This c. corresponds, with some unimportant differences, to several distinct sections in 2 S, viz. 11¹ 12²⁰⁻³¹ 21¹⁸⁻²².

2. David took, etc.] This implies David's presence at Rabbah, and as it stands here is inconsistent with the previous verse. In 2 S 12 the discrepancy is explained by a passage which Chronicles omits, relating that Joab summoned David to Rabbah and that the king went thither.

5. Elhanan the son of Jair, etc.] Both this passage and the parallel in 2 S 21¹⁹ have undergone corruption, and the true text probably had 'Elhanan the son of Jair, a Bethlehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite.' As Goliath is said in 2 S 17 to have been killed by David, there seems to have been variant accounts of his death, unless there were two giants of the same name.

CHAPTER 21

DAVID'S NUMBERING OF THE PEOPLE AND HIS PUNISHMENT

This c. is parallel to 2 S 24, but includes a few additions: see vv. 6, 26.

1. Satan] In 2 S 24¹ the LORD is said to have been angry with Israel, and to have moved David to number the people; for the Hebrews in early times did not hesitate to describe God as prompting to evil as well as to good, men being punished for one sin by being led to commit another. But in later ages the idea that God tempted men to wrong was felt to conflict with His absolute holiness; and this created the belief that temptation was the work of a spirit of malevolent character, who, though subordinate to, and attendant upon, God, was yet an adversary (lit. the 'Satan') of men, and sought to bring about their ruin (see on 1 K 22^{21, 22} Job 1^{6, 7} Zech 3¹). In Job and Zechariah the name is still only a title; but in Chronicles it has become a proper name (being used without the article).

5. A thousand thousand, etc.] 2 S 24⁹ represents Israel as 800,000 and Judah 500,000. According to 27²⁴ the numbers were not entered in the official records, and they have probably undergone corruption in the course of transmission.

6. But Levi, etc.] This is not mentioned in 2 S. If the numbering of the people was due to a presumptuous reliance upon material resources, or some specific command connected with the taking of a census (e.g. Ex 30¹¹⁻¹⁶) had been neglected, the non-inclusion of two tribes by Joab was perhaps a device to prevent the full completion of the king's purpose, in the hope of averting the evil consequences that were feared.

12. Three years' famine] This harmonises better than the 'seven years' of 2 S 24¹³ with the three months and three days. 15. Ornan] in 2 S 24¹⁶ 'Araunah' or 'Ornah.' 18. The angel . . Gad] For divine communications made to prophets through angels cp. 1 K 13¹⁸ 19^{5, 7} Zech 1¹¹, etc. 23. Meat offering] RV 'Meat offering': and so elsewhere. 25. Six hundred shekels of gold] in 2 S 24²⁴ 'fifty shekels of silver.'

26. Answered . . by fire] Other instances of sacrifices consumed by fire from heaven occur in Lv 9²⁴ 1 K 18³⁸ 2 Ch 7¹. This fact is not recorded by the writer of Samuel, but is specially mentioned by the Chronicler because the acceptance of the sacrifice was taken by David to indicate where he was to build his intended Temple, the preparations for which are described in the next chapter.

30. He was afraid] In his alarm David was loath to leave the spot where God's favour had just been renewed to him.

CHAPTER 22

DAVID'S PREPARATIONS FOR THE BUILDING OF THE TEMPLE

This c. is supplementary to the narrative in the earlier books, its contents coming chronologically between 2 S 24 and 1 K 1.

1. This is the house] This v. connects with 21²⁸ (21^{29,30} being parenthetical). 2. The strangers] i.e. the non-Israelite population, who were employed in forced labour upon his building projects: 2 Ch 2¹⁷.

9. Solomon . . peace] Heb. Shelômôh . . Sha-lôm. Peace was the ideal condition appropriate for the building of God's Temple as well as for the advent of Him who was greater than the Temple: Lk 2¹⁴.

14. In my trouble] Some render 'in spite of my trouble,' i.e. in spite of wars and other distractions. David, like other loyal servants of God, was content to pave the way for the accomplishment of a result which he himself would never witness. An hundred thousand, etc.] The weight of gold and silver is so enormous, amounting in intrinsic value to £1,025,000,000 sterling, that great exaggeration may be suspected. The gold that was received annually by Solomon was only 666 talents: 1 K 10¹⁴.

19. The holy vessels] e.g. the table of shewbread, the candlesticks (or lampstands), with their lamps and snuffers, the cups, basons, and spoons, etc.

CHAPTER 23

DAVID MAKES SOLOMON KING. PARTICULARS RELATING TO THE LEVITES

This and the following three chs. (supplementing the earlier history) describe the arrangements made by David for the organisation of the Temple service after Solomon had been appointed his successor. The incidents relating to this last event, which are recorded in 1 K 1, are omitted by the writer, who passes over all David's domestic troubles.

3. From the age of thirty years] This limit is given in Nu 4³, but 'twenty-five' is fixed in Nu 8²⁴, possibly having in view different and lighter duties. By their polls] i.e. by heads. 9. Shimei] This was a fourth son of 'Laadan,' not the 'Shimei' of vv. 7, 10, who was Laadan's brother. 11. Zizah] the 'Zina' of v. 10. Jeush . . Beriah] These together constituted a third 'course' belonging to the house of the elder Shimei, RV 'they became a fathers' house in one reckoning.'

14. His sons . . Levi] i.e. the sons of Moses were reckoned as Levites, not (like the sons of Aaron) as priests.

24. From the age of twenty years] David, at the end of his reign (v. 27), seems to have lowered the limit of age (see v. 3) above which the Levites entered on their duties, and his regulations were observed in subsequent times: 2 Ch 31¹⁷ Ezr 3⁸. 27. By the last words] better, 'in the Last Acts,' i.e. a history of the closing part of his reign. 29. For all . . size] i.e. for dispensing the various quantities used for the different offerings (as in Ex 29⁴⁰).

31. The set feasts] These were the festivals of the Passover, Unleavened Bread, Weeks, and Tabernacles; for the number of victims appointed for each occasion see Nu 28, 29.

CHAPTER 24

THE COURSES OF THE SONS OF AARON

1. Divisions . . Aaron] i.e. courses of the priests, corresponding to the course of the Levites described in 23⁶. 3. Ahimelech] an error (through an accidental omission) for 'Abiathar son of Ahimelech,' and so in v. 31.

4. Chief men] i.e. heads of families or clans (the 'principal households' of v. 6).

6. Ahimelech the son of Abiathar] to be corrected into 'Abiathar son of Ahimelech.'

19. These were the orderings, etc.] i.e. the order in which they succeeded one another in attendance at the Temple had been determined by Aaron.

20. And the rest of the sons of Levi, etc.] The section vv. 20-30 gives the names of the representatives of the 'courses' of Levites, enumerated in 23^{6,4}, but with the omission of the 'courses' of the Gershonites: vv. 7-11.

26. Beno] This is not a proper name, but means 'his son,' Jaaziah being a third son of Merari. 29. Kish] another son of Mahli: see 23²¹. 31. Over against] better, 'equally with.'

PARTICULARS RESPECTING THE SINGERS

1. Separated to the service] RV 'separated for the service certain of the sons,' etc. Jeduthun] as in 16⁴¹, this name takes the place of 'Ethan' in other lists: 6¹⁴ 15¹⁷. Prophecy] see on v. 5. And the number . . was] The sentence is interrupted, and continued in v. 7.

3. Six] only five names are given, but the LXX adds a sixth, 'Shimei': cp. v. 17.

5. The king's seer] Music and singing were often associated with prophecy (cp. 18^{16,17}), and conversely the Temple singers are here accounted seers: cp. 'prophecy,' v. 5. In the words of God] better, 'in matters pertaining to God': cp. 26³². To lift up the horn] i.e. the number of Heman's sons enhanced his dignity: cp. Ps 89¹⁷.

8. They cast lots, etc.] The wards of Asaph alternated with an equal number of wards of Jeduthun until they were exhausted; then the rest of Jeduthun's wards alternated with an equal number of Heman's; and finally the residue of Heman's followed in unbroken succession.

11. Izri] Some of the names in vv. 9-31 differ slightly from those that occur in vv. 2-4, 'Izri' being the 'Zeri' of v. 3, 'Jesharelah' the 'Asarelah' of v. 2, and 'Azareel' the 'Uzri' of v. 4.

CHAPTER 26

PARTICULARS RESPECTING VARIOUS TEMPLE OFFICIALS

1. The divisions of the porters] i.e. the courses of the gate-keepers or sentries who stood on guard at the entrances of the Temple. They were drawn from three families, Meshelemiah (the 'Shallum' of 9¹⁹), Obed-edom, and Hosah. Asaph] the 'Ebiasaph' of 9¹⁹. 5. For God blessed him] see 13¹⁴. The blessing consisted in the number of his children: cp. Gn 1²⁸ 24⁶⁰.

13. For every gate] Though the Temple was not yet built, David is regarded as having settled the plan of it: see 28^{11f}. 14. Shelemiah] the 'Meshelemiah' of vv. 1, 2. 15. The house of Asuppin] RV 'the storehouse,' and so in v. 17.

16. To Shuppin and] the name Shuppin is an accidental repetition of the previous 'Asuppin.' To each of the three families of porters were allotted the gates on one of the four sides of the house, the gates on the fourth side being assigned to the eldest son of Meshelemiah. The gate Shalleeheth has not been identified. The causeway] some road leading up the Temple hill.

18. Parbar] RM 'the Precinct,' possibly a colonnade or portico. 25. His brethren] i.e. his cousins. 27. Out of the spoils] So in Joshua's time, the spoils of Jericho were put into the treasury of the LORD: Josh 6²⁴.

30. On this side Jordan westward] RV 'beyond Jordan westward': an expression which indicates that the writer did not live in Palestine. 31. Jazer of Gilead] a town in the territory of Gad: Josh 13³⁵ 21³⁹.

CHAPTER 27

PARTICULARS RESPECTING VARIOUS MILITARY OFFICERS

This e., as distinguished from the four preceding chapters which describe David's ecclesiastical officials, relates to his secular officers.

1. Which came . . . out] i.e. relieved each other in turn: ep. 2 Ch 23⁸. For particulars concerning several of the officers mentioned in the following vv. see e. 11. 3. Of the children, etc.] RV 'He was of the children of Perez, the chief of,' etc. 4. Dodai] The words 'Eleazar son of' have been lost: cp. 11¹². 5. A chief priest] RV 'of Jehoiada the priest, chief.'

16. Over the tribes] In the following list Gad and Asher are omitted, and the Aaronites are distinguished from the Levites. 18. Elihu] the 'Eliab' of 2¹³ 1S 16⁶. 23. From twenty years old and under] In Nu 1⁸ it is laid down that those required for military service should be above this age.

25. Over the king's treasures] The account implies that David had large private estates as well as considerable accumulations of treasure. Some of his possessions may have formed part of what the king could claim from the nation in virtue of his position (ep. 1S 8^{14,15}), or may have been given him freely by his subjects (cp. 1S 10²⁷), but the bulk was doubtless derived from his successful wars (see 1S 30²⁰ 2S 8⁶⁻⁸). The lands in the low plains (v. 28) were probably in part taken from the Philistines. Castles] better, 'towers' to shelter the herdmen and serve as look-outs.

27. Over the increase, etc.] better, 'over the wine-cellar which were in the vineyards.'

28. The sycomore trees] not the English tree that goes by this name, but one that bears a fig-like fruit. The low plains] RV 'Lowland': a name applied to the downs that extend from the central hills to the maritime plain.

32. David's uncle] better, 'David's nephew': see 20⁷. 34. Jehoiada the son of Benaiah] probably to be corrected to 'Benaiah the son of Jehoiada': cp. 18¹⁷.

Some of the names mentioned in this e. belonged to periods much earlier than David's closing years, for Asahel (v. 7) was killed before David became king at Jerusalem (2S 2^{14f}), and Abithophel killed himself in the course of Absalom's rebellion: 2S 17²³.

CHAPTER 28

DAVID'S LAST DIRECTIONS

2. The footstool of our God] i.e. the Mercy Seat: 2S 6² Ps 132⁷. 5. The throne of the kingdom of the LORD] ep. 17¹⁴ 29²³. Israel's kings were the LORD's viceregents and representatives: He was their true ruler. 7. If he be constant] The continuance of God's favour was conditional upon continued obedience, and the writer, living after the exile, knew how the condition had been violated.

11. The pattern] The pattern of the Tabernacle is similarly stated to have been communicated to Moses by God: Ex 25^{9,40}. The houses] the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place: see 1 K 6. Treasuries . . . upper chambers] probably the side-chambers, described in 1 K 6^{5f}, of which there were three storeys. Inner parlours] perhaps the lowest of the side-chambers.

12. By the spirit] i.e. by revelation. The chambers round about] perhaps detached buildings constructed round the courts that enclosed the Temple. 15. Candlesticks] better 'lamp-stands,' and so elsewhere. Ten are mentioned in 1 K 7⁴⁹, but only one in 2 Ch 13¹¹. 16. The tables] Ten are alluded to again in 2 Ch 4⁸, but only a single table is mentioned in 1 K 7⁴⁸ 2 Ch 13¹¹ 29¹⁸. 18. The chariot of the cherubims] RV 'the chariot, even the cherubim':

cp. Ps 18¹⁰ Ezk 1. 10^{8f}. 20. He will not fail thee] A similar assurance of God's constant aid was given to Jacob and Joshua: Gn 28¹⁵ Josh 1⁵.

CHAPTER 29

DAVID'S OFFERINGS, THANKSGIVING, AND DEATH

1. The palace] The word in the original is more strictly applicable to the fortress which was attached to the Second Temple (Neh 2⁸) and afterwards called the tower of Antonia, but here and in v. 19 is employed of Solomon's Temple.

3. Of mine own proper good] RV 'a treasure of mine own.' 4. Three thousand, etc.] The weights here named, as in many other places in Chronicles, are incredibly large, amounting in value to £21,320,000 of our money.

7. Drams] The dram (Gk. drachma) was $\frac{1}{2}$ shekel; and the value (according to the early Hebrew weights) of all the gold mentioned in this v. would be about £30,760,000, and of the silver about £4,100,000.

10. And David said] David in his prayer recognised that it was not in his, or any man's, power to add to God's glory. The building of the Temple could only manifest his and his people's devotion and gratitude for the goodness which had bestowed such wealth upon them. 15. None abiding] better, 'no hope of abiding.'

20. Worshipped the . . king] cp. Ps 45¹¹. The same kind of prostrations were made both in divine worship and in paying respect to the sovereign.

22. The second time] The 'first time' is only described at length in 1 K 1³⁰, though the writer of Chronicles alludes to it in 23¹.

Zadok to be priest] This seems to anticipate the promotion which Zadok received when Solomon, after David's death, deposed Abiathar: 1 K 2²⁷. 30. The times that went over him] i.e. the fortunes that befell him.

2 CHRONICLES

CHAPTER 1

SOLOMON'S CHOICE OF WISDOM. HIS WEALTH AND COMMERCE

This c., after the opening vv., repeats, with some modifications and additions, what is related in 1 K 3³⁻¹⁴ and 10²⁰⁻²⁹.

5. The brasen altar] This identification of the altar at Gibeon with the brazen altar of the Tabernacle is an addition made to 1 K 3⁴.

CHAPTER 2

SOLOMON'S NEGOTIATIONS WITH HIRAM

This c. substantially reproduces 1 K 5, with some differences in numbers, names, and expressions.

1. An house for his kingdom] The description of this, which is given at length in 1 K 7, is omitted by the Chronicler.

5. Is great] i.e. in magnificence, but not in actual dimensions—the external length and breadth being only 120 x 45 ft., less than many parish churches. It was not intended to hold an assemblage of worshippers, but to be a sanctuary for the Deity, where He might receive the offerings of His servants: v. 6.

10. Beaten wheat] probably a corruption of 'wheat for food': cp. 1 K 5¹¹.

13. Of Hiram my father's] RM 'even Hiram my father': the term 'father' being a title of honour: cp. Gn 45⁸. But the whole expression may be a proper name, 'Hiram Abi'; and so in 4¹⁶. 14. A woman . . of Dan] see on 1 K 7¹⁴, where she is termed a widow of Naphtali. 16. Joppa] The modern Jaffa, some 35 m. from Jerusalem.

17. The strangers] Solomon in imposing forced labour upon his subjects did not, like his father, confine it to those who were of foreign origin, but extended it to native Israelites: 1 K 5¹⁸. 18. In the mountain] probably the hill-country of Judah.

CHAPTER 3

PARTICULARS RELATING TO THE TEMPLE

This and the following c. abbreviate what is recorded in 1 K 6, 7.

1. Moriah] Here the designation of the Temple hill, but in Gn 22² of the 'land' in which was situated the hill where Isaac was to be sacrificed. Where the LORD appeared unto] better 'which was shown unto,' i.e. by the acceptance of the king's sacrifice (1 Ch 21²⁵ 22¹).

3. These are the things, etc.] RV 'these are the foundations which Solomon laid': the v. going on to give the ground plan. After the first measure] This implies that the length of the cubit had changed between the time of Solomon and that of the writer of Chronicles. Ezekiel (40⁵) speaks of a cubit measuring a cubit and a hand-breadth, which, if the smaller cubit was equal to 6 hand-breadths (about 18 in.), must have been equivalent to 7 (about 21 in.). In estimating the size of the Temple, the cubit, for the sake of convenience, has been reckoned at 18 in. ; if the cubit of 21 in. was the one really employed, the dimensions must be modified accordingly.

4. An hundred and twenty] One MS of the LXX has 'twenty.' The figures given in the text are suitable only for a tower, not a porch.

5. The greater house] i.e. the Holy Place.

Cieled] The walls, as well as the roof, were lined with wood. Chains] i.e. festoons of chain work, carved in relief. 6. Parvaim] unknown.

10. Of image work] LXX has 'wrought-in wood': cp. 1 K 6²³. 11. Twenty cubits] This was the length of the four wings together.

13. Inward] RV 'toward the house': i.e. the Holy Place. 14. The veil] This is not mentioned in Kings. 15. Thirty and five] In 1 K 7¹⁵ 'eighteen': see also 2 K 25¹⁷ Jer 52²¹.

16. Chains, as in the oracle] The text is probably corrupt; the chains must be 'the wreaths of chain work' of 1 K 7¹⁷, which were carved on the capitals.

CHAPTER 4

THE CONTENTS OF THE TEMPLE

1. An altar] This was in the Temple court. Though its construction is not described in Kings, it is mentioned in 1 K 8⁶⁴ 2 K 16¹⁴.

3. Oxen] rather, 'knops' (i.e. gourds): see 1 K 7²⁴. 7. According to their form] RV 'According to the ordinance concerning them.' In the temple] i.e. in the Holy Place.

9. The great court] The word here used differs from that employed for 'the court of the priests.' It was in the 'great court' that the scaffold mentioned in 6¹³ was placed: see on 1 K 7⁹. 10. The right side of the east end] i.e. at the SE. corner. 12. Pommels] RV 'bowls,' i.e. the globes of the capitals; and so in v. 13. 14. He made... made he] probably an error for 'ten...ten.' 16. Fleshhooks] probably an error for 'basons,' v. 11: cp. 1 K 7⁴⁵.

20. After the manner] RV 'according to the ordinance.' In the Law (Ex 27²¹) it was required that a light should burn always before the veil. 22. The entry] probably an error for 'the hinges,' 1 K 7⁵⁰.

CHAPTER 5

THE REMOVAL OF THE ARK TO THE TEMPLE

This c. is a repetition of 1 K 8¹⁻⁹, with additional particulars respecting the descent of the glory of the LORD.

4. The Levites... the ark] The mention of 'the Levites' in this connexion is more in accordance with the requirements of the Law than the statement of 1 K 8⁸ that the 'priests' took up the ark.

9. From the ark] better (as in the LXX) 'from the Holy Place': cp. 1 K 8⁸. Unto this day] The Chronicler, like the compiler of Kings, retains the expression of the original writer, who lived before the destruction of the Temple.

11. Did not... course] On this occasion all the priests (and not a single course only) had sanctified themselves to officiate. 12. At the east end] i.e. facing westward, towards the Temple building.

CHAPTER 6

SOLOMON'S PRAYER

The first 39 vv. of this c. repeat 1 K 8¹²⁻⁵⁰, the conclusion of the prayer, as given in 8⁶¹⁻⁶¹, being omitted and three additional vv. being substituted.

5. Neither chose I any man] Saul, though chosen, was subsequently rejected: 1 S 15²⁶.

13. For Solomon had made, etc.] This is not mentioned in 1 K 8.

41. Now therefore arise, etc.] The same words occur in Ps 132^{8,9}. Be clothed with... goodness] i.e. enjoy victory and prosperity.

42. Turn not away, etc.] i.e. do not reject his prayer and make him turn away in disappointment. For anointed cp. 1 S 12⁸ 24⁶.

The mercies of David] i.e. the mercies promised and shown to David: cp. Ps 89⁴⁹.

CHAPTER 7

SOLOMON'S SACRIFICES, AND THE LORD'S PROMISES

This c. reproduces with some additions portions of 1 K 8⁶²⁻⁶⁹ and 9¹⁻⁹.

1. The fire came down] This, which marked the acceptance of Solomon's sacrifice (cp. 1 Ch 21²⁶), is not mentioned in 1 K 8.

21. Shall be an astonishment] i.e. a cause of astonishment.

CHAPTER 8

SOLOMON'S BUILDINGS. HIS TRADE WITH OPHIR

This c. reproduces the substance of 1 K 9¹⁰⁻²⁸ but describes some additional buildings.

2. Had restored] If the reference is to the cities which Solomon gave to Hiram, it seems best to assume that they had been merely pledged as security for money which Solomon borrowed and afterwards repaid: 1 K 9¹⁴.

3. Hamath-zobah] Perhaps a Hamath in Zobah (a country E. of the Sea of Galilee, in the region of the modern Haurân).

4. Tadmor] the later Palmyra, a city 150 m. NE. of Damascus in the Syrian desert.

8. Them did Solomon, etc.] RV 'of them did Solomon raise a levy of bondservants.' 13. After a certain rate, etc.] RV 'as the duty of every day required': cp. v. 14. 16. Unto the day] LXX has 'from the day.'

18. In 1K9²⁶⁻²⁸ it is stated that Solomon 'made' a navy of ships at Eziongaber, and that Hiram sent him skilled mariners.

CHAPTER 9

THE VISIT OF THE QUEEN OF SHEBA.

SOLOMON'S SPLENDOUR

This c. is a close repetition of 1K10¹⁻²⁸ and 11⁴¹⁻⁴⁸.

8. On his throne] i.e. God's throne: see on 1Ch28⁵.

10, 11. These vv. should follow v. 12.

11. Terraces] 1K10¹² has 'pillars' (or balustrades).

12. That which she had brought] 1K10¹³ has 'beside that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty.'

21. The king's ships went to Tarshish] If this is not a misunderstanding of the phrase 'ships of Tarshish' (1K10²²), which describes a particular kind of vessel, it must be assumed that Solomon's ships sailed from a Phœnician port, Tarshish (whether Tartessus or Tarsus) being on the Mediterranean.

29. In the book, etc.] The three works here referred to may possibly have been inserted in 'the book of the kings of Israel and Judah' (see 16¹¹, etc.), as was the case with the 'book of Jehu the son of Hanani' (20³⁴ RV).

CHAPTER 10

REIGN OF REHOBOAM

This c. is a repetition of 1K12¹⁻¹⁹ with slight differences.

2. Returned out of Egypt] Preferable to 1K12², 'Jeroboam dwelt in Egypt.'

4. Thy father made, etc.] The passages in 1K5^{13,14} 11²⁸, which throw light upon the oppressiveness of Solomon, are omitted by the Chronicler.

This c. repeats the substance of 1K12²¹⁻²⁴, and adds much information relating to Rehoboam's buildings, the withdrawal of the Levites from the kingdom of Jeroboam, and Rehoboam's marriages.

5. Built cities] Of the towns named in the following vv. Beth-lehem, Tekoa, Beth-zur, Adoraim, Ziph, and Hebron, were in the hill-country of Judah; Etam, Shoco, Adullam, Mareshah, Azekah, Zorah and Aijalon, were in the lowlands, whilst Gath (a Philistine city, which in Solomon's reign was independent) and Lachish were in the maritime plain. The fortification of these places was intended to guard the Judæan frontier on the side of Egypt, with which country Jeroboam had had friendly relations: 10².

14. Cast them off] When Jeroboam made priests from all the tribes indifferently, the Levites lost their privileged position as the only legitimate priestly tribe.

15. Devils] lit. 'he-goats,' the deities that were worshipped being supposed to assume the forms of these animals, like the Greek Satyrs and the Roman Faunus.

18. Jerimoth] not included in the list in 1Ch3¹⁻⁹, so that he was probably the son of a concubine. And Abihail] RV 'and of Abihail': Abihail being the wife of Jerimoth and mother of Mahalath. 20. Daughter] probably 'granddaughter': see 2S14²⁷ and 13¹.

Abijah] The 'Abijam' of 1K15¹.

23. He dealt wisely] By acting as here described he sought to secure the tranquil succession of the son whom he had chosen as his heir: cp. 21³. Desired] probably for his sons.

CHAPTER 12

REIGN OF REHOBOAM (concluded)

This c. is parallel to 1K14²¹⁻³¹, but supplies additional particulars respecting Shishak's army and the prophet Shemaiah.

3. The Lubims, the Sukkiims] The Lubims were probably Libyans; the Sukkiims, who are not mentioned elsewhere, are called in LXX 'Troglodytes,' i.e. 'cave-dwellers.'

6. The princes of Israel] The term 'Israel' is often applied in Chronicles to the people of Judah, as more nearly realising the ideal of the true Israel than the sister kingdom: cp. 20³⁴ 21^{2,4} 23² 24⁵ 28^{10,23}.

12. Things went well] RV 'there were good things found': cp. 19³ 1K14¹³. The king's repentance was accompanied by a moral reformation on the part of the people.

15. The book of . . . Iddo] The writings of Iddo are also mentioned in 9²⁹, 13²².

CHAPTER 13

REIGN OF ABIJAH

This c. expands the account given of Abijah (Abijam) in 1K15¹⁻⁸ by giving details of his war with Jeroboam, which is there only briefly mentioned.

2. Michaiiah] In 11²¹ and 1K15² she is called 'Maachah,' and was probably daughter of Uriel and granddaughter of Absalom.

3. Four hundred thousand, etc.] These numbers (see also v. 17) are in keeping with the large figures that appear elsewhere in Chronicles: see 14^{8,9} 17¹⁴⁻¹⁸.

4. Zemaraim] Possibly a hill near the place of the same name in Benjamin: Josh18²².

5. A covenant of salt] cp. Nu18¹⁹. The use of salt in connexion with sacrifice (see Lv2¹³) probably arose from its association with a meat; and 'there is salt between us' is said to be a phrase still employed to denote the bond which secures, for any one who has partaken of an Arab's hospitality, protection and (in case of need) assistance.

7. Children of Belial] i.e. worthless persons. Young] That Rehoboam was young when the Ten Tribes revolted is implied in 10⁸, though in 12¹³ his age is given as 41.

8. The kingdom of the LORD] The high prerogative that once belonged to all Israel (1 Ch 28⁵ 2 Ch 9⁸) was now confined to Judah.

9. After the manner, etc.] The LXX has 'out of the people of all the land,' which agrees with the true sense of 1 K 12³¹. 12. Sounding trumpets] cp. Nu 10⁹ 31⁶. 19. Jeshanah . . Ephraim] The first is not known, the second is identified by some with the 'Ephraim' mentioned in Jn 11⁵⁴. 20. The mention of Jeroboam's death here is chronologically out of place, since he outlived Abijah.

22. In the story] RV 'in the commentary.' The original term ('midrash') meant the didactic treatment of a subject or narrative; and in the 'midrash' of Iddo the reign of Abijah was presumably related with a view to moral instruction rather than historic accuracy. Possibly the account of Abijah's speech in vv. 4-12 has been taken from it: contrast 1 K 15³

REIGN OF ASA

This c. adds to what is related of Asa in 1 K 15⁹⁻²⁴ an account of the invasion of the Ethiopian Zerah.

3. Took away . . the high places] In 15¹⁷ (= 1 K 15¹⁴) the opposite of this is stated; if the two passages are to be reconciled, it must be supposed that Asa sought to effect a reform which was only imperfectly executed: cp. also 17⁶ with 20²³.

7. The land is yet before us] i.e. free from the presence of an enemy.

9. Zerah] Zerah, if an Ethiopian (Heb. Cushite) or Egyptian, is probably to be identified with Osorkon II, an Egyptian king of the 22nd dynasty, who, on a monument recently found, declares that 'the upper and lower Rutennu' (i.e. the peoples of Palestine) had been thrown under his feet. But in v. 14 the cities spoiled by Asa after the defeat of the invaders are said to be near Gerar; so that Zerah may have been the chief of an Arabian tribe, a view with which the description of the spoil taken by Asa (v. 15) agrees. Mareshah] in the lowland of Judah (Josh 15⁴¹), where there are some ruins still called 'Mar'ash.' To the N. there is a Wady called 'Wady es Sufieh,' which may be Zephathah.

11. It is nothing, etc.] RV 'there is none beside thee to help, between the mighty and him that hath no strength': i.e. to help the weak under unequal conditions. Asa's prayer 'breathes the true spirit of faith and trust in God.'

13. Gerar] 6 m. S. of Gaza and 25 m.

from Beersheba. 14. The fear of the LORD, etc.] They were so panic-stricken that they could offer no resistance: cp. 17¹⁰ 20²⁹.

15. The tents of cattle] i.e. the tents of nomadic tribes with large possessions of flocks and cattle.

An account of how Asa, moved by the prophet Azariah, made a covenant to seek the LORD.

This c. is almost entirely supplementary to what is recorded of Asa in 1 K 15¹⁵.

1. Azariah] not mentioned elsewhere.

3. For a long season] The writer seems to have principally in view the times of the Judges: see Jg 2¹³ 3⁷ 17⁶ 21²⁵. A teaching priest] For this function of the priesthood cp. Lv 10¹¹ Mal 2⁷.

5. No peace . . came in] i.e. travelling was unsafe: cp. Jg 5⁶ 6². The countries] i.e. the different divisions of Israel: see Jg 12⁴ 20, 21.

8. The prophecy of Oded] The words 'Azariah son of' have dropped out before Oded: the Vulgate has them. The cities . . taken] This seems to refer to the conquests of Abijah: 13¹⁹.

9. The strangers] Those members of the Ten Tribes who removed to Judah on account of the calf-worship: 11¹⁶. Simeon] The territory of Simeon must have practically belonged to Judah from the time of Jeroboam's revolt, but some Simeonites may have resided in the northern kingdom.

11. The spoil] i.e. the spoil taken from the Ethiopians: 14¹³⁻¹⁵.

19. Five and thirtieth] This is inconsistent with the chronology given in 1 K, for Baasha died in the 26th year of Asa (1 K 16⁸); but see on 16¹.

CHAPTER 16

REIGN OF ASA (concluded)

This c. reproduces with some verbal differences 1 K 15¹⁷⁻²⁴, but adds an account of a rebuke received by Asa from the seer Hanani.

1. Six and thirtieth] Since, according to 1 K 16⁸, Baasha did not live until the 36th year of Asa, some have supposed that the six and thirtieth year is reckoned from the revolt of the Ten Tribes.

4. The store cities of Naphtali] LXX suggests that the true reading is 'the surrounding parts of Naphtali.'

7. Hanani] Nothing is known of him beyond what is here related, and the fact that he was the father of the prophet Jehu (19²). Because thou hast relied] cp. the similar protests of Isaiah against reliance upon foreign support instead of upon the LORD (Isa 30¹ 31¹). The host of . . Syria] The prophet seems to imply that Asa might have beaten both Israel and Syria, if he had trusted in the LORD.

8. Lubims] These were not amongst the forces of Zerah (14⁹), but those of Shishak (12³).

12. Sought not to the LORD] Contrast the conduct of Hezekiah in his sickness: see 2 K 20².

14. A very great burning] i.e. of the spices previously mentioned: cp. Jer 34⁵. The bodies of the dead were not ordinarily burnt but buried; the burning of the bodies of Saul and Jonathan (1 S 31¹²) was exceptional.

CHAPTER 17

REIGN OF JEHOShAPHAT

An account of a mission of Levites to teach the Law, and of the king's army.

The particulars of Jehoshaphat's reign here given are additional to those contained in 1 K 22⁴¹⁻⁵⁰.

1. Strengthened himself against Israel] Jehoshaphat came to the throne in the fourth year of Ahab, and it is probable that some interval elapsed before he made peace with him, as recorded in 1 K 22⁴¹.

2. Which Asa . . taken] see 15⁸, and note.

3. His father David] LXX omits 'David,' so that his father means Asa, whose early actions (14²) are here contrasted with the oppressiveness and want of faith that he displayed in his later years (16⁷⁻¹⁰). Baalim] RV 'the Baalim' (and so elsewhere), i.e. the various false gods to each of whom the title 'Baal' (= Lord), was applied.

4. The doings of Israel] an allusion either to the worship of the calves (13^{8,9}) or to that of the Zidonian Baal, introduced into Israel by Jezebel the wife of Jehoshaphat's contemporary, Ahab.

7. He sent to his princes] The princes were to organise the teaching which was carried out by the Levites named in the next v.

9. Went about] This is the only record in the historical books of the diffusion of a knowledge of the Law by means of a mission. In the reign of Josiah (2 K 23²) and after the return from the exile (Neh 8²⁻¹³) the Law was merely read before assemblies of the people at Jerusalem.

13. Much business] i.e. was busily employed on works of defence. And the men of war . . were] better, 'and he had men of war . . in Jerusalem.'

14-18. It is generally agreed that there must be some error in these enormous numbers.

This c. reproduces 1 K 22¹⁻³⁷ with very slight differences.

31. The LORD helped him] This, which is an addition to the narrative of Kings, seems to imply that the writer regarded Jehoshaphat's cry as a prayer for help, which God answered, as explained in the next v.

The c. narrates how Jehoshaphat was improved by the seer Jehu for helping Ahab, and how he instituted judges in the cities of Judah.

This c. is entirely supplementary to the account of Jehoshaphat as given in 1 K.

2. Jehu] previously only named in connexion with the northern kingdom in the reign of Baasha (1 K 16⁷). Shouldest thou help the ungodly] The peace with Israel, ratified by a marriage (2 K 8¹⁸), put an end to a war between two kindred peoples, yet brought evils in its train, since the Baal worship which polluted the northern kingdom was introduced into Judah by Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and the daughter-in-law of Jehoshaphat: 24⁷.

5. He set judges] Local courts of justice may have existed before, but Jehoshaphat improved them, and likewise established a court in the capital, which seems also to have heard appeals: v. 10.

6. The LORD . . judgment] Judges were administrators of the divine justice, so that even the term 'God' could be used to describe them in their official capacity: see Ex 21⁶ RV.

8. For the judgment of the LORD . . controversies] Perhaps the former means cases relating to religious obligations, and the latter ordinary civil and criminal trials. When they returned] RV 'and they returned,' the reference being to the king and his retinue.

10. Between blood and blood] e.g. the determination of what was murder and what was merely manslaughter: cp. Ex 21. Between law and commandment] i.e. the decision, where laws seemed to conflict, which of them applied to a particular case.

11. And, behold, etc.] The court at Jerusalem was divided into two sections, one (under Amariah) dealing with ecclesiastical causes, and the other (under Zebadiah) dealing with secular causes.

CHAPTER 20

REIGN OF JEHOShAPHAT (concluded)

An account of how a host of Moabites and others invaded Judah; how Jehoshaphat prayed to the LORD, and was directed by Jahaziel not to fear; and how the enemy was overthrown by God.

The early part of this c. is additional to the narrative in 1 K: the latter part reproduces 1 K 22⁴¹⁻⁴⁹.

1. Other beside the Ammonites] better (with LXX), 'some of the Meunim' (or Maonites): cp. 26⁷ and Jg 10¹². They seem to have been the people from Mt. Seir mentioned in vv. 10, 23.

2. Beyond the sea] i.e. from the eastern side of the Dead Sea. On this side Syria] lit. 'from Syria,' but Syria is probably a mistake for 'Edom.' The Moabites and Ammonites had marched round the S. end of the Dead Sea, and passing through Edom (the 'Mount Seir' of v. 10) had been joined by some of the inhabitants. En-gedi] on the W. shore of the Dead Sea, the modern Ain-jidy.

5. Before the new court] probably 'the court of the priests' of 4⁹, which was distinct from the one in which Solomon prayed : 6¹⁸.

10. Wouldest not let, etc.] The Moabites, Ammonites, and Edonites were all spared on the ground of their kinship with Israel through Lot and Esau : Dt 2^{4, 9, 19}.

16. Ziz] The word perhaps survives in the name El Husasah which attaches to a district near Tekoa : v. 20.

21. The beauty of holiness] Perhaps better, 'in holy apparel' : cp. 1 Ch 16²⁰.

22. Ambushments] RV 'liers in wait.' Apparently the enemy fell out among themselves.

25. Riches with the dead bodies] LXX points to another reading, 'riches and garments.'

26. Berachah] i.e. 'Blessing.' The place has been identified with the Wady Bereikût near Tekoa.

34. Who is mentioned] RV '(the book) which is inserted in.'

36. To go to Tarshish] 1 K 22⁴⁸ has 'ships of Tarshish' (i.e. large merchantmen) 'to go to Ophir' (in Arabia, or E. Africa), for which Ezion-geber was the natural port of departure.

CHAPTER 21

REIGN OF JEHORAM

This c. in part reproduces 2 K 8¹⁷⁻²² but adds several particulars respecting the judgments brought upon Jehoram.

2. Azariah . . Azariah] One of the names is probably an error, perhaps for 'Ahaziah' : cp. the mistake in 22⁶. 3. And their father] cp. 11²³.

10. So the Edomites revolted] The writer omits the final sentence in 2 K 8²¹ which accounts for the successful revolt of the Edomites : see note there.

11. Fornication] A figure for religious infidelity.

12. A writing . . from Elijah] If this mention of Elijah as living in the reign of Jehoram is to be reconciled with 2 K 3¹¹, which relates that Elisha (Elijah's successor) prophesied in the reign of Jehoshaphat, it must be supposed that Elisha entered upon his ministry before Elijah was translated ; and that 2 K 2 is out of its proper chronological order. The incident here described is the only instance of Elijah having concerned himself with the affairs of Judah.

14. A great plague] i.e. the great blow inflicted by the invasion described in v. 16.

16. The LORD stirred up] The invaders, though pursuing designs of their own, were really agents of the divine judgment : cp. 1 Ch 5²⁰ Isa 10⁵⁻⁷ 37²⁴⁻²⁹. The Arabians . . Ethiopians] These Arabians came from the W. coast of Arabia, facing Ethiopia across the Red Sea.

17. In the king's house] better, 'belonging to the king's house.' It is not meant that the invaders assaulted Jerusalem, but that they carried off the royal property in the country districts. Jehoahaz] called in 22¹ 'Ahaziah.'

19. Made no burning, etc.] i.e. they did not use the same quantity of spices as were burnt at the funeral rites of former kings. 20. Departed . . desired] i.e. he died unregretted. But some (following LXX) render 'he walked (i.e. lived) in an undesirable way.'

CHAPTER 22

REIGN OF AHAZIAH

This c. reproduces with some differences 2 K 8²⁴⁻²⁹ and 11¹⁻³ (the intervening chs. being omitted because they relate exclusively to Israel).

2. Forty and two] This must be an error, for his father was only 40 when he died (21²⁰). 2 K 8²⁰ has 'twenty-two.' 6. Azariah] An error for 'Ahaziah,' which LXX has. 7. Had anointed] see 2 K 9¹⁻¹⁰.

8. The sons of the brethren, etc.] i.e. of the elder sons of Jehoram who were killed by the Arabians (21¹⁷). If Jehoram was only 40 at his death (21²⁰), his grandsons at this time (v. 2) must have been quite young children.

9. He was hid in Samaria] 2 K 9²⁷ states that he was mortally wounded in his chariot when escaping from Jehu, and died at Megiddo.

They had slain . . they buried] The first verb refers to the emissaries of Jehu, the second to the servants of the murdered Ahaziah. To keep still] i.e. to retain.

CHAPTER 23

REIGN OF JOASH

This c. repeats 2 K 11¹⁻²⁰, but brings into prominence the ecclesiastical officials in place of the soldiers of the royal guard.

4. This is the thing, etc.] The arrangements differ from those described in 2 K 11 (see note there). Here there are three divisions which are posted (a) at the doors of the Temple, (b) at the palace, (c) at the gate of the foundation (which in 2 K is called the 'gate Sur' and connected with the palace). Here too only priests or Levites are allowed to enter the Temple, whilst the rest take up their position outside ; but in Kings the distinction is not observed.

16. Between him, etc.] RV 'between himself, and all the people, and the king.'

18. Appointed the offices, etc.] better, 'put the offices . . . into the hand of.' The priests the Levites] LXX has (preferably) 'the priests and the Levites,' the priests alone being authorised to offer sacrifice (according to Nu 18⁷).

CHAPTER 24

REIGN OF JOASH (concluded)

An account of the repair of the Temple, the idolatry of Joash after the death of Jehoiada, the murder of Jehoiada's son, and the king's violent death.

The early part of this c. reproduces 2 K 11²¹⁻¹²¹⁶, with unimportant variations, but vv. 15-22 are entirely supplementary, and give a different account of the closing years of the reign of Joash from that contained in 2 K.

6. According to . . . Moses] This refers to the half-shekel required to be paid by every Israelite as an atonement for his soul: Ex 30¹³⁻²⁶.

7. The sons of Athaliah] perhaps her adherents, rather than her children, who had been killed in the lifetime of their father Jehoram: 21¹⁷.

15. An hundred and thirty] an age unprecedented since Joshua: Josh 24²⁹.

16. Among the kings] Jehoiada thus received an honour which was refused to Joash: v. 25.

20. The son of Jehoiada] called in Mt 23³⁵ 'the son of Barachias' by confusion with Zachariah the prophet. Which stood above the people] probably on a platform.

23. The host of Syria] Hazael, the king of Syria, was engaged in attacking Gath, and from thence made an incursion into Judah.

Destroyed all the princes] These were the instigators of the king's impiety: v. 17.

25. The sons of Jehoiada] better, as in LXX, 'the son of Jehoiada' (vv. 20, 21).

27. The burdens, etc.] better, 'the multitude of the oracles uttered against him': see v. 19, and cp. 2 K 9²⁵. The story] RV 'the commentary': see on 13²².

REIGN OF AMAZIAH

This c. is derived in the main from 2 K 14¹⁻²⁰, but with two insertions, vv. 5-10 and 13-16.

5. Made them captains, etc.] better, 'arranged them according to their fathers' houses under captains.' From twenty years old] Under this age military service was not required: Nu 1³ 1 Ch 27²³.

7. With all . . . Ephraim] added to explain the sense in which 'Israel' is used, since ordinarily in Chronicles it is equivalent to Judah: see on 12⁶. For the protest against an alliance with the northern kingdom cp. 19² 20³⁷.

8. But if thou wilt so] LXX has 'if thou thinkest to prevail with these' (i.e. the forces from Ephraim) 'God shall make thee fall.'

11. The children of Seir] i.e. the Edomites.

13. From Samaria] i.e. from the frontier of the kingdom (not from its capital).

14. He brought the gods, etc.] Similarly the Philistines brought away the ark which the Israelites had carried with them into battle at Ebenezer: 1 S 4¹¹.

17. Come, let us, etc.] In connexion with the preceding narrative Amaziah's challenge might be explained as due to a desire to have satisfaction for the conduct of the Israelite forces as described in v. 13, but see on 2 K 14⁸.

23. Jehoahaz] i.e. Ahaziah: 21¹⁷.

24. With Obed-edom] i.e. with the descendants of Obed-edom, who were porters of the Temple: 1 Ch 26⁴⁻⁸.

28. The city of Judah] LXX has 'the city of David,' as in 2 K 14²⁰ and 2 Ch 24¹ 16¹⁴ 21^{1,20}, etc.

CHAPTER 26

REIGN OF UZZIAH

This c. adds largely to the parallel account of Uzziah's reign in 2 K 15¹⁻⁷, and furnishes information respecting his wars, his military defences, and the cause of his leprosy.

1. Uzziah] This is the usual form in Chronicles except in 1 Ch 3¹²; in Kings it is generally 'Azariah.'

6. Jabneh] between Joppa and Ashdod: afterwards called Jamnia.

7. The Mehunims] see on 20¹.

9. The valley gate] probably a gate leading into the valley of Hinnom, at the S. end of the W. hill.

10. In the desert, etc.] Uzziah's cattle were pastured in three different districts, (a) the desert (or wilderness) in the S. and SE. of Judah, which has some fertile spots; (b) the low country (or lowland), consisting of the slopes that extend from the Judean hills to the Mediterranean; (c) the plains, or tableland, E. of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, where Uzziah may have secured rights of pasturage from the Ammonites (v. 8). Carmel] RV 'the fruitful fields': or level gardenland, as distinct from the 'mountains' or hilly districts.

14. Habergeons] RV 'coats of mail.'

Slings to cast stones] RV 'stones for slinging': which had to be supplied of a certain size and in sufficient quantity. 15. Engines] These were machines of the nature of catapults.

16. To his destruction] RV 'so that he did corruptly.' Into the temple] The altar of incense was in the Holy Place. 18. To the priests, etc.] The restriction to the sons of Aaron of the duty of offering incense is enforced in the Law by the history of Korah:

Nu16⁴⁰. 21. In a several house] i.e. in a lazar house. For the seclusion of leprous persons from the community cp. Lv13⁴⁶ Nu5².

22. [Isaiah] The prophet received his prophetic call in the year that Uzziah died (Isa6¹).

23. In the field of the burial, etc.] i.e. in the royal burial ground, but not in the royal sepulchres.

CHAPTER 27

THE REIGN OF JOTHAM

This c. repeats the substance of 2K15³²⁻³⁸, but expands the account of Jotham's buildings, and relates a war with Ammon about which Kings is silent.

2. The people did . . corruptly] If Isa2 is rightly assigned to this reign, it furnishes illustrations of the historian's statement, for it represents idolatry, sorcery, and arrogance, as prevalent amongst the people (Isa2^{6-8, 11 f.}).

3. Ophel] the southern extremity of the Temple hill.

5. Measures] lit. 'cors': a 'cor' being rather more than 10 bushels, the whole quantity of each kind of grain was over 100,000 bushels. For such payments in kind cp. 17¹¹ 2K3⁴.

CHAPTER 28

THE REIGN OF AHAZ

This c. recounts how the idolatry of Ahaz was punished by the attacks of Syria and Israel; how the captives taken by the Israelites were restored; and how Ahaz in his distress appealed to Assyria.

This c. corresponds to 2K16, but it omits many facts related there, whilst expanding the account of the war with Israel.

5. The king of Syria] i.e. Rezin, who, with Pekah of Israel, wished to depose Ahaz: see Isa7.

7. Maaseiah, the king's son] perhaps a son of Jotham and brother of Ahaz, since Ahaz himself was only 20 at his accession and 36 at his death (v. 1). Next to the king] i.e. the principal counsellor of state: cp. Esth10³.

9. That reacheth, etc.] i.e. immoderate and excessive: cp. Ezr9⁶.

16. The kings] The LXX, more appropriately, has 'the king,' the allusion being to Tiglath-pileser (v. 20). But Chronicles frequently uses the plural where the singular would be more accurate: see v. 23, also c. 32^{4, 31} 30⁶.

17. The Edomites] Rezin had previously captured Elath and returned it to the Edomites (2K16⁶), and this doubtless encouraged them to retaliate upon the Judæans, who had withheld it from them for so long.

18. The Philistines] These had suffered at the hands of Judah during the reign of Uzziah (26^{6, 7}), and now took the opportunity to seek revenge.

19. Made Judah naked] RV 'dalt wantonly in Judah.'

20. Distressed him, etc.] The intervention of Assyria not only imposed the burden of tribute upon Judah, but also awoke the jealousy of Egypt, with evil results to the small kingdom placed between the two empires; yet for a time at least the Assyrians delivered Judah from Syria and Israel: 2K16⁹ 15²⁰.

23. Because the gods, etc.] i.e. as shown by the successes of Rezin (v. 5).

CHAPTER 29

THE REIGN OF HEZEKIAH

This c. describes a cleansing of the Temple and a sacrifice for the sins of the people.

This and the following chs. 30-32, cover the same period as 2K18-20, but, for the most part, have in view a different side of Hezekiah's reign, Chronicles relating in great detail his religious reforms, whilst Kings is concerned mainly with the political events of the time.

3. Opened the doors] The Temple had been closed by Ahaz: 28²⁴. 4. The east street] RV 'the broad place on the east,' perhaps one of the courts in front of the Temple: cp. Ezr10⁹ RV.

10. A covenant] The covenant between the nation and its God had been previously renewed in the time of Asa (15¹²).

15. By the words of the LORD] The king was moved by a divine impulse, perhaps communicated through a prophet: cp. 30¹².

16. The inner part of the house] i.e. from the courts into the interior of the building. The Holy Place is meant (not the Holy of Holies, which the Levites might not enter). 17. The sixteenth day] In the first period of 8 days the Temple itself was cleansed, in the second period the Temple court (where the altar of burnt offering was: v. 18).

21. Seven bullocks, etc.] It is possible that the bullocks, rams, and lambs constituted the burnt offerings mentioned in v. 27 (the victims for which are not otherwise named), and that the he-goats alone formed the sin offering (as v. 23 suggests). For the kingdom] i.e. for the king as distinguished from the people (Judah).

25. By his prophets] i.e. David's arrangements, as described in 1Ch23⁵ 25¹, were made under divine direction.

30. Of Asaph the seer] Twelve of the Psalms bear the name of Asaph.

31. Thank offerings] a form of peace offering (Lv7¹²), most of which was eaten by the worshipper. Burnt offerings] wholly consumed on the altar. Of a free heart] RV 'of a willing heart.'

34. Were more upright . . than the priests] Many of the priests had perhaps taken part in Ahaz's impieties as Urijah the high priest had done : 2 K 16¹⁶.

36. Prepared the people] The zeal of the people was so remarkable that it could only be attributed to divine influence : cp. 30¹².

This c. relates how a passover was kept on the second month for Israel and Judah.

1. Should come . . at Jerusalem] This implies an endeavour to centralise the national worship by the abolition of the local sanctuaries (as described in 2 K 18⁴).

2. In the second month] The Law allowed individuals to keep the Passover in the second month instead of the first, if they were prevented by some temporary hindrance (Nu 9^{10, 11}), and this permission Hezekiah thought might be extended to the whole community.

3. At that time] i.e. at the proper season, viz. the 14th day of the first month. The cleansing of the Temple was not completed till the 16th day of that month : 29¹⁷.

5. Done it of a long time] RV 'kept it in great numbers.' According to Ex 12⁶ the Passover was to be observed by 'the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel.'

6. The posts] lit. 'the couriers,' who were probably some of the royal guards. You, that . . Assyria] Since what is here related took place (according to 29³) in Hezekiah's first year, the reference must be to the invasion of Tiglath-pileser : 2 K 15²⁹ 1 Ch 5²⁶.

13. The feast of unleavened bread] This, though distinct from the Passover, was not separated from it by any interval, and the two came to be treated as one which could be described indifferently by either name : vv. 2, 13, 15. 14. The altars] i.e. those erected by Ahaz : 28²⁴. 15. Were ashamed] The zeal of the laity roused the priests, who had formerly been remiss (29³¹), to a sense of their duty.

17. The passovers] i.e. the paschal lambs, which (according to Ex 12^{6, 7}) ought to have been killed by the head of each household.

18. Otherwise than it was written] As this Passover in the second month took the place of the one ordinarily held in the first month, there could be no supplementary passover for such as were unclean ; so Hezekiah preferred that the people should break the letter of the Law and eat without being sanctified than that they should be debarred from such an important festival and so be unfaithful to the spirit of the divine legislation.

20. Healed] i.e. did not send upon them the punishment which they had incurred : cp. Lv 15³¹.

25. The strangers] i.e. proselytes of foreign descent, who either had come out of the northern kingdom or were settled in Judah.

This c. gives an account of Hezekiah's re-organisation of the Temple service.

2. Appointed the courses] The succession (see 1 Ch 23-26) had been suspended during the idolatry of the previous reigns, and required to be rearranged. The tents of the LORD] The phrase is borrowed from the conditions that prevailed in the wilderness.

3. The king's portion, etc.] The king set an example to his subjects by providing for the sacrifices named, for which see Nu 28, 29, whilst the people were required to support the priests (according to Nu 18).

6. That dwelt in the cities of Judah] The provincial population, as distinguished from the inhabitants of the capital. The title of holy things] The words title of have been accidentally repeated from the preceding ; they are omitted in v. 12. 11. Chambers] i.e. some of the side chambers that surrounded the Temple. 14. Toward the east] RV 'at the east gate' : cp. 1 Ch 26¹⁷.

15. To give to their brethren] The general sense of vv. 15-18 is that the officers named in v. 15 distributed to all the priests who dwelt in the priestly cities a share of the people's offerings, those alone being excluded from sharing, who, whilst in their courses at Jerusalem, were supported at the Temple itself : these, including priests, Levites and their families, are referred to in vv. 16-18.

16. Beside] i.e. excepting. Genealogy] i.e. list.

19. Also of the sons of Aaron, etc.] The meaning is that the six persons named in v. 15 furnished support to the priests and Levites who dwelt outside the cities, as well as to those who dwelt within them.

CHAPTER 32

REIGN OF HEZEKIAH (concluded)

This c. abbreviates the account of Sennacherib's invasion as related in 2 K 18^{13-20, 21} but supplements it by various particulars respecting Hezekiah's preparation to meet the attack.

3. To stop the waters, etc.] The chief spring which was thus stopped (or 'hidden') was the fountain of Gihon : see v. 30. 4. The brook lit. 'torrent-valley.' The Gihon spring was in the ravine of the Kidron.

6. The street of the gate] RV 'the broad place at the gate' : where the people were wont to assemble.

9. After this] The Chronicler omits all account of the surrender of Hezekiah related in 2 K 18¹⁴⁻¹⁶.

18. They cried] i.e. the 'servants' of v. 16 In the Jews' speech] cp. 2 K 18²⁰

22. Guided them] LXX has 'gave them rest,' which suits the context better.

24. In those days] In vv. 24-26 the writer summarises very briefly what is related at length in 2K 20 Isa 38.

30. Brought it, etc.] better, 'stopped the upper spring of the waters of Gihon and brought them straight down' (or, 'underground') 'westward to the city of David.' Gihon lay to the E. of Jerusalem, and Hezekiah conveyed its waters by a subterranean aqueduct to the pool of Siloam at the foot of the Temple hill.

31. The ambassadors] i.e. of Merodach-baladan, the king of Babylon: see 2K 20^{12f}. Isa 39.

32. And in the book of the kings, etc.] The conjunction and should be omitted, the vision of Isaiah being incorporated in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel, like the 'book of Jehu the son of Hanani': 20³⁴.

33. In the chiefest] RV 'in the ascent': i.e. on the road that led up to the sepulchres.

CHAPTER 33

THE REIGN OF MANASSEH

This c. repeats, with certain omissions, 2K²¹; but the section v. 11-17, relating the captivity in Babylon, repentance, and release of Manasseh, is supplementary to the account in 2K.

6. Observed times] RV 'practised augury': perhaps, as the original suggests, by watching the motions of clouds.

8. So that] RV 'if only': God's promises to Israel were conditional upon its obedience.

11. Among the thorns] RM 'with hooks': a monument still exists which shows the Assyrian king Esarhaddon leading two captives by hooks or rings put through their lips.

To Babylon] This city was for the most part subject to Assyria until the overthrow of the Assyrian power in 607 B.C. Shortly before 648 the brother of Assurbanipal (who is probably the king of Assyria alluded to in this v.) revolted, and received support from some of the Palestinian states; but the insurrection was suppressed, and if Manasseh had been among those who aided the insurgents, he may well have been punished in consequence. The Assyrian inscriptions, though they mention that Manasseh was a vassal of Assyria, do not refer to the events here related.

13. Brought him again, etc.] i.e. by prompting the Assyrian king to restore him to his throne. Such leniency on the part of Assurbanipal finds a parallel in his conduct towards Necho, an Egyptian feudatory prince, who was taken captive for intriguing against his suzerain, but was subsequently restored to his country.

14. A wall without . . David] RV 'an outer wall to the city of David.' The fish gate]

This was in the N. wall of the city; through it fish is supposed to have entered from Tyre.

16. Commanded . . to serve the LORD] In spite of Manasseh's reformation here related, Jeremiah subsequently declared that his sins had not been expiated, and that the nation was doomed to destruction in consequence: Jer 15⁴.

18. His prayer] What purports to be Manasseh's prayer is preserved in the Apocrypha, but is not considered genuine. 19. The sayings of the seers] This follows the LXX. The Heb. has 'the sayings of Hozai.' 20. In his own house] LXX has 'in the garden' (or 'park') 'of his own house': cp. 2K 21¹⁸.

REIGN OF JOSIAH

The c. narrates how Josiah suppressed idolatry and repaired the Temple; how a book of the Law, found in the Temple, was read to the king and the people; and how the nation's covenant with the Lord was renewed.

This c. and the following are, in general, parallel to 2K 22, 23¹⁻³⁰, with some unimportant variants; but the Chronicler gives more prominence than the writer of 2Kings to the passover celebrated by Josiah.

3. In the twelfth year] In 2K the abolition of the 'high places' is described as subsequent to the repair of the Temple, and the latter is assigned to Josiah's 'eighteenth' year: 2K 22³ 23^{3,8}.

5. Burnt the bones] This was believed to afflict the souls of the dead priests, as well as to desecrate the shrines at which they had ministered. The condition of the spirit after death depended in a large measure upon the treatment sustained by the body. 6. With their mattocks] A slight alteration gives 'in their ruins' (so RV), i.e. the desolate sites of the cities destroyed by the Assyrians.

9. And they returned to Jerusalem] Another reading is 'and of the inhabitants of Jerusalem.'

11. The houses] i.e. the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies: cp. 1 Ch 28¹¹ 29⁴.

22. In the college] RV 'in the second quarter' (of the city). It has been suggested that this may have occupied the upper end of the Tyropean valley, W. of the Temple.

CHAPTER 35

REIGN OF JOSIAH (concluded)

This c. contains an account of how Josiah celebrates the Passover, and how he provoked Necho the king of Egypt, and was slain at Megiddo.

1. On the fourteenth day] Josiah's passover, unlike Hezekiah's, was kept at the prescribed time.

3. Put the holy ark, etc.] The following words suggest that during the repair of the Temple, it had been removed and committed to the care of the Levites.

4. According to the writing, etc.] The reference is to the arrangements described in 1 Ch 23-26 2 Ch 8¹⁴. 5. According to the divisions, etc.] The sense is 'let there be for each family of the people a portion of a Levitical family to minister.' 6. Prepare your brethren] RV 'prepare for,' etc. The killing of the passover victims by the Levites for the laity, which was exceptional in Hezekiah's time (30¹⁷), had now become customary.

12. Removed] Perhaps they separated those parts (the fat, etc.) of the victims which were to be burnt. If so, these sacrifices were not strictly 'burnt offerings,' for in such, the whole of the victim was consumed by fire.

15. They might not depart] RV 'they needed not to depart.'

18. There was no passover, etc.] Hezekiah's passover had surpassed all that had preceded it (30²⁰), but Josiah's exceeded even that.

20. Against] better, 'at.' Necho's purpose was to share the spoils of the falling Assyrian empire. Nineveh was taken by the Babylonians about 607. 21. He sent ambassadors, etc.] Necho's remonstrance to Josiah against interfering in the war between himself and the Babylonians, the conquerors of Assyria, is not recorded in 2 K.

22. Disguised himself] The same is related of Ahab in 18²³, but LXX has 'strengthened himself.' From the mouth of God] The writer regards Necho's words as a divinely-sent warning, which Josiah disregarded to his cost.

24. All Judah . . mourned] It is possible that this is the 'mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo,' alluded to in Zech 12¹¹.

25. Made them] i.e. those in authority made such lamentations an ordinance. In the lamentations] probably not the book that bears this name, but a composition now lost.

CHAPTER 36

THE FALL OF JERUSALEM

This is a brief record of the reigns of Jehoshaphat, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, and of the destruction of Jerusalem.

The first twenty vv. of this c. are abbreviated from 2 K 23³⁰-25²¹, with some variations of statement.

6. Nebuchadnezzar] He was the son of Nabopolassar, the conqueror of Nineveh.

Bound him in fetters] This is not recorded in Kings. Perhaps this was the 'purpose' of the invasion described in 2 K 24², but Jehoiakim may have averted the threatened consequences by a timely surrender. The statement of Chronicles is followed in Dan 1^{1,2}.

8. That which was found in him] i.e. his offences: ep. 1 K 15⁵².

9. Eight] 2 K 24⁸ has 'eighteen,' which, as he was married (2 K 24¹⁵), is doubtless correct.

10. His brother] In reality Zedekiah was brother to Jehoiachin's father Jehoiakim. 1 Ch 3¹⁵.

12. Jeremiah the prophet] For Zedekiah's disregard of Jeremiah's warnings see Jer 34⁸, 37² 38¹⁷. Contrast the attitude of Ahab towards Elijah, as described in 1 K 21²⁷⁻²⁹.

13. Made him swear] Ezekiel refers to this in 17¹³.

14. Moreover, etc.] In vv. 14-16 the writer briefly explains the causes which led to the final destruction of Jerusalem and its inhabitants. For instances of the abominations of the heathen see 2 K 21⁷, and what is implied in 1 K 15¹² 22⁴⁶.

15. Rising up . . sending] In the O.T. such expressive anthropomorphisms are common; thus it is related that the Lord 'walked' in the garden of Eden (Gn 3⁸), 'smelled' Noah's sacrifice (Gn 8²¹), 'came down' to see Babel (Gn 11⁵), etc. Yet nowhere is the infinite distance separating God from human limitations and frailty more forcibly asserted; see Nu 23¹⁹ Isa 55⁹.

16. Mocked the messengers] In the reign of Jehoiakim the prophet Urijah was put to death (Jer 26²⁰⁻²³), and in the reign of Zedekiah, Jeremiah underwent much persecution (Jer 37, 38).

18. All the vessels, etc.] i.e. all that survived the spoliation described in v. 10.

20. The reign . . Persia] i.e. until the overthrow of Babylon by Cyrus in 538. 21. To fulfil threescore and ten years] If the period of 70 years is reckoned from the time when Jeremiah's prophecy was uttered (Jehoiakim's 4th year, 605 B.C.) till the return of the Jews to their own land in 536, the prediction (for which see Jer 25¹¹ 29¹⁰) was almost exactly fulfilled. Between the final destruction of Jerusalem in 586 and the Return just 50 years elapsed.

22. Now in the first, etc.] vv. 22, 23 are identical with the opening words of Ezra (1¹⁻³), and end in the middle of a sentence. (For the notes see the passage in Ezra.)

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

1. The period of the Exile. The contents of Ezra and Nehemiah are separated from the last events in the previous historical writings by an interval of 50 years. The books of Chronicles, like the books of Kings, virtually close with the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and the deportation of a large number of its inhabitants into Babylonia. There they were probably gathered into colonies or settlements at various places, such as Tel-abib (Ezk 3¹²), Tel-melah, Tel-harsha (Ezr 2⁵⁹), Casiphia (Ezr 8¹⁷), and others. So long as they remained quiet subjects they were not, as a rule, persecuted or enslaved. They were at liberty to cultivate the land and to acquire servants (Jer 29¹ Ezr 2⁶⁵); and, to judge from the value of the contributions made for religious purposes (Ezr 2^{68, 69} Zech 6^{10, 11}), some must have accumulated considerable wealth. On the other hand, those who were disaffected and insubordinate brought upon themselves cruel punishments (Jer 29²²); and several passages in the prophets imply that many of the exiles were not unacquainted with harsh conditions of service (Isa 14⁸ 47⁶).

Jewish religious life in the time of the Exile was distinguished from that of the pre-exilic period by the suspension of the sacrificial system. Not only was the Temple at Jerusalem destroyed—the place which the LORD had chosen to put His name there—but the captive Jews were withdrawn from the actual soil of Israel and were dwelling in an ‘unclean land’ (cp. Am 7¹⁷), where acceptable sacrifices could not be offered. They maintained, however, such religious ordinances as the sabbath and circumcision; and the cessation of material oblations probably intensified rather than impaired the practice of prayer. Reflection upon the calamities sustained by their race must have deepened their sense of national sin; and the lessons of experience at last bore fruit in the gradual eradication of their propensity towards idolatry. The hope of a future restoration to their own country led to an increasing study of the ceremonial law which circumstances prevented them from carrying out in the present; and the loss of national independence enhanced the interest attaching to the records of their past greatness, some of the historical books (including the books of Kings) being completed during this period.

The Exile was brought to a close when the Babylonian empire fell before Cyrus, prince of Anshan or Elam. Cyrus, though an Elamite, was connected by descent with the Persian house of Achæmenes; and he not only became master of Media (in 549 B.C., through the deposition of Astyages), but subsequently of Persia likewise. In character he was courageous, magnanimous, and pious; and when he advanced to attack Babylon (then ruled by Nabunahid, or Nabonidus, a feeble prince), his career was watched with intense interest by the Jews, who regarded him as their destined deliverer. In 538 he took possession of Babylon, which surrendered peaceably; and when Nabonidus, who had fled, was captured, the Jews passed under the rule of a new lord. The way in which their expectations respecting Cyrus were fulfilled forms the subject of the opening narrative of the book of Ezra.

2. Political and Religious Conditions after the Return. When the Jewish people returned from exile their political condition was very unlike what it had been before the Fall of Jerusalem and the deportation of its inhabitants. With those events the national existence which they had enjoyed for many centuries came to an end; and though a number of them were restored to their country by Cyrus they remained subjects of the Persian empire. Jerusalem and the surrounding districts were under the control of a governor (Pehah or Tirshatha), who, though he might be occasionally a Jew, must often have been an alien. And whilst the Persian rule was probably in general not oppressive, various circumstances must have made the position of the Jewish community rather a hard one. They were surrounded by a hostile population, who seized every opportunity of bringing them into disfavour with the Persian authorities. They were for the most part poor (the richest men, according to Josephus, having remained in Babylon), and the land they cultivated, which was naturally not very fertile, had doubtless suffered from neglect; and yet they not only had to pay tribute, custom, and toll to the royal exchequer (Neh 5⁴ Ezr 7²⁴), but had to contribute to the support of the local governor. And the pressure of external hardship was aggravated by internal friction. The poorer classes, to meet the payments required of them, had to borrow of their more prosperous neighbours at a high rate of interest, and the latter enforced to the full the rights which the Jewish laws conferred upon the creditor over an insolvent debtor. Many, to support themselves, had not only to part with their fields, but with their families, who were sold into bondage. The bitter feelings created by this situation might have had serious results, had it not been for the prudence and self-sacrifice of Nehemiah, who from 445 to 433 was Tirshatha. By his exhortation and example he succeeded in averting the social divisions that at one time threatened the people; and though some of the measures he adopted to safeguard the religion of his countrymen did not conduce to friendly relations with their neighbours, his statesmanship ensured during the tenure of his authority not only the security but the contentment of the community.

In religion the Jews enjoyed a degree of freedom denied them in civil affairs. When they returned to Jerusalem they were authorised by Cyrus to restore the Temple; and though some years elapsed before the Temple was actually reconstructed, the altar of the LORD was set up as soon as they were once more settled in their own land, and the system of sacrificial worship, which had been suspended during the Exile, was re-organised. But though the religious life of the community again flowed in its old channels, its general tenor was in some respects unlike what it had previously been. Three points of difference may be noticed here. (a) The proneness to adopt alien religious rites, or to worship the LORD by means of material symbols, which was so common before the Exile, disappeared after the Return. The severe national judgment which they had sustained, and the experience of polytheism which they had acquired in Babylon, seem to have confirmed them finally in their allegiance to the God of their fathers and in the principles of spiritual religion; and the protests against idolatry, so frequently required in earlier times, are henceforward seldom heard. (b) Prophecy, which in pre-exilic days had been so conspicuous a feature in their religious history, now declined in importance; and though several prophets did arise in the course of this period, they were more circumscribed in the range of their thoughts and less vigorous and original in the expression of them. In some respects the diffusion of a knowledge of the Law among the people at large rendered the need of such exceptional teachers less urgent, their places as moral and religious instructors being, in a measure, filled by the scribes. (c) Ritual was regarded differently by the leaders of religious thought before and after the Exile, in consequence, no doubt, of a difference in the needs of the times. When Israel enjoyed national independence, there was less need to emphasise the external features distinctive of Jewish worship, the prophets being chiefly concerned to insist upon the moral conditions demanded by the LORD of His worshippers. But after the Exile, when the nation had lost its independence, it was only by its ecclesiastical organisation and observances that its separateness as a community could be maintained, and therefore increased importance was attached to the ceremonial requirements of the Law.

EZRA

INTRODUCTION

1. Character and Contents. The book of Ezra was combined by the Jews with the book of Nehemiah, the two being regarded as constituting a single work, of which Ezra himself was the reputed author. In the Hebrew Bible they both precede Chronicles; but it is probable that with the latter they form a consecutive history of which Chronicles is the first half. The close connexion between these three books is shown, not only by the way in which the closing verses of Chronicles are practically repeated in the opening verses of Ezra, but by (a) a common interest in statistics and genealogies; (b) a common sympathy for the ecclesiastical side of Jewish life; (c) a common use of certain phrases (e.g. 'father's house') which are comparatively rare elsewhere. If the three are all portions of one single work the composition of it cannot be earlier than the close of the 4th cent.; for, as has been seen, Chronicles must be as late as 340 B.C., whilst Nehemiah contains a reference (12^{11, 22}) to the high priest Jaddua, who was contemporary with Alexander the Great (336-323). Consequently, since Ezra cannot have outlived the 5th cent. B.C., his authorship of the connected books is out of the question; and the writer is really unknown.

The book of Ezra relates the history of the Jewish people from their return under Zerubbabel from Babylon to their own country in 536 to the arrival at Jerusalem of a second body of exiles under Ezra in 458, and includes an account of the building of the Second Temple. It thus covers a period of rather more than 78 years; but of these the 15 years between 535 and 520 and the 58 years between 516 and 458 are practically a blank; so that it is less a continuous record than a description of selected incidents.

2. Sources. The principal sources employed in the compilation of the book are (a) the actual memoirs of Ezra, distinguished by the use of the first person (7²⁷⁻²⁹); (b) genealogies and registers (2, 10¹³⁻⁴⁴); (c) extracts derived from documents written not in Hebrew but in Aramaic (4⁷⁻⁶ 13⁷⁻²⁶).

3. Value. The historical importance of Ezra is very great, since it is the chief authority for the period of Jewish history with which it deals. Though the work of which it forms part is separated by a considerable interval from some of the events narrated, it makes use (as has been just shown) of earlier documents, and, for some portion of the time covered by it, it draws upon records composed by one of the principal actors in the incidents described. Nor is its religious value inferior to its secular interest. As a record of the past it recounts the fulfilment of one of the most remarkable predictions of Hebrew prophecy, namely, the restoration to their own land of the exiles who 50 years before had been carried into captivity; it relates the establishment at Jerusalem of the community to which the world owes the preservation, arrangement, and completion of the Hebrew Scriptures; and it marks the beginning and development of that intense attachment to the Mosaic Law which became so conspicuous a feature of Jewish religious life in after times. And as a means of conveying practical instruction the book is animated with a spirit of fervid patriotism, of uncompromising adhesion to principle, and of loyal devotion to God. The character of Ezra in particular exhibits qualities deserving much admiration—deeply-rooted personal piety conjoined with a high regard for ecclesiastical order and the external rites of religion, and unwavering faith manifesting itself in, and through, active works.

THE RETURN OF THE JEWS FROM CAPTIVITY

The c. narrates how Cyrus, king of Persia, permitted the Jews in Babylon to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple there, and restored the vessels taken from it.

1. Now, etc.] The book of Ezra begins with the last words of 2 Ch; vv. 1, 2 and the first half of v. 3 occurring in 2 Ch 36^{22, 23}. The three books, Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, were probably at first continuous, in this order; but subsequently the arrangement in the Hebrew Bible was altered to Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles, Ezra being placed first in order to form a sequel to the history contained in Kings. 2 Chronicles was then made to conclude with the same words that form the beginning of Ezra.

In the first year of Cyrus] i.e. of Cyrus' rule over Babylon, 538 B.C.

The word of the LORD . . . Jeremiah] see Jer 29¹⁰ 25¹¹⁻¹³; cp. also Ezk 11¹⁷ 37¹². The period of the Captivity was described by Jeremiah as 70 years and by Ezekiel as 40 (4⁶). Its actual duration, reckoned from the Fall of Jerusalem in 586, was about 50 years, but the interval between the destruction of the Temple and its restoration in 516 (Ezr 6¹⁵) was almost exactly 70. The accordance of the event with predictions uttered so long before witnesses to the remarkable faculty of prevision possessed by the Hebrew prophets, inasmuch as there was nothing (so far as can be judged) within the political horizon at the time when the predictions were made to create such an expectation.

The LORD stirred up, etc.] Josephus states that the divine will respecting the Jews was made known to Cyrus by the prophecies of Isaiah (see Isa 44²⁸ 45¹⁻⁴, where Cyrus is styled 'the LORD's servant' and 'the LORD's anointed'). Be this as it may, God's purposes were fulfilled, whatever may have been the motives by which the Persian king was consciously actuated. From the inscriptions it appears that Nabonahid (Nabonidus), the last king of Babylon, had caused great discontent by removing to his capital the gods of various cities, and that Cyrus sent them back to their respective sanctuaries; and the restoration of the sacred vessels (v. 7) of the Jews, whose God was not represented by any image, was doubtless part of the same policy. The permission given to the Jews themselves to return to Jerusalem to re-construct the Temple there conciliated a number of people who might otherwise have been a source of danger to the empire. The old idea that Cyrus as a Zoroastrian had sympathy with the religion of the Jews is disproved by evidence from the monuments.

2. The LORD God . . . hath given me] Cyrus showed great regard for the religious sentiments of his various subjects; and just as in his inscriptions it is represented to the Babylonians that he had obtained his victories through Merodach their chief god, so here in a decree issued to the Jews his success is ascribed to the LORD. But it is possible that the Hebrew colouring of the decree is due to a Hebrew scribe, commissioned to make it intelligible to his countrymen, rather than to its royal author.

4. Whosoever remaineth] RV 'whosoever' (of the captive people) 'is left' (cp. Neh 1²), there being an allusion to the remnant of Israel.

The men of his place] i.e. his Babylonian neighbours (v. 6).

5. Whose spirit, etc.] It was only a small proportion of the exiled Jews who were inspired with such zeal for their land and the sanctuary of their God as to exchange the comfort of Babylon for the desolation of Judæa. In this passage those who took advantage of Cyrus' decree are represented as belonging to Judah and Benjamin only, but there were also among them some from Ephraim and Manasseh: 1 Ch 9³.

7. Had brought forth] see 2 K 24¹³ 2 Ch 36⁷.

8. Sheshbazzar] It seems probable that this was the Persian or Babylonian name of Zerubbabel (2²). In favour of the view that the same person is designated by the two names is the fact that the foundation of the Temple is ascribed to both (5¹⁶ 3⁸), whilst the double name may be paralleled by the instances of Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, Azariah (Dan 1^{6,7}), Eliakim, and Mattaniah (2 K 23³⁴ 24¹⁷). But some distinguish between the two (as is done in 1 Esdr 6¹⁵), and either regard Sheshbazzar as identical with Shenazzar the uncle of Zerubbabel (2 Ch 3^{18,19}), or take him to be a Persian commissioner accompanying Zerubbabel (for although he is here called the prince of Judah, i.e. the representative of Judah's royal line, the LXX in 5¹⁴ styles him 'the guardian over the treasure,' or 'treasury').

9. Chargers . . . knives] The words probably mean different kinds of vessels.

CHAPTER 2

THE NAMES AND NUMBER OF THOSE WHO RETURNED

1. The province] i.e. the Persian province of Judæa (5⁸). Had carried away] in 597 B.C. and 586 B.C. Every one unto his city] i.e. to the provincial towns. This process can only have taken place very gradually.

2. Zerubbabel] for his relation to Sheshbazzar see on 1⁸; for his ancestry see on 3². The list of names that follows is repeated, with some variants, in Neh 7⁷⁻⁷³. Jeshua] the high priest, called by Haggai 'Joshua.' The names in this v. number 11, but in the corresponding passage in Neh (7⁷) they amount to 12, and are probably intended to be symbolic of the 12 tribes of Israel (cp. 6¹⁷), the number of which was recalled at a later date by the 12 he-goats offered as a sin-offering at the dedication of the restored Temple (6¹⁷), and by the sacrifices described in 8³⁵: cp. also the expression 'all Israel' in 2⁷⁰. Nehemiah] not the Nehemiah of Neh 1¹.

3-9. The names in these vv. are those of families. 16. Of Ater of Hezekiah] i.e. the descendants of Ater through Hezekiah, one of his sons.

20-35. The names in these vv. are those of localities. 29. Nebo] not the Nebo in Reuben, E. of the Jordan (Nu 32³⁸), but situated in Judah, identified by some with Nob (Isa 10³²), by others with the modern Nuba, S. of Jerusalem. 31. The other Elam] in contrast to the Elam of v. 7.

36-39. Of the four priestly houses here named, one, Pashur, is not among the 24 enumerated in 1 Ch 24⁷⁻¹⁸, but is probably a branch of the house of Malehijah (1 Ch 24⁹): see Neh 11¹².

40. Seventy and four] The small number betrays a backwardness on the part of the Levites similar to that which they manifested on a subsequent occasion: see 8¹⁵. 42. The porters] they kept the Temple gates (1 Ch 9¹⁷). 43. The Nethinims] i.e. Temple servants: see Neh 8¹⁷, and on 1 Ch 9². 55. The children of Solomon's servants] probably descendants of the native Canaanites employed by Solomon on his buildings: see 1 K 9²¹. 59. Tel-melah, etc.] localities in Babylonia.

62. Sought their register, etc.] i.e. sought their entry among those who were enrolled as being Israelites of pure descent. As polluted] Only those were admitted to the priesthood who could prove their descent from Aaron, in accordance with Nu 3¹⁰ 16¹⁰.

63. The Tirshatha] i.e. Zerubbabel, the title meaning 'governor,' perhaps one subordinate to a 'satrap.' Eat of the most holy things] the privilege of the priesthood only (Nu 18¹⁰). Till there stood up, etc.] In early times the high priest used to enquire of the LORD by Urim and Thummim: see on Ex 28³⁰.

64. Forty and two thousand, etc.] The total number here given disagrees with the sum of the items, which only amounts to 29,818 (in Neh 7⁶⁰, 31,089, the difference perhaps being due to textual errors).

65. Singing men, etc.] These were minstrels employed on secular occasions (cp. Eccl 2^{7,8}), distinct from the singers of v. 41, who were intended for the Temple.

69. Drams] The dram (Gk. drachma), like the pound (manek), was a weight, equivalent to the Hebrew half-shekel. The pound contained 100 drams. Some authorities render the word translated 'dram' by daric, a gold coin worth a guinea. A pound of silver was worth about £1.

70. Dwelt in their cities] i.e. occupied several of the provincial cities. Some scholars have held that only a few (if any) Jews returned to Jerusalem in the reign of Cyrus (whose decree in Ezr 6³⁻⁵ only directs the construction of the Temple, not the restoration of any exiles), and that the Temple was not begun as related in c. 3, but built for the first time in the reign of Darius by the remnant of the people left in Judaea (Hag 1^{12,14} Zech 8^{6,11}). There seems, however, no adequate reason to question the substantial truth of Ezr 1-3.

THE REFOUNDING OF THE TEMPLE

1. The seventh month] i.e. Sept.-Oct. of (probably) 537 B.C.

2. Jeshua] called in Hag 1¹ 'Joshua.' His father Jozadak had been carried into exile by Nebuchadnezzar (1 Ch 6¹⁵). Son of Shealtiel] In 1 Ch 3¹⁹ Zerubbabel is called the son of Pedaiah, the brother of Shealtiel (Salathiel). The discrepancy may be explained by the suppositions (a) that he was the real son of Pedaiah and the legal son of Shealtiel (Pedaiah having married Shealtiel's widow, according to the law of Dt 25^{5f}), (b) that he was grandson of Shealtiel and son of Pedaiah, (c) that he was grandson of both. But LXX of 1 Ch 3¹⁹ makes him the son of Shealtiel (Salathiel), in agreement with the evidence of this passage and of Hag 1¹.

Builded the altar] Possibly an effort had for a time been made to continue the worship of the LORD on the site of the Temple after its destruction (see Jer 41⁵); but the altar erected had apparently been overthrown. The Jews now proceeded to restore it, in order to have the privilege of public worship whilst the Temple was in course of reconstruction. As it is . . . Moses] Special sacrifices were enjoined for the 1st day of the 7th month (Nu 29¹⁻⁶).

3. Fear] i.e. of interruption from the enemy. 4. The feast of tabernacles] This began on the 15th day of the 7th month, and lasted 7 days, followed by a solemn assembly on the 8th day: Nu 29^{12f}. 5. Both of] better, 'and the offerings of': see Nu 28, 29.

7. And meat and drink, etc.] cp. 1 K 5⁶⁻¹¹ regarding Solomon's Temple. To the sea of Joppa] RV 'to the sea, unto Joppa': cp. 2 Ch 2¹⁶.

8. In the second year] probably 536 B.C. The second month would correspond to April-May.

9. Jeshua] not the 'Jeshua' of v. 8 (who was high priest), but a Levite (2⁴⁰). 10. The ordinance of David] This is set forth in 1 Ch 25¹⁻² 16⁴⁻⁶. 11. Together] RV 'one to another': i.e. antiphonally.

12. Wept] Though the younger among the people were filled with hope, now that the house of the LORD was once more established in their midst, the older, who could remember the earlier Temple, destroyed about 50 years before, wept at the contrast to it which was presented by the meanness of the new building, and the inadequate resources available for its completion: cp. Hag 2³ Zech 4¹⁰.

Some scholars have questioned whether the foundations of the Temple were really laid by Zerubbabel in the second year after the Return, as related in vv. 8-10, on the ground that Haggai and Zechariah seem to imply that it was not begun until the 2nd year of Darius Hystaspis (520 B.C.): see Hag 2¹⁵ Zech 8⁹. But the language of the prophets is sufficiently explained if it is assumed that only a commencement was made in 536, that the progress of the work was very soon suspended, and that the renewal of it in 520 was practically a fresh start, as indeed the book of Ezra itself declares it to have been (5²).

FEUD BETWEEN THE JEWS AND SAMARITANS

This c. describes the desire of the Samaritans to take part in the rebuilding of the Temple, and their successful opposition to the Jews on their request being refused.

1. The adversaries] The term is here anticipatory of the opposition subsequently displayed. The people thus designated were the Samaritans, who, in the main, were the descendants of the immigrants who, to replace the Israelite population that had been deported after the fall of Samaria, had been introduced, first of all by Sargon, from Babylon, Cuthah, and other places (2 K 17²⁴), and also at a later date by Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal (vv. 2, 10). But there must likewise have been mingled with them a certain number of native Israelites, who had been left behind in the country by their Assyrian conquerors.

2. We seek your God] A priest had been brought back from captivity to teach them how to fear the LORD (2 K 17^{28,32,33}). We do sacrifice unto Him] so one reading of the Heb., followed by the LXX, the clause expanding the plea of common worship. Another reading is 'yet we do no sacrifice,' the argument implying that they had hitherto had no opportunity of offering acceptable sacrifices, but now desired to do so at Jerusalem, the only lawful sanctuary. Esar-haddon] the successor of Sennacherib (681-668 B.C.). Assur] i.e. Assyria.

3. As king Cyrus, etc.] The fact that they were not authorised to extend to others the privileges conferred upon them by Cyrus was probably not the only motive that actuated the Jews. They no doubt felt that to admit to closer association such a hybrid community as the Samaritans, with their mixture of Hebrew and heathen rites of worship, would neutralise the impulse in the direction of purity of religion which they had derived from their experiences as exiles. 4. The people of the land] i.e. the Samaritans and the other hostile neighbours of the Jews; the annoyances they caused are referred to in Zech 8¹⁰.

5. The reign of Darius] i.e. Darius Hystaspis, the third in succession to Cyrus, who was followed on the throne by Cambyzes, Gomates (who personated Smerdis, and is consequently often styled Pseudo-Smerdis), and Darius, in the order named. Darius reigned from 521-485, so that the rebuilding of the Temple was interrupted for fifteen or sixteen years (536-520).

6. Ahasuerus] i.e. Xerxes (485-464), the successor of Darius Hystaspis.

7. Artaxerxes] i.e. Artaxerxes Longimanus (464-424), the successor of Xerxes. Since both Xerxes and Artaxerxes lived after Darius Hystaspis, to whom v. 24 probably refers, and to whose reign the contents of c. 5 belong, the section, vv. 6-23, departs from the chronological succession of events either in consequence of some accidental misplacement, or because the writer has in view a comprehensive summary of the several occasions when opposition was offered to the Jews by their enemies. The charge made in this section against the Jews is not the building of the Temple (the subject of which is resumed in v. 24 and c. 5), but the fortification of Jerusalem (v. 12), either by Nehemiah (as related in the book of Neh) or by a body of Jews who came from Babylon before him, perhaps those who accompanied Ezra (see c. 7). Some, who consider the chronological sequence in this c. to be unbroken, identify the 'Darius' of v. 24 with Darius Nothus (423-405): whilst others, who take vv. 6-23 to be a detailed explanation of the opposition summarised in v. 5, identify Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes with Cambyzes and Gomates, the two kings who came between Cyrus and Darius Hystaspis.

7. In the Syrian tongue, etc.] RV 'written in the Syrian (Aramean) character, and set forth in the Syrian (Aramean) tongue.' Aramean was the chief medium of communication between the different peoples of the East: cp. 2K 18²⁶.

8. Rehum . . Shimshai] It is not clear whether vv. 7, 8 refer to more than one letter sent on different occasions by the enemies of the Jews, or to a single letter written by the persons named in v. 7 (who were presumably Samaritans) and communicated through the Persian officials named in v. 8.

9. Dinaites] The identification of most of the peoples mentioned in this v. is uncertain. The Susanchites were the natives of Shushan, the capital of Elam. 10. On this side] RV 'beyond' (and so in vv. 11, 16, 5³, 8³⁰), regarded from the point of view of the Persian court. 11. At such a time] RV 'and so forth' (and so in vv. 11 and 17). 12. Joined the foundations] RV 'repaired the foundations'.

13. So thou shalt endamage] RV 'in the end it will endamage.' 14. We have . . palace] lit. 'we have salted the salt of the palace': cp. the term 'salary,' from salarium, 'money given to provide salt.'

15. The book of the records] For such see 6². A rebellious city] This, so far as it was true, applied to Jerusalem only under Babylonian rule (see 2K 24^{1,20}). But the circumstances of the time rendered the walling of the city suspicious, since Egypt, which lay so near, had recently been in revolt.

24. The second year . . Darius] 520 B.C., if, as is most probable, Darius Hystaspis is meant, as in v. 5 (the closing words of which are here repeated). But some suppose Darius Nothus (423-405) to be intended.

CHAPTER 5

THE BUILDING OF THE TEMPLE RECOMMENCED

This c. gives an account of a renewed attempt to rebuild the Temple, and recites a letter from the Persian officials in Judaea to the Persian court to enquire whether the Jews had leave to proceed with the work.

1. Then the prophets] The hostility of their neighbours (4^{4,5}), coupled with disastrous seasons (Hag 1^{10,11} 2¹⁷), had so discomaged the people that they said 'The time is not come for the LORD's house to be built' (Hag 1²). Out of this despondency they were roused by two prophets, whose presence amongst them must of itself have convinced them that the Spirit of the LORD was once more with them.

Haggai] The prophecies of Haggai were all delivered in the second year of Darius. In them he upbraided the people for building substantial houses for themselves whilst neglecting the House of God; attributed to such neglect the prevalent scarcity, which was God's judgment upon them; and when the work was once again taken in hand by Zerubbabel, predicted that the glory of the second Temple would exceed that of the first.

Zechariah] The prophecies of Zechariah (who was really son of Berechiah and grandson of Iddo) were delivered at intervals between the second and fourth years of Darius. In them he consoled his countrymen for their afflictions, denounced God's wrath upon the nations who had oppressed Jerusalem, encouraged with hopes of a great future both Zerubbabel and Joshua in their work of rebuilding the Temple, and exhorted the people to truth, justice, and mercy.

In the name . . . even unto them] RM 'in the name of the God of Israel which was upon them': cp. Jer 14⁹ (which is lit. 'thy name is called upon us').

2. Began to build] It had really been begun sixteen years before (3⁸⁴), but the work having been suspended, it had to be recommenced.

3. Tatnai] perhaps the satrap of all the Persian possessions W. of the Euphrates (the 'river'). 4. Said we] better, with the LXX, 'said they.'

5. They could not cause them to cease] Tatnai could not venture to arrest a work which was alleged to have the sanction of Cyrus (v. 13), though he cautiously sent to Persia to have the statement verified. Till the matter came, etc.] RV 'till the matter should come to Darius, and then answer should be returned.'

13. Cyrus the king of Babylon] The king of Persia included Babylon within his dominions: cp. Neh 13⁶. 14. Sheshbazzar] i.e. Zerubbabel: see on 1⁸.

CHAPTER 6

COMPLETION AND DEDICATION OF THE TEMPLE

This c. relates the authorisation of the construction of the Temple, and the completion of the work.

2. Achmetha] i.e. Ecbatana in Media.

3. Threescore cubits, etc.] The dimensions here given, which considerably exceed those of Solomon's Temple (1 K 6²), perhaps marked the limits beyond which the builders were not to go. 4. With three rows, etc.] cp. 1 K 6³⁶, which suggests that these materials were used in the construction of the Court, not of the edifice, of the Temple. Out of the king's house] i.e. from the king's resources: cp. 7²⁰.

6. Now therefore, etc.] At this v. the decree of Darius begins. 7. The governor of the Jews] i.e. Zerubbabel (Sheshbazzar), who was subordinate to Tatnai (5³). 10. Sacrifices of sweet savours] cp. Gn 8²¹ Ex 29¹⁸. 12. To alter] i.e. the decree. 14. Artaxerxes] The Temple was really completed in the reign of Darius (v. 15), but Artaxerxes (464-424 B.C.) bestowed treasure upon it (see c. 7).

15. Adar] February-March.

The sixth year] i.e. 516 B.C. The Temple, which was begun for the second time in the second year of Darius, 520 B.C. (Hag 1^{14,15}), had taken more than four years to finish. No complete description of it is forthcoming, but some information respecting it can be derived from allusions. If the measurements given in the decree of Cyrus (6³) were actually adopted, it must have been larger than that of Solomon (1 K 6²), but otherwise it was much inferior to it (3¹² Hag 2³). Like the earlier structure, it consisted of a Holy of Holies and a Holy Place, before each of which hung a veil (1 Mac 4³¹); whilst it had in front of it more than one court (1 Mac 4^{38,46}). The Holy of Holies was empty (the ark being lost); but the Holy Place contained the golden altar of incense, the candlestick, and the table of shewbread, together with various vessels (1 Mac 1²²). In one of the courts was the altar of burnt-offering, constructed of 'whole stones' (1 Mac 4⁴⁷); and round the Temple building there were chambers, for the use of the priests and the storage of provisions (Ezr 8²⁹ 10⁶ Neh 10⁸⁴ 13³ 1 Mac 4³⁸).

17. Twelve he goats] The number (see Nu 7⁸⁷) was representative of the twelve tribes of Israel, though only a few of them had returned from their exile and were present at the festival. 20. For the priests, etc.] better, 'for the priests had purified themselves, and the Levites, as one man, were all of them pure.' Killed the passover for all] i.e. the Levites, who in Hezekiah's time killed the passover lambs only for such as were not clean, now killed them for all alike, both priests and laity.

21. All such as had separated, etc.] cp. 10¹¹ Neh 10²⁸. The allusion is to the Israelites left in the country when the flower of the population was removed by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylon, who had become contaminated by the surrounding heathen, but now detached themselves from them. 22. The king of Assyria] i.e. Darius, whose predecessors had conquered Babylon, the mistress of Assyria.

THE JOURNEY OF EZRA TO JERUSALEM

1. Now after . . . Artaxerxes] The interval of time here implied amounted to more than fifty years, from the sixth year of Darius (516 B.C.) to the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimannus (458 B.C.). Between the reign of Darius and Artaxerxes there intervened the reign of Xerxes (485-464 B.C.), to which belong the incidents related in the book of Esther. In the early years of his successor Artaxerxes an effort was made to surround Jerusalem, with a wall (see 4¹²), though with no success. Probably to the same period should be assigned the ministry of the prophet Malachi. From his writings it may be gathered that the religious and moral condition of the Jewish community at Jerusalem was very unsatisfactory. The people were divided into two sections, the one scrupulous in their religious duties, the other sceptical and indifferent (Mal 3¹³). The latter party had contracted marriages with heathen women (2¹¹); oppression and immorality were prevalent (3⁵); the Temple services were neglected (16¹⁴); and the maintenance of the priesthood stunted (38-10). Against the continuance of these evils the prophet raised a strong protest, denouncing divine judgment upon the offenders, but promising that God's blessing would attend them upon their reformation (3¹⁰ 4¹⁻³).

Ezra . . Seraiah] Ezra was a descendant of the Seraiah who was chief priest in the reign of the last king of Judah (2K 25¹⁸). His genealogy as given in vv. 1-5 is abbreviated by the omission not only of all the generations separating him from Seraiah, but also of many of those between Seraiah and Aaron: cp. 1Ch 6³⁻¹⁵.

6. This Ezra] Ezra, as his history shows, was a devout and zealous ecclesiastic, of passionate temperament, strong religious faith, and rigid principles, who, though he met with temporary failure, in the end permanently influenced the thoughts and habits of his countrymen. A ready scribe] Ezra belonged to the class of literary men, who, being acquainted with the art of writing, had, in the time when the nation was independent, furnished its statesmen with their secretaries (2S 8¹⁷ 1K 4³ 2K 18¹⁸), but now that its political life had ceased, were students of the Law, which they copied, and interpreted (cp. Neh 8⁷). All his request] The nature of this is implied in the letter of Artaxerxes (vv. 12-26).

9. Began he to go up] better (by a slight correction), 'he fixed the going up.' The actual journey was not begun till the twelfth day (8³¹). The first month] i.e. Nisan. (= Mar.-April). The fifth month] i.e. Ab (= July-August). The journey, which lasted some three months and a half, was probably made by way of the Euphrates to Carchemish, then across to Hamath, and so southward along the Orontes. The distance was about 900 m.

10. To teach in Israel] Ezra, though like Zerubbabel he led a body of settlers to Jerusalem, is never styled 'Tirshatha' (as Zerubbabel is in 2⁶³), and his mission appears to have had purely religious ends in view. The Jews who remained in Babylon, and who were surrounded by a population wholly heathen, were marked off from their neighbours by a much deeper line of cleavage than were the Jews of Palestine, and a higher standard of religious devotion prevailed amongst them: consequently when the religious laxity of the people of Jerusalem became known at Babylon, Ezra was sent to enquire into it (v. 14), to introduce reforms, and, by authority of the Persian king, to enforce the observance of the Law by means of penalties (v. 26).

12. King of kings] The same title was used by the kings of Babylon (Ezk 26⁷ Dan 2³⁷). Perfect peace, and at such a time] better, 'the whole' (of the usual heading) 'and so forth.'

13. His priests] RV 'their' (i.e. Israel's) priests.

14. His seven counsellors] In Esth 1¹⁴ mention is made of seven princes 'who saw the king's face and sat the first in his kingdom.'

16. Canst find] i.e. obtain from the native Babylonians and Persians: cp. 14⁶.

22. Talents . . measures . . baths] The 'talent' used by the early Hebrews weighed 96 lb., the Persian talent was 66 lb. A 'measure' (Heb. cor) contained 83 gallons, a 'bath' a little more than 8 gallons. The wheat, wine, oil, and salt were required for the sacrificial offerings: see Ex 29⁴⁰ Lv 2¹³. 23. Why should there be wrath, etc.] The piety of the Persian kings led them to seek the favour of the deities worshipped by the different nationalities under their sway: cp. 6¹⁰. 26. Banishment] or exclusion from the congregation: cp. 10¹.

27. Blessed be the LORD, etc.] This introduces Ezra's thanksgiving for the king's letter. His gratitude to God is conspicuous throughout the passages in this book which proceed directly from him (e.g. 8^{18, 22, 31}), and is reflected in the account of the historian (7^{16, 9}, etc.).

PARTICULARS OF EZRA'S COMPANY

1. Them that went up] The sum of the numbers given is 1,496. Only males are mentioned, and if no women accompanied them, the absence of such doubtless increased the tendency that the people manifested to intermarry with heathen families. 2. Hattush] This should be connected closely with the following clause, Hattush being grandson of Shecaniah: 1Ch 3²². 3. Of the sons of Pharoah] Most of the families in this list also appear (with some variations) in c. 2 and Neh 7 as having contributed members to the body of immigrants that accompanied Zerubbabel in the reign of Cyrus. 13. Of the last sons of Adonikam] perhaps those who belonged to the youngest branch of Adonikam's house.

15. Ahava] This was the name both of a town and of a river (v. 21) in Babylonia, on the road to Palestine. None of the sons of Levi] Only a small number of Levites had previously accompanied Zerubbabel (2³⁴).

17. Casiphia] unidentified, but presumably near Babylon. And to his brethren the Nethinims] The text is defective, and should probably be corrected to 'and to his brethren (i.e. the Levites) and to the Nethinim.' 18. Of the sons of Mahli] Either the name of the 'man of understanding' has dropped out of the text, or else this expression itself represents a proper name, Ish-sechel : so RM.

22. The enemy in the way] probably such marauders as were accustomed to attack defenceless travellers: cp. v. 31. 24. Serebiah, Hashabiah] These were Levites, not priests (Neh 12²⁴), so that the individuals selected were twenty-four in all, twelve priests and twelve Levites: cp. v. 30. 26. Six hundred and fifty talents, etc.] The value of the offerings mentioned in this and the following v. is so great (approaching a million sterling), that exaggeration or textual corruption may be suspected.

30. Took . . silver] i.e. took the silver weighed out to them (v. 26). 33. By the hand of] RV 'into the hand of': the persons named being those with whom the silver brought from Babylon was deposited. 34. By number . . of every one] RV 'the whole by number and by weight.' 36. The king's commissions] i.e. the directions intended for the royal treasurers (7²¹). Lieutenants] lit. 'satraps.'

EZRA'S INDIGNATION AT INTERMARRIAGES WITH THE HEATHEN

1. The Canaanites, etc.] In the Law it was only with the various Canaanite nations that marriage was altogether forbidden (Ex 34¹²⁻¹⁶ Dt 7¹⁻³). David was descended from a union between an Israelite and a Moabitess (Ruth 1⁴ 4¹⁷), and Solomon had married an Egyptian princess without reproach (1 K 3¹). But the principle which excluded alliances with certain nations was doubtless felt to be applicable to others also, and Solomon's marriages with women of the Moabites and Ammonites had certainly been attended with calamitous results (1 K 11^{1,2}).

3. Plucked off the hair] Baldness artificially produced was a sign of mourning: Isa 15² 22¹² Jer 16⁶ Am 8¹⁰ Job 1²⁰. 8. A nail] a figure for security: cp. Isa 22²³. In his holy place] i.e. Jerusalem: cp. Psa 24³ Isa 56⁷ 57¹³.

9. We were bondmen] RV 'we are bondmen': i.e. subjects of the Persians: cp. Neh 9³⁶. A wall] i.e. protection (RM 'a fence').

11. The filthiness of the people] The iniquity of the Canaanite peoples, whose land Israel had taken in possession, is alluded to in Gn 15¹⁶ Dt 9⁵: cp. also 1 K 21²⁶.

13. Such deliverance] RV 'such a remnant.'

15. For we . . escaped] better, 'for we are left but a remnant that is escaped.' God's righteousness had been vindicated by the almost complete destruction of the guilty people; but His mercy had been manifested in the survival of a few who were now imperilling themselves by fresh offences.

CHAPTER 10

THE FOREIGN WIVES ARE DIVORCED

3. According to the law] see Dt 24¹⁻², which required a bill of divorce. 5. The chief priests] RV 'the chiefs of the priests': see 2 Ch 36¹⁴.

6. Johanan] If the Eliashib meant is the contemporary of Nehemiah (13^{4,7}) and Johanan was really his grandson (not his son, see Neh 12²²), he must have lived a long while after Ezra, and consequently the description of the chamber, here alluded to, as the chamber of Johanan applies not to the time of Ezra, but to that of the compiler of the book. But it is possible that another Johanan is intended.

8. Forfeited] lit. 'placed under the ban.' Goods that were 'banned' were brought into the treasury of the Lord (Josh 6¹⁰). For the authority under which these proceedings were undertaken see 7²⁰. 9. The ninth month] i.e. Chisleu (= Nov.-Dec.). In Palestine rain falls regularly in December, and on this occasion was perhaps heavier than usual. 13. We are many, etc.] better, 'we have greatly transgressed.' 14. Let now our rulers . . stand] i.e. as a committee to see into the question of the divorcees. 15. Were employed about] RV 'stood up against.' The opposition was not really strong. 16, 17. The tenth month . . the first] i.e. Tebeth (= Dec.-Jan.) and Nisan (= Mar.-Apr.).

18. Of the guilty there were 17 priests, 10 Levites, singers and porters, and 86 laymen, making a total of 113. 25. Of Israel] i.e. of the laity, as contrasted with the priests and Levites. 44. Some of them, etc.] The text is obscure and perhaps corrupt: the LXX renders 'and had begotten children by them'; whilst 1 Esd 9³⁶ has 'and they put them away with their children.'

The harsh measures here described were adopted by Ezra and his supporters owing to the necessity of preserving the distinctive faith of their race from being contaminated by, and finally lost in, the heathendom that surrounded it. A small and feeble community, deprived of national independence, was peculiarly exposed to external influences; and Ezra might well fear that the proneness to idolatry from which his countrymen had been purified by the exile might revive, if marriage alliances were permitted with the neighbouring peoples, whose women, in the words of Malachi (2¹¹), were 'the daughters of a strange god.'

Nothing further is related of Ezra himself after this attempt to prevent mixed marriages until his reappearance in company with Nehemiah in 444 (Neh 8¹); and nothing is known for certain respecting the condition of affairs in Judaea between the last events here recorded and the arrival of Nehemiah at Jerusalem, as narrated in Neh 2. But one section of this book (4⁶⁻²³) shows that in the reign of Artaxerxes an endeavour was made to rebuild the fortifications of the city by a body of Jews who had recently arrived there (v. 12), and it is natural to connect this body with those who accompanied Ezra. The offence given to the peoples with whom intermarriage had lately been prohibited would render it desirable to secure the safety of the reforming party, and it may well have been to them that the scheme for surrounding the place with a wall was due. As has been seen, it was frustrated through information being sent respecting it to the Persian authorities; and if Ezra was in any way thought to be responsible for it, it is easily intelligible that his influence was in consequence impaired, and he himself forced into the obscurity in which the history leaves him.

NEHEMIAH

INTRODUCTION

1. Character and Contents. The book of Nehemiah, as has been already noted, probably forms part of a single work embracing Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1, 2 Chronicles, and its date, therefore, is that of the larger whole (perhaps about 330–320 B.C.). Its contents are separated from those of Ezra by an interval of thirteen years, so that the rule which the writer has previously observed of confining his history to an account of a few critical periods is again followed here. The record comprises Nehemiah's visit to Jerusalem in 445, his repair of the city walls, and the measures taken by him to secure obedience to the Law. The latest date in his life mentioned in the narrative is the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes, 433 B.C. (5¹⁴).

2. Sources. The chief sources referred to, or implied, in the book are (a) the memoirs of Nehemiah (1¹⁻⁷ 2¹²⁻⁴³ 13⁴⁻³¹); (b) genealogies and registers, partly incorporated in the memoirs just described, and partly reproduced by the compiler (3, 7⁶⁻⁷³ 10¹⁻²⁷ 12¹⁻²⁰).

3. Value. The book of Nehemiah carries the history of the Jewish people down to a later date than any other of the avowedly historical works in the canon of the OT. Its interest is manifold, since it describes not only the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, but the reconstruction of the Jewish ecclesiastical organisation; and as an authority for the events it relates, is first-rate, since it is largely based upon contemporary materials. And its value is augmented by its vivid portrayal of the noble character of Nehemiah himself. His career presents an exceptional combination of strong self-reliance with humble trust in God, of penetrating shrewdness with perfect simplicity of purpose, of persistent prayerfulness with the most energetic activity; and for religious faith and practical sagacity he stands conspicuous among the illustrious personages of the Bible.

ILL NEWS FROM JERUSALEM. NEHEMIAH'S PRAYER

1. The words] better, 'the history.' Some thirteen or fourteen years separate the visit of Nehemiah to Jerusalem, recorded in this book, from that of Ezra which is related in Ezr 7.

Nehemiah] Nehemiah, as stated in v. 11, occupied an important position at the Persian court, seems to have been a favourite with the king, and probably possessed considerable wealth (5¹⁴). Unlike Ezra (who was of priestly family and a student), he was a layman and a man of action. His career shows that he was self-reliant (2¹²), energetic (chs. 3, 4), shrewd (c. 6), and masterful (c. 13); but his vigour and determination were directed not to the promotion of his own interests, but to the service of his countrymen, for whom he made great sacrifices. His religious faith was strong, and his prayerfulness is repeatedly illustrated in the narrative: see 1⁴ 2¹ 4^{4,9}, etc.

The month Chisleu] i.e. November–December. In the twentieth year] i.e. of Artaxerxes Longimanus, to whom reference is made in Ezr 4⁷ 7¹. The year intended is probably reckoned to begin with the month of his accession, not with the first calendar month Nisan, since the events that happened in Chisleu, the ninth month, are related before those that occurred in Nisan, 21. The date is 445. But some scholars regard twentieth in this c. as an error for 'nineteenth' (446 B.C.). Shushan] i.e. Susa, in Elam. The term palace is strictly 'fortress,' or 'castle.' 2. Which were left, etc.] i.e. the Jews dwelling at Jerusalem.

3. The province] Judaea was now a province of the Persian empire (Ezr 5⁸). The wall... broken down] This is most naturally explained by the supposition that some recent attempt had been made to fortify Jerusalem, which had been forcibly stopped; and such an attempt seems described in Ezr 4⁷⁻²³. But some authorities suppose the allusion to be to the destruction of the walls by the Babylonians in 586, some 140 years before.

4. Prayed] Nehemiah's prayer consists of a confession of sin, an appeal to God's promises, and an entreaty for help in the undertaking he contemplated.

CHAPTER 2

NEHEMIAH'S RESOLVE TO REBUILD JERUSALEM

This c. gives an account of Nehemiah's request for leave to rebuild Jerusalem, his arrival there, and his survey of the ruined walls, which it was decided to restore.

1. Wine was before him] LXX has 'wine was before me,' implying that it was Nehemiah's turn to act as cup-bearer (the king having several). This would explain why Artaxerxes had not observed his servant's sadness during the four months that had elapsed since the arrival of the news from Jerusalem.

2. Sore afraid] i.e. for the success of his intended request. 6. I set him a time] Nehemiah's absence seems to have lasted twelve years (5¹⁴). 7. Convey me over] RV 'let me pass through,' i.e. the Persian provinces between Shushan and Judaea. 8. The king's forest] RM 'park,' identified by some with certain gardens at Etham, some 6 m. from Jerusalem, in which (according to Josephus) Solomon used to drive. The palace] RV 'the castle': and so in 7². This was situated on the N. of the Temple (the house), and subsequently called (by Herod) 'Antonia.'

9. Captains of the army] Nehemiah as Tirshatha or governor (8⁹ 10¹) was invested with civil and not, like Ezra, ecclesiastical authority only; and consequently was attended by a body-guard: contrast Ezr 8²². 10. The Horonite] so named either from Beth-horon or Horonaim. Nothing is known of Sanballat beyond what is related in this book. Heard of it] Nehemiah on his way to Jerusalem had probably passed through the Samaritan colony of which Sanballat was leader (4¹⁻³).

12. At Jerusalem] RV 'for Jerusalem.'

13. Viewed the walls of Jerusalem] The topography of ancient Jerusalem is too obscure to admit of the various parts of its walls being identified with certainty, but 'the valley gate' from which Nehemiah issued on his survey was at the SW. corner of the SW. hill, and opened into the valley of Hinnom. From it he pursued his course first along the south wall, and next along the eastern wall, up the side of the 'brook' (v. 15), i.e. the Kidron.

14. There was no place] The ground was so rough and encumbered with fallen masonry that he could not follow the line of wall closely. 15. Turned back] presumably along the N. wall, so as to make the circuit of the city.

19. Geshem] called 'Gashmu' in 6⁶; he was doubtless an Arab sheikh. Will ye rebel?] The same construction had been put upon the Jews' proceedings on a previous occasion: Ezr 4¹⁸. 20. Ye have no portion] Nehemiah's words had reference to the desire which the Samaritans once had to unite with the Jews (Ezr 4¹⁻⁶).

PARTICULARS RESPECTING THE REBUILDING

1. Then, etc.] For the purposes of repair the wall was parcelled out between a number of working parties consisting of various important families, the inhabitants of certain towns, and different professional and trading bodies. The description of the several sections of the wall begins near the Temple at the sheep-gate, through which the flocks used to be driven for sacrifice. The writer's purpose in enumerating all who undertook to rebuild these sections is to put on record the names of those who devoted their labour and their substance to restoring the city which protected Jehovah's sanctuary, and to challenge the emulation of later generations.

5. Their Lord] better, 'their lord,' i.e. Nehemiah. 7. Unto the, etc.] RV 'which appertained to the,' etc. Part of Mizpah was under the direct control of the Persian officer who governed the region W. of the Euphrates, whilst part was under Jewish rule (v. 15).

8. The son of one of the apothecaries] better, 'one of the perfumers.' They fortified] RM 'they left,' meaning that the builders at this point left the fortifications untouched because they were in good repair, or that they departed in their reconstruction from the existing ground-plan.

9. Of the half part] RV 'of half the district,' the ruler of the other half being the Shallum of v. 12. 11. The other piece] RV 'another portion': and so in vv. 19, 20, 21, 24, 27, 30.

14. Part of] RV 'the district of': and so in vv. 15, 16, 17, 18. 15. The pool of Siloah] i.e. the pool of Siloam. The stairs] These were steps leading to the pool, perhaps from the Temple hill: cp. 12³⁷.

16. The sepulchres of David] i.e. the tombs of David's descendants and successors: cp. 2 Ch 32³⁸. These were near the Temple (Ezk 43^{7,8}), probably NW. of the city. The pool that was made] perhaps the pool alluded to in 2 K 20²⁰. The house of the mighty] perhaps the barracks of the soldiery. 17. In his part] RV 'for (i.e. representing) his district' (of Kcilah).

19. The armoury] the site of 'the house of the forest of Lebanon' (1 K 10^{17,21} Isa 22⁸).

22. The plain] better, 'The Plain,' the specific name of part of the Jordan valley (Gn 13¹⁰).

23. After him . . . After him] RV 'After them . . . After them.'

26. Moreover] RV 'now,' the v. being parenthetical. Ophel] the southern extremity of the Temple hill. The water gate] leading to the spring of Gihon in the gorge of the Kidron. 28. The horse gate] This, like the 'water gate,' faced eastward (Jer 31⁴⁰).

31. The goldsmith's son] better, 'a member of the body of goldsmiths.' And of the merchants] better, 'and (after him repaired) the merchants.' 32. The sheep gate] The circuit of the walls ended with the original starting-point (v. 11).

THE MACHINATIONS OF THE ENEMIES OF THE JEWS

1. Sanballat] His irritation at Nehemiah's arrival (2¹⁰) was increased by the work accomplished by the latter. 2. Fortify themselves] The same word as that used in 3⁸, with a like uncertainty of meaning. Some render 'will they (the Persian authorities) let them alone?' Will they sacrifice?] i.e. in the hope of obtaining supernatural assistance. 4. In the land of captivity] Nehemiah's desire for the confusion of his enemies not unnaturally took the form of a wish that they might experience the fate which he and his countrymen had undergone. 6. Was joined . . . thereof] The circuit of the wall was completed and raised to half the intended height.

7. The walls . . . made up] RV 'tho repairing of the walls . . . went forward.' 9. We made our prayer . . . a watch] Nehemiah and his followers, whilst commending themselves in prayer to God, took every precaution within their power. 10. Judah] i.e. the Jews.

12. From all places, etc.] perhaps, 'from all places, Ye must return to us,' this being an appeal from the Jews of the neighbouring towns to their fellow-citizens who had gone to work at Jerusalem, summoning them to return for their protection. But LXX has 'From all places they come up against us.'

13. On the higher places] RV 'in the open (i.e. exposed) places': where they could be seen to be on guard. 15. We returned] This implies that the enemy for a time abandoned the design described in v. 11. 16. Habergeons] RV 'coats of mail.' 17. With those that laded] RV 'laded themselves': i.e. laboured vigorously. Every one . . . weapon] This clause probably refers to the second of the two classes named in the beginning of the v., viz. those that bare burdens. These with one hand carried materials and with the other held a missile. 'The 'builders' (v. 18), on the contrary, who had to use both hands for their work, only wore swords.

21. Half of them] This refers back to the servants mentioned in v. 16. 23. Men of the guard] i.e. the Persian guard attached to Nehemiah as governor: cp. 2⁹. Saving that . . . washing] RV renders, 'every one went with his weapon to the water': whilst others suggest, 'every one sent for water'; but the text is too defective to be translated with certainty: the LXX omits the clause.

NEHEMIAH'S MEASURES IN ALLEVIATION OF POVERTY

1. The people] i.e. the commons (as contrasted with the nobles and rulers, v. 7). These had neglected their own interests to labour gratuitously on the fortifications, and now in the time of dearth were feeling the pinch of want. 2. Therefore we take up corn] better, 'we must get corn.' The language is that of desperate men, compelled by necessity to accept the harsh conditions imposed by those to whom they had recourse for the corn they required.

4. The king's tribute] The common people were not exempted from paying taxes to the Persian king, like the priests and other ministers of the Temple (Ezr 7²¹ Neh 9³⁷).

5. Our flesh, etc.] i.e. we are as much Jews as the creditors to whom we have sold our children. Bondage] The sale of children to defray a debt was recognised in the Mosaic Law: see Ex 21²⁻⁷ Dt 15¹²⁻¹⁴; cp. also 2 K 4¹.

7. Ye exact usury] Usury was prohibited by the Law in connexion with loans made to fellow-Israelites (Ex 22²⁵ Dt 23¹⁹); but the Jews doubtless interpreted the prohibition with the same latitude as Christians have done the similar command in the Gospel (Lk 6³⁵). The Law probably had in view cases where money was borrowed under the pressure of misfortune, not as a help in commercial ventures; and the like considerateness towards the necessitous is incumbent upon Christians.

8. Have redeemed . . . heathen] probably during Nehemiah's residence in Persia. 9. The reproach] the humiliation they had undergone in consequence of their failure to walk in the fear of God.

10. Might exact] RV 'do lend . . . on usury.' Nehemiah, to conciliate those whom he wished to persuade, admitted that he (probably in the persons of his relatives and dependents) had been guilty of the same conduct against which he was protesting. 11. Their lands, etc.] These had been given in pledge, and, if unredeemed, were retained by the creditor. The hundredth part] usually regarded as one per cent. a month, and so equivalent to twelve per cent. a year. The expression restore, in connexion with the interest, probably means 'cease to require': cp. v. 12. Corn, wine, oil] i.e. interest paid in kind. 12. Took an oath of them] i.e. took of the money-lenders an oath which the priests administered to them. 13. Shook my lap] For similar syncholic acts cp. 1 K 22¹¹ Jer 27² 28¹⁰.

14. From the twentieth . . unto the two and thirtieth] i.e. from 445-433 B.C. The fact that Artaxerxes seems to have been unwilling to part with his cup-bearer for a long period, and stipulated for a date by which he was to return (26), makes it rather surprising that he should have thus been absent from court for twelve years; but it is to be assumed that his leave of absence was extended by the king.

The bread of the governor] i.e. the supplies due to the Persian governor from the people.

16. Neither bought we] better, 'neither got we' (by foreclosing mortgages). All my servants] He did not retain them to attend to himself or to his own interests. The whole conduct of Nehemiah was that of a warm-hearted, generous man.

CHAPTER 6

ATTEMPTS OF SANBALLAT TO HINDER THE COMPLETION OF THE WALLS

2. Ono] near Lod (Ezr 2³³), now Kefr 'Ana, some 25 m. from Jerusalem. 5. An open letter] in order that its contents might reach and intimidate others. 6. According to these words] better, 'and so forth' (and so in v. 7), the quotation from the letter in v. 6 ending with king.

10. Who was shut up] perhaps meaning 'ceremonially unclean': cp. Jer 36⁵. She-maiah probably hoped that Nehemiah would conclude that only for the most urgent reasons would he under such circumstances make the proposal described. Within the temple] i.e. to seek asylum there (as Joab fled to the tent of the LORD, 1 K 2²⁸). 11. Being as I am] Only the priests might enter the Temple buildings. 15. Elul] The 6th month (August-September) of 445 B.C. 18. Arah . . Meshulam] see Ezr 2⁵ Neh 3⁴.

A LIST OF THOSE WHO RETURNED FROM BABYLON WITH ZERUBABEL

2. Hanani] after carrying information to Nehemiah respecting the condition of Jerusalem (12), he must have returned with him to Judea. 3. Until the sun be hot] By this time the mass of the citizens would be astir. While they stand by] RV 'while they (i.e. the sentries) stand on guard.' 4. The houses were not builded] i.e. the area of the city was not yet fully occupied with buildings.

5. Reckoned by genealogy] It was proposed to take a census of all the persons of Jewish descent, with a view to transferring part of the country population to the capital. Particulars derived from such a census appear in 11^{4f}. Here, however, the subject is for a time dropped, and the register that follows relates to the period of Zerubbabel (v. 7).

7-73. The names here enumerated are repeated, with certain small differences, from the list contained in Ezr 2. 70. Basons] used in connexion with the sacrifices. Five hundred and thirty priests' garments] For this should perhaps he substituted 'five hundred pounds of silver and thirty priests' garments,' a change which would make the quantities named in vv. 70-72 approximate closely to those given in Ezr 2⁶⁹. 73. And when the seventh month came] These words in RV are connected with the subject of c. 8, the seventh month (Tishri) being probably the one immediately following the sixth (Elul) mentioned in 6¹⁵.

CHAPTER 8

THE READING OF THE LAW BY EZRA

1. The street] RV 'the broad place': and so in vv. 3, 16. The water gate] This probably led to the spring of Gihon (the Virgin's spring).

2. Ezra] It has been argued in the note on Ezr 10⁴⁴ that the effort to fortify Jerusalem described in Ezr 4⁶⁻²³ was made whilst Ezra was present there, and that the failure of it destroyed for a time his influence among his countrymen. The interval that elapsed between the destruction of the newly-built walls and Nehemiah's arrival was probably not long, and during it Ezra may have remained in retirement at Jerusalem. Some, however, have supposed that after effecting the reforms described in Ezr 9 and 10, he returned at once to Babylon, and only revisited Palestine after Nehemiah's arrival there. The absence of his name amongst those who helped to build the walls of Jerusalem (c. 3) has been urged in favour of this view; but there would be little reason to distinguish his co-operation from that of the other priests (31). To bring . . of Moses] The teaching of the Law was the purpose of Ezra's journey to Jerusalem some fourteen years before.

2. The first day of the seventh month] This was one of the festivals (cp. v. 9) of the New Moon, termed in the Law the Feast of Trumpets, and kept with special rites: Lv 23^{24, 25} Nu 29¹⁻⁶. 7. And the Levites] omit and.

8. Gave the sense] i.e. with such additional explanation as was required for the people to understand what was read.

9. The Tirshatha] i.e. governor. The same title was borne by Zerubbabel (Ezr 2⁶³). All the people wept] from a consciousness of their transgressions which the reading of the Law had awakened. 11. Hold your peace] in order to guard against uttering words ill-suited to a holy day.

14. Should dwell in booths] This command in connexion with the Feast of Tabernacles (kept on the fifteenth day of the seventh month) occurs only in Lv 23⁴². 15. The mount] better, 'the hill-country.' Pine branches] RV 'branches of wild olives' (or oleaster).

16. The roof of his house] This was flat, and available for walking or sleeping: cp. Dt 22⁸ 1S 9²⁵ 2S 11² 16²². The gate of Ephraim] in the N. wall, facing the former kingdom of Ephraim.

17. Since the days of Jeshua] i.e. of Joshua. The exceptional feature in this observance of the ancient Feast of Tabernacles seems to have been the dwelling in 'booths,' though the dwelling in 'tents' had been previously practised (cp. Hos 12¹⁴). Either the command of Lv 23⁴² had been disregarded, or it was a modification of the older usage which had only recently been incorporated in the Law.

CHAPTER 9

THE RENEWAL OF THE COVENANT

4. Stairs] lit. 'ascent': probably the pulpit of wood mentioned in 8⁴. Bani . . Bani] One of the two names is probably an error for 'Binnui': cp. 12⁸.

6. Thou, etc.] Before this LXX inserts 'And Ezra said.' The prayer that follows first recalls God's early mercies to the nation, the unworthy return made for such, the divine forbearance, the people's renewed offences, and their consequent punishment; it next acknowledges the justice of the chastisement undergone; and it concludes with a solemn promise of future amendment. But though it is a confession of national sins and ends with a national covenant, the sequence of thought it presents might well be followed in private devotions. All their host] i.e. the stars: cp. Gn 1² Isa 40²⁶. The host of heaven] i.e. the angels: cp. 1K 22¹⁹.

7. Didst choose] The religious privileges enjoyed by Israel could only be ascribed to the free grace of God, and such privileges carried with them corresponding responsibilities. The same is true of the advantages, material or intellectual, possessed by other peoples. 8. Righteous] i.e. faithful to Thy promises: cp. Ps 40¹⁰. 16. They and our fathers] better, 'they, even our fathers.'

22. Didst divide . . corners] RV 'which thou didst allot after their portions': i.e. according to their several boundaries. 26. Slew thy prophets] see, for instance, 1K 18⁴ 19¹⁰ 2Ch 24²⁰⁻²² Jer 26²⁰⁻²³. 29. Withdrew the shoulder] like a restive ox that refuses the yoke.

32. The kings of Assyria] The kings of Assyria that distressed Israel were Shalmaneser II (to whom Jehu paid tribute), Tig-lath-pileser (2K 15²⁹), Shalmaneser III and Sargon (2K 17^{5, 6}), Sennacherib (2K 18, 19), and perhaps Asshurbanipal (2Ch 33¹¹). Unto this day] The rule over Israel exercised by Assyria had been succeeded by that of Babylon and Persia. 33. Done right] RV 'dealt truly': i.e. faithfully: cp. v. 8.

38. And because of all this] RV 'and yet for all this.' We make a sure covenant] The original covenant between Israel and the LORD made at Sinai (Ex 24) had been renewed by Hezekiah (2Ch 15¹²) and Josiah (2Ch 34³⁰⁻³³): cp. also Ezr 10⁸. Seal unto it] lit. (and the names of) 'our princes, etc., are on the sealed writing.'

CHAPTER 10

LIST OF THOSE WHO PARTICIPATED IN THE COVENANT

1. Now those that sealed were] The names that follow Zidkijah's are those of families whose living representatives sealed on behalf of their houses. Several of these family names occur in the list of those who accompanied Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (c. 12). Zidkijah] The fact that his name is coupled with Nehemiah's suggests that he was a person of importance, but nothing is known of him.

29. To walk in God's law, etc.] The enactments of the Law which they more particularly undertook to carry out were those directing (a) abstention from marriage with aliens, (b) the observance of the sabbath and sabbatical year, (c) the provision of supplies for the Temple and its ministers. These enactments gained in importance from the circumstances of the times, for there was a persistent tendency on the part of many of the people both to form alliances with their heathen neighbours and to be indifferent to the external ordinances of religion (see Ezr 9 Neh 13). It was to counteract these evils that prominence was given to those regulations which were calculated to preserve the separateness of the Jewish race, and to accentuate the sacredness of their religious institutions. The stress thus laid upon the ceremonial law was not due to any relapse from the spiritual faith of the prophets to the more material and mechanical ideas of primitive times, but was intended to impress upon the people a sense of the transcendent sanctity of the God with whom they enjoyed such privileged relations.

31. Leave the seventh year] i.e. forego the produce of the land in that year. 32. The third part of a shekel] In Ex 30¹¹⁻¹⁶ the amount named is 'a half shekel' (cp. Mt 17²⁴), the change being perhaps due to an alteration in the weight of the shekel. 34. The wood offering] This is not specifically prescribed in the Pentateuch. Josephus speaks of it as a festival (the Xylophory). 38. The priest] i.e.

some priest was to attend when the Levites took their tithes. 39. Forsake] i.e. fail to provide for.

CHAPTER 11

MEASURES TO SUPPLEMENT THE POPULATION OF JERUSALEM

1. This v. resumes the subject of the paucity of population in Jerusalem: see 7⁴. The rulers were already residing in the capital, and means were now taken to transport thither a proportion of the commons that had made their homes in the country towns (v. 3). The city had received fortifications; but these were useless unless they were manned.

3. The province] i.e. Judaea: Ezr 5⁹.

4. At Jerusalem, etc.] The list that follows apparently enumerates the provincial families that removed to Jerusalem. It likewise occurs, with some variations in the names and figures, in 1 Ch 9³⁴. 9. Second over the city] presumably second to Joel: cp. v. 17. But some render, 'over the second quarter of the city': cp. 2 K 22¹⁴ Zeph 1¹⁰. 14. The son of one of the great men] RV 'the son of Haggadolim.'

16. The outward business of] Perhaps the judicial administration described in 2 Ch 19⁸⁻¹⁰ 1 Ch 26²⁹. 17. Was the principal, etc.] i.e. led the praises of the Temple singers after prayer had been made. The second] i.e. to Mattaniah: cp. v. 9.

20. This v. interrupts the account of the residents at Jerusalem: it should precede v. 25.

22. The overseer, etc.] RV 'The overseer . . the son of Micha, of the sons of Asaph, the singers, over the business,' etc. The words over the business are connected with overseer. The business meant is the conduct of the Temple services. 23. For it was, etc.] RM 'for there was a commandment . . and a sure ordinance concerning the singers': The king] Artaxerxes: cp. Ezr 7²⁴. 24. Was at the king's hand] Possibly Pethahiah was a royal officer, subordinate to Nehemiah, having charge of civil, as distinct from ecclesiastical, matters.

25. The villages, with their fields] better, 'the villages in their fields,' i.e. the unwall'd towns (Lv 25³¹). Most of the names that follow occur in Josh 15^{13f}. 31. From Geba dwelt] RV 'dwelt from Geba upward.' 35. The valley of craftsmen] RM 'Gehaharashim,' another locality. 36. And of the Levites, etc.] RV 'and of the Levites, certain courses in Judah' (i.e. formerly reckoned to Judah) were joined to Benjamin.

CHAPTER 12

THE DEDICATION OF THE WALL OF JERUSALEM

1. The priests] The names in vv. 1-7 likewise appear with some variations in 10³⁻⁸;

see also Ezr 2³⁶⁻³⁹. 8. The Levites] cp. 10⁹⁻¹⁴ Ezr 40⁴². Over the thanksgiving] RM 'over the choirs.'

10. Jeshua] The high priest who returned with Zerubbabel. The succession of high priests is carried down to Jaddua, who was contemporary with Alexander the Great, so that the six generations cover the period from 536 to about 340. Eliashib the grandson of Jeshua was contemporary with Nehemiah.

12-21. The names that are repeated in these vv. from vv. 1-7 present certain variations.

22. Johanan] probably the same as the 'Jonathan' of v. 11. Darius] Since Jaddua was contemporary with Alexander the Great, the Darius here meant is probably Darius Codomannus, who was successively defeated by Alexander at the battles of the Granicus, Issus, and Arbela. 23. The book of the chronicles] some official record, not the 'Chronicles' of the OT. 24. Jeshua the son of Kadmiel] to be corrected to 'Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel': see v. 8, 10⁹. Over against them] i.e. in the choir, where the singing was antiphonal.

25. The thresholds] RV 'the storehouses.'

26. In the days of Nehemiah] a date subsequent to the days of Joiakim, for the high priest in Nehemiah's time was Eliashib, son of Joiakim.

27. The dedication of the wall] It is reasonable to suppose that the dedication of the wall followed closely upon its completion (related in 6¹¹), so that the events described in chs. 8-10 may be later than those narrated in this c., which from the use of the first person (vv. 31, 38, 40) seems to be derived from Nehemiah's memoirs. 28. The plain country] better, 'The Plain' (lit. 'circle'), i.e. the S. end of the Jordan valley: cp. 3²². Others suppose the word to be used here in a general sense of the circuit of country round Jerusalem. Netophathi] RV 'the Netophathites.' 29. The house of Gilgal] RV 'Beth-gilgal.'

31. Two great companies, etc.] RV 'two great companies that gave thanks and went in procession.' Went on the right hand] The two companies probably mustered on the W. side of the city, facing eastward: the company on the right under Ezra then moved southward, whilst the company on the left under Nehemiah moved northward; and the two eventually reunited on the E. of the city near the Temple.

35. Zechariah] the overseer of the right-hand company, corresponding to Jezrahiah (v. 42) in the other. His descent from Asaph suggests that he was a Levite, not a priest, so that for 'namely, Zechariah' should be substituted 'also Zechariah.' 37. And at the fountain gate, etc.] better, 'and by the fountain gate and straight on.'

38. Went over against them] The words over against them should probably be altered, by an easy correction, to 'on the left hand' (cp. v. 31), and the whole should run, 'and the other company . . . which went on the left hand, and I and half of the people after it (went) upon the wall above the tower of the furnaces . . . and above the gate of Ephraim and by the old gate and by the fish gate,' etc. 39. The prison gate] RV 'the gate of the guard.'

40. In the house] better, 'at the house.'

44. Out of the fields] RV 'according to the fields': alluding to certain arrangements for storing. Portions of the law] RV 'portions appointed by the law.' 45. The ward] better, 'the charge': ep. 2 Ch 13¹¹. 46. In the days, etc.] LXX has 'in the days of David Asaph was of old chief.' 47. Every day his portion] RV 'as every day required.' Sanctified them unto] RV 'sanctified for': i.e. Israel set apart as holy certain portions for the Levites, and the latter for the priests.

THE REFORM OF ABUSES

The reforms embraced the separation of Israel from the mixed multitude and the abolition of certain abuses that had arisen in connexion with the chambers of the Temple, the provision for the Levites, the observance of the sabbath, and mixed marriages.

1. On that day] the particular time intended is uncertain. Was found written] see Dt 23³⁻⁶.

3. Separated] see Ezr 9, 10. All the mixed multitude] cp. Ex 12³⁸ Nu 11⁴. The term may be illustrated by Ezr 9², where 'mingled themselves with the peoples of those lands' is a kindred expression.

4. Eliashib] previously mentioned in 3¹ 12¹⁰. Chamber] RV 'chambers.' 6. The two and thirtieth year] i.e. 433 B.C. Obtained I leave] i.e. to return to Palestine. 7. Understood of] better, 'perceived.' 10. For] RV 'so that.' The Levites not receiving the support due to them had to work to maintain themselves.

11. Forsaken] i.e. unprovided for.

Gathered them] i.e. the Levites.

17. What evil . . . the sabbath] The protests made by the prophets and others against the profanation of the sabbath (see Ezk 20^{12, 20} 44²⁴ Isa 56^{4, 6} 58¹³) eventually brought the Jews to observe it so strictly that they even allowed themselves to be massacred rather than desecrate it by defending themselves (1 Mac 2³²⁻³⁸).

23. That had married wives, etc.] The same practice was condemned by Ezra (chs. 9, 10).

24. Their children spake half] better, 'of their children half spake,' etc. 26. Outlandish] i.e. foreign.

28. Chased him from me] i.e. expelled him from the Jewish community. According to Josephus (who, however, places the incident at a much later date) Joiada's son was named Manasseh, and when expelled by Nehemiah, was induced by his father-in-law Sanballat to join him at Samaria by the promise of being appointed high priest of a temple that was to be built on Mt. Gerizim. 29. Defiled the priesthood] The actual high priest was prohibited from taking as his wife any but a virgin of his own people (Lv 21¹⁴). 30. The wards of] better, 'charges for.'

At this point the OT. record of Nehemiah closes; but in 2 Mac 2¹⁸ it is added that he collected together 'the books about the kings and prophets, and the books of David, and letters of kings about sacred gifts'—a statement the precise meaning of which it is unnecessary to discuss here. In Ecclus 49¹ he is eulogised for having 'raised up the walls that were fallen, and set up the gates and bars.'

ESTHER

INTRODUCTION

1. Character and Contents. The book of Esther is one of a group of writings known as the Five Rolls (the other four being the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, and Ecclesiastes). Its contents fall within the period embraced by the book of Ezra, namely, the reign of Xerxes (485–464 B.C.), when the Jews were under Persian rule, and when, though a large body had returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel, yet numbers of them were still scattered over the Persian empire. The events recounted are put forward as those which led to the institution of the Jewish feast of 'Purim,' held on the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar (February–March), and preceded by a fast on the thirteenth (called the Fast of Esther). The author is quite unknown, but his familiarity with Persian customs and Persian words makes it probable that he lived in Persia itself. He was not, however, contemporaneous with the events he relates, for Xerxes is described in language which implies that his reign was past; and his work is perhaps to be placed in the fourth century B.C. The book came to be held in very high esteem by the Jews; it was called par excellence 'the Roll'; it was read annually at the Feast of Purim; and Maimonides is reported to have said that in the days of the Messiah the only Scriptures left would be the Law and the Roll. In the Apocrypha there are certain additions to the book, called the 'Rest of Esther,' which are probably later in date than the original work, and are certainly different in style and spirit.

2. Sources. In the course of the narrative allusion is made to Persian state-records (2²³ 6¹ 10²), as well as to documents written by Mordecai, upon which some of the facts related may be based.

3. Value. That the account contained in the book has some historical foundation is probable for several reasons. It offers an explanation of a well-established Jewish festival; reference is made in 2Mac15³⁸ to the fourteenth day of Adar as being 'the day of Mordecai'; and acquaintance is shown throughout with Persian customs (see 1¹⁹ 3¹³). A certain parallel to the destruction inflicted by the Jews upon their enemies, and the institution of a feast to commemorate it, is afforded by the slaughter of the Magi by the Persians and the festival by which it was celebrated. The extraordinary conduct of Xerxes in countenancing a general massacre of his subjects is in keeping with his irrational behaviour on more than one occasion, as described by Herodotus. And finally, the interval of time between the disgrace of Vashti in Xerxes' third year (1³), and the elevation of Esther in his seventh year (2¹⁶), agrees with his absence from Persia on his expedition against the Greeks, the battle of Salamis taking place in 480 B.C., after which engagement the king returned to Asia. On the other hand, certain features in the narrative suggest that the writer has sought to enhance the effectiveness of his recital by striking contrasts, embellished descriptions, and large figures. It is not likely that either Vashti or Esther was Xerxes' queen; according to Herodotus it was Amestris who held that position, and Vashti and Esther were probably nothing more than favourite concubines. The six months' feast (1⁴), the ten thousand talents of silver (3⁹), the gallows (or stake) 50 cubits high (5¹⁴), and the 75,000 (LXX 15,000) slain (9¹⁶), are probably all exaggerations. And there is some lack of plausibility in the statements that orders were issued for the slaughter of the Jews and of their enemies eleven and nine months respectively before the massacres were to be carried out (3¹², 18 8⁹).

4. The moral instructiveness of the book centres in the character of Esther, who, as depicted in the narrative, appears as virtuous as she was fair, being dutiful to her foster-father, faithful to the king, loyal to her people, and pious towards her God. Her story breathes the spirit of truest patriotism, for she is represented as willing to face death to save her countrymen. It also illustrates the working of Divine Providence, for though the name of God does not appear in the book (at least in the original Hebrew, in the LXX it is introduced freely), the whole history implies the belief that it was as an instrument in His hand that Esther wrought her people's deliverance. And whilst prayer is likewise not actually mentioned in the book, yet the fast of Esther and her countrymen (described in 4¹⁶) presumes the practice, and the sequel of the narrative is meant to attest its efficacy.

THE DISOBEDIENCE AND DISGRACE OF QUEEN VASHTI

1. Ahasuerus] LXX has 'Artaxerxes,' but probably 'Xerxes,' the son of Darius Hystaspis, is meant, who succeeded his father in 485 B.C.

India . . Ethiopia] India here means not the peninsula of Hindostan, but the region near the Indus: Ethiopia is the modern Nubia.

2. Shushan] i.e. Susa in Elam, the country lying to the E. of the Persian Gulf. The palace] lit. 'the fortress,' as in Neh 1¹. 3. In the third year] i.e. 483 B.C. Thy power] better, 'the forces': and so in 8¹².

6. White, green, and blue] Somo take the second term to designate the 'material,' and render 'of white cotton and blue,' white and blue (or violet) being the Persian royal colours (8¹⁵). The beds] RV 'the couches,' upon which the feasters reclined. 7. Royal wine] LXX has 'wine which the king himself used to drink.' The state] RV 'the bounty.'

8. According to the law] i.e. according to the king's express command on this occasion; for it is implied that in general the drinking was regulated by the court officials, and the guests had to drink just as much or as little as they were bidden, not as they pleased.

9. Vashti] According to Herodotus, Xerxes' queen was called Amestris.

13. The wise men, which knew the times] probably experienced counsellors (cp. 1Ch 12³²): but according to others, astrologers and diviners: cp. Isa 44²⁵ Dan 5¹⁵. For so was the king's manner toward all] better, 'for so was the king's business brought before all,' etc. The king was expected to consult 'those who knew law and judgment' in all matters before coming to a decision. 14. The next unto him] i.e. nearest to the king in rank and importance.

18. Likewise shall the ladies, etc.] RV 'And this day shall the princesses of Persia and Media which have heard of the deed of the queen say the like unto all the king's princes.'

19. That it be not altered] cp. Dan 6⁸. Any command written in the king's name and sealed with his ring was similarly irrevocable.

20. For it is great] i.e. the decree is weighty and important.

22. According to the writing thereof] i.e. the letters sent to the several provinces were written in the characters and language that prevailed in each. Many of the extant inscriptions of the Persian kings are tri-lingual.

And that it should be published, etc.] better (by a slight correction), 'and that he should speak all that seemed good to him,' i.e. should speak his mind freely, without regard to the feelings of his women-folk.

CHAPTER 2

THE CHOICE OF ESTHER TO BE QUEEN.

MORDECAI'S SERVICE

1. He remembered, etc.] LXX has 'he thought no more of Vashti, remembering what,' etc. 3. The house of the women] This was the house of the virgins, as contrasted with the house of the concubines (v. 14).

Their things for purification] Various perfumed oils and ointments (v. 12).

5. Mordecai] The name, though used by Jews (cp. Ezr 2³ Neh 7⁷), was derived from the Babylonian deity Merodach (Marduk).

Shimei . . Kish] probably Mordecai's grandfather and great grandfather (v. 6 applying to Kish). Others regard the genealogy as abbreviated, and take Shimei and Kish to be remoter ancestors, identifying them with the Shimei and Kish of 2S 16⁶ 1S 9¹ (in which case v. 6 must refer to Mordecai's family two or three generations back).

7. Hadassah] a Hebrew name meaning 'Myrtle.' Esther] conjoined by some with the Persian word for 'star'; according to others, the same as the Babylonian 'Ishtar,' the Canaanite 'Ashtoreth.' 9. Such things as belonged to her] lit. 'her portions'; perhaps richer viands than ordinary: cp. Dan 1⁵.

11. And Mordecai walked, etc.] He apparently occupied a position in the king's household (cp. 3²), and in the apocryphal 'Rest of Esther' (11³) he is expressly styled a servitor in the king's court. He would thus have opportunities of communicating with Esther.

12. After that she had been, etc.] RV 'after that it had been done to her according to the law for the women, twelve months.' 13. Whatsoever she desired] i.e. for the adornment of her person. 14. Into the second house of the women] so LXX. Some render, 'returned a second time' (i.e. back again) 'into the house of the women,' but at any rate into a different quarter of it, where they were under the charge of Shaasghaz, not of Hegai.

15. She required nothing, etc.] i.e. instead of selecting her articles of attire for herself like other maidens (v. 13), she left everything to the choice of Hegai. 16. Tebeth] i.e. December-January. The seventh year] i.e. 479 B.C. Thus four years elapsed between the degradation of Vashti and the promotion of Esther (see 1³). In the interval between 483 and 479 Xerxes' expedition into Greece took place, the battle of Salamis being fought in 480 B.C. 18. Made a release] Either from taxation or military service. Some would render 'granted a holiday.' According to the state] RV 'according to the bounty of': i.e. with regal generosity.

19. And when the virgins, etc.] Some connect this with v. 14, and take 'the virgins' to mean 'the young women.' Others render, 'now when virgins were gathered together a second time' (as on the earlier occasion described in v. 8). Sat in the king's gate] perhaps as the official who received applicants that desired to have audience with the king.

23. Hanged] or, 'impaled,' a form of punishment frequently inflicted by Persian sovereigns. The book of the chronicles] Herodotus relates instances of Xerxes' similarly recording the names of certain men who distinguished themselves in the war against Greece.

HAMAN'S REVENGEFUL DESIGN AGAINST THE JEWS

1. The Agagite] It has been suggested that the name is an epithet meant to recall the Amalekite Agag hewn in pieces by Samuel (1S 15³³), and intended to indicate contempt and abhorrence.

2. Mordecai bowed not, etc.] In the apocryphal 'Rest of Esther' Mordecai explains in a prayer to the Almighty that he refused to bow down to Haman, 'that he might not prefer the glory of man above the glory of God.' Amongst many heathen peoples divine honours were paid to human beings.

7. Nisan] i.e. March-April. The twelfth year of Xerxes would be 474 B.C. They cast Pur, etc.] i.e. early in the first month they cast lots for every day of the year to find out which day would be the most favourable for the success of Haman's design. In the Assyrian calendars there are lucky and unlucky days; and the Persians doubtless entertained a like belief. To the twelfth month] The Heb. is probably defective, and the LXX gives a completer sense by adding, 'and the lot fell on the fourteenth' (an error for the 'thirteenth,' v. 13) 'day of the month, which is Adar.' Adar corresponded to February-March.

9. Ten thousand talents] The Persian talent weighed 66 lb. That have the charge of the business] i.e. those whose business it is to receive money paid into the king's treasury.

10. Took his ring] For the significance of this see 8^s. 11. The silver] The money which Haman had pledged himself to pay into the treasury the king confers upon him for his services in pointing out a serious danger to the kingdom (v. 8).

12. The thirteenth day of the first month] Eleven months were thus to elapse between the issue of the decree and its execution.

Lieutenants] lit. 'satraps,' of whom, according to Herodotus, there were twenty. 13. Posts] Horsemen (cp. 8¹⁰) were posted at regular intervals of a day's journey along the main roads to transmit in succession the messages they received until they reached their destination. 15. Was perplexed] i.e. at the magnitude and arbitrary character of the contemplated massacre.

MORDECAI'S APPEAL TO ESTHER TO SAVE HER COUNTRYMEN

1. When Mordecai perceived] His position at the door of the palace (2²¹) would enable him to obtain early intelligence. 2. Even before] better, 'as far as before.' The LXX adds, 'and stopped.' 6. The street] RV 'the broad place': and so in 6^{9,11}. 11. One law of his] RV 'one law for him': i.e. who approached the king without leave given.

14. Then shall there enlargement, etc.] RV 'Then shall relief,' etc. Mordecai's speech, though no mention is made in it of God, nevertheless breathes a spirit of trust in His Providence, and expresses a conviction that help will come from some unperceived quarter.

But thou... destroyed] Divine judgment would overtake her if she neglected her duty to her countrymen. Whether... as this] i.e. who knows whether thou hast not been raised to the throne by God for the express purpose of averting the dangers threatening at the present crisis?

16. Fast ye for me] Fasting was an accompaniment of prayer (cp. Ezr 8²³ Neh 1⁴), and Esther's request was for united prayer on her behalf. If I perish, I perish] Esther proceeded on her dangerous venture in a spirit of resignation.

CHAPTER 5

ESTHER'S PETITION TO THE KING

An account of how Esther, being favourably received by the king, invited him, together with Haman, to a banquet whereat she promised to make known her petition, and how Haman prepared for the execution of Mordecai.

1. On the third day] This indicates that the fast of 4¹⁰ is not to be regarded as extending over three whole days. 6. The banquet of wine] This presumably followed the dinner. Herodotus states that the Persians, though moderate at their meals, were much addicted to wine. 8. I will do... hath said] i.e. to make known to him her request. Esther hoped that by preparing a second banquet for the king before presenting her petition, she would render him more disposed to grant it.

9. In the king's gate] Since his hopes had been raised by Esther's undertaking to supplicate the king, he had laid aside his garb of mourning (4²), and resumed his previous station (2²¹). 11. The multitude of his children] A Jew regarded a large family as a blessing (Gn 30²⁰), and, according to Herodotus, a Persian's strongest motive for pride, next to his personal bravery, was the number of his children. Haman had ten sons (9¹⁰). 14. A gallows] lit. 'a tree' (or 'stake').

MORDECAI IS HONOURED

An account of how the king being reminded of Mordecai's services, and wishing to reward him, consulted Haman, and how Haman, thinking himself the object of the king's interest, counselled him, and was directed to render to Mordecai the honours he had advised.

1. The book... chronicles] in which the chief occurrences of the king's reign, including any signal services done by his subjects (2²³), were recorded.

8. The royal apparel... usest to wear] Not apparel similar to that which was worn by the king, but apparel which the king had actually used, just as the horse upon which the person to be honoured was mounted was that which the king had actually ridden (cp. 1 K 1²³). The crown royal... head] RV 'and on the head of which' (i.e. of the horse) 'a crown royal is set.' The royal charger bore on its head a crown or coronet. 12. Having his head covered] as a sign of humiliation and woe: cp. 2 S 15³⁰ 19⁴ Jer 14¹. 13. If Mordecai... fall before him] LXX adds, 'for the Living God is with him.'

THE EXECUTION OF HAMAN

4. We are sold] an allusion to Haman's tender of 10,000 talents (3⁹). Although the enemy, etc.] The rendering is uncertain; RV 'although the adversary could not have compensated for the king's damage' (which would have resulted from the loss of so many of his subjects); RM 'for our affliction is not to be compared with the king's damage' (or 'annoyance' occasioned by Esther's complaint). Perhaps, 'although no enemy is comparable (to Haman) in doing damage to the king.'

8. The bed] RV 'the couch,' on which Esther was reclining at the table. They covered Haman's face] preparatory to his execution. 9. One of the chamberlains . . the king] better, 'one of the chamberlains that were before the king said.' Harbonah is mentioned in 1¹⁰. Who had spoken good] i.e. by the disclosure of the conspiracy described in 2^{21,22}. Hang him thereon] Haman suffered the retribution declared by the Psalmist to await the wicked: see Ps 7^{15,16}.

CHAPTER 8

THE JEWS ARE SAVED

1. Did . . of Haman] The property of Haman, after his execution, was confiscated to the use of the king, to be disposed of as he thought fit. 2. Took off his ring, etc.] The bestowal of the ring implied that Mordecai was appointed to be a minister of State, since the ring was used for giving authority to royal decrees (see v. 8): cp. Gn 41⁴².

4. Then the king held out] This seems to imply that Esther had approached the king unbidden: see 4¹¹.

7. Behold, I have given, etc.] The king mentions this to show that his denial of her request to reverse the letters of Haman (v. 5) was due not to lack of desire, but lack of ability to meet her wishes. 8. Write ye also] The letters written by Haman and sealed with the king's ring could not be reversed as Esther had requested (v. 5), but she and Mordecai could be empowered, as Haman had previously been (3^{11,12}), to write such letters as they might think expedient to enable the Jews to stand on their defence. 9. The third month] i.e. May-June. Rather more than two months had elapsed since Haman's letters had been despatched (3¹²). 10. Riders on mules, etc.] RV 'riding on swift steeds that were used in the king's service, bred of the stud.'

15. In royal apparel] not the same as that described in 6⁸, but a dress befitting the high office to which he had been appointed. His present magnificence was in striking contrast to his previous distress and humiliation (4¹).

A great crown of gold] i.e. a circlet, indicative of high, though not royal, rank. In the Heb. a different word is used to describe the royal crown worn by the king and queen (1^{11 217}). 17. Became Jews] i.e. proselytes.

CHAPTER 9

THE JEWS SLAY THEIR ENEMIES. INSTITUTION OF PURIM

3. All the rulers, etc.] The great massacre described in v. 16 is thus represented as being in part the work of the Persian authorities with the forces at their disposal. 10. On the spoil, etc.] In this respect they did not carry out the king's decree (8¹¹); their vengeance was not sullied by sordid motives.

12. What have they done, etc.] An exclamation, not a question. What is thy petition? etc.] The king was willing to gratify Esther further, perhaps to make amends for having been unable to grant her earlier request (8⁵⁻⁸).

13. Be hanged] i.e. let their dead bodies be exposed, such exposure being a mark of infamy.

16. Had rest] This anticipates what took place on the 'fourteenth' of Adar (v. 17).

Seventy and five thousand] LXX has 'fifteen thousand.' 19. The Jews of the villages] better, 'the Jews of the country districts.'

Sending portions] i.e. to the poor among them: cp. Neh 8¹⁰.

20. Mordecai wrote these things] This refers not to the existing book of Esther, but to an account contained in the letters sent to effect the purpose indicated in vv. 21, 22. This was the establishment as yearly festivals for all Jews throughout the empire both the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar; and consequently involved a modification of the usage described in vv. 17, 18, according to which only a single day (in Susa the fifteenth, in the country districts the fourteenth) was so observed.

23. As they had begun . . written unto them] i.e. they undertook to celebrate both the day observed at first (vv. 17, 18) and also the additional day suggested by Mordecai. 25. When Esther came] The name 'Esther' does not occur in the Heb., so that the correct rendering may be 'when it' (i.e. Haman's device) 'came before the king.' 26. For all] RV 'because of all.' This letter] the 'letters' of v. 20.

27. Such as joined themselves unto them] i.e. religious proselytes: cp. 8¹⁷. 29. This second letter] 'second' in relation to the letter mentioned in v. 20.

31. The matters of the fastings and their cry] Seemingly it was directed that there should be a commemoration not only of the deliverance granted to the Jews, but also of the distress that preceded it: see 4³. No account is here given of the day thus appointed for fasting and lamentation; but in later times the thirteenth day of Adar, as being that which Haman had fixed for the destruction of the Jews (3¹²), was observed as a day of humiliation. 32. In the book] probably a book, not now extant, dealing with the Purim festival; but some authorities think that 'the book of the chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia' (10²) is meant.

CHAPTER 10

THE GREATNESS OF MORDECAI

1. The isles of the sea] or, 'coast lands,' i.e. the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. The description of the king's dominion serves to enhance the glory of Mordecai, who was his minister. 3. Seeking the wealth] i.e. seeking to promote their welfare: cp. Ezr 9¹².

JOB

INTRODUCTION

1. Theme and Contents. The book of Job, it may safely be said, is not known and read as it deserves to be. It is a fascinating book, and one of the most valuable in the OT. It deals with a theme which is as old as man and as wide as the world, viz. the reason of human suffering, the why and wherefore of those afflictions that fasten not merely upon the guilty, but, as it often appears, upon the righteous and the innocent. This immemorial problem, the crux of theology and the darkest mystery of human life, is the subject of this book, where it is treated in a most brilliant manner. In style the book of Job is a masterpiece of literature. It contains some of the deepest thought and the sublimest poetry that have come down from antiquity.

The difficulties that beset the ordinary reader are due not merely to the nature of the subject, but also to the fact that it is written in poetry, which is always more difficult than prose, and also to the too common practice of reading only short extracts. The work, being a discussion carried on at considerable length, must, if it is to be rightly understood, be read as a whole. It must, moreover, be read in the Revised Version, the meaning and sequence of thought being often much obscured in the Authorised Version.

The book is artistically constructed, and consists of three parts—a Prologue, the Poem, and an Epilogue. The Prologue is contained in the first two chapters, and the Epilogue in the last. These are written in prose, and form the setting of the Poem, which extends from c. 3–42⁶. The Prologue introduces the characters, and tells how they come together. The Poem contains the debate between Job and his three friends, followed by a speech from a bystander called Elihu, and concludes with an address by the Almighty and a penitent confession by Job. The Epilogue relates the further fortunes of Job, his restoration to prosperity, and his death.

The Prologue (chs. 1, 2) presents to us an Eastern chieftain called Job, who lives in the land of Uz, probably near Edom. He is a very pious man, 'perfect and upright, one that fears God and eschews evil,' and a very prosperous man. He is surrounded with what are commonly regarded as unmistakable tokens of the divine favour. He has a large family, possesses immense herds of camels, oxen, asses, and sheep, and is described as 'the greatest of the children of the east.' He is as good as he is great.

In these circumstances a scene is opened in heaven. One of God's angels, called 'The Satan,' i.e. The Adversary, whose office seems to be to test the sincerity of men's characters, suggests that Job's piety is dependent upon his prosperity, that he does not 'serve God for nought,' that his religion is mere selfishness, and that if God were to withhold His blessings Job would withhold his worship and 'curse God to His face.' Satan obtains permission to put Job to the proof. From the height of his prosperity and happiness Job is suddenly plunged into the depths of misery. He loses all his property, and his children are cut off by violent death. Job is profoundly grieved, but he submits reverently to the will of God. So far he stands the test. In a second heavenly council Satan asserts that the test has not been severe enough, and receives permission to afflict Job's person. He smites him with a severe and loathsome disease, which makes him an outcast and an object of abhorrence to all. Still he is resigned. His faith remains unshaken. 'What?' he says, 'shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?' He makes no complaint against the Almighty.

Three friends now appear upon the scene: Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, who having heard of his great calamities come to condole with the ruined and childless man. They are appalled at the sight of his misery. Job is hardly recognisable. The words of consolation fail upon their lips, and they sit down beside him for seven days and seven nights, uttering never a word. Hitherto Job has been able to restrain himself, but now in the presence of his speechless friends a change comes over him. He is unmanned, and breaks down. He opens his mouth, and, in a passage of marvellous pathos and power, he curses the day that he was born and calls for death to come and put an end to his sufferings (c. 3).

With Job's first words begins the main portion of the book, which is continued for 39 chapters, and is written in poetry. It comprises a debate between Job and his three friends as to the reason of his sufferings. The debate is conducted in an orderly manner.

All three speak in turn, and Job answers each after he has spoken. This is repeated three times, except that according to the present arrangement of the book Zophar, who speaks last, fails in the third round of the debate to come forward. Perhaps this is due to some dislocation; see the introductory remarks to the third series of speeches. The theory with which all three begin is that suffering is a certain proof of previous transgression, and accordingly they all adopt a tone of rebuke towards Job on account of his supposed shortcomings, and urge him to repent of his sin, whatever it may be, saying that if he does so God will restore to him his prosperity. No doubt sympathy is more in place than argument in times of trouble, but the object of the book is not to show how to comfort sufferers, but how to account for the sufferings.

The Argument of the three friends is simple. God, they say, is always just. If a man suffers it must be because he deserves it. The righteous never suffer. Job, they conclude, must have been a great sinner to be afflicted thus. And they strive to get Job into a proper frame of mind. To this Job replies that the moral government of the world is not such a simple, uncomplicated thing as his friends suppose. Their theory may be true as a general rule, but there are exceptions. His own case is one. He protests that he is not conscious of any such great sin as they assume to be the cause of his present misery. His sufferings must have some other explanation. They are meanwhile a mystery to him. Nor is he the only exception to the rule of 'Be good and you will be prosperous.' It is a matter of universal experience that the innocent suffer as well as the guilty, and the wicked are frequently allowed to end their days in peace. In the debate this difficulty is put with great boldness, and Job is tempted occasionally to think and say hard things of God. With exquisite pathos he describes his bodily sufferings and mental perplexity, and his last speech concludes with a pathetic contrast between the former days, when the candle of the Lord shined upon his head, when the Almighty was with him and his children were about him, and he was honoured and respected by all, and his present state, when days of evil have laid hold upon him and wearisome nights and days are appointed unto him, when he is poor, and childless, and friendless, an abhorrence and a byword to young and old. To the end he protests his innocence and demands to be shown wherein he has transgressed. His great desire is to come face to face with his Maker. If he only knew where he might find Him, he is sure all would be explained. Meanwhile all is dark, a mystery he cannot fathom, a riddle he cannot explain. I go forward, but He is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive Him; on the left hand, where He doth work, but I cannot behold Him; and on the right hand, but I cannot see Him; but He knoweth the way that I take. His way have I kept, and not declined. Neither have I gone back from the commandment of his lips. When He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.' In a dim way he feels that though he is destined to die without learning the reason of his affliction, yet after death in another world the mystery will be solved. God will show Himself his friend and vindicate his innocence.

When the discussion between Job and his three friends is ended, and their explanation of his afflictions put aside as inadequate, a new speaker is suddenly introduced. A young man, called Elihu, has been listening to the debate, and he now comes forward as a critic of both sides. He is not satisfied with Job's assertions of self-righteousness, and he is disappointed with the three friends for bringing forward such poor arguments and allowing themselves to be silenced by Job. He hopes to set them all right, but one has a difficulty in discovering wherein he differs from the other three reprovers of Job. In great measure he repeats their arguments that God is just and deals out to every man exactly what he deserves. In two particulars, however, he seems to go beyond them, and so far approaches the right view of the question in the more explicit statements, (a) that chastisement may be the expression not of the divine indignation but of the divine goodness, and (b) that it may be designed as a warning, a restraint to keep men from falling into further sin; in other words, that chastisement is discipline, a prevention as well as a cure, having a reference to the future as well as to the past.

This brings us to the last section of the Poem. Job had expressed an earnest desire to meet God face to face. In answer to this, 'the LORD answers Job out of the whirlwind' (chs. 38-41). The striking thing about God's answer is that it is not at all what Job expected. He hoped that God, when He appeared, would give an explanation of His servant's sufferings. But this God does not do. He never alludes to Job's sufferings. What He does is simply to bid Job look around and observe the wonder and mystery of the world in which he is placed. In a series of splendid pictures God causes the panorama of nature to pass before the eyes of His human creature, and asks him if he could make any of these things, or even understand how they were created—the earth, the sea, the stars, the light, the rain, the snow and frost, the lightning, the variety of marvellous instincts and powers possessed by the animals. Could Job rule the world or even subdue any of its wonderful creatures? If not, why should he presume to cavil at the ways of the Almighty or criticise His government of the world? From first to last the answer of God is simply a revelation of His omnipotence. 'It seems, therefore, to be irrelevant to the subject. It is no explanation of the mystery of human suffering.' And yet Job is satisfied. It brings him face to face with God. He feels how presumptuous he has been in questioning the way of God to men, how ignorant and weak and vile he is in the presence of God's omniscience and omnipotence and perfect holiness. 'Behold, I am vile,' he says; 'I will lay mine hand upon my mouth. I have uttered what I understood not. Mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes.' He has regained the old trust in God, but it is a deeper trust. Before his trial he had walked with God in the glad, unquestioning confidence of a child; now he has sounded the abyss of misery, but in the fullest knowledge of the world's pain, he is wholly assured of the righteousness of God. In the vision of God, which has replaced the old knowledge of God at second hand, even more than in the exhibition of God's omnipotence, he enters into peace. The answer to his problems is not simply the manifestation of God's power, it is God Himself. He does not understand, he is content to be humble and to trust. And with this attitude of humility and trust God is represented as well pleased.

In the Epilogue (c. 42⁷⁻¹⁷) Job is restored to double his former prosperity and dies 'old and full of days.'

It is not easy to sum up the distinctive teaching of the book of Job. As a matter of fact, the problem which it states is insoluble. The book itself does not offer a solution. What it does is to show the true spirit in which the calamities of life should be met, a spirit of submission to the omnipotence and of trust in the wisdom of the Almighty. Incidentally, however, the following truths emerge in the book of Job, and have been noted by various commentators. . .)

(a) Even a righteous man may suffer in this world from severe afflictions. (b) It is wrong, therefore, to make a man's sufferings a reproach to him, as though he were 'a sinner above all other men.' They may be permitted by God as a trial of his righteousness. (c) True religion is always disinterested. A truly righteous man will serve God and trust in Him in spite of all temptations to renounce Him arising from his sufferings. (d) It is presumption to accuse God of injustice on account of the sufferings that the good endure or the prosperity that the wicked are permitted to enjoy; man is unable fully to understand God's moral government of the world. (e) The true solution of all such moral perplexities is to be sought in a fuller and larger sense of God's presence and power and wisdom.

It only remains to consider briefly how far we as Christians, living in the clearer light of Christ's life and teaching, have advanced in the knowledge of the purpose and meaning of suffering. Again, this may be summed up under a few separate heads:

(a) Christ Himself is the most conspicuous instance of innocent suffering. 'Though He were a Son yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered.' 'He was made perfect through sufferings.' His words and example show that suffering may be innocently endured for the sake of others, or for the sake of righteousness, or in self-denial, or for the glory of God. (b) Christ has taught us that freedom from outward ills is not the greatest good. The highest good lies in the sphere of character and spirit. Jesus congratulated, not the rich and prosperous and those who never know what pain and sorrow are, but the poor, the meek, the mourning, the persecuted. In spite of all affliction a man may be truly blessed. In this Jesus reversed the common judgment of the world. As Bacon paradoxically puts it, 'Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament, adversity that of the New.' (c) Christ has taught us to call God our Father. He is not, therefore, a mere Judge dispensing abstract justice with indifference to the result upon the individual. God seeks to train and discipline His children so that they may be 'partakers of His holiness.' For their own sakes, therefore, it may be better, considering the end, that in some cases the innocent should 'endure grief' and the guilty be treated with long-suffering and leniency. Under a paternal government the treatment in each case will be accommodated to serve the best result. It will not always follow the rule of abstract justice. (d) Christ has revealed a future life. This Job and his friends, with the OT. saints in general, only dimly perceived or faintly hoped for. Having no certainty of the future life they naturally demanded that justice should be meted out in the present. Perceiving that this was not always done they were beset with many perplexities and doubts as to the justice of the divine government of the world. With the Christian revelation of a future life many of the embarrassments and anomalies of the present disappear. The end, is not yet. The time of the final settlement of accounts is still future. There need be no fear that justice will not be done. Meanwhile the wicked flourish and the righteous suffer. But they may suffer in patience and hope. The afflictions of the present are 'light' and 'but for a moment.' 'They are not to be compared with the glory to be revealed.' 'Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to Him in well-doing, as unto a faithful creator.'

2. Occasion, Authorship, and Date. It has always been a question whether the book of Job is to be regarded as history or parable. Among the Jews themselves the prevailing opinion was that it was strictly historical, though some of their Rabbis were inclined to think that the person of Job was created by the writer of this book in order to set forth his teaching on the problem that was vexing human thought. Rabbi Lakish, e.g., said 'Job existed not, nor was he created; he is a parable.' The opinion of Luther is probably the correct one, viz. that a person called Job did really exist, but that his history has been treated poetically. (The allusion to Job as a real person in Ezk 14¹⁴ seems to show that there was a tradition connected with his name, and that he was famed for his piety. There may also have been a tradition that he suffered from a grievous reversal of fortune.) On this historical foundation a later writer built up this dramatic poem, adopting Job as his hero and freely utilising his history to discuss a problem which was probably pressing with special weight upon men's minds at the time. It would not have served the writer's purpose so well to have created an altogether fictitious hero. But many things indicate that the traditional history of Job has been freely adapted, as, e.g., the elaborately constructed dialogues, the employment of symbolic numbers in the Prologue and Epilogue, the dramatic way in which the scene in the council chamber of heaven is depicted and in which the messengers bring to Job the tidings of his successive calamities, and, moreover, the very fact that the book is a 'poem' in which four men are represented as doing what men never do in real life, conversing with each other in measured strains of lofty and impassioned poetry.

(To what writer we owe this poem, which Victor Hugo called 'perhaps the greatest masterpiece of the human mind,' and which has captivated the minds of men by no means prejudiced in favour of the literature of sacred Scripture, we shall never know with certainty. It belongs to the great class of anonymous masterpieces of which the literatures of all languages contain examples.) Job himself, Moses, Solomon, Isaiah, Ezekiah, Baruch, have each been credited with its composition. (Whoever he was, he was a poetic genius, an earnest philosopher, and a truly religious soul. He probably lived after the downfall of the kingdom of Judah, in any case not earlier than the time of Jeremiah.) At that period the perplexing problems connected with the divine government seem to have pressed heavily on men's minds: cp. e.g. Jer 12¹ 31²⁹ Ezk 18. Professor Davidson thinks that behind the author's time there probably lay some great public calamity which forced upon men's minds the questions of evil and the righteousness of God, and that such a calamity could be nothing short of deportation or exile. 'We may infer,' he says, 'that it was the design of the author to teach Israel, amidst its sorrows and the perplexities caused by them, that sufferings may be a trial of the righteous which if reverently borne will lift them up into fuller knowledge of God and therefore into more assured peace and felicity.' In view of the fact that national disaster would occupy men's thoughts before they felt the problem of individual suffering, there is much to be said for the view, held by many scholars, that the book of Job, which is concerned with the individual, not with the nation, and represents an advanced stage in the discussion of the problem, belongs to the period after the Return, perhaps about 400 B.C. This is also suggested by several other features in the book.

THE PROLOGUE

Chs. 1 and 2, which form the Prologue to the book, describe (a) the prosperity and piety of Job; (b) a scene in heaven in which the Satan questions the motives of his piety; and (c) his subsequent trials, which are permitted by God in order to test and confirm His servant's righteousness, and to show to angels and men that a man may serve God for His own sake and not from self-interest. So far from being dependent on outside conditions the true servant of God will endure the severest trials which can befall human nature, and yet retain his faith and uprightness. It should be observed that whilst the author reveals to his readers the source and purpose of Job's trials these are unknown to Job and his friends. It is the mystery of his suffering which forms the problem of the book.

Chs. 1, 2 are in prose. The rest of the book, except 32¹⁻⁵ and 42⁷⁻¹⁷, is in poetry. See on c. 3.

1-5. The prosperity and piety of Job.

1. The land of Uz] a district to the E. of Palestine, and near Arabia and Edom: cp. Jer 25²⁰ Lam 4²¹. The word Uz occurs (a) as the name of a son of Aram (Gn 10²³); (b) as a descendant of Seir (Gn 36²⁸); (c) as a son of Nahor (Gn 22²¹). The names 'Aram' and 'Seir' seem to point to the lands of Syria and Edom, but the exact position of Uz cannot be exactly defined. From various allusions in the book we must probably think of 'the red sandstones of Edom' (the 'red' land), 'and of the remote desert city in the hollow of the hills—Sela, afterwards Petra; of the broad grey plain of the Arabah to the west; of the dark rugged peaks rising high to the east, their summits white with snow in winter, and beyond this the high desert plateau with its great pilgrim and trading road to Arabia' (see on 6¹⁵⁻²⁰); 'a region with few springs, where the white broom grows' (see on 30⁴); 'and where the ostrich still runs and the wild ass scours the plain seeking the scanty green patches in spring' (39^{5-8, 18-19}). (Conder.)

Job] Meaning uncertain; either 'persecuted' or 'pious.' Perfect] Not sinless; rather, 'single-hearted,' blameless: cp. Noah (Gn 6⁹).

2. Seven . . . three] sacred numbers indicating perfection. We are dealing with ideal history, as the rest of the numbers and other features here and in the Epilogue show.

3. Job was a prince of the desert. He possessed herds of camels yielding milk and food and hair for making tents; asses for riding, and fetching water; cattle and sheep. He even possessed fields (31³⁸). The description corresponds in each respect to the life of a free Arab chief E. of Jordan to-day. The term men of the east is applied to the tribes dwelling on the borders of Palestine, e.g. Syria and Arabia (cp. Gn 29¹ Jg 6³).

4. RV 'And his sons went and held a feast in the house of each one upon his day.' They took it in turns to entertain each other at their respective homes. 5. When the days . . . were gone about] i.e. when all seven sons had given their feast. It appears that it was Job's pious custom to gather together his children at stated intervals that atonement might be made for any neglect of God at their feasts. He sanctified them, i.e. prepared them by ablutions, etc., for taking part in the sacrifices he afterwards offered (cp. Gn 35² Ex 19¹⁰ Lv 9⁷ 18¹⁶). Here we have an instance of the piety alluded to in v. 1. Burnt offerings] Observe that it was not the sin offering of the Mosaic Law which Job offered, but a burnt offering wholly given to God, which was common to many peoples (cp. Nu 23 Mic 6⁵⁻⁸). As head of the family Job acted as priest: cp. Jethro (Ex 2¹⁶ 3¹). Cursed] RV 'renounced'; 'blasphemed' or 'blamed' may be better.

6-12. The first interview between God and Satan. The scene in heaven is based on the conceptions of the spirit world prevailing in the author's time (cp. 1 K 22¹⁹⁻²² Zech 3^{1,2}), and introduced by him to explain the origin and purpose of Job's trials. See last section of Intro.

6. Now there was a day] better, 'Now it was the day,' as if at a special season. The sons of God] i.e. the angels: cp. 38⁷. They come before God to give account of their ministry: cp. 1 K 22¹⁹.

Satan] rather, 'the Satan,' lit. 'the adversary.' The word is in common use to-day among Orientals. The presence of the definite article shows that it is not used in this book as a proper name. The Satan is again spoken of in 1 Ch 21¹ and in Zech 3^{1,2} (see note). In the Adversary we have presented to us a spirit whose mission it is to try and test the lives of men and the motives of their acts: cp. 2³. He sees the bad side of life and therefore opposes man's standing with God. Naturally the constant discovery of evil motives underlying good actions has destroyed his faith in human nature. He is not represented as opposed to God, he is rather His loyal servant, who will not see His kindness abused, and zealously fulfils his duties by leaving no part of the earth unvisited. Malignant motives are, however, already attributed to him; he seems to delight in opposing men, and tortures Job without compunction to justify his own cynicism. But he is not yet regarded as a fallen and evil being, opposed to God. The personality and character of the Devil had not yet been fully revealed.

9-12. In answer to God's challenge the Satan makes the slanderous suggestion that Job's religion is based on selfishness. He serves God for reward. The Satan obtains leave to put Job to the test.

9. The principles of Job's conduct are questioned. Perhaps his integrity is only skin deep. Will he continue his righteous life if he is called on to suffer? 10. An hedge] i.e. God's protecting care. 11. Curse thee to thy face] see on v. 5.

12. God permits the Adversary to try Job in order to test his integrity and manifest his piety. Observe that Job's person is exempt from attack in this first trial. In view of the Satan's eagerness to prove his judgment of Job correct, God knows that this limitation of his power is necessary.

'Between vv. 12 and 13 there is an interval, an ominous stillness like that which precedes the storm. The poet has drawn aside the curtain to us, and we know what is impending. Job knows nothing' (Davidson).

13-22. The first trial of Job's integrity arising from the loss of his property and children. The way in which the messengers are introduced, and the similarity of their message, shows that we are not reading actual history, but a drama. The poet represents the catastrophe as falling on the day when the feast was at the eldest brother's house, because on the morning of that day the sacrifices had been offered for Job's children after the feast in the youngest brother's house on the day before. The death of the children cannot therefore be explained as duo to their sin, for this had just been atoned for. Each catastrophe is worse than the previous one.

15. Sabaeans] Arab tribes. Saba is the great S. Arabian kingdom of which inscriptions going back to an early date are preserved. The Bedonin Arabs still make raids on tribes at a distance, and also, when strong enough, on the settled population. 16. The fire of God] i.e. lightning. 17. Chaldeans] Heb. Kasdim, from the neighbourhood of the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf.

20. Rent his mantle] Tearing the robe has always been an Eastern sign of mourning, as was also shaving the head or pulling out the hair (see Jer 7²⁹ Mic 1¹⁶). Worshipped] lit. 'prostrated himself': cp. Gn 18² Mt 8². The first act of worship is submission, humility.

21. Thither] i.e. to the womb of mother earth. This v. (but somewhat differently rendered, cp. 1 Tim 6⁷) is used in the Burial Service. All is from God, and He has the right to do what He will with His own.

The LORD] It will be noticed as a rule the Hebrew author only uses in the dialogues such names for the Deity as were common to other peoples besides the Hebrews, e.g. 'God,' 'the Almighty.' The occurrence of the Heb. title 'Jehovah' here and in 12⁹ is commonly explained on the supposition that it was a slip on his part. It is keenly disputed whether the name may not have been much older than the time of Moses, and known in Babylonia and Assyria. The evidence must at present be regarded as indecisive, though such a wide diffusion is not antecedently unlikely: see on Gn 2⁴ Ex 3¹³.

22. Charged God foolishly] lit. 'and did not offer (or, attribute) folly to God.' Thus Job successfully withstands the first test of the Adversary and remains loyal to God.

Job's second trial. He refuses to renounce God when afflicted with an excruciating disease. Three friends come to comfort him.

3. Although thou movedst, etc.] or, 'so that it was in vain thou movedst me against him to destroy him.'

4, 5. Skin for skin, etc.] The precise meaning of the proverb is uncertain, but the general meaning seems to be that as long as a man does not suffer in his own person he will gladly bear the sacrifice of everything else ('skin for skin'). But it is a different matter when his life is endangered. Let Job suffer this last and greatest trial, then his integrity will fail him (so the Adversary insinuates) and he will renounce God. His life the Satan is not permitted to touch, short of that he has full liberty, and uses it.

7. Sore boils] lit. 'an evil inflammation.' The disease with which Job was afflicted is commonly taken to be elephantiasis, a terrible form of leprosy. It has also been identified with the 'Oriental sore,' also with ecchyma, for which a plausible case has been made out.

8. A potsherd] A piece of earthenware to remove the scurf skin. He sat down among the ashes] Perhaps those of his camp fires. This was a sign of mourning. Tradition places him on a dunghill, like the 'Mizbeleh' or mound of refuse found outside an Eastern town or village where lepers and other outcasts sit, and men sometimes meet to talk.

9. Job's wife would have had him act as the Adversary expected him to do. 'You may as well renounce God's service since you benefit so little by it, and meet your fate at once instead of lingering in intolerable pain.'

10. Both good and evil are from God's hand, and must be taken in the same spirit. The words of Job are in notable contrast to those of his wife. With his lips] The reader must not be misled into thinking that the author means to suggest that Job nursed in his heart a rebellion he would not utter with his lips.

11. The three friends of Job now come upon the scene. They are represented as persons of importance like himself. Temanite] connected with Edom (Jer 49⁷). Shuhite] Shuah was a son of Abraham by Keturah, who was sent 'to the East' (Gn 25^{2,6}). Naamathite] unknown. The friends, like Job, were probably descendants of Abraham, but not of Israel (Jacob). 12. Knew him not] so disfigured was he by his sickness and misery.

Sprinkled dust upon their heads] This was generally done when lying prostrate on the ground (cp. Lam 2¹⁰), but the words 'toward heaven' suggest that they were standing. They throw dust in the air, which falls on their heads. 13. Seven days] the time of mourning for the dead: cp. 1 S 31¹³ Ezk 3¹⁵.

CHAPTER 3

JOB CURSES HIS DAY

Job curses the day of his birth. He asks why he did not die at birth: why should his wretched life be prolonged?

We are now confronted with a striking change in Job's frame of mind from that presented in 2¹⁰. Probably a considerable interval had elapsed before his friends arrived. He complains in the speeches which follow of the emaciated state into which he had fallen, and that from being the honoured of all he had become a byword to his neighbours: cp. 1³ 19⁸⁻²² 30¹⁻¹⁵. It is evident from this c. that he has been brooding over the miseries of his condition and the hopelessness of the future, and complaint has taken the place of resignation. The presence of his friends only provokes him to give vent to his anguish. In their silent amazement he sees as in a mirror the extent of his own misery. He casts himself confidently on their sympathetic comprehension, and freely utters the dark thoughts he has hitherto restrained. He knows that if left to himself he may lose the fear of the Almighty, and trusts that they will deliver him from this temptation. But an obsolete theology froze their power to help.

Chs. 3-42⁶ are poetical in form, not in exact metre as if for song, but rhythmical for reading. The parts of which the couplet or triplet forming the verse are composed show a marked parallelism, the thought in one half corresponding to or completing the thought in the other. C. 3 is a good example.

There is much similarity between this c. and Jer 20¹¹⁻¹⁸, but the thoughts are those natural to the Hebrew mind, and we need not necessarily suppose them to be borrowed in either case.

3-10. Job curses the day of his birth.

1. His day] the day of his birth. It was thought that the days of the year had an existence of their own, so that any given day would come round again in its turn. Hence Job is not cursing a day which long ago ceased to be, but one which year by year comes back to blight the happiness of others as it blighted his: see on v. 5. 3. Observe the piled-up malediction. The power and pathos of the c. are remarkable. 5. Stain it] RV 'claim it for their own.' Blackness of, etc.] RV 'all that maketh black the day'; e.g. eclipses and unusual darknesses. 6. Let it not be joined, etc.] let it be blotted out of the calendar. The ancients believed in lucky and unlucky days. Let this day ruin no more lives, it has ruined enough. 7. Solitary] RV 'barren.' No joyful voice] as on the occasion of a birth.

8. Let them curse it that curse the day] A reference to magicians who professed to be able to cast spells on a day and make it unlucky, apparently causing eclipses, as the next line suggests. Who are ready to raise up their mourning] RV 'Who are ready to raise up leviathan' (a mythical dragon). It was an ancient superstition that when an eclipse happened it was caused by a dragon which swallowed the sun or moon, or enfolded them in its coils, and so created darkness. A curious present-day confirmation of this idea occurs in the daily papers of Nov. 11, 1901. In a telegram from Peking it was reported that for the first time in history a few foreigners were invited to be present at the Chinese Board of Rites to witness 'the rescuing of the sun, which was suffering from the attacks of a dragon. The rescue was accomplished by means of prostrations, the burning of incense, and beating of drums and gongs.' 9. Dawning of the day] lit. 'eyelids of the morning.'

11-19. Job asks why he did not die at birth; a very fine passage expressive of great bitterness of soul.

12. Prevent me] RV 'receive me.' It was usual for the newborn child to be laid on its father's knees in token of ownership. If he suffered it to remain he pledged himself to bring it up. 14. Desolate places] RM 'solitary piles': cp. the pyramids of Egypt, which were the royal burying-places.

15-19. In reading these verses, in spite of their great beauty, we cannot help contrasting the vague and cheerless ideas about the future state in these early days with the clearer knowledge and glorious hope of the Christian. Although believing that the soul retained its consciousness, men do not appear to have regarded death as but the beginning of a higher form of existence, in looking forward to which man learns to bear the trials of life with patience. They thought of Sheol as the dim and cheerless underworld, where the pale shades of the departed dragged on a colourless existence, dark and monotonous. Yet the gloom of Sheol is to Job a welcome refuge, where he would be at peace. How terrible must be the pain from which he would gladly escape to so wretched a home.

15. Perhaps an allusion to the valuables buried in ancient tombs. 18. Oppressor] rather, 'taskmaster.'

20-26. Job asks why his wretched life should be prolonged.

22. There may be a connexion of thought here with the 'hid treasures' of v. 21. The idea is perhaps that of violating an ancient tomb. The entrance was usually hidden carefully. 23. Whose way is hid] in perplexity and doubt. 24. Translate, 'For my sighings are instead of my eating, and my groans are poured out like drink': cp. Ps 42⁸.

25, 26. The verbs should all be in the present tense in these vv. Job's grief and sickness make him full of gloomy forebodings, which are constantly being realised.

The passionate complaints and longings for death in this c. testify to the agitation of Job's soul. There are signs of impatience and resentment at God's dealings, which shock his friends and evidently influence the tone of their language towards him in the debate which follows.

THE FIRST SERIES OF SPEECHES (Chs. 4-14)

CHAPTER 4

THE FIRST SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ (Chs. 4, 5)

Eliphaz is the principal and probably the oldest of the three friends: cp. 32^{6f}. He is also the most considerate. But the complainings of Job in c. 3 had evidently deepened in him the bad impression which must have been created by Job's sufferings, and being ignorant of the true cause of his trials he draws false conclusions from them. Whilst admitting that Job is fundamentally a pious man, Eliphaz infers that his sufferings must be the punishment of some sin, and that therefore the correction which God is sending should be received with humility and the sin repented of. These promises, which are held by all the friends, are throughout denied and combated by Job.

1-11. Eliphaz gently rebukes Job for yielding to despair, since the godly do not perish under their affliction, but it is the wicked who reap the evil they have sown.

2. Note the courtesy of Eliphaz. He loses his temper in later speeches.

2-5. Eliphaz is greatly struck with the reverse in Job's fortunes. He who had been the great comforter of those in distress is now overcome by his own troubles. Observe that Eliphaz quite underrates their severity, and ignores the wonderful resignation Job has displayed. 4. Cp. 29¹²⁻¹⁷. 5. It is come] i.e. calamity.

6. RV 'Is not thy fear (of God) thy confidence, and thy hope the integrity of thy ways?' Surely Job may reckon on the uprightness of his past life as a pledge of speedy deliverance! He must not despair. The v. is important as proving that the friends recognised Job's fundamental goodness, into whatever sins he may have suffered himself to be betrayed.

7-9. Whereas gross sinners are sure to be cut off, the righteous man, though he may have to suffer for his faults, has reason to hope that he will not perish. 10, 11. The wicked, who are compared to lions, will certainly be destroyed: cp. Ps 22¹³.

12-21. By way of awakening in Job a sense of sin Eliphaz describes a vision in which was revealed to him the perfect purity of God, and the imperfection in His sight of men and even of angels. We have here one of the most wonderful passages in literature. The secrecy, the hush, the sudden panic, the breath that passes over the face, the hair cret with horror, the shadowy figure whose form he cannot discern, the silence broken by the voice, all combine to produce the impression of terror, and terror not of the definitely known, but of the vague and mysterious, leaving the imagination full play to heighten it.

15. A spirit] rather, 'a breath.' 17. RM 'Shall mortal man be just before' (i.e. in the eyes of) 'God? Shall a man be pure before his Maker?' 18. He put no trust] because of their imperfections. Servants] attendant angels. 19. Houses of clay] perishing bodies: cp. 2 Cor 5¹. If spiritual beings like the angels were imperfect, how much more men with material bodies. Before] RM 'like.' 20. From morning to evening] i.e. in a day.

21. Doth not, etc.] rather, 'Is not their tent-cord (or tent-peg) pulled up in them?' The falling tent is a figure of collapse and death. Even without wisdom] i.e. without having learnt the great lessons of life.

CHAPTER 5

THE FIRST SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ (concluded)

1-5. Eliphaz warns Job that to show a resentful temper at God's dispensations is folly, and that fools never prosper.

1. Call, etc.] i.e. 'make your complaint against God to the angels'; 'do you think they will help you?' Saints] RV 'holy ones,' i.e. the angels. 2. Wrath] RV 'vexation.' Envy] RV 'jealousy.' Such rash conduct brings destruction.

3. Cursed] i.e. rejected as an accursed thing. At first Eliphaz was inclined to envy the prosperity of the wicked; but in a moment he sees there is no room for envy. He would not accept their position at any price, so sudden and sure was their downfall.

4. Crushed in the gate] the gate of the city, where justice was administered: cp. Ps 127⁵. There are none to support their cause or to influence the judge. 5. The thorns] the protecting thorn hedge.

6, 7. Affliction is not accidental, but is due to man's sinful nature. Although] RV 'for.'

8. I] RV 'As for me, I.' Eliphaz, instead of murmuring, would leave his case in the hands of One who is both great and wise. 11. To set] RV 'so that he setteth,' i.e. setteth men up by raising them from despair. 13. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness] quoted by St. Paul in 1 Cor 3¹⁹, the only quotation from Job in the NT. Is carried headlong] i.e. furthered to their hurt. 14. The bewildered, haunted state into which the crooked devices of the wicked bring them. 15. From their mouth] RV 'of their mouth.'

17-27. The blessedness of affliction if regarded as correction.

21. Scourge of the tongue] of false accusers and slanderers: cp. v. 15. 23. In league with the stones of the field] His land will be free from stones; a part of the general thought of being at peace with all creation: cp. Prov 16⁷. For the idea of a sympathy between man and nature cp. Ro 8¹⁹. 24. Tabernacle] RV 'tent.' Shalt not sin] RV 'shalt miss nothing.'

CHAPTER 6

THE FIRST SPEECH OF JOB (Chs. 6, 7)

1-13. Job, smarting under the remarks of Eliphaz, which he feels are not appropriate to his case, renews and justifies his complaints. He bemoans the heaviness of God's hand, and wishes that He would slay him outright.

2, 3. Job admits that he was rash in his remarks (in c. 3), but declares that his language was justified by his miserable condition.

3. Are swallowed up] RV 'have been rash.' 4. It is because he feels that his troubles are due to God that he is almost beside himself, since he cannot understand their motive. In c. 3 he had not charged God with being the author of his sorrows.

5-7. Job continues to assert that he would not complain without good cause. 5. The animals cease their cries when their wants are satisfied. 6. Unsavoury] without flavour.

The white of an egg] Some prefer RM 'the juice of purslain.' 7. RV 'My soul refuseth to touch them; They are as loathsome meat to me.' Vv. 6, 7 may mean that Job's afflictions are as intolerable to him as loathsome food.

8-10. Job longs for the stroke of death to descend and release him from his pain.

10. Yea, I would, etc.] RV 'Yea, I would exult in pain that spareth not: for I have not denied,' etc. Job fears not death, for he is unconscious of sin towards God. The passage is difficult, since Job does not expect retribution after death. The original text may not be correctly preserved.

11. Prolong my life] RV 'be patient.' Since there is nothing but death before him, how can he help being impatient for its arrival? 12. He is not made of stone or brass that he can bear such troubles. 13. RV 'Is it not that I have no help in me, and sound wisdom is driven quite from me?' He is exhausted and without resource.

14-30. Job complains of the lack of sympathy and false conclusions of the friends. They have bitterly disappointed the hopes he had set on them.

14. But he forsaketh] RV 'even to him that forsaketh.' Kind words from his friends might have helped Job to retain his trust in God, which he feared to lose.

15-20. Job likens the treatment of the friends to sudden torrents which fill the deep ravines or wadies of his land after storms. These flow abundantly in the winter, when they are least needed. In the parching heats of summer they dry up, and are sought in vain by wandering caravans which perish from thirst. So his friends fail him when most wanted.

16. In the winter the torrents are black and turbid with melting snow. There is plenty of ice in winter in the upper parts of Edom. 18. RV 'The caravans that travel by the way of them turn aside' (in search of water). They go up into the waste, and perish.

19, 20. Troops] RV 'caravans.' Tema... Sheba] in Arabia. The vv. describe the disappointment (ashamed) of the Arab caravans.

21. Ye are nothing] RM 'ye are like thereto,' i.e. to the deceptive brooks. But it would be better to read 'so have ye been to me.' And are afraid] perhaps of showing sympathy, since they thought him guilty of sin. 22, 23. All that Job looked for from them was sympathy. 25. Forcible] perhaps 'irritating' would be better, a bitter sarcasm.

What doth your arguing reprove?] At what sin are they aiming? 26. 'Are you finding fault with desperate words uttered in distress?' 27. Render, 'Would you sadden the bereaved and wound your friend?'

28. Look upon me] i.e. in the face. For it is evident, etc.] RV 'For surely I shall not lie to your face.' 29. Render, 'Reconsider my case; do not do me such injustice.' Yes, reconsider it; my cause is a righteous one!

Iniquity] RV 'injustice.' 30. Is there iniquity, etc.] rather, 'Is my tongue perverted?' Cannot my taste, etc.] 'Cannot I distinguish between right and wrong as well as you can?'

CHAPTER 7

JOB'S FIRST SPEECH (concluded)

1-10. Job laments the hardship and misery of his destiny.

1. Man's life is a lot of hardship. Appointed time] RM 'time of service.' 2, 3. As the labourer longs for the weary day to end and to receive his wages, so Job bemoans the length of his sufferings and sighs for death to end them. 3. Months of vanity] so called because they were unsatisfactory, hopeless. 'Months' imply that Job's sufferings had lasted a considerable time. 5. Worms] from the diseased flesh. Clods of dust] the crust of his sores. These symptoms are found in leprosy, though they are not peculiar to it.

6. Weaver's shuttle] the implement which carries the thread swiftly backwards and forwards in weaving. Job has just been longing for death, but yet he feels that length of days is desirable in itself if freed from so much misery. Without hope] of recovery. 7. Good] i.e. happiness. 8. Thine eyes, etc.] render, 'Thine (God's) eyes shall look for me, but I shall be no more.'

9. Grave] better, as RV, 'Sheol,' the place of the departed: see on 3¹⁵⁻¹⁹. Note how hopeless is the outlook here and elsewhere towards the future.

11-21. He appeals to God, complaining of the undeserved severity of his treatment. He demands why God concerns Himself to interfere with so insignificant a being as man.

12. 'Am I so dangerous a character that I need such persistent persecution?' Whale] rather, 'sea monster,' perhaps the personification of the sea, the mythical dragon of the ancients. The Babylonians told the myth of the dragon Tiamat, who waged war against heaven and was slain by the God Marduk. (See art. 'Genesis and the Babylonian Inscriptions.') This myth is referred to here, but in a form which represented the monster, not as slain, but imprisoned and kept under strict observation. The sea needs to be held down lest it flood the earth or smite the sky (cp. 38⁸⁻¹¹), the dragon must be watched lest it bursts its bonds. Is Job as formidable as they that God should watch him as closely?

14. Dreams] the bad dreams of the sick.

15. Strangling] or, suffocation. Job longs for the arrival of this sign of approaching death. My life] RV 'these my bones.' He was reduced to a skeleton. Possibly we should read 'my pains.' 16. RV 'I loathe my life: I would not live alway.' Vanity] RM 'as a breath.'

17. Magnify] i.e. consider of such importance. Set thine heart] or 'fix thy thoughts.' The thought of vv. 17 f. is 'Surely man is too insignificant for such constant persecution. Even his sins are hardly worth heeding.' Cp. Ps 84⁵, of which these vv. seem to be a bitter parody. 19. Till I swallow, etc.] i.e. for a moment.

20. RV 'If I have sinned, what do I unto thee, O thou watcher of men?': i.e. granting that I have sinned (which Job does not), how can it affect Thee who art so great? Against thee] RV 'for thee.' 21. In the morning] RV 'diligently.' Job believes that one day God will turn to him once more in love, but then it will be too late. The faint hope expressed here gradually becomes a conviction: cp. 13¹³⁻¹⁸ 14¹³⁻¹⁵ 16¹⁹⁻²¹ 19²³⁻²⁷.

The speech of Eliphaz, while considerate in tone, yet took Job's guilt for granted. This shows the sufferer that he can expect no sympathetic insight from the friends, and the shock of the disappointment drives him not simply to scornful attack on them, but to bitter accusation of God, whom he regards as the direct author of his troubles. He thinks of Him as petty and spiteful, yet he cannot forget the blessed communion of happier days, and ends with the thought that when His present anger is passed, He will desire a renewal of that fellowship.

CHAPTER 8

THE FIRST SPEECH OF BILDAD

Holding the same doctrine about sin and suffering as Eliphaz, Bildad supports the views of his friend by an appeal to the teaching of antiquity. He shows less sympathy and more narrowness of mind than Eliphaz.

1-7. Bildad maintains the justice of God's actions. Since Job's children have perished it must have been for their sins. As for Job, if he would but repent he would be restored to prosperity.

2. Like a strong wind] violent, headstrong.

3. Can there be injustice with God as Job seems to think is possible? Bildad thinks the All-powerful must in the nature of things be righteous. Job does not deny the omnipotence, but he questions the righteousness. 4. And he have cast, etc.] RV 'he delivered them into the hand of their transgression,' i.e. abandoned them to the consequences of their sins. This conclusion about the death of Job's sons was quite unjustifiable (cp. Lk 13⁴ Jn 9^{2,3}), but is in accordance with the general views about retribution. The catastrophe had fallen on the very day on which their father had offered the sacrifice: see on 1¹³. 6. Awake for thee] LXX reads 'hearken unto thee.'

8-22. Bildad appeals to the experience of antiquity to show that God uproots the wicked, though they seem firmly established, and does not cast away the upright.

8. To the search of their fathers] RV 'to that which their fathers have searched out.'

9. We] the men of his own day.

11-15. As surely as a water-plant perishes without water so surely will the sinner perish when God turns from him. 11. The rush] RM 'the papyrus,' a reed from which the Egyptians made paper, light boats, etc.

13. Hope] of prosperity. 15. Hold it fast] RV 'hold fast thereby.'

16-18. The sinner is compared to a fast-growing weed which flourishes under the heat of the sun, and whose roots plant themselves firmly in the earth (seeth the place of stones), but when destroyed it passes at once into oblivion. A slight correction of the Heb. would give for 17^b, 'It lives in a house of stones.' 17. Heap] The Heb. also means 'fountain,' and possibly the sense may be that the plant lives in the stone erection over the fountain in the garden. 19. The joy of his way] the short-lived prosperity of the sinner. Others grow] who fill his place.

21. Till he] RV 'He will yet.' Bildad, sharing the view of Eliphaz that while Job must have fallen into some heinous sin he was nevertheless a pious and upright man at heart, bases on this his prophecy that God will restore him. He must be chastened, but he cannot be cast away.

CHAPTER 9

JOB'S SECOND SPEECH (Chs. 9, 10)

Chs. 9, 10 are, perhaps, in their religious and moral aspects the most difficult in the book.

Driver in his 'Introduction to the Literature of the OT,' analyses them as follows:—'Job as well as his friends believes suffering to be a mark of God's displeasure for some grave sin. Job, however, is conscious that he has not so sinned. Hence the terrible dilemma in which he finds himself and which forces him to the conclusion that God, though He knows him to be innocent (10⁷), is determined to treat him as guilty, and that it is hopeless for him to attempt to clear himself.' Davidson characterises the leading features of the speech as 'awe before an Omnipotent Power, and moral terror and indignation, mixed with piteous despair at the indiscriminate severity with which it crushes men!'

The strange blending of conflicting emotions is one of the most striking features in this and some other of Job's speeches. With great skill and psychological insight the poet has shown us the rebellion which, springing from God's apparent cruelty, gives place for the moment to a softened mood as the sufferer recalls his former life in God's favour. Then this, in turn, is brushed aside to make way for a darker accusation than ever; God had deliberately led him on to believe in His love that He might make all the bitterer the revelation of His hate. Then the mood changes once more and he appeals to the pity of that God, whose pitilessness he has just asserted.

2-13. Job admits that it is impossible for him to maintain his righteousness before God. But this he implies is not due to his consciousness of guilt, but to the hopelessness of attempting to defend himself against God's irresistible power which is manifested throughout creation.

3. If he will] RM 'If one should desire to.'

Contend] argue his cause. One of a thousand] viz. charges against him, or questions with which he might be entrapped. 5. And they know not: which overturneth] RV 'And they know it not when he overturneth.' The catastrophe is so sudden. 6. The v. describes an earthquake. The roots of the mountains were thought of as pillars supporting the earth: cp. 26¹¹ Ps 75³. 7. It riseth not] because of darkness or eclipse. Sealeth up] i.e. in the abode where the stars were thought to dwell, and where they were brought forth by night to shine in the sky (Isa 40²⁰). 8. Cp. Isa 40²². The points of resemblance between the book of Job and the latter part of Isaiah are striking and frequent.

9. Arcturus] RV 'the Bear.' The Heb. names in this v. are supposed to refer to three well-known constellations, the Bear, the Pleiades, and Orion. Chambers of the south] the southern heavens. So the Babylonians divided the sky into 'lunar mansions.' 11. Job is baffled by the suddenness and mystery of God's actions. There is no escaping Him.

13. RV 'God will not withdraw his anger; the helpers of Rahab do stoop under him.' The word 'Rahab,' which means 'pride,' occurs again in 26¹² RV, and is there evidently applied to the raging sea. 'This stormy sea, assaulting heaven with its waves, was personified in ancient myth as a monster leading his helpers on to wage war with heaven' (Davidson). Rahab is the same as Tiamat (see on 7¹²). The myth relates that she brought forth a brood of monsters to help her in her battle. To this the term 'helpers of Rahab' alludes. See also Isa 51⁹.

14-21. God, Job feels, is resolved to regard him as guilty. It is therefore vain to assert his innocence, yet while he can assert it he will.

15. Would I not] i.e. 'would I not dare to.' I would make supplication] rather, 'I must ask mercy.' It would be useless to attempt to establish his innocence. Judge] rather, 'adversary-at-law.' 16. 'If God allowed me to plead my cause, I cannot believe He would condescend to attend to me.' Job feels that God is indifferent to his cry for justice.

17, 18. Breaketh . . multiplieth . . will not suffer . . filleth] rather, 'would break . . would multiply . . would not suffer . . would fill.'

19. God is represented as speaking. 'If it be a question of strength, it is I who am strong; if of judgment, who would dare appoint me a day?' 'The words imply the irresponsibility and superiority to all law of the speaker' (Davidson). 20. Job speaks. Render, 'Though I am innocent, a word may put me in the wrong; though I am upright, He can pervert me.' It is therefore useless to plead. 21. RV 'I am perfect: I regard not myself; I despise my life.' Job now boldly asserts that he is innocent, even though it may cost him his life.

22-24. Job boldly arraigns the morality of the divine government of the world.

22. This is one thing] RV 'It is all one.' Apparently he means, 'It makes no difference whether I live or die.' God destroys indiscriminately both innocent and guilty. This directly controverts the friends' view (8²⁰). There is no such thing as a moral government of the world. 23. Scourge] e.g. famine, etc.

Trial] RM 'calamity.' 24. He covereth the faces, etc.] so that they are blind to justice.

If not, where, etc.] RV 'If it be not he, who then is it?' To whom but God can this state of things be ascribed?

25-31. Job's life speeds away; God will make him out to be guilty however pure he may be.

25, 26. Cp. Wisd 5^{9,10}, where two of the same metaphors are similarly used. 25. A post] RM a 'runner' with messages. 26. Swift ships] Heb. 'ships of reed,' light boats made from the papyrus reed, and very swift.

28. Since God is determined to hold Job guilty, it is useless for him to try and establish his innocence. I am afraid of all my sorrows] because they seem to be evidences of God's anger. Apparently there were times when the pain was less acute, but the cheerfulness he might have felt was checked by the knowledge that it would come back again. 29. If I be wicked] RV 'I shall be condemned.'

30. And make, etc.] RM 'And cleanse my hands with lye,' or potash. He means that he is really righteous, but God is determined to make him seem wicked.

32-35. Job is conscious that he cannot meet God on his own level and plead his cause on equal terms, nor is there any one to act as mediator.

33. Daysman] an Old English word meaning 'umpire,' or 'arbitrator'; one who mediates between two parties.

33-35. Translate (with Cox): 'There is no arbiter between us to lay his hand upon us both, who would remove His (God's) rod from me so that the dread of Him should not overawe me. If there were, I would speak and not fear Him.' Job laments that there is no being, having power with God and man, who would interpose and arbitrate between him and God, and make both parties yield to his decision.

This passage is the first occurrence of the idea of intervention on his behalf, which takes more definite shape in 16¹⁹ and 19²⁵⁻²⁷. But in those passages Job advances to the thought that, since he has no umpire to vindicate him, God Himself will be his umpire, and vindicate Job even against Himself. This longing of pious men of old for some mediator who would bring about peace between them and God has been satisfied in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, both God and man.

34. His fear] i.e. the fear He causes, as in Ex 23²⁷. 35. But it is not so with me] RV 'For I am not so in myself,' i.e. In my own soul I am not guilty.

CHAPTER 10

JOB'S SECOND SPEECH (concluded)

1-7. Job seeks the reason of his trial, and protests against God's treatment as inconsistent with the natural relations between Creator and created, and with God's knowledge of his innocence and inability to escape Him.

1. I will leave, etc.] RV 'I will give free course to my complaint.' 3. The work of thine hands] i.e. man, God's creature.

4-6. 'Is God's judgment liable to mistakes like that of frail man' (eyes of flesh), 'or is His time so short that He is in a hurry to find Job guilty and to punish him?' Observe that Job cannot altogether give up his conviction that God must be really just, although the reason of his suffering causes him the greatest perplexity. 7. Thou] RV 'although thou.'

8-17. Job dwells on God's past goodness. Does he not owe to Him his existence and his preservation up to the present? Yet He had apparently purposed all along to destroy him in the end.

10, 11. The conception and growth of the infant. Curdled me] made him take solid form.

11. Fenced me] RV 'knit me together.'

12. Visitation] RM 'care.'

13. And these, etc.] RV 'Yet thou didst hide these things,' etc. I know that this is with thee] rather, 'I know that these things were with thee.' Job concludes that even from his childhood God had purposed to afflict him, making him happy so that his misery might be deeper by contrast.

14, 15. Whether guilty or innocent he would be condemned. 15. If I be righteous, etc.] 'Were I righteous I must not lift up my head as an innocent man.' I am full, etc.] RV 'being filled with ignominy, and looking upon my affliction.' But a slight correction gives the very much better sense, 'drunk with affliction.' 16. Marvellous] in his persecutions; a sorry sequel to the marvel of creation (chs. 38, 39). 17. Thy witnesses] Job's afflictions, which seem to witness to his guilt. Changes and war, etc.] RM 'Host after host is against me.'

18-22. Job begs for a little respite before his death: cp. Ps 39¹³. Observe how appeal follows hard on accusation. 21, 22. Note the dreary, hopeless conception of the dim shadow-land of death.

It should be observed that in spite of the rash and despairing utterances to which Job in his misery gives vent in chs. 9, 10, his position is one of religious perplexity, rather than of reasoned doubt. Calmer and more hopeful views soon appear, and the conviction that God will restore him to His favour and justify him comes out more and more clearly as we read on: cp. 14¹³ 16¹⁹ 19²⁵ 27¹⁻⁵. 'Job never entirely gave up his faith in God, though, like Jacob, he wrestled with Him. And, as in that case, the issue shows that God was not displeased with such an unburdening of the soul that still kept close to the strict line of truth' (Bradley). 'Much of the interest of this drama of the soul lies in the growth of a consciousness in Job that God's present anger does not represent His inmost self. It is a mood that will pass, a dark cloud eclipsing His truest character. This thought does not, however, emerge as yet' (Peake).

CHAPTER 11

THE FIRST SPEECH OF ZOPHAR

The speech is short and unsympathetic.

1-6. Zophar rebukes Job for daring to assert his innocence.

3. Thy lies] RV 'thy boastings,' viz. Job's assertions of innocence (v. 4). 6. That they are double, etc.] RV 'That it is manifold in effectual working.' God exacteth, etc.] RM 'God remitteth unto thee of thine iniquity';

He does not bring up all Job's guilt, which is greater than he is aware of. So far from the penalty being excessive, Job has not received all that he deserved.

7-12. God knows Job's sinfulness if he does not himself.

7. RM 'Canst thou find out the deep things of God?' 8. It] God's wisdom. 10. If he cut off, etc.] rather, 'Should he pass by, imprison, arraign before an assembly?' If God, with perfect knowledge of sinful man, visits him in various ways, who shall gainsay His actions? 12. Perhaps we may render, 'Thus vain man gets understanding, and a wild ass's colt is born a man.' The description of affliction brings wisdom to the foolish and transforms the most unpromising natures.

13-20. Repentance the way to restored prosperity.

14. Tabernacles] RV 'tents.' 15. Without spot] of guilt. 16. Waters] rather, 'floods.'

17. Thine age] RV 'thy life.' Thou shalt shine] RV 'Though there be darkness, it shall be as the morning.' 18. Dig] RV 'search,' viz. for danger, but find none. 20. As] RV omits. There is nothing before the wicked but death. The statement is general, but Zophar, unlike the other friends, hints that Job may belong to the wicked.

CHAPTER 12

JOB'S THIRD SPEECH (Chs. 12-14)

The friends have said God is wise and mighty. Job replies, 'I know that as well as you. You infer that He is also righteous, but experience shows that His power and wisdom are directed to unrighteous ends.' But it is with God rather than with them that he wishes to argue, and come what may he will utter all he feels. He challenges God to name his sins, presses man's hopeless destiny as a reason for God's pity, longs that God might shelter him out of reach of His anger, till it has passed away, and then renew His communion with him, but closes again on the note of man's hopeless fate. The thought that God might take Job's part against Himself here comes to expression.

1-12. Job sarcastically praises the wisdom of the friends, which, however, is not greater than his own, or indeed than any one may learn from God's creation and government of the world. It is easy to mock one who is down: yet the prosperity of the wicked is a fact as patent as the wisdom and power of God.

2. A sarcastic allusion to the omniscience of the friends: Ye are the people; the only wise ones. 4. Who calleth] RV 'A man that called.' Job complains that he, a servant of God, has become the subject of mockery.

5. RV 'In the thought of him that is at ease there is contempt for misfortune; it is ready for them whose foot slippeth.' An allusion to the way his friends treat him now that he is in trouble. How easy to despise the man who is down! 6. The wicked, on the other hand, seem to fare better than the good. Into whose hand, etc.] Another rendering is, 'Who bears (his) god in his hand'; i.e. who regards his sword as his god: cp. Hab 1¹¹⁻¹⁶.

7. Even the animals know the commonplaces that constitute the friends' stock of wisdom.

9. In all these] among all these creatures. The LORD] see on 1²¹. Hath wrought this] i.e. orders all things. 11, 12. 'I test your arguments as the palate tests its food; the aged are not necessarily wise.' 11. And the mouth, etc.] RV 'Even as the palate tasteth its meat.' 12. RM 'With aged men, ye say, is wisdom.' Job is not stating his own views.

13-25. With God are wisdom and might, no one can reverse His actions. The mightiest are overthrown by Him, and He takes away the understanding of the wise.

13. With him] viz. God. Absolute power and wisdom are inherent in God, not acquired by pains and years as man acquires such power and wisdom as he possesses. 14. The impotence of man in the hands of the Almighty.

Shutteth up a man] e.g. in prison. 16. Are his] exist by His permission.

17. Perhaps the original text meant 'He sends mad counsellors.' 18. God sets kings free, or imprisons them according to His will.

19. Princes] RV 'priests.' Perhaps, 'He sends mad priests and perverts the mighty.'

22. 'The v. means that God through His wisdom sees into the profoundest and darkest deeps, and brings what is hidden to light' (Davidson). 23. Straiteneth them again] RM 'leadeth them away into captivity.' 24. Wilderness] The Heb. is used of the primeval chaos of Gn 1².

1-12. Job claims to understand as much about God as the friends. He rejects their opinion as to the cause of his troubles, and regards it as an attempt to curry favour with God.

1. The v. is in close connexion with c. 12. Eye refers to 12^{7,8}, ear to 12^{18f}: cp. 12¹¹.

3. Surely] rather, 'but.' Job seeks an explanation from God, not from man. 4. Forgers] better, 'plasterers,' i.e. they plaster their lies over God's misgovernment and hide its evils. 7, 8. 'Does God require His actions to be defended by their untruths and servile flattery?' The friends condemned Job unjustly in order to uphold God's justice. They were special pleaders for God, because they wanted to curry favour with Him.

8, 10. Accept] RV 'respect.' The phrase is used of a judge who shows partiality. Considerations of self-interest lead them to give God their verdict and not Job. 9. 'Do they think they can deceive God with their partiality? He penetrates their cowardly motives.'

10. Job believes that God will not approve of those who lie for Him, an assertion of God's righteousness in remarkable contrast to the assertions of His unrighteousness. 12. RV 'Your memorable sayings are proverbs of ashes, your defences are defences of clay.' Job regards their view as worthless, and their arguments such as any one could refute.

13-22. He turns from man, and boldly pleads his cause with God.

14, 15. Render, with a slight alteration, 'I will take my flesh in my teeth and I will put my life in my hand (he daring). Lo, he will slay me: I have no hope, but I will maintain my words before him.' The meaning of the phrase 'to take the flesh in the teeth' is uncertain. Probably it signifies just the same as to 'put the life in the hand,' which means to dare the uttermost peril. Job is resolved to speak out, though he feels that God will kill him for doing it.

16. He] RV 'This.' The v. may mean that God would pardon his boldness but not a false confession of sin: see 42⁷. 18. Ordered my cause] i.e. prepared his defence.

19. Plead with] RV 'contend with': to prove him a sinner. For now, etc.] RV 'For now shall I hold my peace and give up the ghost': i.e. if his innocence were disputed. Note how in prospect of his case coming into court Job's spirits rise. He is so certain of his innocence that he cannot believe that it can help being established. The axiom on which this rests is his conviction of God's righteousness, once more a strange contrast to his charges against Him. 20, 21. Job begs that God will free him from the sense of terror which he naturally feels. Thy dread] i.e. dread of Thee.

23-28. He seeks to know his sins, and the reasons of God's treatment.

26. Possess] RV 'inherit.' Job thinks he must be suffering for his early follies.

27. Stocks] rather, 'clog,' to prevent slaves escaping. Thou settest, etc.] lit. 'Thou dost make a mark upon the roots of my feet,' perhaps, i.e. make them sore with the clog upon them. 28. And he, etc.] RV 'Though I am like a rotten thing that consumeth'; an allusion to his miserable state.

CHAPTER 14

JOB'S THIRD SPEECH (concluded)

1-6. Job pleads for God's forbearance on the grounds of man's shortness of life and sinful nature.

1, 2. The well-known Sentence in the Burial Service. 3. Open thine eyes] i.e. watch so vigilantly: cp. vv. 16, 17. 4. Job pleads the innate sinfulness of man. 5, 6. Let man spend his days in peace, seeing that his time is but short: cp. e. 7.

7-12. A tree has a chance of a second growth after it is cut down. Not so man. With him death is final. Job here reaches the depth of despair.

13-22. Despairing of any return to God's favour before death, Job is seized with a longing to remain in the place of the departed (Sheol) until God's wrath is past, when he should be forgiven and restored to His favour. Notice how Job assumes that God's hostility to him will not be permanent. He pictures God as conscious of this and as, in view of the future love He would feel for him, sheltering him in Sheol from His present anger. Yet though he dwells upon a possible return from Sheol to life in fellowship with God, he does not dream that it is more than an enchanting thought. If only a man might die and live again! No, that is impossible. 14. Will I wait] RV 'would I wait.' Come] RV 'should come.' 15. RV 'Thou shouldst call and I would answer thee: Thou wouldest have a desire to the work of thine hands.'

16, 17. These vv. probably are not, as AV and RV take them, the present contrast to the glowing picture of the future that he has been wishing might be true, but a continuation of that picture. Render, 'For then Thou wouldest number my steps; Thou wouldest not watch over my sin; my transgression would be sealed up in a bag, and Thou wouldest cover over my iniquity.' God would number his steps in kindly care (cp. 'the very hairs of your head are all numbered'). He would no longer treasure up his sin against him, but hide it away out of sight. 18, 19. And] render. 'But.' Under God's visitation the hopes of men come to nought, like undermined mountains or water-worn rocks.

20-22. A description of what happens after the death change passes over the face and the spirit goes away to Sheol. The dead have lost all knowledge, all interest in the things of earth, even in the fortunes of their own children (cp. Eccl 9^{5,6}). In the grave the body passes through the painful process of decomposition, the pain of which is also felt by its shade in Sheol.

THE SECOND SERIES OF SPEECHES (Chs. 15-21)

The rejection by Job of the opinions and advice of the friends, his sturdy maintenance of his innocence, and the fearlessness with which in his anguish he has arraigned the divine government of the world, have all alike deepened their conviction of his guilt.

Without actually charging Job with definite sin, for which indeed they have no ground, they now administer stern rebukes, and draw terrible pictures of the certain misery which awaits the godless, and this evidently with an eye to the sufferer. They no longer encourage him to repentance, or predict consequent prosperity.

Job, for his part, laments their harshness, and rejects anew their doctrine of retribution as contrary to experience, and as not applicable to his case. He feels himself to be abandoned by God and man; he cries out for pity; he reasserts his innocence, and is still troubled by the problem of evil. Yet in the very midst of his trouble he makes some advance towards the solution of the mystery. Already he has had dim visions of a mediator between himself and God (9^{32f.}), and of the possibility of a restoration to the divine favour (14¹³⁻¹⁵). These were only momentary glimpses of a brighter day amidst the gloom, but now they develop into a stronger conviction that God must in the end restore the light of His countenance to His servant, and vindicate his innocence to the world, though it can only be after his death: see 16¹⁰ 19²³⁻²⁷. It is, however, no longer an umpire between himself and God that he desires. The conviction has come to him that since there is no umpire who can force his decision on God, God Himself will be the umpire to vindicate the righteousness of Job against the stigma of unrighteousness which He had Himself seemed to fasten upon him by his affliction.

CHAPTER 15

THE SECOND SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ

1-16. Eliphaz accuses Job of impiety and arrogance.

2. And fill, etc.] utter idle, empty remarks.

7. It was a popular idea that there was a primeval man endowed with perfect wisdom, corresponding to the figure of the Divine Wisdom in Prov 8. 8. Render, 'Didst thou hearken in the council of God?' i.e. before the creation of the world. 10. Eliphaz, perhaps, refers here to himself.

11. RV 'Are the consolations of God too small for thee, and the word that dealeth gently with thee?' The 'consolations of God' are the comforting views about God's government and purposes which Eliphaz would have Job accept: cp. 5⁸⁻²⁷. 12. What do thy eyes wink at? render, 'why do thy eyes flash (in anger)?' 14. Eliphaz uses Job's own words (14⁴) to convict him of his sinfulness.

15. He] i.e. God. Saints] RV 'holy ones': the angels, cp. 4¹⁸. Heavens] i.e. probably, 'heavenly beings.' 16. Drinketh] thirsts after, is greedy for.

17-35. Eliphaz describes, doubtless as a warning to Job, the troubled conscience and inevitable doom of the wicked.

18, 19. Eliphaz refers to a time when his ancestors had not mingled with other people, who would corrupt the purity of their wise sayings. His countrymen the Edomites, who were descended from Abraham, would have the same pride of race as their Hebrew cousins.

20-23. The haunting fears of the wicked oppressor. 20. And the number, etc.] RV 'even the number of years that are laid up for the oppressor.' 22. He loses hope of deliverance from misfortune. 23^a. He imagines he is always coming to poverty. 24. Ready] fully prepared. 25. For] RV 'Because.'

26. Render, 'It (trouble) leaps at his throat, past the thickest boss of his shield.' The boss is the central knob of the buckler. 27. A picture of sensual luxury: cp. Ps 73⁷.

28. Illustrative of his daring impiety: he ventured to dwell in cities that lie under the curse: cp. Josh 6²⁶. 29. Neither shall he prolong, etc.] RV 'neither shall their produce bend to the earth'; a figure of fruitfulness.

30. By the breath, etc.] God's wrath will destroy him like a withering sirocco. 31. RV 'Let him not trust in vanity, deceiving himself.' Accomplished] RM 'paid in full.' His time] the natural time of his death.

32, 33. The speedy end of the wicked. 'His branch prematurely withers; he puts forth grapes, and cannot ripen them; he flowers, but he fails of fruit' (Davidson).

CHAPTER 16

JOB'S FOURTH SPEECH (Chs. 16, 17)

See introductory remarks on chs. 15-21.

1-5. Job retorts scornfully that he too could offer such empty 'comfort' if he were in the friends' place.

2. The friends can do nothing but repeat their exasperating commonplaces. 3. Shall vain words, etc.] i.e. 'will you never stop?'

5. Job would have acted very differently (13⁴ 29) giving no mere lip-comfort.

6-17. Job enlarges on the wrath of God and the enmity of man. Neither speech nor silence brings him relief.

7-9. These vv. seem to refer to the hostility of God, v. 10 to that of man. In vv. 7-9 Job varies between complaint of God in the third person and direct address to Him.

7^b. Perhaps a reference to the loss of his family (1^{18,19}). 13. Archers] RM 'arrows.' Reins] i.e. kidneys. 14. With breach upon breach] with one blow after another, as a battering-ram makes breaches in a wall.

15. Sackcloth] the sign of mourning.

Horn] the emblem of pride and strength.

17. Not for any injustice] RV 'although there is no violence.' Cp. the suffering Servant of Jehovah in Isa 53⁹.

18. Conscious of his innocence and yet of his impending death, which seems a token that he is condemned as guilty, Job invokes the earth not to conceal his blood, but to let it cry aloud for justice. The idea that the earth would not absorb innocent blood occurs also in Gn 4¹⁰ Ezk 24^{7,8}. No place] RV 'no resting place.' Let it be heard everywhere!

19-21. Rejected by men who count him guilty, Job is for a moment cheered with a bright vision of a 'witness in heaven,' one who will vouch for and testify to his innocence (v. 19). From vv. 20, 21 RV it is supposed that Job has an intuition that the God who now seems to be his enemy is after all the God of love, in communion with whom his past life has been spent, and to Him he turns:

'But thou giv'st leave, dear Lord, that we Take shelter from Thyself in Thee;
And with the wings of Thine own Dove
Fly to the sceptre of soft love.'

(Crashaw, quoted by Cheyne.)

We see here a development of the idea of a 'daysman' or mediator first mentioned in 9³³. There it appears as a longing impossible to be realised. In this c. it turns into a definite hope, and in 19²⁵⁻²⁷ it rises to a certainty. It is evident from 16²² 17¹⁻³, 13-16 that Job does not expect this vindication before his death, which seems at hand.

19. Also now] RV 'Even now.' My record] RV 'he that voucheth for me.' 21. RV 'O that he (God) would maintain the right of man with God, and of a son of man with his neighbour.' Some render the second half of the sentence, 'as a mortal man does for his neighbour.' 22. Connected in subject with 17^{1,2}. Some by a slight correction read in the first line, 'For the mourning-women shall come.'

CHAPTER 17

JOB'S FOURTH SPEECH (concluded)

1-9. Job prays God to pledge Himself to vindicate his innocence in the future, for his friends have failed him, and he rejects their promises of restoration in the present life.

1. RV 'My spirit is consumed, my days are extinct, the grave is ready for me.' The v. is connected with 16²². 2. Job rejects the delusive hopes of restoration held out by the friends.

3. RV 'Give now a pledge, be surety for me with thyself; who is there that will strike hands with me?' Job begs that God will promise to testify to his innocence after he is dead. There is no one else who will do this. To 'strike hands' was the Hebrew sign of becoming surety for another.

4. The friends are too prejudiced against Job to speak on his behalf. Not exalt them] i.e. not let their views triumph. 5. RV 'He that denounceth his friends for a prey, even the eyes of his children shall fail.' 6. He hath made me] Render, 'I am made.' And aforetime, etc.] RV 'And I am become an open abhorring.'

8, 9. The upright, astonished at Job's calamities, will rise against the ungodly, while the righteous holds on his way with increasing strength. This does not fit in well with Job's attitude, so that there is plausibility in the view of some scholars that the vv. are a misplaced fragment of Bildad's speech.

10. Job invites the friends to renew their arguments, although he expects nothing worth hearing from them. 11, 12. The thoughts, etc.] Render, perhaps, 'The thoughts of my heart put night for day. Darkness is nearer than light.'

13-16. Job declares that it is vain to look for any restoration or justification (my hope) in this life. His hope will go to the grave with him. 13. RM 'If I hope, Sheol is mine house.' 16. They] RV 'it' (i.e. his hope). Bars of the pit] the gates of the world of the dead: cp. Isa 38¹⁰. When, etc.] RV 'when once there is rest in the dust.'

Job moves forward in this speech to the great thought that after he is dead, God will clear his reputation of the stain placed upon it by his disasters, which seemed to the world to prove his guilt. He does not expect the old relations between God and himself to be renewed, but since he cannot bear the thought that he will be permanently branded as an evil-doer, he wins the conviction that he will ultimately be righted. And since God alone can or will clear his honour (for man cannot and will not) he is assured that God, who is now slaying him by slow torture, will at last vindicate him. God's present mood is not an index to His permanent character.

CHAPTER 18

BILDAD'S SECOND SPEECH

Bildad replies with a rebuke to Job and a reassertion of the miserable lot of the wicked already asserted by Eliphaz; not so much, however, with covert reference to Job, to whose case the description is largely unsuitable, as in answer to his impeachment of God's moral government.

1-4. Bildad protests against Job's violent language.

2. RV 'How long will ye lay snares for words'; i.e. hunt for arguments. Mark] RV 'consider (the matter).' 3. Cp. 17^{2, 4, 5, 10}.

4^a. RV 'Thou that tearest thyself in thine anger,' a rebuke to Job's rash utterance in 16⁹. Shall the earth, etc.] Did Job imagine that God's universal law that sin must be followed by suffering would be reversed in his case, because of his expressions of indignation?

5-21. He insists on the misery in the present life and the dishonour after death, which are the portion of sinners.

5, 6. The sinner's house shall be desolate.

Tabernacle] RV 'tent.' 7^b. His crafty plans shall be his ruin. 9. Gin] i.e. trap. The word was originally 'grinne.' 9^b. RV 'a snare shall lay hold on him.' 11. Drive him to his feet] RV 'chase him at his heels.'

12. Hunger-bitten] exhausted by hunger.

13. Strength of his skin] RV 'members of his body.' Firstborn of death] i.e. a deadly disease. 14^a. Render, 'He shall be rooted out of the tent he trusted was his own.' King of terrors] death.

15^a. RV 'There shall dwell in his tent that which is none of his,' i.e. his possessions will pass into the hands of strangers. Some read, 'Lilith shall dwell in his tent.' Lilith is a nocturnal demon, that plays the part of a vampire. Brimstone shall be scattered] a sign of God's wrath (cp. Gn 19²⁴ Ps 11⁶ Isa 34⁹).

17. No name in the street] he is quite forgotten. 19. Nephew] RV 'son's son.'

20. Render, 'They of the west shall be astonished at his day (i.e. fate), and horror shall seize those on the east.' His name will be a byword throughout the world.

CHAPTER 19

JOB'S FIFTH SPEECH

In this speech Job repeats his bitter complaints of God's injustice, and man's contemptuous abandonment of one formerly so loved and honoured. He appeals in broken utterances to his friends to pity him; then from them he would fain appeal to posterity, wishing that he might engrave in the rock a declaration of his innocence, sure that those who read it in the after-time would feel the ring of sincerity and exonerate him of guilt. But, baffled by the callous unbelief of his friends and the impossibility of an appeal to generations unborn, he is driven, as he had been driven before, from man to God. Already he had uttered the conviction that God would vindicate him to the world. Now he reiterates the conviction and rises to a still loftier height in the assurance that he will be permitted to know of his vindication. He does not expect to be restored to life, nor yet to escape from Sheol, nor to renew the old fellowship with God. His deepest anxiety is that his honour should be cleared from stain, and the thought that this will be accomplished, and that he shall be allowed to see God reversing the verdict against him, fills him with overwhelming emotion.

1-22. After reproaching the friends for unfeeling conduct, Job again rejects their insinuations as to the reason of his calamities. He declares that God is treating him with unjustifiable severity, and that he has become estranged from all.

3. Ten times] i.e. continually: cp. Gn 31⁷ Nu 14²². 4. Mine error remaineth with myself] i.e. 'is my own affair,' or, perhaps, 'injuries myself alone.'

6. Job maintains, rightly, that his calamities were not due to his sins, but, wrongly, that they were the result of God's unjust action. As the reader knows from the Prologue, God permitted these trials in order to test and make manifest Job's uprightness. Job's ignorance of this explains and excuses much that otherwise might be deemed unpardonable.

7. Render, 'Behold, I shriek "Violence," and am not answered. I clamour, and there is no justice.' 8. Job's bewildered state: his mind sees no clear course. 9. Glory . . crown] probably Job's righteousness, on which his sufferings seemed to throw doubt. 10. Mine hope] viz. of recovery, or perhaps of happiness.

12. Troops] of afflictions: cp. 'battalions of sorrows' ('Hamlet,' IV, 5). Raise up their way] The figure is that of casting up a mound by which to attack a city. 15. They that dwell in mine house] the servants or guests.

17. Render, 'My breath is offensive to my wife, and I am loathsome to the children of my (mother's) womb'; owing to his complaint.

18. I arose, etc.] RV 'If I arise, they speak,' etc.; i.e. the children mock him. 19. Inward] i.e. intimate. 20^a. The words describe his leanness. I am escaped, etc.] Some would substitute, 'And I am escaped with my flesh in my teeth' (cp. 13¹⁴). 22^b. 'You cannot tear me to pieces enough!' An 'eater of flesh' is an Eastern expression for a slanderer.

23-27. Job had frequently expressed a hope that his righteousness would be proclaimed, as a reply to the insinuation of the friends that he was suffering for his sins (cp. 13¹⁵⁻¹⁹). We have also noted his longings, more or less definitely expressed, that he might find a mediator or vindicator who would do this office for him (cp. 9³²⁻³³ 17⁸). In this c. these longings, already turned into conviction in 16¹⁹⁻²¹, receive an even higher expression. He utters his belief (vv. 23-27) that God Himself will once more manifest Himself as his friend, and vindicate his character after his death, and that he shall be suffered to see God proclaiming his righteousness over his grave. It is unfortunate that the rendering 'Redeemer' and the traditional reference of the vindicator to Christ, together with the supposition that Job expects a resurrection of the body, have completely disguised the true meaning from most readers. The vindicator is God Himself, who is now his persecutor, and Job anticipates neither deliverance from death nor a resurrection of the body after death, nor even a deliverance from Sheol and renewed fellowship with God, only the experience of one thrilling moment, when his shade will wake from its semi-conscious stupor to see God standing over his grave and declaring his innocence to the universe.

23, 24. Job longs to write down or, better still, to engrave upon a rock (a durable material to last into the future) his protestation of innocence. Lead] This may refer to the pouring of molten lead into the carved-out letters, though we have no other mention of such a practice.

23. Printed in a book] RV 'inscribed in a book'; but since a book quickly perishes, he substitutes the wish that his words might be graven in the imperishable rock.

25-27. Render, 'But as for me I know that my vindicator is alive (i.e. exists), and hereafter He will stand above the dust (either of Job or of his grave, as his vindicator). And after (the loss of) my skin, which has been destroyed (i.e. after my death) this shall be. I shall have vision of God, whom I shall gaze on as for me (i.e. as my friend), and mine eyes shall behold and not as a stranger.'

25. Redeemer] Heb. Go'el, from ga'al, 'to make a claim.' The Go'el was the next of kin whose duty it was to prevent land being sold out of the clan (Lv 25²⁵), and to avenge murder. See also Ruth 3, 4 and notes. Driver points out that the word means here the opposite to the Christian idea, viz. a deliverer, not from sin, but from affliction and wrong not due to sin. The best rendering here is 'Vindicator.'

26. In my flesh] rather, 'without' or 'apart from my flesh,' i.e. after death.

27. For myself] RM 'on my side.' Not another] or, 'not as another,' i.e. no longer estranged.

27^b. RV 'my reins are consumed within me.' He faints with emotion at the thought of this vindication.

28. Probably with 'many ancient authorities' (RM) we should read 'him' instead of 'me' in the second line, and translate, 'If ye say, How we will persecute him, and find the root of the matter in him,' i.e. probe relentlessly till they find the secret sin which has led to Job's afflictions. Job proceeds in v. 29 to warn them of the vengeance that will overtake them.

CHAPTER 20

ZOPHAR'S SECOND SPEECH

Zophar ignores Job's conviction that God will one day establish his innocence, and proceeds to describe the short triumph of the wicked and his certain downfall and punishment at God's hand. Perhaps he wishes Job to apply the description to himself and take warning therefrom; though quite apart from that the speech is relevant to his argument that the moral order of the world is not, as Job maintains, unrighteous.

3. The cheek of my reproach] RV 'the reproof which putteth me to shame.' He refers to Job's reproaches in c. 19. 10. Seek to please the poor] i.e. seek in distress the favour of the humblest. For his hands Buddle reads 'his offspring.' Restore their goods] which he had extorted from them in his prosperity. 11. RV 'His bones are full of' (the vigour of) 'his youth, but it shall lie down with him in the dust.' 12, 13. Like a sweetmeat which is retained in the mouth as long as possible, so the sinner revels in his sin.

14-16. The consequences of sin figuratively described: cp. Prov 23²⁰⁻²². His meat] better, 'this food of his,' i.e. sin. Asps] a species of serpent. 17. The floods, etc.] RV 'the flowing streams of honey,' etc.: a figure of prosperity. Surely he shall not feel quietness] RM 'Because he knew no quietness in his greed.' His greed was never satisfied. 21. RV 'There was nothing left that he devoured not; therefore his prosperity shall not endure.'

22^b. RV 'The hand of every one that is in misery shall come upon him'; i.e. all who have suffered at his hands.

23-29. The terrible death of the wicked.

24. Steel] better, 'bronze.' 25^a. RV 'He draweth it forth, and it cometh,' etc. 26. RV 'All darkness is laid up for his treasures: a fire not blown by man shall devour him: it shall consume that which is left in his tent.'

27. The v. seems to be Zophar's harsh retort (a) to Job's conviction of a vindicator from heaven of his innocence (16¹⁹ 19²⁵), and (b) to his appeal to the earth (see 16¹⁵).

CHAPTER 21

JOB'S SIXTH SPEECH

Zophar, like the other friends, had insisted on the certain retribution for sin which befalls the wicked in this life. Now at length these views draw from Job a direct contradiction. It is his manner to wait till the three friends have spoken before he demolishes their case.

1-21. Job declares that as a matter of common observation bad men often go prosperously through life without any sign of God's displeasure.

4. To man] RM 'of man.' It is of God that Job complains. And if, etc.] RV 'And why should I not be impatient?' 6. Job trembles at the thought of the bold arraignment of God's government which he is about to make, or possibly at the remembrance of how unrighteous that government seems to him.

8. Unlike Job, who had lost all his children at a stroke. 12. Timbrel] a small drum still used in Palestine. Organ] RV 'pipe.'

13. In a moment] without prolonged illness or pain, such as that from which he himself suffers. 14. Therefore] better, 'though' or 'yet.'

16. Lo, their good, etc.] It may mean, They cannot control their fortunes: it must be God who has prospered them. Is far] rather, 'be far.' Job repudiates the devices of sinners. Possibly the whole v. is an objection uttered by the friends. 17, 18. The vv. should be read as questions, the words 'How oft' being prefixed to each sentence. The answer implied is 'very seldom.'

19. RV 'Ye say, God layeth up his iniquity for his children. Let him recompense it unto himself that he may know it.' The friends may argue that retribution may, at all events, fall upon the wicked man's children. To which Job replies that the sinner ought to suffer personally. Possibly, however, we should read in the first line, 'Let him not lay up iniquity for his children.' 21. Pleasure] better, 'interest.'

22-26. It is presumptuous for the friends to settle what are the rules by which God decides the fate of men, God who judges even the angels. 24. Breasts] mg. 'milk-pails.'

And his bones, etc.] RV 'And the marrow of his bones is moistened': he is strengthened and refreshed.

27-34. Job says he knows that the friends' remarks are aimed at him. He is to take warning from the sure doom of the sinner. But experience does not justify their conclusions.

28. Prince] here probably means 'tyrant.'

29, 30. The meaning is: Have you not asked the traveller who has seen the world what are his conclusions on the subject? Are you not familiar with the examples he quotes? He would tell you that the wicked is spared in the day of destruction, and led away (safely) in the day of wrath. 31. Who boldly rebukes or punishes the tyrant? 32. RM 'He is borne to the grave and keepeth watch over the tomb'; i.e. he is buried with honours. Perhaps we should read, 'they keep watch.'

33. After his life of happiness he rests in the sweet-smelling earth. His career of successful wickedness draws many to imitate him, as indeed he had himself many to anticipate him.

34. Job concludes that the arguments of the friends are worthless, since he has shown that the wicked do not get their deserts.

So ends the second cycle of debate, the main theme of which is the assertion denied by Job, that trouble overtakes the evildoer. Job does not deal with this in his first and second speeches, which centre about his own calamities, and rise to the conviction that after his death God will reverse the verdict upon him, and that in Sheol he shall himself know of this vindication. In his third speech he asserts against the friends the prosperity of the wicked.

THE THIRD SERIES OF SPEECHES (Chs. 22-31)

Having failed to convince Job by the argument derived from God's greatness and wisdom, and to make good their assertion that it fared ill with the wicked, the friends have only one new line of argument left. This is a downright accusation of Job as a high-handed tyrant. Eliphaz adopts this, though he softens its severity by a fervent exhortation to Job, and a description of the felicity that awaits him if he will but make peace with God. The rest of the debate on his side is difficult to appreciate, owing to the uncertainty attaching to the distribution of the speeches. According to the present arrangement Bildad utters only a few sentences reasserting the greatness of God, and the impossibility that man should be pure in His sight. Zophar does not come forward at all. Several scholars infer from this that the poet means to suggest that the friends have exhausted their case. But since in other instances Bildad and Zophar substantially repeat what Eliphaz has said, the poet could very well have made them follow on the same lines here. Moreover, the symmetry is spoiled if Zophar does not speak. Since we have in 27¹³⁻²³ a description of the fate of the wicked exactly repeating the sentiments of the friends, it is a probable conjecture that this is part of Zophar's missing speech. In that case, however, there is plausibility in the view that Bildad's speech was originally longer than the few verses at present assigned to him. Several attempts at reconstruction have been made. The most recent (that in the Century Bible) assigns 25^{2,3} 26³⁻¹¹ to Bildad, 26²⁻⁴ 27^{2-6,11,12} to Job, 27¹³⁻²³ (with possibly 27⁷⁻¹⁰) to Zophar. 25⁴⁻⁶ is regarded as a gloss based on 15¹⁴⁻¹⁶, and it is supposed that the greater part of Job's reply to Bildad, which stood between 27¹¹ and 27¹³, has been struck out on account of its boldness. If this or a similar view is correct, Bildad repeats the theme of the friends in the first cycle of debate, Zophar that in the second.

CHAPTER 22

THE LAST SPEECH OF ELIPHAZ

1-11. Eliphaz ignoring Job's last speech, perhaps because he could not answer it, argues that God's treatment of man must be impartial, since He has nothing to gain or lose at his hands. Job can therefore only be suffering for his sins, and Eliphaz suggests those of which he has been guilty.

2^b. RV 'Surely he that is wise is profitable to himself': i.e. benefits himself only.

3. Pleasure] rather, 'advantage.' 4. RV

'Is it for thy fear of him that he reproveth thee, that he entereth with thee into judgment?' Is it likely you are suffering as you do for your goodness?

5-9. The sins with which Eliphaz now definitely charges Job were the usual faults of Eastern rulers, such as oppression and injustice. There is no reason to suppose that there was any justification for these accusations, which indeed Job repudiates in chs. 29, 31. 6. Cp. Ex 22²⁶ Dt 24^{10-13, 17}. 8. The honourable man] RM 'Heb. he whose person is accepted.'

11^a. LXX 'Thy light has become darkness.'

12-20. The distance of God's abode and His majesty do not prevent Him from seeing men's deeds, as sinners thought in the days of the Flood. Let not Job follow in their steps.

14. In the circuit] RM 'on the vault.'

15. Hast thou marked] RV 'wilt thou keep.' 16. Out of time] RV 'before their time.'

17. Do for them] RM 'do to us.' This and v. 18 are largely a repetition of parts of 21¹⁴⁻¹⁶, and are regarded by some scholars as an insertion. 19. It] the sinner's downfall.

20. RV 'Saying, Surely they that did rise up against us are cut off.' The remnant of them] RM 'that which remained to them.'

21-30. Eliphaz advises Job to make his peace with God, assuring him of restoration and prosperity.

22. The law] RM 'instruction.' 23. Thou shalt put away] RV 'if thou put away.'

24. RV 'and lay thou thy treasure in the dust, and the gold of Ophir among the stones.' Fling thy earthly treasure away! 25. Render, 'Yea, the Almighty shall be thy treasure and precious silver unto thee!' 27. Thou shalt pay thy vows] Job should carry out the promises made to God in times of distress: cp. Ps 50¹⁴.

28. When he has repented, all his desires will be granted. 29. RM 'When they are made low,' i.e. Job's ways. If he should decline in prosperity he will assert with confidence that his ways will soon take an upward turn.

30. Render, 'He (God) shall even deliver him that is not innocent, (through Job's intercession). 'Yea, he shall be delivered through the cleanness of thy hands' (i.e. on account of Job's piety). This actually happens at the close of the book (42^{8, 9}).

CHAPTER 23

JOB'S SEVENTH SPEECH (Chs. 23, 24)

Job makes but slight reference to the remarks of Eliphaz, but continues to brood over the mysteries of God's dealings with himself (c. 23), and with mankind (c. 24). All seems to betoken a God that hideth Himself. Yet he is evidently calmer and more trustful in God's justice than in earlier speeches.

1-7. Job longs that he may find God and plead his cause before Him, confident that He will acquit him of guilt.

2^b. RM 'My hand is heavy upon my groaning,' i.e. I suppress it as much as I can.

6. Render, 'Would He contend with me with great force? Nay, He would hear me!' A truer conception of God's character than e.g. in c. 9. 7^a. Lit. 'Then a righteous man would be pleading with him,' i.e. then it would appear that the man who pleads with Him is righteous (Davidson).

8, 9. The bright vision fades. God ever escapes his search. 8. Forward . backward] better, 'east' . . 'west.' 9. Left . . right] better, 'north' . . 'south.' In ancient times the cardinal points were described by facing the east. 10^a. RM 'For he knoweth the way that is with me'; i.e. my innocence. 11. Declined] RV 'turned aside.' 12^b. LXX better, 'In my breast I have stored up his words.'

13-17. Job returns to the old tormenting idea that God must be resolved to hold him guilty, since he suffers so much in spite of his innocence.

14^b. Job is not the only victim of the inscrutable actions of Providence. 16. Soft] RV 'faint.' 17. RM 'For I am not dismayed because of the darkness, not because thick darkness covereth my face.' Job means that his sufferings do not distress him so much as the fact that it is God who so mysteriously sends them without just cause.

CHAPTER 24

JOB'S SEVENTH SPEECH (concluded)

1-25. Job continues to express his perplexity at the ways of Providence in the ordering of the world. The poor and the weak suffer: violence and wrong go unpunished.

1. Render, 'Why are times not laid up' (i.e. set apart for doing justice) 'by the Almighty, and why do not those who know Him see His days?' The last clause means, Why do not the godly see signs of divine retribution?

2-12. Those who commit open violent crimes are left unpunished. 2. Remove the landmarks] cp. Dt 19¹⁴ 27¹⁷. Feed thereof] RV 'feed them': as if they were their own.

3. Pledge] i.e. security for debt: cp. 22⁶ 18¹².

5-12. This passage depicts the misery of the homeless outcasts from society, driven into the rocks and mountains, unsheltered from the pitiless storms and hard put to it to save themselves and their children from starvation. The outcasts, lean with hunger like the wild ass in the desert, have to search diligently for the poor bits of food on which they keep body and soul together. 5^a. Render, 'The

Arabah' (the plain W. of Edom near Job's home) 'gives food to their young men.'

6. Merx reads, 'They reap by night in the field.' They are driven to theft to get food. 'Wicked' should perhaps be 'rich.' 7. RV 'They lie all night naked without clothing, and have no covering in the cold.'

9^a. RV 'There are that pluck the fatherless from the breast.' The v. appears to introduce a new description. Since, however, vv. 10, 11 seem to continue v. 8, this v. is apparently out of place. 9^b. Perhaps we should read, 'And take the suckling of the poor in pledge.'

10. RV 'So that they go about naked without clothing, And being an-hungred they carry the sheaves.' Probably the outcasts are described as stealing the corn, and making oil and wine at the expense of the farmer.

12. Layeth not folly to them] render, 'regardeth not the wrong.'

13-17. Criminals who work at night. 'They hate (rebel against) the light of day, preferring darkness for their crimes.'

13. They are of those] RV 'These are of them.' 14. With the light] i.e. while it is still twilight. But with a very slight emendation we might read, 'when there is no light.'

16. Dig through houses] Walls of Eastern houses are often made of clay or sun-burnt bricks, which crumble easily: cp. Mt 6²⁰ RM. The robbers do not break in by the door since the threshold is sacred. 17. If one know, etc.] RV 'For they know (are familiar with) the terrors.' The shadow of death] i.e. midnight. Light they shrink from, but midnight is their day.

18-21. These vv. cannot express the sentiments of Job, and we must either, with RM, prefix 'Ye say,' to indicate that Job is giving the views of the friends, or remove it from this speech either as an insertion or as part of a speech by one of the friends which has been displaced, or possibly as an interruption by one of them. RV renders v. 18, 'He is swift upon the face of the waters; Their portion is cursed in the earth: He turneth not by the way of the vineyards.' The meaning is apparently that the doom of the wicked comes rapidly; there is a curse upon his property; he goes no more to gaze upon its prosperity. Vv. 19, 20 then describe the complete destruction of sinners. V. 21 render, 'Even he that evil entreated,' etc.

22-24. In these vv. we have Job's own view, viz. that (22) God continues the wicked in power, (23) His eyes watch over their welfare, and (24) when they die, it is in the maturity of old age like ripe ears of corn.

24. Tops of the ears of corn] Egyptian wall-paintings show that the ripe corn was cut just below the ears instead of near the ground as with us. The straw was ploughed in.

25. 'Who can dispute my contention?'

CHAPTER 25

BILDAD'S LAST SPEECH

He ignores Job's questionings respecting the justice of God's rule, but declares His perfection and majesty, and the imperfection of all created things, repeating the theme of the first cycle.

2. With him] i.e. with God. He maketh peace, etc.] He keeps in order the hosts of heaven: cp. Isa 24²¹ Dan 10¹³. 3. Armies] e.g. the angels and the elements. 4. Justified with God] RM 'just before God'; a rebuke to Job's presumption: cp. 4¹⁷ 15¹⁴. 5^a. RV 'Behold, even the moon hath no brightness'; i.e. in the presence of God's glory.

With this c. the speeches of the three friends, according to their present allocation, come to an end, for it will be observed that Zophar, the third speaker, offers no reply. It is probable, however, that, as already pointed out, 27⁷⁻²³ are his concluding words. If the present arrangement is correct, we may perhaps infer that they came to the conclusion that they and Job regarded the whole question from different and irreconcilable standpoints, and that further argument was useless. [Or the poet may intend to suggest by Bildad's brief speech and Zophar's silence that they felt their case to be exhausted. 'Indeed, (in 32¹) Elihu regards the friends as practically acknowledging themselves worsted in the debate.']

CHAPTER 26

JOB'S EIGHTH SPEECH (Chs. 26, 27)

1-4. Job taunts Bildad with the worthlessness of his remarks as a solution of the problem.

2, 3, 4 are spoken ironically. 2. Him that is without power] i.e. Job himself. 4. To whom hast thou uttered words?] i.e. surely not to Job who knows it already.

5-14. The manifestations of God's power and work in the world below, in earth and in heaven. Some scholars think these vv., which are quite in the tone of 25^{2,3}, should be inserted after 25³ as a misplaced portion of Bildad's last speech, and that Job's remarks (26¹⁻⁴) are continued at 27².

5. The inhabitants] probably sea-monsters. The Babylonians believed in a judgment in Sheol under the ocean. 6. RV 'Sheol' (the place of the departed) 'is naked before him, and Abaddon' (i.e. destruction, another name for Sheol, cp. Rev 9¹¹) 'hath no covering,' viz. from God. 7. The empty place] RV 'empty space.' The writer seems to speak here of God stretching the vault of the northern heavens with their bright constellations above the atmosphere, and of the earth hanging unsupported, as instances of His power.

8. The retention of rain in the clouds as in a skin or bag: cp. 38³⁷. 9. He holdeth back] RV 'He closeth in.' God veils His throne from men. 10. Davidson renders, 'He hath drawn as a circle a bound upon the face of the waters (of the sea) at the confines of light and darkness': i.e. God has marked out the horizon which forms to us the limit of vision.

11. The mountains (see on 9⁶) tremble in the earthquake. 12. Divideth] RM 'stilleth.' The sea is a power hostile to God, that tosses its waves in impotent fury towards heaven.

Pride] RV 'Rahab,' i.e. the dragon of chaos, Tiamat: cp. 71² 9¹⁸. 13. Render. 'By His breath the heavens are bright (through the scattering of the storm clouds), and His hand pierceth the flying serpent,' or dragon, which was supposed to cause darkness or eclipse by swallowing the heavenly bodies: see on 3⁸. 14. Job (or Bildad), after thus depicting the marvels of God's working, declares that what he has said is but a faint whisper of His power.

CHAPTER 27

JOB'S EIGHTH SPEECH (concluded)

1-6. Job protests that he is innocent.

Vv. 1-6 are an enlargement of what Job had previously said (13¹⁶) of his determination not to admit that he was being punished for his sins, since he felt that he was innocent of any great offence. This much is plain, but the rest of the c. (vv. 7-23) is puzzling: inasmuch as the sentiments expressed regarding the fate of the wicked seem opposed to Job's views in the rest of the book when he enlarges on the prosperity of sinners in this life: see e.g. c. 21 and notes. It is therefore commonly considered that vv. 7-23 are really a misplaced speech of Zophar's corresponding with the final speeches of Eliphaz and Bildad (chs. 22, 25), and this view is strongly confirmed by the subject-matter. Vv. 11, 12 are Job's (see intro. to chs. 22-31).

1. Parable] i.e. discourse: cp. Nu 23⁷.

2. My judgment] RV 'my right.' God has not yet vindicated Job's uprightness, on which his sufferings throw doubt. 3^a. RV 'For my life is yet whole in me.' The v. is a parenthesis, explaining that Job is in full possession of all his faculties, when he makes this deliberate utterance. Spirit of God] cp. Gn 2⁷. 4. He will not acknowledge guilt of which he is unconscious. 5. I should justify you] i.e. by admitting their contention that he was suffering for his sins. 6^b. RM 'My heart doth not reproach me for any of my days.'

7-23. The fate of the wicked. Here it would seem that Zophar speaks.

7. Hypocrite] RV 'godless.' 8. Though he hath gained] RM 'when God cutteth him off.' 15. Buried in death] rather, 'buried by death.' 'Death' should here be rendered, 'pestilence': cp. Jer 15² 18²¹. In such a case there would be only maimed funeral rites. 18. As a moth] like the frail chrysalis or cocoon. As a booth] like the temporary shelter of the vineyard watchman.

19-23. The passage refers to the final fall of the wicked. In the Persian sacred books we read that the dead pious man is led by an angel created by his own good life to the 'bridge of the gatherer' leading to heaven, whilst a storm sweeps the wicked man to hell. The same idea seems to occur here. The sinner is not 'gathered,' but blown away into darkness.

CHAPTER 28

THE MYSTERY OF DIVINE WISDOM

In this famous chapter Job declares that Wisdom—that is, the principle of the divine government of the world—is a mystery not to be solved by man. Man's wisdom lies in fearing God, and in departing from evil. But this conclusion is quite at variance with the position taken by Job in the chs. before and after it. 'It might no doubt be supposed that Job has reached a calmer mood; and abandoning the attempt to discover a speculative solution of the difficulties which distress him, finds man's wisdom to consist in the practical fulfilment of life (v. 28). But if Job has risen to this tranquil temper, how comes it that he falls back into complainings (30²⁰⁻²³) and dissatisfaction at not having been justified by God (31³⁵)? And, further, if he has reached by the unaided force of his own meditations this devout and submissive frame of mind, how is the ironical tone of the Divine speeches (chs. 38f.) to be accounted for? If he is already resigned to the inscrutability of the divine ways, how does it need to be again pointed out to him?' (Driver). These considerations have induced many scholars to regard the c. as a later insertion. Some have regarded it as a part of Zophar's third speech, but its quiet beauty and detachment in temper forbid this view. The c. constitutes an independent poem, which a reader may have inserted here to indicate that the discussion which has just closed deals with subjects too lofty for human understanding.

1-11. Man can discover precious metals by mining processes, but where can Wisdom be found?

1. Surely] RM 'For.' Perhaps the question in vv. 12 and 20, 'Where shall Wisdom be found?', 'Whence then cometh Wisdom?' may be understood at the beginning of this verse. It has even been suggested that it once stood at the beginning and has been omitted by accident.

1. Vein] RV 'mine.' Remains of mines have been found in Edom a little N. of Petra, and it is well known that copper and turquoise mines were worked by the Egyptians in the Sinaitic Peninsula at least as early as the reign of Sa-nekht, the founder of the third Egyptian dynasty, i.e. according to Prof. Flinders Petrie about 4950 B.C. (see his 'Researches in Sinai'). Where they fine it] RV 'which they refine.' 2. Brass] rather, 'copper.' 3. Render, 'Man setteth an end to darkness, and searcheth out to the furthest bound the stones,' etc., a reference to mining operations.

4. RV 'He (the miner) breaketh open a shaft away from where men sojourn; They (miners) are forgotten of the foot that passeth by (overhead); They hang afar from men, they swing to and fro (i.e. by ropes).' The word rendered 'shaft' should be 'channel.' Ancient mines were often not vertical shafts, but sloping tunnels. A slight change would give 'He breaketh open a shaft away from light.'

5. As it were fire] RV 'as it were by fire,' a reference to mining operations. 7. A path] the miner's tunnel. 9. The miner's excavations. 10. Rivers] RM 'passages.' 11^a. RV 'He bindeth (with clay) the streams that they trickle not,' i.e. he prevents water from entering the mine.

12-28. Man can discover some things by his cleverness, but Wisdom, the mystery of the universe and its ordering, is beyond his ken. It is the secret of God who ordained its existence.

13. The price thereof] LXX reads, 'the way thereof.' 14. The depth] the primeval abyss supposed to lie under the earth: cp. Gn 1². 15f. Cp. Prov 3^{14, 15} 8^{10, 11}. 17. Crystal] RV 'glass': known to the ancients, but extremely costly. 18. No mention] because there is no comparison. Rubies] RM 'pearls.' 22. Destruction] Heb. Abaddon, the realm of the dead. The fame of Wisdom, but not the knowledge of it, has reached these gloomy regions.

23. See on 12-28. Since God is the creator of the universe, and knows even its most secret recesses, He must know where Wisdom is to be found. Not only so, but the very work of creation and the adjustment of natural phenomena are indications of Wisdom, and prove not merely God's knowledge of Wisdom's abode, but his possession of Wisdom itself.

25. RM 'When he maketh a weight for the wind: yea, he moteth out the waters by measure,' i.e. the regulation by God of the forces of nature. 26. A decree for the rain] i.e. for its regulation. 27. 'When God ordered creation, Wisdom was present to Him; He declared it, gave it existence, and contemplated it in all its fulness with divine approval'

(Gibson). 28. Man's wisdom is a distinct thing from the Divine Wisdom. It is that right conduct which accompanies reverence for a holy God.

The description of Wisdom in this c. closely connects the book of Job in this respect with the other Wisdom literature of the O.T., viz. Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. The personification is, however, less distinct in Job. Wisdom here is only God's attribute. Prov 8²²⁻³¹ should be carefully compared with this c.

CHAPTERS 29-31

These chs. form a section by themselves, in which Job reviews his life. He first of all draws a picture of his past prosperous career, when he was happy and respected (c. 29). With this he contrasts his present condition, when men he once despised now hold him in contempt, and he is in pain and sorrow and disgrace (c. 30). Finally, he reasserts his innocence of wickedness in any form (c. 31).

CHAPTER 29

JOB'S PAST GREATNESS AND HAPPINESS

Job mournfully recalls the days of God's favour, and the prosperity and honour he once enjoyed. In this c. we have the picture of a great and worthy chieftain looked up to and respected by all. It confirms the description of Job's importance in c. 1.

3. Candle] RV 'lamp'; a figure of God's favour. 4. Days of my youth] RV 'ripeness of my days.' Secret] RM 'friendship.' Tabernacle] RV 'tent.' 6. A figure of prosperity: cp. Dt 33²¹.

7. Through the city] RV 'unto the city.' Job went with other elders to administer justice at the city gate. Observe that Job did not live in the city; his usual abode was in his camp. But he was influential in the city, just as a great Arab prince is sometimes in our own times.

8. Hid themselves] because of the awe which Job inspired. 11. Gave witness to me] i.e. to my goodness, which it saw. 14. Lit. 'Justice clothed itself in me.' He was the very personification of justice. Diadem] RM 'turban.'

16. The cause which I knew not] RV 'the cause of him that I knew not.'

18. As the sand] RM 'as the phoenix.' This was a fabulous bird alluded to in Egyptian, Hebrew, and Arabian tradition. It was supposed to be immortal, burning itself in its nest every thousand years and renewing its life in the flames.

19, 20. The verbs should be read in the future tense. 19. By] RV 'to': cp. Ps 1³.

Dew] cp. Prov 19¹² Dt 32². The dew was an emblem of prosperity in a land where rain was infrequent. 20^a. The respect paid him would not fail him. 20^b. His physical powers should endure: cp. Gu 49²¹, 'His bow abode in strength.'

21-25. These vv. would more naturally follow v. 10, and some think this was their original position. 22. Dropped upon them] as refreshing rain: cp. Dt 32². 23. The latter rain] the spring rains as contrasted with those of the autumn. 24. If I laughed, etc.] RM 'I smiled on them when they had no confidence,' i.e. to encourage them. 24^b. They failed to remove his cheerfulness. 25. Job speaks as if he used to be the natural guide and comfort of his fellow-men.

CHAPTER 30

JOB'S PRESENT MISERY

Job bitterly contrasts his present with his past condition, as described in c. 29. It must be borne in mind that Job was now outcast and beggared.

1-8. Job complains that he is insulted by abject outcasts, the class of broken men who are expelled from respectable tribes and live by thieving. They are common E. of Jordan in the nomadic regions.

2^b. RV 'Men in whom ripe age' (or vigour) 'is perished.' 3. Solitary] RV 'gaunt.'

Flying, etc.] render, 'Fugitives in the desert on the eve of want and ruin.' 4. Render, 'They pluck salt-wort' (a plant sometimes eaten by the abjectly poor) 'among the bushes, and the roots of the white broom to warm them.' This broom is a distinctive shrub of the southern desert hills: cp. 1K 19⁴ RM.

7. Render, 'They snore under bushes and huddle under thorny shrubs.' 8^b. RV 'They were scourged out of the land.'

9-14. A description of a poor old man mobbed and worried by the rabble. Or possibly 11-15 refers to God as assailing him with troops of afflictions. The Heb. is very obscure.

11. RV renders, 'For he hath loosed his cord, and afflicted me, and they have cast off the bridle before me.' RM gives another reading, 'my cord (or bowstring).' Perhaps 'loosed my bowstring' is the best of these alternatives: cp. 29²⁰. Conder suggests, 'For they spy the (tent) door and insult me, and stretch out a headstall before my face.' This was an insult and one which is still customary. The headstall means that the man is regarded as an ass.

12. Conder suggests, 'The brood (of boys) stand upon my right hand (an insult, for the place of honour was on the right hand). They trip up my feet and jostle me on the dangerous paths.' They no longer make room for him. The last clause is more usually regarded as a metaphor from a siege; so RV 'And they cast up against me their ways of destruction.'

13. They have no helper] Perhaps we should read, 'There is none to check them.' 15. My soul] RV 'my honour.'

16-31. Job laments his misery of mind and body, and the severity of God.

17. Are pierced] by acute pain. Sinews] render, 'gnawing pains.' 18. Changed] lit. 'disfigured.' His complaint causes painful changes in his appearance. 20. Regardest me not] rather, 'lookest at me,' with indifference to his sufferings. 22. Figurative of the storm of God's anger. Dissolvest my substance] RV 'dissolvest me in the tempest.' 23. House appointed] RM 'house of meeting.' Job is convinced that his sufferings can only end in death. 24. Render, 'Doth not a sinking man stretch out his hand, and cry out in his calamity?'

27^a. Figurative of his agitated condition.

27^b. Prevented me] RV 'are come upon me.' 28^a. RM 'I go blackened, but not by the sun'; the result perhaps of his disease: see v. 30. 28^b. RV 'I stand up in the assembly and cry for help.' 29. Dragons] RV 'jackals.'

Owls] lit. 'daughters of screeching.' These are animals associated with desolate places: cp. Isa 13^{21,22}. 30^a. RV 'My skin is black, and falleth from me.' 31. Organ] RV 'pipe.' Job's happiness is turned to sorrow.

CHAPTER 31

JOB PROTESTS THE INNOCENCE OF HIS PAST LIFE

Job's virtues are those of a great Arab prince, such as are admired still: namely, blameless family life, consideration for the poor and weak, charity, modesty, and generosity concerning wealth, pure religion (according to his creed), the absence of vindictive feelings, hospitality to strangers, fearless honesty and just dealings.

1-12. Sensual sins.

1. I made a covenant with mine eyes] Job resolved to keep a guard over them that they should not transgress. Why then should I think?] RV 'How then should I look?'

2^a. RM 'What portion should I have of God?' i.e. How would God visit such sin?

3. Is not] RV 'Is it not.'

6. Even balance] i.e. balances of justice. In the Egyptian Book of the Dead the soul is represented as being weighed in the balance before Osiris at the judgment. 10. To grind at the mill is a menial task, the work of slaves.

12. The evil results of lust: cp. Prov 6²¹⁻³⁵.

13-23. Sins of oppression.

14. Riseth up] i.e. to judge. 18. He] the fatherless. Her] the widow. 21. When I saw my help in the gate] Job could have counted on the judges supporting his side of the question. Gate] see on 29⁷. 22. Bone] i.e. collar-bone. 23. The thought of God's displeasure checked him, and a sense of His majesty kept him from sinning.

26-28. A reference to the worship of the heavenly bodies (cp. 2K 21³⁻⁵ Jer 44^{17f} Ezk 8¹⁶). 27. My mouth hath kissed my hand] a form of idolatrous worship: cp. 1K 19¹⁸.

29f. The high moral tone is very significant: cp. Mt 5⁴⁴ Ro 12¹⁰⁻²¹. 31. Render, 'If the men in my tent have not said, Who can find one that hath not been satisfied with his flesh?' i.e. Job had more than satisfied his servants. 33^a. Render, 'If I hid my fault like a common man': i.e. as men usually do.

34. Did I fear] RV 'Because I feared.' Job declares that he had nothing to hide in his conduct and did not fear enquiry.

35-37. Job breaks off and does not complete the sentence begun in v. 33. For his whole soul is moved by the words he has just uttered, and with the proud assertion of his innocence he challenges God to answer him, to give him the writing which contained the charges against him. Proudly, even with God's stigma upon him, he would enter God's presence, the certainty of his rectitude changing the disgrace into distinction. Most scholars feel that the addition of vv. 38-40 spoils the effect of this splendid conclusion.

35. RV 'Oh that I had one to hear me! (Lo, here is my signature, let the Almighty answer me!) And that I had the indictment which mine adversary hath written!' Job puts his signature to the declaration of his innocence. The adversary is God. 37. Conscious of his integrity, Job would lay bare every act of his life to God.

38-40. The grand challenge thrown down by Job in vv. 35-37 seems to form such a suitable conclusion to his speeches that most scholars hold that vv. 38-40 stood originally in an earlier part of the c., e.g. after vv. 8 or 25.

40. Cockles] RM 'noisome weeds.'

Job for the last time has maintained the integrity of his past life, and expressed his readiness to answer all charges of guilt brought against him. The third and final series of his speeches comes to an end. It cannot be said that any explanation of the ways of Providence has been put forward so far, but the popular theories that suffering must always imply previous sin, and that compensation according to conduct is invariably meted out to both good and bad in this world, have been refuted. Moreover, we see the noble spectacle of a good man in adversity clinging in spite of all his trials to his uprightness. Job has been able to find no foothold in the thought that God would revive him, or that the life beyond the grave will restore him to blessed fellowship with God. Nor has he gained any hope that the government of the world will become more righteous. But he has reached the assurance that God will vindicate his innocence, and that he shall be permitted to know of this vindication.

CHAPTERS 32-37

THE SPEECHES OF ELIHU

It is the view of almost all scholars that the speeches of Elihu are a later addition. The grounds for this view are the following. His presence comes upon the reader with surprise, he is not mentioned with the other friends in the Prologue, and we have had no intimation that he has all the while been listening to the debate. It is still more remarkable that he is not mentioned at the close. Here God passes judgment on Job and the friends, and it is strange that Elihu is ignored. If the author intended Elihu to represent the true view, why did he not represent God as praising him, if not, why is he not condemned with the friends? This silence is the more surprising in view of the contents of the speeches. Elihu blames the friends for the ineffectiveness of their attack, yet he adopts somewhat the same attitude and repeats their arguments, though passing, to some extent, beyond them. He elaborates the thought that suffering is discipline, and may actually be an expression of the goodness of God. He works out this vein of argument more fully than the three friends. Still it is difficult to think that, after the debate between Job and the friends had been exhausted, the poet should have introduced a new speaker unless he had something better to say, unless, in fact, he could sum up the case and decide between the disputants. Job could have met the arguments of Elihu as easily as those of the friends. We may be well assured that the author who made him triumph over them would never have let him be silenced by the similar contentions of Elihu. It is also noteworthy that Elihu in his description of celestial marvels to some extent anticipates the speech of God which is to follow, and thus robs it of some of its effect. The style of the speeches is throughout on a much lower level, they are prolix and hard to understand, and the language is more coloured by Aramaic influences. It is also noteworthy that the opening words in Jehovah's speech, 'Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?', which refer to Job, do not well admit the view that another speaker has made a lengthy speech since Job finished speaking. There are minor arguments that need not be mentioned here.

A few scholars, however, still regard the speeches as part of the original poem. It is argued that the function of Elihu is to exhibit and correct the spiritual pride of Job, which he had himself failed to detect and overcome. Elihu brings home his fault to him, and shows how the discipline through which God has brought him was designed to purify him of his unsuspected sin and raise him to a loftier spiritual eminence. In spite of the subtle arguments urged in favour of this view it must be dismissed as very unlikely. The main lesson of the book on this theory nowhere finds clear expression, while the debate is largely irrelevant. The representation of the design of God does not harmonise with that in the Prologue, and the Divine speeches lose much of their significance. Moreover, according to the Prologue, which represents the author's view, Job is a truly blameless man, acknowledged as such by God Himself. With this Elihu does not agree, hence it was not the original author who introduced him into the book. Nor is it the fact that Elihu convicts Job, it is the vision of God that brings him to contrition.

The reasons for the insertion of these speeches lie on the surface. The author wished to reassert the doctrine held by the friends, but also to develop aspects of it which had not received due weight. He dwells on the value of affliction for discipline, and lays much stress on the goodness of God. He also wished to rebuke Job for his unbecoming words about God. And he seems to have dissented from the poet, to whom we owe the rest of the book, in his representation of Job's character before his trial, while he also thought it an impropriety to represent God as condescending to debate with Job.

CHAPTER 32

THE SPEECHES OF ELIHU

Elihu explains his reasons for intervening in the debate.

2. Elihu] Heb. 'He is my God.' Buzite] In Gn 22²¹ Buz is closely connected with Uz (RV), which was Job's country. To the Assyrians Huz and Buz ('Haza' and 'Baza') were known as places not far from Edom.

Ram] uncertain. It occurs again in Ruth 4¹⁰ 1 Ch 29¹⁰. He justified himself rather than God] Job, in asserting his own innocence so warmly, had charged God with injustice in treating him, as he thought, as if he were guilty. 3. The friends had not succeeded in refuting Job's arguments, and they only asserted that he was wicked without proving it.

8. A spirit] a divine impulse which moved him to speak.

13. RV 'Beware lest ye say, We have found wisdom; God may vanquish him, not man.' The friends must not excuse themselves for their failure on the score that Job was too clever for man to debate with. Job had not yet contended with Elihu, and the latter intended to use different arguments. The author criticises the poet for letting God intervene in the debate.

15. Elihu describes the discomfiture of the friends. 19. Belly] Wo use 'heart' in the same way, of the emotions. New bottles] i.e. new wine-skins. If wine was put into new skins before it had finished fermenting it might cause them to burst: cp. Mt 9¹⁷ 21, 22. Elihu will show no partiality to either side in the remarks he is about to make. 22^b. RV 'Else would my Maker soon take me away.'

1-13. Elihu blames Job for regarding himself as sinless, and complaining that God is his enemy and will not answer him.

4. Elihu feels that God is inspiring his mind to speak aright. 6. RV 'Behold, I am toward God even as thou art.' Job need have no fear in facing a man like himself, such as he had felt about God: cp. 9³² 13²¹. 9. Cp. 9²¹ RV 10⁷ 16¹⁷ 27⁴⁻⁶. But Elihu exaggerates Job's protestation of innocence: cp. 7²¹ 13²⁶.

10, 11. Cp. 13^{24, 27} 19¹¹ 30²¹. 12^b. God is too great to have His actions questioned by mortals: to do so is presumptuous. 13. For] i.e. 'because.' Why does Job complain because God does not explain His treatment of him? God does answer man, as he proceeds to point out in two ways.

14-30. Elihu especially insists that the purposes of God's visitations are often to teach and to discipline: vv. 15-18 represent one method of God's training, vv. 19-24 another. 'In the first Elihu probably had Eliphaz in his eyes, in the second it is all but certain he had Job' (Cox).

15. Cp. the vision of Eliphaz in c. 4.

16. Sealeth] Impresses on the mind like a seal. 18. He keepeth back] RM 'That he may keep back.' 22. The destroyers] or, 'the slain.'

23, 24. An angel messenger, interpreting God's will, comes to the sufferer and shows him what right conduct is. Thereupon God declares that He has found a means of reconciliation (ransom), perhaps the man's repentance, and pardons him. Some regard the angel as a mediator who comes between man and God and pleads his cause. 'Jewish prayers show that the "interpreter" of this verse was always identified in their minds with the expected Redeemer of Israel': thus, 'Raise up for us the righteous Interpreter, say: I have found a ransom' (Cook).

26. He will render, etc.] God restores to the penitent his righteousness, i.e. a position of acceptance with Him. 27. Render, 'He (the penitent) singeth before men and saith, I have sinned and . . . it was not required to me.'

29, 30. Elihu has now shown Job the loving purposes of God in chastening man. Job himself had only advanced to the idea of his own vindication after death. Elihu teaches the use of evil in this present life. 32. I desire to justify thee] I am ready to admit you are right if you can prove it.

1-9. Elihu appeals to his hearers to judge the matter. He protests against the complaints of Job that he was treated unjustly by God, and that it was no profit to be righteous.

3. Cp. 12¹¹. 4. [Judgment] RV 'that which is right.' 5. My judgment] i.e. my right.

6. RV 'Notwithstanding my right I am accounted a liar: My wound is incurable, though I am without transgression.' Right = innocence. 7, 8. Elihu implies that, in indulging in such reckless remarks, Job was linking himself with sinners. 7^b. Cp. 15¹⁶. 9. Cp. e.g. chs. 9 and 21.

10-37. Elihu meets Job's doubts. The omnipotent God cannot commit injustice: the idea is inconsistent with the conception of One who creates and sustains and governs all mankind. Instances are given of His judgments.

13. God has not been entrusted with His rule by a higher Power.

14^a. RM 'If he cause his heart to return to himself,' i.e. if God ceased to concern Himself with the affairs of man, and only selfishly regarded Himself. If He acted thus He might withdraw from man the breath of life He had given him (14^b), and then he would perish (15).

17. Render, 'Doth one hating right rule?' The thought is the same as Abraham's, 'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' (Gn 18²⁵): cp. also Ro 3⁸. Of course this begs the very question in dispute. 19. Accepteth not] RV 'respecteth not,' shows no undue partiality to. 20. The impartiality of God's judgments. Without hand] i.e. without human agency.

23. RV 'For he needeth not further to consider a man, that he should go before God in judgment.' God at the same time sees and judges every act: there is no need to set apart a special time for trying man. 24. Without number] RM 'without inquisition.' 25. He knoweth] RV 'he taketh knowledge of.'

28. Oppression causes God's intervention.

29. Make trouble] RV 'condemn.'

30. RV 'That the godless man reign not, that there be none to ensnare the people.'

31. Render, 'For hath any said unto God, I have borne chastisement though I offend not?'

32. 'Show me my sin, and I will give it up.' In vv. 31-33 Job is rebuked for presumption in criticising God's treatment of him.

33. RV 'Shall his recompence be as thou wilt, that thou refusest it? For thou must choose and not I: Therefore speak what thou knowest.' Elihu asks Job ironically if he is to lay down the law to God.

34. RV 'Men of understanding will say unto me, yea, every wise man that heareth me.'

36. Answers for] RV 'answering like.'

Elihu does not really advance on the position of the friends. Omnipotence cannot go wrong, the supreme tribunal cannot be unjust. This is just the point to be proved, and the proof derived from the fact that God gives and sustains man's life, while sound as far as it goes, does not go far enough. God may have His own ends to serve in this, rather than be prompted by benevolence, and the hard facts of human misery are left to suggest the darker interpretations of God.

1-8. Elihu (34⁹) had charged Job with saying that there was no advantage in being righteous. He now deals with this assertion.

2. Right] RV 'thy right,' thy just cause.

3. If I be cleansed from my sin] RV 'more than if I had sinned.' 4. Thy companions] those who held the same views.

5-8. Elihu points to the infinite distance between God and man, and shows that He cannot be injured by the evil or benefited by the good which we do. But a man's conduct is most important both to himself and to his fellows.

9-16. Coming to the problem why the cry of the oppressed seems often unanswered, Elihu replies it is because there is a lack of real prayer and trust in God. Hence Job must not expect to be heard so long as he murmurs at the way God treats him.

9. They make the oppressed to cry] rather, 'men cry out.' 10. Who giveth songs in the night] i.e. who delivers in the night of trouble, and causes men to sing with joy. 12. Render, 'They cry because of the pride of evil men, but none giveth answer'; i.e. because there is no humble, trustful appeal to God.

13. Vanity] or, unrecalcity. 14. Shalt] rather, 'dost.' Although Job thinks God is indifferent to his cause, it is not forgotten, only he must wait patiently. 15. RV 'But now, because he hath not visited in his anger, neither doth he greatly regard arrogance'; i.e. because God does not seem to punish sin at once. 16. In vain] i.e. with foolish views.

In this c. Elihu follows Eliphaz in explaining that righteousness is profitable to the upright, since God is too exalted to have any interest of His own to serve in perversion of justice. He urges further that the reason for God's silence when the wretched appeal to Him is that their cry is prompted by their selfishness. Both arguments are quite irrelevant to the case of Job.

1-15. Elihu maintains the wisdom and impartial justice of the rule of God. His purpose is to discipline and improve men, even by their afflictions.

3. From afar] from a review of the whole universe. 4. He] RV 'one'; i.e. Elihu.

7^b. RV 'But with kings upon the throne he setteth them for ever.' 9. Their work] i.e. their faults. Exceeded] RV 'behaved themselves proudly.' 12. Without knowledge] without learning God's lessons.

13. Hypocrites] RV 'godless.' Heap up wrath] RV 'lay up anger'; they cherish rebellious feelings. They cry not] in submission. The way the godless take God's chastening is contrasted with that of the righteous, vv. 7f. 14. Is among] render, 'perisheth like.'

15. RM 'He delivereth the afflicted by their afflictions, and openeth their ears by adversity.' Such are the effects of God's discipline when taken in the right spirit.

16-21. Elihu applies these remarks to Job, urging him to humble himself instead of remaining rebellious.

17. Hast fulfilled] RV 'art full of.' Job acts like the wicked under affliction: ep. v. 13.

18. Render, 'For beware lest wrath lead thee away into mockery: neither let the greatness of the ransom (Job's sufferings) turn thee aside,' i.e. into rebellion.

19. Nothing but affliction can save him.

20. The night] probably, of judgment.

People] rather, 'nations.' 21. Iniquity] i.e. rebelliousness.

22-37²⁴. The wonders of the heavens testify to the majesty and unsearchableness of God. Let Job refrain from judging Him.

22. Exalteth by] RV 'doeth loftily in.' Who teacheth like him] This is Elihu's great point, that afflictions are intended to teach, to discipline, and to purify even the good.

23. Iniquity] RV 'unrighteousness.'

26-37¹³. Elihu illustrates the marvellous workings of God by a vivid description of a rising storm.

27. The formation of rain. RV 'He draweth up the drops of water which distil in rain from his vapour.' 29^b. RV 'The thunderings of his pavilion'; i.e. of the clouds. 30. Render, 'Behold, He spreadeth His light around Him, and covereth it with the deeps' (lit. 'roots') 'of the sea': see on 26⁶ and ep. Ps 104^{2,3}. Modern scholars generally correct the text; some read with Duhm, 'Behold, He spreadeth His mist about Him, And He covereth the tops of the mountains.'

31. The people] rather, 'the peoples.' The purpose of storms may be either punishment or a bountiful provision. 32. RV 'He covereth his hands with the lightning' (to conceal them): 'and giveth it a charge that it strike the mark.'

33. The present text is difficult. The vowel-points should probably be somewhat altered, and the v. should run, 'The noise thereof telleth concerning Him as one that kindles His wrath against wickedness.'

CHAPTER 37

THE SPEECHES OF ELIHU (concluded)

2. The thunder is frequently called the voice of God: ep. Ps 29. Sound] RM 'muttering.' 4. Them] the flashes and thunder-claps. 6^a. RV 'And to the showers of his mighty rain.' 7^b. RV 'That all men whom he hath made may know it.' The suspension of work by storms shows men that they are subject to a higher Power.

9. Render, 'The whirlwind comes from its chamber, and cold from the scatterers,' i.e. from the winds (so RM), which scatter the clouds. But we should probably read, 'from its storehouses,' with a trifling change.

10. Straitened] RM 'congealed.' 11. RV 'Yea, he ladeth the thick cloud with moisture: he spreadeth abroad the cloud of his lightning.' 12. The lightning flashes and falls in obedience to the behest of God. 13. Probably the first line should run, 'Whether it be for correction for his land.' The word translated 'or' has been repeated by mistake.

14-24. A series of questions to Job, intended to produce submission and belief in God's providence.

15. Dost thou know?] can you explain?

16. The balancing of the clouds] the way in which they are poised. 17. Render, 'When thy clothes are hot, and the earth still by reason of the south wind.' Vv. 17, 18 refer to the sultry weather and sky of brass before the storm breaks. 18. Looking glass] RV 'mirror' (of metal). 19-20. Elihu shrinks from the presumptuous thought of contending with the Almighty, such as Job had uttered 20^b. RV 'Or should a man wish that he were swallowed up.'

21. RM 'And now men cannot look on the light when it is bright in the skies, when the wind hath passed and chased them.'

22. Fair weather is literally 'gold.' The author probably intended 'brightness,' for which he may have used a different word. The reference may be to the Northern Lights.

23, 24. Elihu concludes by summing up the character of God as He manifests Himself to man. Though His dealings may be beyond man's comprehension, yet He is just as well as mighty, and will not afflict unjustly. But He expects humility, not presumption from His creatures. 24. Respecteth] RV 'regardeth.'

Wise of heart] i.e. confident in their own wisdom, as Job was in Elihu's opinion.

THE SPEECHES OF THE ALMIGHTY

When the human debate was over, and Job had proudly asserted his readiness to confront God, conscious of his innocence (31³⁵⁻³⁷), there was nothing left, if the contest was to be decided, except a direct intervention of God. This Job had himself again and again demanded. He had challenged God to meet him and justify the treatment He accorded to him. He complains bitterly that God evades him, and lets him suffer, though He knows that he is innocent. Now at last God speaks. But not at all as Job had demanded. For he had implored God to remove His hand from him, in other words, to release him from pain that he might not be distracted by it, and not to make him afraid with His terror, since otherwise he might be driven, though innocent, to confess to guilt. God does not heal him, and He speaks out of the storm. Nor does the matter of His utterance conform to what Job had demanded, any more than the manner of it. For He does not deal with the question of Job's sin, or tell him the reason of his affliction. He puts question after question to him, challenging him to explain the mysteries of the universe. These he cannot comprehend; with what right then does he criticise God's government of the world?

It is a surprise to some that God should be represented by the poet as taking this line. Why should He speak with such irony, and why not offer the man who had suffered so deeply some explanation and comfort? Partly because Job had brought deserved rebuke on himself for his attack on God's rule of the world. Partly because he needed to rise to a higher point of view from which he could see the complexity of the problem. Moreover, God does not explain to Job the cause of his suffering, since the supreme lesson of the book is that he becomes so sure of God that he knows his affliction to be in harmony with God's righteousness, though he is wholly incapable of reconciling the two intellectually. But after he has reached this position God restores him to health and prosperity.

The vital element in his experience is not the speech of God, but the vision of God. It is in a true relation to God, which is possible only to him to whom the divine vision is vouchsafed, that Job learns to trust God utterly. And as he looks back on the charges he has brought against Him, whom in this deep, mystical manner he has just come to know, he loathes the words he has uttered, and repents in dust and ashes. 'I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee.'

CHAPTER 38

THE FIRST SPEECH OF THE ALMIGHTY (Chs. 38, 39)

The marvels of creation, which witness to the infinite wisdom, power, and watchful care of the Creator, are presented to Job in such a way as to force from him a confession of ignorance and weakness, and of presumption in venturing to contend with God.

1-38. The wonders of earth and heaven. What does Job know of their nature and origin and ordering?

1. Whirlwind] rather, 'storm.' Theophanies, or manifestations of God to man, are usually represented in OT. as accompanied by convulsions of nature: cp. Ex 19¹⁶⁻²⁰. There is no necessary reference to the storm in c. 37.

2. The question evidently refers to Job. 'God condemns Job for making dark the divine plan of the world. He had spoken as though it was all a tangled riddle. Really there is in it a beautiful luminous order' (Peake). But this makes Job the last speaker, not Elihu, and supports the view that the latter's speeches are an interpolation.

3. Job had expressed too boldly his desire to contend with God concerning his righteousness. But he has still to learn that he must trust where he cannot understand.

4-7. The creation of the earth.

5. Who hath laid] RV 'Who determined.'

7. Sons of God] the angels.

8-11. The sea.

8. When it brake forth] The ancients thought that the sea issued from the subterranean abyss, with which it was connected by springs in the bed of the ocean: cp. v. 16 and Gn 7¹¹. 10^a. Render, 'and prescribed for it its boundary.'

12-15. The dawn.

12. Since thy days] RV adds 'began.'

13. Deeds of darkness are checked by the coming of light: cp. Jn 3²⁰. 14. RM 'It is changed as clay under the seal, and all things stand forth as in a garment.' Objects which have hitherto been obscure and shapeless take form and colour, as if wrapped in a clinging garment, when daylight comes. 15. Darkness, which is the light of the wicked, disappears, and with it their power to harm is gone.

16, 17. The deep and the under-world. The deep lies beneath the bed of the sea.

16. Search of the depth] RV 'recesses of the deep.' 17. Opened] RV 'revealed.' Death] Sheol, the place of the dead.

19-21. The abode of light and darkness.

19. Where] rather, 'whither.' 20. Take it to the bound thereof] i.e. track it. 21. Knowest thou it] RV 'Doubtless thou knowest': spoken ironically.

22-30. The secrets of snow and hail, rain and frost.

22. Treasures] RV 'treasuries'; store-houses. 22, 23. Cp. passages such as Josh 10¹¹ Ps 18, where God is represented as intervening in the affairs of men through the elements of nature. 24^b. RV 'Or the east wind scattered upon the earth.'

25. 'Who has made a channel for the tropical rain to pour down from the heavens through the skies?' 26, 27. God's providence neglects no part of His creation. Job had at the most thought of man, but mainly of himself. God reminds him of the vast animate and inanimate creation. 28^a. 'Does man beget the rain?' 30. Render, 'The waters are congealed like stone.'

31^a. Render, 'Canst thou group together the Pleiades?' Sweet influences] RV 'cluster.'

Pleiades] see on 9^o. 32. Render, 'Canst thou lead forth the signs of the zodiac in the season?' i.e. Can you influence their appearing? The zodiacal signs were known 3,000 years B.C. (The zodiac is that part of the sky which includes the apparent paths of the sun, moon, and planets. The 'signs' are the divisions of 30 degrees into which, for astronomical and other purposes, it is divided.) Arc-turus with his sons] or, 'the Bear over her sons,' i.e. the revolution of the Bear round the Pole and Little Bear.

33. The laws of the seasons and their influence on the earth. 36. Inward parts] RM 'dark clouds.' Heart] RM 'meteor.' 37. In] RV 'by.' Stay] RV 'pour out.' Bottles of heaven] i.e. rain-clouds.

37-41. These vv. are connected in subject with c. 39. 41. They wander] RV 'and wander.'

CHAPTER 39

THE FIRST SPEECH OF THE ALMIGHTY (concluded)

Chs. 38³⁹⁻⁴¹ and 39 depict the wonders of animate creation, and the instincts with which animals are gifted by the providence of God. In view of His works Job must learn to trust Him and to believe in His goodness.

1-4. The wild goat or ibex.

1. Knowest thou? i.e. do you control?

3. Their sorrows] their young, whose birth causes pain. 4. With corn] rather, 'in the desert.'

5-8. The wild ass, which is still found in the deserts of N. Arabia and Syria.

6. Barren land] RV 'salt land,' districts coated with this mineral, which is much sought after by cattle. 7. Note the contrast between the life of the wild and the domestic ass.

Regardeth he the crying] RV 'heareth he the shoutings.'

9-12. The wild ox.

9. Unicorn] RV 'wild-ox.' The word 'unicorn' is based on the LXX translation, and is incorrect. The nearest extant representative of the wild ox is the bison, which still lingers in the forests of Lithuania, the Caucasus and N. America. Its bones are found in Lebanon bone-caves. 10-12. The untameable nature of the wild ox. 12. Believe] i.e. confide in, trust. Gather it into thy barn] RV 'gather the corn of thy threshing floor.'

13-18. The ostrich.

13. There is nothing about peacocks in the Hebrew. Perhaps the sense is, 'The wing of ostriches is goodly. Is it a stork's wing for flight?' The ostrich cannot fly like a stork, which comes to Palestine in the spring on its way from Africa to Europe. 14. In the earth] RV 'on the earth.' Dr. Tristram says: 'The ostrich is polygamous, and several hens deposit their eggs in one place, a hole in the sand. The eggs are then covered over and left during the heat of the day; but in the cold regions at any rate, as in the Sahara, the birds sit regularly during the night, and until the sun has full power.' 16. She is hardened against] RM 'She deals hardly with.' If her nest is discovered the ostrich often destroys her young: cp. Lam 4³. 16^b. RV 'Though her labour' (of laying the eggs) 'be in vain, she is without fear,' i.e. acts still without due caution.

17. 'More stupid than an ostrich' is an Arab proverb. 18. Lifteth up herself on high] RV 'rouseth herself up to fight.' Scorneth the horse] by outrunning him. Tristram puts the stride of an ostrich at full speed at from 22 to 28 ft.

19-25. The war-horse.

19^b. RV 'Hast thou clothed his neck with the quivering mane?' (lit. 'with shaking').

20. Afraid as a grasshopper] RV 'to leap as a locust.' Nostrils] RV 'snorting.'

23. Against] rather, 'over.' Shield] RV 'javelin.' The horse probably is not being ridden here, but driven in a chariot, on which quiver, spear, and shield (or dart) are hung. He is not afraid of the noise they make, or, perhaps, of the enemy. 24. He swalloweth] render, 'he digs' or 'paws.' Neither believeth, etc.] RM 'Neither standeth he still at.' 25^a. Render, 'at each trumpet he saith, Ha!' 25^b. The sense of smell in horses is very acute, and they are much discomposed by the odour of carrion.

26-30. The hawk and the eagle.

26. The migratory hawk is intended, which leaves Palestine for the S. in winter.

27. 'Eagle' is masculine throughout. 30. ('p. Mt 24²⁸).

CHAPTER 40¹⁻⁵

A short dialogue between the Almighty and Job, ending in the latter's confession and submission.

2. Cox renders, 'Is he who contended with the Almighty corrected? Let him who disputed with God reply.' 4. Vile] RV 'of small account.' Job confesses that in view of these marvellous works of God, it was presumption to think of criticising His actions.

CHAPTERS 40⁶-41³¹

THE SECOND SPEECH OF THE ALMIGHTY

Job, we know, in his anxiety to prove his integrity had been led into casting doubts on the justice of God's government of the world. He is here ironically invited to take God's place as ruler of the universe, and to display a wisdom as great as that of God. If he proved himself competent to do this, then, and not till then, he may consider himself independent of God and criticise His actions.

8. Disannul my judgment] deny my righteousness. 13. In secret] RV 'in the hidden place'; Sheol, the abode of the dead.

15-41³⁴. In this passage the mightiest beast of the earth and the one most dreaded in the water are portrayed to Job, and he is asked if he can subdue them. Many scholars regard these descriptions as a later insertion.

15-24. The Elephant or Hippopotamus.

15. Behemoth] the word means 'a large beast.' Most scholars consider that the hippopotamus is meant, but some regard the description as more applicable to the elephant. Buxtorf, the great Hebraist, renders 'elephas.' He has a 'nose,' i.e. a trunk, and swings a tail 'like a cedar.' Elephants were known on the Euphrates about 1550 B.C. Thothmes III of Egypt is represented as receiving one from Syria. Which I made with thee] i.e. it and Job are alike God's creatures. Or render, 'which is with thee,' i.e. you can see him.

16. Navel] RV 'muscles.' 17. Like a cedar] it is so firm and strong. 17^b. RV 'The sinews of his thighs are knit together.'

19^b. RM 'He that made him hath furnished him with his sword'; i.e. his tusks or teeth.

20. Mountains] Unlike the hippopotamus, the elephant is found in hill forests.

23. RV 'Behold, if a river overflow, he trembleth not: He is confident though Jordan swell even to his mouth.' Jordan] means a river as swift and strong as Jordan. 24. RV 'Shall any take him when he is on the watch, or pierce through his nose (or, his trunk) with a snare?'

CHAPTER 41

THE SECOND SPEECH OF THE ALMIGHTY (concluded)

The second great creature, the Crocodile (with which the 'leviathan' is generally identified) is now described. If Job cannot control the crocodile, dare he contend with Him who made it? The crocodile is found in the Crocodile River under Carmel as well as in Egypt.

1. Hook] RV 'fishhook.' 1^b. RV 'Or press down his tongue with a cord.' This may be an allusion to the method of treating a refractory camel or mule by tying down its tongue with the lead-rope. 2. Hook] RM 'rope of rushes.' Thorn] RV 'hook.'

4. Wilt thou take] RV 'That thou shouldst take.' 6^a. RV 'Shall the bands of fishermen make traffic of him?' Merchants] lit. 'Canaanites' or 'lowlanders' on the trading route from Syria to Egypt, who were great merchants. Their name is sometimes used for merchants generally: cp. Prov 31²⁴ Isa 23⁸ Zech 14²¹. 8. Lay thine hand upon him] i.e. if you dare. Do no more] or, 'do not repeat it.' 9. The hope of him] i.e. of overcoming him.

10, 11. If the creature is so great, who can withstand the Creator? 11. Prevented me] RV 'first given unto me.' 12. His parts] i.e. the crocodile's. 13. RV 'Who can strip off his outer garment? Who shall come within his double bridle?' 14. Doors of his face] his mouth. 14^b. RV 'Round about his teeth is terror.'

18^a. RV 'His neesings (i.e. sneezings or snortings) flash forth light.' This and the following vv. poetically describe the snorting and heated breath and spray thrown from the crocodile's mouth. 18^b. In the Egyptian hieroglyphs the dawn is expressed by crocodile's eyes. 20. Caldron] The crocodile's breath is likened to vapour that rises from a steaming pot. 22^b. RV 'And terror danceth before him.'

25^b. RV 'By reason of consternation they are beside themselves.' But the v. may perhaps, with a slight alteration of the text, be rendered: 'When he raiseth himself up the deer are afraid who slip (or stray) among the broken places on the banks of the river.' It is not the usual term for 'the mighty' that is used here. Shebarim, 'broken places,' in Josh 7⁵, refers to the slope of a ravine.

26. Habergeon] RV 'pointed shaft.' An ordinary bullet will not pierce a crocodile's scales.

30. RV 'His underparts are like sharp potsherds: He spreadeth as it were a threshing wain upon the mire.' 31. He lashes the water into foam. Like a pot of ointment] perhaps a reference to the strong musky smell of the crocodile.

34. The meaning is probably, 'Everything that is high feareth him: He is king over all the sons of pride,' i.e. the other great beasts (28³).

CHAPTER 42¹⁻⁶

JOB'S FINAL WITHDRAWAL

Job at last has learned his lesson. The convincing evidences of wisdom, power, and love which God has offered him, have led him to lay aside his pride of intellect and pride of innocence. He feels that he may safely trust, even though he may never fully understand, and with Abraham he may rest convinced that the Judge of all the earth must do right.

The difficulties of Job were the difficulties of the author and of the thoughtful men of his day. 'He had pondered the ethical and religious problem presented by the moral order of the world. With a flaming hatred of wrong and tender pity for the oppressed, he saw the triumph of the wicked and the misery of the just. He was familiar with the current doctrines, and knew how they ignored the most patent facts. A truly religious man, he had found his heart drawn to God by the irrepressible instinct for fellowship with Him, driven from Him by the apparent immorality of His government. He had known what it was to be baffled in his search for God and to feel himself slipping from the fear of the Almighty. An intellectual solution he had not been able to reach. But in humble submission to God's inscrutable wisdom, and in a profounder sense of fellowship with Him, he had escaped into the region of unclouded trust' (Prof. A. S. Peake's 'Job').

2^b. RV 'And that no purpose of thine can be restrained.' 3. Job soliloquises. 'Well might God say to him (38²): Who is this that hideth counsel without knowledge?' i.e. that misreads in his ignorance the real facts of divine providence. The point is that Job now agrees in God's estimate of himself.

4. Again he repeats God's words in 38⁸ and 40⁷.

5, 6. Job declares that he now understands God's relations towards man in a far deeper and truer sense than he had hitherto. At once he retracts and repents of all that he had said amiss. The sight of God, i.e. a clearer apprehension of His majesty and righteousness, humbles Job to the dust. 6. Abhor myself] RM 'loathe my words.'

THE EPILOGUE (42⁷⁻¹⁷)

7-17. These vv. describe the happy ending to Job's trials and his restoration to prosperity. It is a sequel in full accord with the religious ideas of the Hebrews. With no clear idea of a future state, where compensation will be found for the ills of this world, long life and earthly happiness were regarded as the only evidence of God's favour and approval. The feeling that the happy ending spoils the effect is modern, but incorrect. For it would have made a very bad impression on the reader, if God had been represented as callously leaving Job to suffer, when the occasion for trial had passed away.

7-9. The friends receive the divine condemnation. 'The three friends had really inculpated the providence of God by their professed defence of it. By disingenuously covering up and ignoring its enigmas they had cast more discredit on it than Job, who honestly held them up to the light. Their denial of its apparent inequalities was more untrue and dishonouring to the divine administration as it is in fact conducted than Job's bold affirmation of them' (W. H. Green's 'Argument of the Book of Job unfolded'). At the same time there is a strange contrast between the judgment on Job expressed here and that expressed in the speech out of the storm, which supports the view that the prose portions were borrowed by the writer from an older book.

11. A piece of money] Heb. Kesitah, a very early word occurring only in Gn 33¹⁹ and Josh 24³². It was probably an uncoined piece of silver representing the value of a lamb as the LXX and Vulgate translate it. This, with the rings, 'constituted, I suppose, the un:ar, or present, such as Orientals still make on paying a visit of ceremony' (Cox).

12. Note that the numbers are double those mentioned in 1⁸, an indication of the ideal nature of this history of Job: see on 1². The prophets often allude to the double compensation in store for their afflicted people: Isa 61⁷ Jer 16¹⁴⁻¹⁸ Zech 9¹².

14. These names contain allusions to feminine charms. Jemima means 'dove': cp. Song 1¹. Keziah probably means 'cassin' or 'cinnamon', a fragrant spice: cp. Ps 45⁸. Keren-happuch means 'a horn of eye paint.' It was a dye made of antimony with which the eyelashes were tinged, and was considered by Orientals to enhance the beauty of the eye: cp. 2 K 9³⁰ Jer 4³⁰ Ezk 23⁴⁰. 15. Inheritance among their brethren] this was an unusual privilege to women: cp. Nu 27¹⁻¹¹.

17. In LXX a postscript is added, 'It is written that he will rise again with those whom the Lord raises up.' This is probably an addition made by some reader, who felt the inadequacy of any material compensation or reward.

PSALMS

INTRODUCTION

1. Name. The book of the Psalms is the name given in our versions to the first of the books of the third division of the Hebrew Bible called Kethubhim or Hagiographa. It is followed in that division by Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. The name of the book in Hebrew is Tehillim, i.e. 'Praises.' Our name, Psalms, is a transliteration of the Greek title of the book, and signifies 'songs accompanied by stringed instruments.' The title Psalter is from the Greek psalterion, 'a harp,' and is applied to the book of Psalms just as 'Lyre' or 'Harp' is sometimes used for a collection of hymns.

2. Hebrew Poetry. The history of Hebrew poetry, as evidenced in extant sacred literature, can only be sketched in briefest outline. It is predominantly lyric in character, i.e. it expresses, or refers to, the poet's own thoughts or emotions. Epic poetry, i.e. poetry narrating the achievements of heroes, is not represented. Some of the poetry is of a dramatic nature, as Job, and especially the Song of Songs, but there is no drama properly so called. Fragments of early songs of various kinds have been preserved, and are embedded in the literature of the OT. Examples of these are the 'Song of the Sword,' uttered by Lamech in Gn 4^{23,24}; the 'Song of the Well,' recorded in Nu 21^{17,18}; and the burden of the thanksgiving for the deliverance from Egypt in Ex 15^{1,21}, the whole fine composition contained in vv. 2-18 being probably of later date.

One of the very oldest portions of Hebrew literature is the Song of Deborah in Jg 5. Most critics consider the Song of Moses, recorded in Dt 32, to be of comparatively late date, and Hannah's Song in 1 S 2 can hardly be of contemporary authorship. Many of the poetic strains that have come down to us are laments in memory of the departed, one of the most notable examples being David's elegy on the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1), and another the lament for Abner in 2 S 3³³. The 'last words of David,' recorded in 2 S 23, are cheerful in strain, forming a marked contrast to the dirge of Hezekiah in view of his approaching death (Isa 38). Traces of harvest and vintage songs, and songs for banquets, are discernible: see Am 6⁶. Wedding songs are, perhaps, preserved in the book of Canticles.

Interspersed among the prophetic writings a few beautiful lyrics are to be found: see Isa 12, Jon 2, and Hab 3. A sublime and powerful Mashal, or Taunting Song, is preserved in Isa 14¹⁻²⁷. It is notable for its bold symbolism, and its daring and bitter irony, rather than for its beauty.

Careful readers of the OT. will not fail to notice scattered references to collections of poems that have not been preserved. One of these is called in Nu 21¹⁴ 'The book of the Wars of Jehovah,' containing, presumably, martial songs; and another, 'The book of Jashar,' i.e. the Upright, may well have consisted of verses in pious memory of departed saints and heroes. The titles of the Psalms, when closely examined, render their own evidence to the existence of other collections of Hebrew lyrics which have perished, as well as to some that have been taken up into that larger collection, which now forms one of the most precious possessions of the world.

The book of Lamentations may stand as an illustration of the elaborate versification of later days. Short as the book is, it consists of several parts distinguishable from one another by their various metres, one being styled the Kinah or Elegiac metre, and all displaying considerable artistic skill. The acrostics which have been preserved in the book of Psalms and in Lamentations are probably the product of a comparatively late period.

It remains only to mention the Gnomical verse (i.e. didactic poetry, dealing in maxims), of which the book of Proverbs furnishes such abundant illustration. Some of the Psalms, and parts of the book of Job, may perhaps be included under this heading, but the attempt accurately to classify under modern subdivisions the many-voiced poetry of the OT. is more than futile. It is clear that one marked type of poetical composition is recognisable in the sententious, regular, evenly-balanced clauses, such as constitute the main portion of Proverbs. In the Hebrew, however, there is no monotony. There is variety enough in the rhythm of the lines, in the kind of parallelism adopted, and in the various building up of lines and couplets into stanzas, to remove the feeling of sameness which an English reader experiences in reading Proverbs or the 119th Psalm. Hebrew poetry in all its parts pulsates with the spontaneity, the freedom, and the sparkling variety of full and vigorous life.

3. Hebrew Poetical Construction. The distinction between poetry and prose in Hebrew does not depend upon the presence or absence of rhyme. Nor is metre—that is, arrangement in lines of a measured length, consisting of a definite number of syllables or ‘feet’—characteristic of Hebrew poetry, though some approach to this is occasionally found. Poetical construction depends upon rhythm of thought and balance of sentences. Each psalm is made up of lines, arranged so as to produce a ‘parallelism of members,’ so that in two or more lines words and matter correspond to one another with a carefully-studied equality. In the simplest form, two such lines match one another in a couplet, e.g.—

‘The heavens declare the glory of God
And the firmament sheweth his handy work.’
‘Enter into his gates with thanksgiving
And into his courts with praise.’

In these examples, the second line repeats the general sense of the first and strengthens its emphasis. This is called synonymous parallelism. Sometimes the second line affirms the opposite of the former, in antithesis or contrast, e.g.—

‘The wicked borroweth and payeth not again,
But the righteous sheweth mercy and giveth.’
‘The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous,
But the way of the ungodly shall perish.’

Sometimes a triplet is found, as—‘I call to remembrance my song in the night,

I commune with my own heart,
And my spirit made diligent search.’

Four lines may be included in the scheme, and then the first and third may be called parallel, and the second and fourth; or three of the lines may preserve a close parallelism, while one of them, either the first or the last, stands independent; or two ordinary couplets may constitute a verse of four lines, e.g.—

‘In my distress I called upon the Lord,
And cried unto my God:
He heard my voice out of his temple,
And my cry before him came into his ears.’

Close examination will show that these distichs, tristichs, and tetrastichs, as they are called—i.e. verses of 2, 3 and 4 lines respectively—assume a great variety of forms in the Psalms, thus avoiding the sameness and monotony characteristic of the poetry of the Proverbs. Order can be discerned, but, like the symmetry in the life of nature, it manifests itself amidst endless variety, so that the charm of freshness and unexpectedness is never lost. (For examples, see the arrangement of the verses in RV.)

As two, three, or four lines make a verse, so a number of verses constitute a stanza, or strophe, corresponding to a paragraph in prose. The end of such a stanza is sometimes marked by a refrain, such as ‘The Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge’ in the 46th Psalm, and ‘Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men,’ which is found four times in the 107th Psalm. But the stanzas do not recur with strict regularity, and the writers of these marvellous sacred lyrics never allow themselves to be chained by any mechanical rules.

There is, however, one apparent exception to this rule. Though rhyme is not found in Hebrew poetry, alliteration and assonance—the repetition of a letter or of similar sound endings—is not infrequent, and the alliteration sometimes takes the form of an acrostic. That is to say, a psalm may be composed so that each verse shall begin with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet, arranged in order from the first to the last—as we should say, from A to Z. This is practically the case in Pss 25, 34, 145. Or every other verse may thus follow on with consecutive letters, as in Ps 37; or every single line may begin with a fresh letter, as in Pss 111, 112. In the 119th Psalm, as is well known, there are twenty-two stanzas, each consisting of eight verses, and each verse in the stanza begins with the same letter, the letters of the whole alphabet being taken in regular succession. It is difficult to imitate this in English, and if it were done, an appearance of stiffness and artificiality would be produced. But, excepting perhaps in the elaborate scheme of the 119th Psalm, the mechanical arrangement does not seriously fetter the Hebrew poet, and the English reader would hardly guess how completely the alphabetical system is carried out. This is very marked in the 3rd chapter of Lamentations, a striking example of acrostic composition.

4. Hebrew Music. Tradition places the introduction of musical instruments at a very early date. In Gn 4²¹ Jubal is described as ‘the father of all such as handle the harp and pipe.’ Amos (5²³) speaks of ‘the melody of viols’ as being heard in the services, and Isaiah (30^{29, 32}) similarly mentions pipe and tabret and harp. The nature of the music is more a matter of speculation than of knowledge: it was probably what we would consider harsh and discordant. The singing at the Temple services seems, from notices in the Psalms, to have been antiphonal, sometimes by the two divisions of the choir, sometimes by the choir and the people, the latter joining at intervals in a refrain (e.g. 136). The singing in later times, at any rate, was accompanied, in some cases if not always, by instrumental music. Pss 4, 6, 54, 55, 67, 76 are headed ‘On Neginoth’ (RV ‘upon stringed instruments’); and Ps 5 has the direction 'Upon Nehiloth' (RM 'with the wind instruments'). Two stringed instruments are mentioned in the Bible, the kinor (harp) and the nebel (psaltery). The former seems to have been a lyre, an instrument of a light and simple nature upon which the performer could play while walking; the latter was probably more like our harp. The chief wind instruments are the halil (flute), shophar (horn), and hazzerah (trumpet). The flute was played in religious processions (1S 10⁵ 1 K 1⁴⁰ Isa 30²⁹). The horn (made at first of a ram's horn, sometimes later of metal) was used to summon the people to worship, or as a signal, or for special purposes, as e.g. to proclaim the year of Jubilee. The trumpet was a long instrument of silver, blown on ceremonial occasions by the priests (Nu 10²⁻¹⁰). It is the instrument portrayed on the Arch of Titus at Rome. There were also percussion instruments used, the chief of which were the toph (a small hand drum, Gn 31²⁷ 'tabret,') and cymbals both flat and conical (Ps 150⁵ Zech 14²⁰).

5. The Titles of the Psalms. The titles, or short inscriptions, found at the beginning of many psalms, are not to be regarded as forming a part of the sacred text, but they were prefixed at a very early date, and are very instructive. The exact meaning of each will be explained where it occurs, but a few general remarks may here be made. Titles occur chiefly in the first three books, and only thirty-four psalms are without any. These the Jews called 'orphaus.'

Some of the titles are musical directions, some suggest a historical setting for the psalm, and others indicate the authorship or the source from which it was taken. (The names Alamothe (46), Sheminith (6, 12), Neginoth (4), and Nehiloth (5), refer to the music; the first two probably indicating pitch, and the last two enjoining the particular instrumental accompaniments.) Several psalms, e.g. 9, 22, 45, etc., have some words prefixed which seem to indicate the tune of some well-known song to which the psalm was set. Prefixed to thirteen psalms are notes suggesting a suitable historical occasion for the psalm. All of them refer to the history of David, the majority being placed in the period of his flight from the jealousy of Saul. Many of them, however, are irreconcilable with the words of the psalms themselves, and are therefore unreliable as sources of information. At the same time, they often provide apt historical illustrations of thoughts and principles dwelt upon by the psalmists.

Many of the titles give hints of authorship or source. Seventy-three psalms are headed 'Le David,' which is translated 'Of David' in our versions. It is more correct to translate the preposition 'Belonging to'; and while many of the psalms bearing this title may be the productions of the shepherd king, all that is indicated by the title 'of David' is that the psalm to which it is prefixed was taken from an early collection called the Psalms of David or the Prayers of David (72²⁰). Similarly other psalms are distinguished as 'belonging to Asaph,' 'belonging to the Sons of Korah,' 'belonging to the Chief Musician,' these names being those of collections of sacred pieces which had been made at different times. The same preposition being used in all the cases, it is evident that it must be interpreted in the same sense of David and Asaph as of the Chief Musician and the Sons of Korah; and if in the latter cases it does not refer to authorship in the strict sense of the word, it can scarcely do so in the former. The view is now generally accepted that the titles for the most part refer to collections which had come to be known by certain familiar names, without its being implied that every psalm in a collection was written by the person whose name it bears. In the case of David, it is easy to understand how his honoured name came to be given to all the psalms in a particular collection, though he only wrote some of them. The 72nd Psalm is entitled 'of Solomon,' yet it is included among those that are styled 'prayers of David, the son of Jesse.' It was a rule among the Jews that a psalm without an author's name attached to it was to be ascribed to the author of the one immediately preceding. This shows how the name 'David' came to be given to the whole Psalter, as in Heb 4⁷.

6. Date and Authorship. What then may we infer as to the date and authorship of the several psalms? The belief that David wrote all the psalms to which his name is attached cannot now be maintained. Modern scholars differ widely in their estimate of the number of psalms which may safely be ascribed to him, some including over forty in the list, while others allow no more than three, and one or two admit none at all. While, however, it cannot be demonstrated that David wrote any of the psalms, the probability is that he wrote a number. The 18th Psalm is given at length in 2S 22 as well as in the Psalter, and in both cases a note is prefixed, setting forth that the psalm was written by David to celebrate his deliverance from his enemies, and especially from Saul. If we might build upon this statement it would give us firm ground on which to rest arguments concerning David's style and mode of composition. Considerable weight, too, is due to tradition, which is too strong and too persistent to be lightly set aside. The very fact that so many psalms were handed down to the compilers of the Psalter under David's name, is a very strong argument in favour of his authorship of a considerable number. It may be, indeed, that many psalms composed by him were modified and altered in some respects by later editors, in order to fit them for use in public worship and apply them to the circumstances of a later age; but tradition gives strong ground for believing that the 'sweet singer of Israel' was the author of songs of praise which are included in our book of Psalms. Critics of the moderate school ascribe to David Pss 3, 4, 7, 8, 15, 18, 23, 24, 32, as well as 19¹⁻⁶, with perhaps 101 and 110, and some others. It is possible, however, that most of those in the first book are Davidic in their original form. It is difficult on any other supposition to account for the facts that the earliest collection was called by his name, and that so many psalms were ascribed to him.

It is as impossible to fix the dates at which the various psalms were composed, as to settle the questions of authorship. Incidental allusions to place or circumstance will sometimes show the date earlier than which a particular psalm cannot have been written. References to the Temple (5⁷ 27⁴ 28² 65⁴, etc.) imply the existence of that centre of national worship; and the mention of 'the hill of God' (15¹ 24³, etc.) seems to indicate that the worship on Zion had been established for some time. It is evident again that some psalms must be dated as late as the exile (e.g. 137), and that others (e.g. 126) are post-exilic. Some scholars hold that many of the psalms must be dated as late as the Maccabean age. But while it is possible that some psalms belong to that period (e.g. 44, 74, 79, 83), it is not likely that the number is very great.

Readers may be reminded that the spiritual benefit of these inspired lyrics is not lessened by their detachment from a particular name and occasion. The Psalms should be studied in the light of eternal truth, and the local significance should be lost in the universal. Pre-eminently among the books of the OT. they are intended not for one age but for all time.

7. The Compilation of the Psalter. The book of Psalms, as we know it, was not made—it grew. A long history, partly obscure, partly traceable, and directed throughout by the guidance of the Divine Spirit, lies behind the final collection of these hundred and fifty sacred lyrics into one Psalter, for the use of Israel and the spiritual benefit of the world. The RV follows a very ancient Jewish tradition in dividing the whole into five books—Pss 1–41, 42–72, 73–89, 90–106, 107–150. This division is supposed to have been made in imitation of the five books of the Pentateuch. Each book closes with a doxology. But this arrangement of the Psalms, though dating from the 2nd cent. B.C., does not represent the earliest grouping. Closer examination shows that smaller collections existed in earlier times, and that these were gradually brought together and re-arranged on principles which we can only partially and with difficulty trace out. The note which closes the second book (72²⁰) shows that the psalms included in this collection were in some sense 'of David,' and that the writer of the note knew of no other Davidic psalms. We observe also that the same psalm occurs more than once in slightly differing forms: e.g. Ps 14 with 53, 40¹³⁻¹⁷ with 70, and 108 with 57⁷⁻¹¹ and 60⁵⁻¹². It will be seen that one feature of difference, in verses which are almost identical otherwise, is that different names of God are used. The sacred name Jehovah, the covenant name of Israel's God, is used in Book 1 272 times, while Elohim, a more general name for the Deity, occurs only 15 times. In Book 2 the proportion is reversed; in it Jehovah is found only 30 times, while Elohim is employed 164 times. This cannot have happened by chance, and the names Jehovistic and Elohistie have been given to indicate the prevalence of the two names respectively. The reason of this peculiarity is not perfectly clear. It is probably due to different editions, and perhaps shows that the respective names were prevalent at different periods.

The Psalter seems to have been formed very much as modern hymn-books are formed. The earliest collection would be the Davidic, of which a large part is preserved in Book 1, later collections would be those of Asaph and the sons of Korah. The psalms described in their titles as Mizmor (AV 'A Psalm') may have formed a collection by themselves selected from the earlier Psalters with additions. Later still would come the collection made by the Chief Musician, probably for the Temple worship after the exile; this again being selected from the earlier collections. Perhaps about the same time the Elohistie collection was made; that it was formed from earlier sources is shown by the fact that Ps 53 = Ps 14, and Ps 70 = Ps 40¹³⁻¹⁷; Jehovah, in the earlier version, being changed into Elohim in the later. Prof. Briggs thinks that the Psalter of the Chief Musician was formed in Palestine in the middle Greek period (3rd cent. B.C.), and that the Elohistie collection (partly preserved in Books 2 and 3) was made about the same time in Babylonia. Other groups of psalms of late date are the Songs of Ascents (Pss 120–134), a title which probably refers either to the 'going up' from Babylon to Jerusalem after the exile, or to the annual pilgrimage to the Temple to celebrate the feasts; and the Hallelujah Psalms, 104–107, 111–117, 135–136, 146–150. The editor of our Psalter, taking the principal collections as his basis, and adding to them such other psalms as were suitable for the Temple service of praise, formed them into a complete Book of Praises probably in the Maccabean age—the 2nd cent. B.C.

It is sometimes argued that the Psalms express not personal but national feelings and aspirations: that the 'I' of the Psalms represents not the writer but the Jewish nation. But while this may be the case in some psalms (e.g. 44, 76), especially those written in later times, it can scarcely be so in the great majority. These certainly express the desires and hopes of the faithful community, but it is because they first expressed the desires and hopes of individuals. They are natural and spontaneous, especially the Davidic Psalms. It is only later that the composition becomes more artificial, as in the case of the acrostic or alphabetical Psalms (e.g. 119, 145).

Allowing, then, for the measure of uncertainty surrounding the date and authorship of the Psalms, we may summarise the following conclusions: (1) The earliest date admissible for the composition of any psalm is the time of David, and in all probability some now extant may be ascribed to that king. (2) Additions to Hebrew psalmody were made during the period of the monarchy, several specimens of which are to be found in the Psalter: see Pss 2, 20, 21, 46, 48, etc. (3) A considerable part of the book of Psalms dates from the period immediately after the captivity, and about that time the process of collecting and arranging the Psalms was probably begun. (4) This process continued till the early part of the 2nd cent. B.C., when the Canon of the O.T. was virtually complete.

8. Religious Ideas. The Psalms are the outpouring of the spirit of devotion to God. It is to God that the Psalmist's thoughts and hopes are directed, to whom he looks for deliverance, or whom he blesses for personal or national mercies. The Psalms are full of expressions of trust in God at all times, and they contain glowing testimonies to the perfection of God, to His love, His power, His faithfulness, His righteousness. They are specially valuable to us as a mirror and mould of devotion. They show us the human heart laid before God in all its moods and emotions; in penitence, in desire for holiness, in doubt and perplexity, in danger, in desolation, or, again, in deliverance and triumph. The reader will always find something in the Psalms in sympathy with his own spiritual state. They are 'as comprehensive as the human soul and varied as human life; . . . they treat not life after the fashion of an age or people, but life in its rudiments.'

ity of the wicked with God's moral government of the world: cp. Intro. to Job. This problem is handled at length in Pss 37 and 73. In the former psalm the solution reached is the somewhat superficial one that the success of the wicked is but temporary, and that the righteous will soon come to his own. In the latter the writer goes deeper. His faith had been severely tried by his experiences, but when he cast his burden on the Lord, as he worshipped in the sanctuary, he received new light in his darkness, and was enabled to leave the issues of the future with God. The one unfailing truth which comforted the Psalmists was 'The Lord reigneth.' Evil may endure for a time, and the wicked may oppress the just, but 'He that sitteth in the heavens will laugh' at them, and wait His opportunity to deliver His servants. There is nothing more noticeable in the Psalms than this triumphant faith in God's overruling power—a faith which neither personal nor national misfortune was able to destroy.

This is one aspect of the Psalmists' doctrine of God: another aspect of it is found in the divine relation to nature. Everything in nature speaks of God's power and glory. 'The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament sheweth His handiwork.' The Hebrew poets have no pleasure in nature for her own sake; they value her only as she speaks of the invisible presence of God. If they regard the earth, they view it as the footstool of the Lord; if they see the clouds gathering, they speak of them as the curtains for Jehovah's pavilion: if they listen to the thunder rolling, they hear in it 'the voice of the Lord upon the waters'; if they watch the lightning flashing, they think of it as 'the arrows of the most High.' It is, however, the transcendence rather than the immanence of God that is the thought of the Psalmists' minds: while He uses nature to make known His presence and power, He is high above it (cp. Pss 18, 19, 29, 93).

Another point that may be noticed is the attitude of the Psalmists to ritual and sacrifice. There are frequent references in the Psalms to the Temple worship and sacrifices. The Psalmists declare their intention of offering burnt offerings and paying their vows in the presence of all the people (e.g. 66¹³⁻¹⁵ 116^{14,17}). The spiritual aspect of the ritual is, however, the most prominent in the Psalmists' thoughts. They know that offerings are insufficient of themselves, and that they are only valuable in so far as they typify the 'living sacrifice' of self, which every true worshipper must offer. Indeed, if that sacrifice be offered, the material offering is unnecessary (cp. Ps 40⁸⁻⁹ 50⁷⁻¹⁵). In Ps 51 the writer at one moment declares that sacrifice and burnt offering are not desired by God; 'the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit' (51^{16, 17}); and immediately afterwards declares that only when the walls of Jerusalem are rebuilt can sacrifice be acceptable to Jehovah (51^{18, 19}). It is probable that the latter vv. are a later liturgical addition; but, even so, the whole psalm was used without any sense of incongruity.

Another feature of the Psalms is their intense patriotism. Patriotism and religion were inseparably associated by the Hebrews. That God was good to Israel was the first article of their creed. The historical Psalms developed this idea, and illustrate it from the national history (e.g. Pss 104, 105, 106). His blessings were destined to teach them His ways, and make His mighty power known to them (106⁸). Even His punishment was for their good, to renew them to repentance and bring them to realise the greatness of their privilege (106^{13, 14}, etc.). The purpose of God in choosing Israel was that they might extend His Kingdom. Sometimes, indeed, 'the heathen' or 'the nations' are regarded as God's enemies (21, etc.); but at other times they are looked upon as the witnesses of the Psalmists' praise (57⁹), and even as God's people (47⁹). God's mercy is given to Israel that they make His way known upon the earth, and His saving health among all nations (67^{1, 7}). But, above all, Israel is His peculiar people (73¹); their enemies are His enemies; misfortunes to them are hindrances to His cause; their success is His triumph.

In this lies the explanation of two features of this book which call for comment—the self-righteousness of the Psalmists, and their vindictive resentment against their enemies. Let us remember at the outset the distinction between the OT. and NT. standards in this matter. We must not expect to find in the OT. the humility arising from the deep sense of sin, or the meek, forgiving spirit, inculcated by the Lord Jesus Christ. To judge the Psalmists by these standards is unfair, and the attempt to explain away the plain meaning of their words, in order to palliate a moral fault, is unsound exegesis. None the less it is possible, within limits, to defend the position taken up in what are called the imprecatory Psalms (e.g. 58, 68, 69, 109) without doing violence to sound ethical standards. The Psalmist claimed to be 'holy' and 'perfect,' without implying all that we mean by those lofty words. He meant that he was striving to be upright, a man of integrity, mindful of the claims of God upon him according to the law, and to the best of his ability endeavouring to be faithful to duty. He was placed, however, in the midst of men animated by entirely different motives; some of them openly and violently opposed to the God of Israel and His worship, others nominally acknowledging Him, but in reality idolaters, or disloyal to Jehovah. The contrast between the faithful and the unfaithful was sharp and strong; the former were always in a minority, they usually suffered cruel persecution, and were often in extremest peril. Under these circumstances it is easy to understand that the Psalmist felt entitled to identify himself with the cause of righteousness. He pleads for his own personal triumph, and the utter overthrow of his enemies, with a passionate earnestness, which is only warrantable in the light of the words, 'Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate Thee? and am not I grieved with those that rise up against Thee? I hate them with perfect hatred, I count them mine enemies.' Not to hate the enemies of Jehovah is to be a traitor to His holy covenant.

The distinction familiar to us between hating the sin and being angry with the sinner, and the possibility of loving the offender with a desire to save him, were not present to the mind of the Psalmist. Evil and evil-doer were for him identical, and in this respect he stands upon a lower ethical plane than the Christian. Further, the forms of imprecation common in the Psalms belong to an earlier, a sterner, and more violent age than ours. Such horrible curses as are invoked in Ps 109⁶⁻¹⁵ are, rightly, shocking in our ears. But this moral inferiority of the earlier dispensation once granted, no true Christian can afford in a Pharisaical spirit to look down upon these faithful men to whom the light of the gospel had not been granted. Rather should we ask ourselves what is to be learned from denunciations in which Christians are forbidden to indulge. Personal resentment is always unlawful to the man who takes the Sermon on the Mount as his guide; but there is a stern hatred of evil manifest in the Psalms which is only too rare in later and more indulgent days. The Puritan strain in our national character is to some extent a reflexion of the spirit of whole-hearted and indignant righteousness which breathes in the denunciatory Psalms; and, despite the hardness and narrowness too often associated with it, that spirit has proved of the utmost value in its uncompromising protest against prevalent evils in social and national life.

Another fact must be borne in mind, if we would fully understand the reasons for the strong denunciatory element found in the Psalms. To the Jew no clear revelation had been granted of a future life; his horizon was, for the most part, limited by the present. The true Israelite did, in a sense, look to the future. He hoped for a numerous posterity as a mark of God's favour, he anticipated a better state of things for his nation and the world in the coming of the Messiah, and he certainly did not regard death as virtual annihilation. But he had no clear hope of immortality, no vision of a heaven as a state of future blessedness; neither the law nor the prophets warranted any such outlook beyond the grave. It followed that the cause of truth and right must be vindicated here and now, or it could not, properly speaking, be vindicated at all. This at least was the attitude for the most part taken up by the orthodox Jew, and there was much to be said in its favour. It is easy for religious men of to-day, living in a land of freedom and amidst all the blessings of peace, and taught to expect a Day of Judgment in the future, when all earth's wrongs shall be completely redressed, to possess their souls in patience, and wait for the coming of the Day of God and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness. But the problems of life pressed much more grievously upon the saint of old time, crushed by brute force, oppressed under a cruel and relentless Oriental despotism, with no earthly hope of redress, and no clear prospect of a better life to come. No wonder if such men prayed with a certain fierce indignation of soul, 'Up, Lord, and let not man have the upper hand; let the heathen be judged in thy sight, that the nations may know themselves to be but men.'

But, it will be asked, had the Jew then no hope of immortality for himself, and is not the 16th Psalm a prophecy of the resurrection of Christ, as it is more than once declared to be in the NT.? The subject thus opened up cannot be adequately dealt with in a few sentences, and scholars have differed in their judgment upon it. The view taken by the present writer may be thus briefly expressed. No explicit revelation of a future life was given to the Jew, and no definite expectation of a future state of rewards and punishments entered into his ordinary view of life. But the truly devout Israelite possessed so clear and strong a sense of religion, so firm a hold by faith upon the living God, that he was enabled sometimes to transcend the conditions of his ordinary religious creed and reach a state of joyful personal confidence of a very lofty kind. These moments of insight and foresight were, however, comparatively few; the glimpses thus gained were transient, they belonged to the individual only, and could not furnish a basis for definite dogmatic teaching. Thus Job believed that his Redeemer would at the last appear and vindicate his cause upon the earth, though he had no light upon the time and manner of such manifestation, and the confidence expressed in Job 19²⁵⁻²⁷ is the expression of an exalted mood which subsequent chapters prove not to have been permanent.

Similarly it will be found that some passages in the Psalms, such as 65³ 30⁹ 88¹⁰⁻¹² are full of gloomy foreboding concerning the future state. They describe it as a condition of helplessness and forgetfulness, which hardly deserves the name of life at all. There are other passages, however, of which 16⁹⁻¹¹ 17¹⁵ 49¹⁵ 73^{24,25} are examples, in which the Psalmist's assurance of the care and favour of God is such that he appears to triumph not only over the dangers and vicissitudes of the present life, but over the fear of death itself. It is quite true that these hopes are not very clearly expressed, and that some commentators have questioned whether they contain an assured belief in immortality. But St. Peter's quotation from the 16th Psalm on the day of Pentecost shows that the words suggested a hope of immortality which was fully realised in the Resurrection of Christ. We may well find in the 16th and 73rd Psalms another illustration of the argument which the Lord Jesus Christ drew from the phrase 'The God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob.' He is not the God of the dead, but of the living; and the Psalmists, who had God for their portion in this life, entertained a trust and confidence in God which at intervals blossomed into incipient hope that He who was not ashamed to be called their God would preserve them in life, in death and for ever.

The Messianic hope has been spoken of, and certain Psalms—2, 8, 16, 22, 45, 72, 110, and others—have been specifically styled Messianic Psalms. But here a distinction must be made. The word Messianic may be used either in the narrower sense of prophecies which contain a distinct reference to a personal Deliverer called the Messiah, or in a wider sense of predictions of great and glorious blessings to be enjoyed by the nation in a brighter and better age to come. Often without any reference to a personal Messiah, prophets and psalmists are found confidently anticipating a Day of God, when He shall appear in righteous judgment and shall manifest His glory among men. A little group of Psalms, of which 96-98 form the nucleus, may be described as Messianic, because they anticipate a theophany, a manifestation of God in the earth. They contemplate a period when in some sense God shall 'come and not keep silence,' when 'He cometh to judge the world with righteousness and the peoples with equity.' The mode in which this is to be carried out is left indefinite, but the hope is invincible and inextinguishable. In the 2nd and 72nd Psalms a righteous earthly ruler of the house and dynasty of David is celebrated; in Ps 110 the advent of a Priest-King is heralded, and the author of the Psalm looks to the Anointed One who is to rule in Zion, not as his son, but as his Lord. It would be a mistake, however, to restrict the conception of the Messianic hope to passages in which a personal Messiah is foretold. The 22nd Psalm, for example, is in its earlier portion clearly descriptive of the sufferings of the persecuted but faithful servant of God, and its language is frequently quoted in NT. in reference to Christ. But it contains no reference to the personal triumph of the sufferer, whilst the latter part of the Psalm points unquestionably to a great victory over unrighteousness, which is to be gained after and by means of his patient fidelity. The promise is here repeated which elsewhere is given in noble and more explicit words, 'He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied.'

The subject of the relation of the Psalms to Christ, and the fulfilment in the New Testament of hints and prophecies contained in the Old, is too large to be entered on here. It may suffice, however, to say that one simple key will open many otherwise difficult locks. Christ claimed in Lk 24⁴⁴ that many things were written 'in the psalms' concerning Him.

St. Peter, in Ac 2, shows how this saying is to be understood. Words, which were true only in a secondary and imperfect sense of David as the writer of the 16th Psalm, received their complete and perfect illustration in the resurrection from the dead of David's greater Son. The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. The writers of the Psalms, like their brethren who are specifically called prophets, were inspired to write words true, indeed, of themselves and their contemporaries, but perfectly fulfilled only in Him of whom Moses in the Law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, Son of Man and Son of God, the hope of the Psalmists and the Saviour of the world.

The Prayer-Book version of the Psalms was taken in 1549 from the English version of the Bible called the 'great Bible,' which was issued in 1540, and set up to be read in churches. In 1661, when the Prayer Book was revised, other portions of Scripture in the Prayer Book were changed for the AV of 1611. But the Psalter was not altered. People were accustomed to its wording, and it was thought to be more suitable for singing.

BOOK 1 (PSALMS 1-41)

The Pss. in this book are probably among the earliest in the Psalter, and include most of those generally regarded as Davidic. They seem to have existed separately as an early hymn-book, which, with some slight additions from the final editor, was used as the nucleus of the entire collection. They have two well-marked characteristics: (1) the constant use of the name Jehovah (rendered the Lord), and the comparative absence of the name God (Heb. Elohim); the former occurring 272 times, the latter only 15 times: and (2) the description of them all, with the exception of Pss 1, 2, 10, and 33, as 'of David' (Heb. Le David), a fact which has been taken to indicate their derivation from a still earlier collection which bore David's name. The first two Pss. seem to have been prefixed to the others when the present Psalter was formed. Historical notices are attached to some of them, connecting them with the life of David, but these are of doubtful importance. Most of the Pss. contained in the book are spontaneous and unaffected in their style, but a few of them are of artificial construction, Pss 9, 10, 25, 34, and 37 being acrostics.

The contents are exceedingly varied, and the same Ps. sometimes expresses such diverse feelings as joy and sorrow, bitter disappointment and lofty aspiration. Usually, however, there is some great thought more or less prominent, which enables us to make the following rough classification of their subjects:—(a) the contrast between the righteous and the wicked, 1, 5, 10, 37; (b) the cry of the righteous in presence of trouble, 3, 4, 6, 7, 12, 13, 22, 31, 38, 39, 40; (c) the glory of God in nature, 8, 19, 29; (d) the law, 1, 19; (e) the king, 2, 18, 20, 21; (f) the future life, 16. In addition, there is a reference to sacrifice in Ps 37, an allusion to the Temple services in Ps 24, and a foreshadowing of the Messianic hope in Pss 2, 20, 28, and 40. The following Pss. are either quoted from or distinctly referred to in NT.: 2, 4, 5, 8, 10, 14, 16, 18, 22, 23, 32, 34, 40, 41. In several instances the NT. writer finds the fulfilment of the OT. passage in Christ. Thus Ps 2, with its defence of Jehovah's righteous King, of whom He says, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten Thee,' is regarded as descriptive of Christ in Ac 13³³ and Heb 1⁵ 5⁶; and Ps 22, with its pathetic presentment of the suffering Servant of Jehovah, is reported to have been actually quoted by Christ upon the cross (Mt 27³¹ Mk 15³⁴), and v. 18 is asserted in Jn 19²⁴ to have been literally fulfilled in one of the incidents of His crucifixion.

The moral teaching of this first book of Psalms is simple and emphatic. It rests upon an unswerving belief in the will and power of God to uphold the moral values of life, and mete out punishments and rewards according to personal desert. In whatever circumstances they may be placed, the writers never lose hold of their conviction of the ultimate prosperity of the righteous and destruction of the wicked. Appearances may seem to contradict their faith, but they cling to it all the more strenuously, and insist that in the long run the balance will be redressed. The ideal character portrayed by them is that of the good man, defamed, wronged, and oppressed by irreligious foes, but holding fast his faith in God, and trusting confidently that, in His own good time, He will deliver him. Sometimes there is a note of joy and thankfulness at the accomplishment of the deliverance; and this leads on to the anticipation of a time when, throughout the whole world, the justice of God will be manifested, and His power felt.

PSALM 1

This Ps. forms an appropriate introduction to the whole Psalter. In some Hebrew MSS it is not numbered with the Psalms, but stands before them as a prologue, and in others it is combined with Ps 2. It is one of the 'orphan' psalms, and the want of a title indicates that it did not originally belong to the Davidic collection, 3-41. The subject of the Ps. is the blessedness of the righteous man who studies the Law of Jehovah, as contrasted with the unhappy end of the ungodly. It consists of two strophes, vv. 1-3 and vv. 4-6, the former describing the character and destiny of the righteous, and the latter the character and destiny of the wicked.

1. Blessed] RM 'happy.' The first of the Old Testament boatitudes. Walketh not] There seems a gradual progression intended in the three clauses of the v.: walk, stand, sit, and wicked, sinner, scoffer. 2. Law] the whole revelation of God's will as made known in the sacred writings, especially the Pentateuch.

Doth . . meditate] lit. 'crooneth over,' repeats again and again in a low tone.

3. And he shall be] better, 'for he becomes,' i.e. in consequence of his constant study of God's law. Like a tree, etc.] cp. Jer 17^{7,8}, where the illustration is more fully developed, and the character of the wicked is similarly illustrated (17^{5,6}); and Ezk 47¹². And whatsoever, etc.] The illustration is dropped at this stage, and the words apply to the righteous man. Shall prosper] the simple faith of the pious Israelite, which no adversity was able wholly to overcome: cp. Ps 112 and see Ps 37, where the problem of the suffering of the righteous perplexes another Psalmist.

4. Chaff] A common OT. type of the wicked: cp 35⁵. Threshing-floors were usually on high ground, where the wind would easily catch the chaff when it was beaten from the corn and drive it away (Isa 17¹³). Driveth away] PBV adds, 'from the face of the earth,' following LXX and Vulgate. 5. The judgment] every visitation of God's providence, or perhaps the final judgment. Congregation] the faithful people of Israel.

PSALM 2

The historical situation of this Ps. cannot now be recovered. It may refer to some threatened rebellion of subject kings in the early days of Solomon, or to some similar movement under one of the later kings; but it is impossible to give it any precise date. This, however, is of the less importance, as the leading feature of the Ps. is its application to the Messianic King—the ideal ruler of Israel. Some writers deny that it had any historical setting, and hold that it refers exclusively to the ideal King, the viceroy of Jehovah. As one of the Messianic Ps. it is appropriately used on Easter Day. It is divided into four strophes or verses, and is a dramatic poem, different speakers being introduced. The divisions are, vv. 1-3, 4-6, 7-9, 10-12. In the first two strophes the Psalmist is the speaker; in the last two the King. (1-3) The poet views the nations plotting against Jehovah and His representative, the Messianic King; (4-6) but remembering the power and majesty of God, he sees a speedy end to their devices. (7-9) Then the King is introduced relating Jehovah's decree and promise of sovereignty over all nations, and (10-12) bidding the rebellious kinglets therefore be warned in time and repent.

1. The heathen] RV 'the nations,' i.e. the Gentile or non-Jewish peoples. Rage] better, 'plot together.' 2. Against the LORD] In rebelling against Jehovah's anointed King they were rebelling against Jehovah Himself.

3. Bands] The words of the kings are of course metaphorical; they were seeking to cast off what was to them a foreign yoke.

4. The contrast between Jehovah in His majesty and the puny plotters is dramatically introduced. 5. Then] i.e. when the plot ripens into action. 6. Yet] lit. 'and.' Upon my holy hill of Zion] Zion is the eastern hill of ancient Jerusalem on which the 'city of David' with its stronghold was built; it is used poetically for Jerusalem the holy city: cp. Isa 64¹⁰.

7. The Messianic King now speaks, quoting the promise given to David, the father of the dynasty, through Nathan the prophet: see 2S 7¹⁻¹⁷. Thou art my Son; this day, etc.] on the day of his anointing, when he was set apart to his high office. But some refer it to the day of his birth. In any case the king was adopted as the son of God, reigning in His name over His people (cp. Ac 13³³ Heb 1⁵ 5⁵). 9. A rod of iron] because they are rebels who can only be restrained by repressive methods.

10. Be wise] The obvious lesson from the truths stated in the preceding vv.

12. Kiss the Son] This is a difficult passage. The translation of the AV is only got by assuming that the Psalmist has chosen the Aramaic word for 'Son' instead of the Hebrew. LXX renders, 'Lay hold of instruction,' which is in harmony with the general drift of the passage, and is supported by the Targum. Others translate 'Kiss' (i.e. worship or serve) 'with sincerity.' The doubt does not affect the teaching of the Ps. as a whole. From the way] RV 'in the way.' When his wrath, etc.] better, 'For soon His wrath will burn.' Blessed are all they, etc.] This is either a pious reflexion of the Psalmist at the end of the words put into the mouth of the King; or, as Prof. Briggs holds, a liturgical addition suitable when the Ps. was used in worship.

PSALM 3

This is the first of the 'Davidic' Psalms. It is a morning prayer as v. 6 suggests. The heading of the Ps. provides a historical setting for it in the revolt of Absalom, and it is the only Ps. specifically dated at that time. There are many features in that revolt (2S16-18) which suit the circumstances to which the Psalmist refers. He speaks of the increasing number of his enemies (ep. 2S17¹¹), of the contempt in which many held him (ep. 2S16⁷⁻¹⁰), of the danger in which he lay (ep. 2S17²), and of his preservation by Jehovah (ep. 2S17¹⁴). The Ps. contains the Psalmist's description of his foes (1, 2); his inward assurance of God's help (3, 4); his statement of his present experience (5, 6); and his prayer for complete deliverance and national blessing (7, 8).

1. Increased] ep. 2S15^{12,13}. 2. Of my soul] i.e. of myself. 3. A shield] a natural metaphor in days when kings were warriors: cp. 18² 84^{9,11} 115⁹, etc. 4. Out of his holy hill] i.e. Zion, the seat of Jehovah's worship, where in a special sense He was present. The Psalmist was probably at a distance from Jerusalem. Selah] This word is found 71 times in the Psalter. It occurs in 40 Pss., as well as three times in Hab3, which is also a Ps. Its meaning and use are both uncertain. Possibly it is derived from a root, meaning to 'lift up.' LXX translates it 'interlude,' while the Jewish tradition renders it 'for ever.' (1) Some think that it is an instruction to the musicians to 'strike up' with an interlude during an interval of the singing. (2) Prof. Briggs suggests that the LXX and Jewish renderings are really two aspects of the same thing: the former ('interlude') denoting the point where the benediction might be sung and the Ps. concluded for that service; while the latter ('for ever') gives the last word of the benediction, which would indicate the same thing. (3) Taking another derivation (from sallem, 'supplement'), others conjecture that the note may indicate the point at which the MS has to be, or has been, supplemented from another MS. It is best, perhaps, just to regard it generally as a 'musical interlude.'

5. I laid me down, etc.] His very sleep, natural as it was, was a proof of God's care, for he might have slept the sleep of death.

Sustained] RV 'sustaineth,' suggesting continual oversight. 7. Arise, O LORD] The ancient marching-song of the Hebrew host began with these words (Nu10³⁵). 8. Salvation belongeth unto the LORD] A triumphant assertion of what the adversaries denied in v. 2. Thy blessing is] RV 'thy blessing be' upon the people as upon their leader. Selah] see on v. 4.

PSALM 4

This is an evening hymn, and though no occasion is mentioned it may perhaps be referred, like Ps3 (its natural companion), to the time of Absalom's revolt, but to a somewhat later stage in the course of events, when the peril had largely passed away. It contains David's appeal to God (v. 1), his appeal to his enemies (vv. 2-5), and his own resolve (vv. 6-8).

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician; on stringed instruments (Neginoth).'

1. God of my righteousness] The God who is on the side of the Psalmist's righteous cause. Enlarged me] RV 'set me at large.'

2. Sons of men] in contrast with God, who is addressed in v. 1. How long will ye turn, etc.] RV 'how long shall my glory be turned,' etc. Leasing] RV 'falsehood.' 3. But know] introduces the truth which the Psalmist's enemies ignored. 4. Stand in awe] LXX renders, 'Be ye angry,' and is followed by St. Paul in Eph4²⁰. Be still] cease your striving after vanity. Selah] see on 3⁴.

5. Sacrifices of righteousness] sacrifices accompanied by right conduct, offered in a right spirit, and so acceptable to God. Perhaps there may be a reference to the insincere sacrifices of 2S15¹².

6. There be many] possibly in allusion to the discontented people whom Absalom sought to win by fair promises (2S15⁴). LORD, lift thou up] a striking transition from the vain quests of men to the one source of the chief good. The light of thy countenance] favour, such as earthly kings express by a smiling face: see Nu6²⁶ Ps80^{8,7,10}. 7. More than in the time] RV 'more than they have when,' etc. 'They' seems to refer to the enemies of the writer. He in his hardships is happier than they in their plenty: the peace of God is better than the mirth of harvest. 8. The note of evensong. Read, 'In peace will I both lay me down and sleep.' The whole night's rest is peaceful, because God, the only source of protection, is on the Psalmist's side.

PSALM 5

This is a morning prayer before going to the sanctuary. The chief difficulty in ascribing it to David lies in the reference (v. 7) to 'thy holy temple.' The word means a 'palace,' and is not strictly applicable to the tent which David provided for the ark (2S6¹⁷). But it was used of the sanctuary at Shiloh (1S1⁹), and may have been poetically transferred to David's humbler tent; or it may be figuratively employed to denote the heavenly temple. The Psalmist appeals to God for hearing (vv. 1-3), contrasts the exclusion of the wicked from God's presence with his own access (vv. 4-7), asks for guidance in the midst of his enemies (vv. 8, 9), and prays for their overthrow and for the triumph of the righteous (vv. 10-12).

Title.—Nehiloth] The RM gives 'wind instruments.'

1. My meditation] the thoughtful desire of the heart which hardly finds expression in words. It is in contrast with the 'cry' of v. 2.

2. My King] If the writer is David he forgets his own royalty in the presence of the heavenly King. Will I pray] RV 'do I pray.'

3. In the morning] emphatic and twice repeated. Direct] RV 'order,' arrange, perhaps, as a sacrifice (Gn 22⁹ Lv 17⁸). But see Job 23⁴ 32¹⁴ 33⁵ 37¹⁹. Look up] RV 'keep watch' for an answer.

4. Neither shall evil dwell] RM 'the evil man shall not sojourn.' 5. Foolish] RV 'arrogant.' Stand in thy sight] endure the holiness of thy presence. 6. Leasing] RV 'lies.' Will abhor the bloody] RV 'abhorreth the bloodthirsty.'

7. The two features of access to God are (1) God's grace, and (2) the worshipper's reverence. Toward] The worshipper in the Temple court prostrated himself towards the sanctuary.

8. Straight] RV 'plain,' level, easy to walk in. 9. The heart and the speech of the wicked are alike corrupt. See Ro 3¹⁸, where this v. is quoted. The throat of the flatterer is compared to an open grave, ever clamouring for fresh victims—a very suggestive figure.

10. Destroy . . . them] RV 'hold them guilty.' Against thee] The Psalmist identifies God's cause with his own. 11. Love thy name] thy revealed character. A name comes to be the equivalent of all that we know about the person who bears it: cp. 'Hallowed be Thy name.'

PSALM 6

This is the first of the Penitential Psalms, the others being Ps 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143. It is the prayer of a sufferer whose experience is like that of Job. He is prostrated by severe illness, and is even in danger of death, while the mockery of his enemies makes his trouble the harder to bear. He entreats earnestly that God may deliver him (vv. 1-7), and rises to a sudden confidence that his prayer has been heard and that his enemies will be put to shame (vv. 8-10). An Ash Wednesday Psalm.

Title.—On Neginoth upon Sheminith] RV 'on stringed instruments, set to the Sheminith (lower octave).'

1. Rebuke . . . chasten] the two aspects of affliction—the one being for punishment and the other for discipline; the one proceeding from displeasure and the other from love.

2. Weak] RV 'withered away': see Ps 102¹¹. My bones] the innermost framework of my body. Vexed] used here of physical pain, and in the next v. of mental anguish: cp. Ps 2⁵. 3. My soul . . . also] The bodily pain has produced distress of spirit. There is an echo of these words in Jn 12²⁷. O LORD, how long?] The broken sentence is more expressive than if it had been completed: see Ps 90¹³.

5. The grave] RV 'Sheol,' the shadowy abode of the dead. In the OT. time there was no clear expectation of immortality in the sense of a happy future life. 6. All the night] RV 'every night.' 7. Mine eye is consumed] The sunken eye is a sure token of bodily anguish or mental distress.

10. Read, 'All mine enemies shall be ashamed . . . they shall turn back, they shall be ashamed suddenly.'

PSALM 7

This Ps. is an appeal to God as the righteous Judge against an ungrateful and vindictive enemy. Nothing is known of Cush the Benjamite, but the case of Shimei affords a parallel to the circumstances here referred to (2S18²¹). The absence of any Scripture mention of Cush makes it all the more probable that the title of this Ps. is genuine, and not invented. The Psalmist asserts his own innocence (vv. 1-6), calls on God, the righteous Judge of all the earth, to exercise His power against evil-doers (vv. 7-13), and describes how the malice of the wicked works its own defeat (vv. 14-17).

Title.—Shiggaion] perhaps, 'a wandering (i.e. changeful) melody.'

3. If I have done this] with which Cush charged him. See further in v. 4. 4. The second clause may be read without the parenthesis, 'or despoiled him that without cause was mine adversary.' 5. Take] RV 'overtake.' Mine honour] RV 'my glory,' an equivalent for 'soul' and 'life' in the previous parallel clauses. Selah] see on 3⁴. 6. Awake for me] a daring figure, as if God's delay had been due to sleep. To the judgment that, etc.] RV 'thou hast commanded judgment,' i.e. exercised the justice of which Thou art the source.

7. So shall, etc.] RV 'and let,' etc. People] RV 'peoples.' So in v. 8. An assize of all the nations is pictured. For their sakes, etc.] RV 'over them return thou on high,' or 'sit thou above them,' i.e. in judgment. 8. Shall judge] RV 'ministereth judgment to.' 9. Just] RV 'righteous,' the same epithet which is applied to God. The hearts and reins] the whole inner life. The reins are the kidneys, and are spoken of like the heart, the bowels, and the internal organs generally, as the seat of thought and feeling.

11. Read, 'God is a righteous judge, yea, a God that hath indignation every day.' 12. Read, 'If a man turn not He (God) will whet,' etc.

13. He ordaineth, etc.] RV 'He maketh his arrows fiery shafts.' The sense is parallel with the last clause of v. 12.

14. There is a transition at this point from God to the wicked man. 15. He made] RV 'he hath made.' The evil he planned for others comes on himself. 16. another figure for the same thing. Mischievous is like a stone thrown up, which falls back upon the thrower's head. Pate] Old English for 'head.' 17. All that has been said illustrates the righteousness of the Lord, which is accordingly the ground of this concluding ascription of praise.

PSALM 8

This Ps. is a poem of wondering praise, called forth by the thought of the supremacy and honour that God has given to man, who in himself holds such an insignificant place in the universe. The glory of the heavens and the variety of the works of nature combine to emphasise the marvel of this choice. The Ps. is based upon the story of creation (Gn 1²⁶⁻²⁸), and sets forth the ideal dignity of man. V. 6 is applied in 1 Cor 15²⁷ Eph 1²² to the exaltation of Christ, in whom alone the ideal is realised. In Heb 2⁶⁻⁸ the same thought is expressed in another way, man's failure to attain to full dominion being contrasted with the supremacy Christ has won. The Ps. is used on Ascension Day.

Title.—Upon Gittith] RV 'set to the Gittith' (perhaps an instrument, or tune, of Gath).

1. O LORD our Lord] lit. 'Jehovah, our Lord.' So in v. 9. Thy name] see on Ps 5¹¹.

Above] RV 'upon.' The glory of God is stamped or impressed on the visible universe.

2. Babes and sucklings] a figure for men in their weakness and ignorance. The words are quoted by our Lord in a more literal sense (Mt 21¹⁶). Ordained strength] RV 'established strength,' laid a foundation for Thy great work. LXX has 'perfected praise,' and our Lord follows this version in the quotation just mentioned. Because of thine enemies, etc.] God's use of feeble instruments to display His glory puts His adversaries to silence: see 1 Cor 1²⁷⁻²⁹.

3. The work of thy fingers] The wisdom and skill of the Creator are thus poetically expressed. The moon and the stars] It is the glory of the sky by night which is before the writer's mind. The discoveries of astronomy only make the conceptions of the Ps. more impressive. 4. What is man] The word rendered 'man' means 'frail man'—humanity in all its weakness and limitation. The son of man] the human race. The expression is a simple variant, and is exactly equivalent to 'man' in the former clause. Visitest] with loving care and remembrance.

5. A little lower than the angels] RV 'but a little lower than God.' 'A little less than divine' would represent the meaning. Man, the only creature made in God's image, stands nearest to Him in the ranks of the universe. Philosophy and science are at one with Scripture in placing man at the top of the scale of creation. 6. All things under his feet] A reference to Gn 1²⁶⁻²⁸: applied to Christ, 1 Cor 15²⁷ Heb 2⁶⁻⁸.

PSALM 9

Pss 9 and 10 are combined in LXX, and there is certainly a real, though obscure, relationship between them. The two together form one 'acrostic,' the vv. beginning with the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet, though in both Pss. there is a gap in the arrangement. The subject matter of the two Pss., however, does not suggest that we have in them the two halves of what was originally a single Ps. Ps 9 is distinctly national and Ps 10 as distinctly personal, and though both may be by the same author, the problem of their connexion must be left unsolved.

Ps 9 is the song of a king who has gained a victory over a foreign enemy, and finds in this a proof of God's righteous rule over the whole earth—a rule which he prays may be yet more fully displayed. Only in vv. 13, 14 is the note of personal affliction and need to be heard.

Title.—Upon Muth-labben] 'Muth-labben' means 'Death to the son,' and probably indicates some well-known song, to the tune of which the Ps. was directed to be sung.

3. They shall fall] RV 'they stumble.'

4. Judging right] RV 'judging righteously.'

5. Heathen] RV 'nations.' So in vv. 15,

19. 6. RV 'The enemy are come to an end, they are desolate for ever: and the cities which thou hast overthrown, their very memorial is perished.' The words are still part of the prayer to Jehovah. Faith in God demands complete deliverance. 7. Shall endure] RV 'sitteth as king.' The eternal rule of God contrasted with the passing powers of earth.

8. People] RV 'peoples.' 10. Thy name] see on 5¹¹.

11. Which dwelleth in Zion] Jerusalem, and especially the hill of Zion, was regarded as the earthly throne of God, after David had placed the ark there: see 76² 132¹⁸. 12. RV 'For he that maketh inquisition for blood remembereth them.' God is represented as the avenger of blood (Gn 9⁵). Humble] RV 'poor' or meek. One of a group of words which in OT. have at first an outward and then a more spiritual sense, tho chief sufferers from want and oppression being often God's true people.

13, 14. This personal cry of distress seems to break the connexion rather abruptly. Possibly we should read, 'The Lord has had mercy... he has considered my trouble.' The gates of death] the extremity of affliction.

The gates of the daughter of Zion] 'The daughter of Zion' is a figure for Jerusalem: see Isa 1⁸ Lam 2²⁵ Ps 45¹² 137⁸. The gates of an Eastern city were its most public and busy spots. The throng of life is thus contrasted with the solitude and dreariness of 'the gates of death' in v. 13.

16. RV 'The Lord hath made himself known, he hath executed judgment.' Higgsion] a musical term applied only here. It occurs in the text of 92³, and probably means something like our forte. Selah] see on 3⁴. 'Higgsion. Selah' together may mean fortissimo. 17. Be turned into hell] RV 'return to Sheol,' the place of the dead, not regarded specially as a place of torment. 'Return' seems strictly to apply to the body, which goes back to the dust whence it was taken: cp. Gn 3¹⁹ Ps 90³ 104²⁹.

18. Needy] Another of the group of words referred to in the note on v. 12. Poor] The same word as in v. 12. 19. Man] The word means 'frail man,' as in 8.

This Ps. has no title. Its relationship to Ps 9 has been discussed in intro. to that Ps. It reflects a time of great social disorder, in which wickedness and violence are rampant, and the righteous are sorely oppressed. It falls roughly into two parts. The wrongs which call for redress are described (vv. 1-11) and God's interposition is invoked (vv. 12-18).

1. God seems to be ignorant of what is taking place, or indifferent to it. The Psalmist, however, does not really believe this, or he would not appeal to God at all. 2^b. RM 'They (the poor) are taken in the devices that they (the wicked) have imagined.' 3. And blesseth the covetous, etc.] RV 'And the covetous renounceth, yea, contemneth the Lord.' 4. Will not seek, etc.] RV 'saith, He (God) will not require it': see v. 13. God is not, etc.] RV 'all his thoughts are, There is no God.' 5. Always grievous] RV 'firm at all times.' He seems to prosper in all his plans. Puffeth] in scorn and contempt.

7. Fraud] RV 'oppression.' Vanity] RV 'iniquity.' Part of this v. is quoted in Ro 3¹⁴ as a description of human depravity in general.

8. The brigand life here described has never been uncommon in Eastern lands, and the picture given is by no means metaphorical: see Prov 1¹⁰⁻¹⁸. Poor] RV 'helpless,' RM 'hapless,' a word found only here and in vv. 10, 14.

10. RM 'And being crushed he (the poor) boweth down, and the helpless fall by his strong ones' (by the wicked man's followers).

11. Cp. vv. 1, 4. The blindness of God, which the Psalmist knows is only apparent, is what the wicked man really believes in.

14. Thou hast seen it] A direct contradiction of the wicked man's thought in v. 11.

15. Break... the arm] destroy the power.

16. The faith of the Psalmist here asserts itself. The heathen] RV 'the nations.' The past extermination of the Canaanites, or some repulse of foreign invaders, is regarded as a pledge that God will remove the present troublemakers of society. 18. The man of the earth] RV 'the man which is of the earth.' The word is again 'frail man.' Foreign enemies and evil-doers at home must alike be made to feel their impotence against God.

PSALM 11

The Ps. is a song of confidence in God, and in the security of the righteous under His protection, notwithstanding the timid counsels of less trustful friends, and the evil devices of the wicked, who are doomed to destruction.

3. If the foundations be destroyed] if those in high places disregard the first principles of righteousness. This is an argument of unbelief and cowardice. It is suggested that wickedness may be so successful as to make resistance useless. 4. God is the great Reality whom such pleadings leave out of account.

His holy temple] the heavenly sanctuary.

Try] test, as precious metals are tested.

5. Trieth] tries and approves. They stand the test.

6. Snares] Another reading is 'burning coals,' which fits the context better. Fire and brimstone] as in the destruction of Sodom: Gn 19²⁴. An horrible tempest] RV 'burning wind,' like the simoom of the desert. Their cup] a common Scripture figure for 'their destiny'; men's experiences in life being like a draught which they have to drink.

7. RV 'The Lord is righteous: he loveth righteousness.' God's dealings with men reflect His own character. His countenance, etc.] RV 'the upright shall behold His face,' shall be admitted to His favour, as worthy subjects are admitted to the presence of a king: cp. Mt 5⁸

The same subject may be traced here as in Pss 9-11, viz. a time of persecution and oppression coupled with a conviction that God lives and will yet deliver.

Title as in Ps 6.

2. Vanity] empty and false words. A double heart] a figure for treachery and deceit.

4. Our lips are our own] We have a right to say what we please, to gain our end.

5. Now will I arise] God's time for interposition always arrives sooner or later. The Psalmist pictures the proper moment as having come. From him that puffeth, etc.] RV 'at whom they puff.' 6. The words of the LORD] His promises of help to the righteous. They are reliable, in contrast to the deceitful words of the wicked in v. 2. A furnace of earth] RV 'a furnace on the earth.' The meaning is perhaps, 'silver tried in a furnace (and flowing out) on the earth.' 7. This v. is the conclusion of the thought of the Ps., though v. 8 repeats the opening complaint.

PSALM 13

The prominence which the Ps. gives to one enemy (v. 2) among the writer's numerous adversaries (v. 4), suggests the circumstances of David's persecution by Saul (1S 21-27). The Psalmist begins in agitation and despondency, and ends in tranquillity and faith.

1. PBV 'How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord, for ever?' A single question instead of the double one of AV. 'Forget for ever' means 'continue to forget.' The seemingly self-contradictory form of the question reflects the conflict of the writer's feelings, 'Hope despairs and yet despair hopes' (Luther). Note the four repetitions of 'how long' in vv. 1, 2. 2. Take counsel in my soul] be compelled to make vain plans for my own deliverance. 3. Lighten mine eyes] give me new life and hope. 'Dying eyes are glazed: a sick man's are heavy and dull. Returning health brightens them': see 1S 14^{27, 29}.

PSALM 14

This Ps., like Ps 12, gives a picture of a corrupt state of society in which God is ignored, and His people are oppressed. David's authorship is not absolutely disproved by v. 7, which some have regarded as a later addition, and where, in any case, 'bring back the captivity' may only mean 'restore the fortunes.' Though God is denied (v. 1), He really sees (v. 2), speaks (v. 3), and acts (v. 4). The Ps. reappears with some variations as Ps 53. Vv. 1-3 are quoted in Ro 3¹⁰⁻¹².

1. The fool is a character who in Scripture is marked by wickedness as well as by what we call folly. His defect is moral as well as mental. In his heart] His denial is a practical one, and he really acts upon it, whatever he may say or think that he believes. There is no God] cp. Ps 12^{4, 11, 13}.

2. The LORD looked down] cp. Gn 6⁵ 11⁵ 18²¹, where similar figures describe God's perception of the wickedness of men in the primitive world.

3. Gone aside] from the true path.

4. God speaks in surprise at the folly of the wicked. Eat up my people as they eat bread] conduct at once rapacious and unconcerned.

Call not upon the LORD] Such wickedness is naturally prayerless.

The Septuagint (LXX), Vulgate, and Syriac versions insert between vv. 4 and 5 four verses which are retained in the PBV q.v. They were probably inserted first as a marginal note in some codices, being quoted from Ro 3¹⁰⁻¹⁸ as an illustration of this passage, and so ultimately found their way into the text of some MSS.

5. There were they in great fear] a sudden mention of God's interference. Some historical event, like the destruction of Pharaoh's host, seems to be in the writer's mind. 6. RM 'You put to shame the counsel (i.e. the righteous thoughts) of the poor, but the LORD is his refuge.' 'The poor' are the afflicted righteous: see 9¹².

7. Out of Zion] Zion is regarded as God's dwelling-place, from which He sends forth His help: see 3⁴. Bringeth back the captivity] The phrase may have the general sense of 'restoring prosperity to,' and need not refer to the Babylonian exile: see Job 42¹⁰. Jacob, like 'Israel,' is a name for the nation.

PSALM 15

In this Ps. we have a fine summary of the essentials of OT. piety. It sets forth the character and conduct required in the worshipper for acceptance with God. The occasion of its composition may have been the bringing of the ark to Jerusalem (2S 6¹⁷). Cp. with the whole Ps. Isa 33^{14, 15}. This is another of the Pss. for Ascension Day.

1. Abide] RV 'sojourn.' The worshipper is conceived as the guest of God. Tabernacle] lit. 'tent,' the kind of structure prepared by David for the ark. Thy holy hill] Mt. Zion, viewed as God's dwelling-place, and specially consecrated first by the presence of the ark, and afterwards by Solomon's Temple.

2. In his heart] Emphasis is laid on inward sincerity as well as on outward integrity.

3. Backbiteth] RV 'slandereth.' Taketh up a reproach] The phrase refers to receiving and repeating what is to another's discredit. 4. He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not] A truly upright man will keep his word even to his own disadvantage.

5. Usury] was forbidden by the Mosaic Law (Lv 25^{36,37} Dt 23^{19,20}) as inconsistent with the kindly spirit of brotherhood among Israelites. Interest was allowed to be taken from foreigners. The absence of greed and exaction is what the Psalmist commends. Nor taketh reward against the innocent] Bribery has always been one of the greatest corruptions of society in the East. It was sternly forbidden in Israel (Ex 23^{7,8} Dt 27²⁵), and the worthy guest of Jehovah could not stoop to such a thing. Shall never be moved] an expressive way of summing up the strength and stability of a righteous life.

The Ps. is the confident and joyous prayer of one whose highest satisfaction is in God and in good men (vv. 2, 3), who renounces all the ways of idolatry (v. 4), and who finds in God not only ample wealth and happiness for the present (vv. 5-7), but also a continuous prospect of the truest life (vv. 8-11). The Ps. is quoted in Ac 2²⁵ 13³⁵ as a prophecy of the Resurrection of Christ. While this is not its primary reference, and while the language does not necessarily involve all that is read into it in the NT., it is true that the thought of the Ps. suggests the hope of immortality, and that the Resurrection of Christ affords the most striking illustration of its meaning.

Title.—Michtam of David] The meaning is uncertain. 'Michtam' may possibly be 'a golden Psalm,' or it may have some musical reference.

2. RV 'I have said unto the LORD (Jehovah), Thou art my Lord: I have no good beyond thee.' 3. RV 'As for the saints that are in the earth, They are the excellent in whom is all my delight.'

4. That hasten, etc.] RV 'that exchange the LORD for another god.' Drink offerings of blood] to be understood perhaps not literally, but in the sense of cruel and impure sacrifices. Their names] the names of the idols which are thus worshipped.

5, 6. There are two figures here, one contained in the words portion, lot, lines, heritage, suggested by the division of the land of Canaan among the tribes, and another contained in the word cup, which denotes the experiences of the Psalmist's life. In Nu 18²⁰ God is the only portion of the Levites, who received no earthly territory. The writer here claims the same goodly heritage.

7. My reins] or as we should say, 'my heart': see 7⁹. God's inward voice heard in hours of quietness, is one of the chief blessings of His people. 8. I have set the LORD, etc.] the constant, deliberate, and conscious exercise of faith. 9. My glory] my soul: see Ps 7⁵ 108¹. Rest in hope] RV 'dwell in safety.' The primary reference is not to the dead body in the grave, but to the continuance of bodily life on earth.

10. In hell] RV 'to Sheol.' The meaning is, 'Thou wilt not suffer me to die.' Thine Holy One] RV 'thine holy one'; RM 'thy godly (or beloved) one.' The allusion is primarily to the Psalmist himself, though the passage is used by St. Peter (Ac 2²⁵⁻²⁶) to prove that the resurrection of Christ was in accordance with prophecy. Corruption] RM 'the pit,' the grave, the state of the dead.

11. The path of life] not specially of life after death, but of true life in the fellowship of God. In thy presence] the presence in which the Psalmist already lived (v. 8).

At thy right hand] RV 'in thy right hand,

For evermore] The contrast which the Ps. draws is not, perhaps, so much between life here and life hereafter, as between life without God and life with Him. In its very nature, however, the latter life is enduring, and hence the Psalmist's words contain an anticipation (though it may be a dim and only semi-conscious one) of the immortality which Christ has brought to light.

PSALM 17

The Psalmist makes his appeal to the justice of God (vv. 1, 2), and supports his prayer by an assertion of his conscious innocence (vv. 3-5) and an account of the eager cruelty of his enemies (vv. 9-12). The concluding thought, that true satisfaction is found in God alone (vv. 14, 15), recalls the teaching of Ps 16, with which this Ps. presents other points of likeness.

1. Feigned] false, insincere. 2. My sentence] my judgment, in the favourable sense of 'vindication.' Let thine eyes, etc.] better, 'thine eyes look upon equity,' a confident assertion of God's justice. 3. Proved] tested.

In the night] when man is alone with God, and conscience shows things in their true character. Shalt find, etc.] RM 'findest no evil purpose in me.' 4. Concerning] RV 'as for.'

By the word of thy lips] the commandments of God. 5. RV 'My steps have held fast to thy paths, My feet have not slipped.'

8. The apple of the eye] The pupil of the eye, a specially important and delicate organ, with peculiarly sensitive arrangements for its protection: see Dt 32¹⁰. Under the shadow of thy wings] as a mother-bird shelters her young. 10. They are inclosed in their own fat] better, 'they have shut up their heart,' a figure for arrogance. 11. Us] The Psalmist mentions his companions along with himself.

Bowing down] RV 'to cast us down.'

12. Like as a lion] RV 'He is like a lion,' the chief enemy (perhaps Saul) being meant.

13. Disappoint] RV 'confront.' From the wicked, which is, etc.] RV 'from the wicked by thy sword.' 14. From men which are, etc.] RV 'from men by thy hand.' From men of the world, etc.] RM 'from men whose portion in life is of the world,' whose ideal is animal gratification, a numerous offspring, and wealth to leave behind them. Full of children] RV 'satisfied with children.'

15. The Psalmist's satisfaction, present and future, lies in the fellowship of God. When I awake] either 'after each night's rest,' or 'after the night of trouble is past.' The thought of life after death may not have been clearly in the writer's mind, but his conviction and experience that true life is life in God involve the foundation of the Christian hope.

With thy likeness] cp. Nu 12⁸ Ps 139¹⁸. The Psalmist seeks continual fellowship with God.

PSALM 18

Of all the Pss. this is the one which can be ascribed with greatest confidence to David. It is found, with some variations, in 2S22, and the title is largely taken from 2S22¹. It consists of a series of triumphant thanksgivings to God, with which the writer connects a highly figurative account of his deliverance from danger (vv. 4-19), an assertion of his own uprightness (vv. 20-24), and a description of the victories he has won by God's assistance (vv. 29-48).

1. I will love thee] RV 'I love thee.' This v. is omitted in 2S. It was perhaps inserted when the Ps. was adapted for use by the congregation in the Temple.

2. Notice the succession of figures drawn from the experiences of a warrior's life in a country where natural strongholds as well as artificial fortresses were common. Strength] RV 'strong rock.' Buckler] RV 'shield.' So in v. 30. Horn] a symbol of irresistible strength. 4. Sorrows] RV 'cords.' So in v. 5. 5. Hell] RV 'Sheol,' the state of the dead. Prevented] RV 'came upon.' So in v. 18. Vv. 4, 5 mean that David felt himself in peril of death. 6. His temple] in heaven.

7-16. In these vv. the manifestation of God's power to deliver is poetically described as the physical appearance of God Himself, accompanied by the most impressive natural phenomena, such as earthquake and thunderstorm. He is conceived as dwelling in the heart of the thunderstorm, surrounded by fires which break forth as lightning through the cloud.

10. A cherub] Cherubim are most familiar to readers of Scripture as symbolic figures appearing in the furniture and decoration of the tabernacle and the Temple. They also appear in Ezekiel's vision of the mystic chariot as the bearers of God's throne (Ezk 1, 10). Here the cherub seems to be a personification of the storm cloud, as the parallel idea in the next clause shows.

12. Read, 'From the brightness before him there passed through his thick cloud hailstones and coals of fire.' Coals of fire] lightning. 13. His voice] the thunder. 14. His arrows] another figure for lightning. 15. The drying up of the Red Sea is woven into the imagery of the storm. 16. Many waters] the emblem of David's troubles. The whole sublime manifestation of God was on his behalf. 19. A large place] the opposite of 'straits.'

24-26. David finds in his own case an illustration of the truth that God deals with all men according to their works, opposing those who oppose Him, as well as showing His perfections to those who are like Him.

27. High looks] RV 'the haughty eyes.'

28. My candle] RV 'my lamp,' the symbol of David's prosperity: see Job 18⁶. 29. This v. may refer to the pursuit of the Amalekites (1S30) and the capture of Jerusalem (2S5¹⁻⁷).

33. Hinds' feet] agile, swift, and sure. My high places] The figure of the hind, climbing precipitous hills, is continued. 34. A bow of steel, etc.] RV 'mine arms do bend a bow of brass' (i.e. copper or bronze), a harder task than to bend a wooden bow.

35. Gentleness] RM 'condescension.' For the thought cp. 113⁶ Isa 57¹⁵: see also Ps 23.

36. Enlarged my steps] given me freedom to move without obstruction. 40. Given me the necks of mine enemies] RV 'made mine enemies turn their backs unto me.'

43. Heathen] RV 'nations.' So in v. 49. David subdued all the countries around Palestine (2S8). Shall serve] This and the following future tenses to the end of v. 45 are better rendered as past. 45. Be afraid] RV 'come trembling.' 47. People] RV 'peoples.'

PSALM 19

This Ps. falls into two well-marked divisions. Vv. 1-6 describe the glory of God (El) as seen in the heavenly bodies, especially the sun, and are thus parallel to Ps 8. Vv. 7-14 deal with the excellence of the revelation of God (Jehovah) in the Law—the subject which is expanded in Ps 119. It is possible that two independent Pss. are here combined, as in Ps 108, or that the second half was written as an addition to the first by another hand. The first part may quite well have been David's work. The second part may be divided into the praises of the Law (vv. 7-11), and the Psalmist's prayer for preservation from sin (vv. 12-14). This is one of the Pss. for Christmas Day.

1. The firmament] the sky, conceived of as a solid canopy: see Gn 1⁶. 2. Days and nights in unbroken succession testify to God's glory.

3. RV 'There is no speech nor language; Their voice cannot be heard.' Their witness is none the less impressive for its silence.

4. The silent testimony of the heavens is world-wide. Their line] the measuring line, marking off the region to which the message of the skies comes. LXX has 'their sound,' and is followed by St. Paul, who quotes this v. in Ro 10¹⁸. Tabernacle] or tent: see Isa 40²². The sun, as the most glorious of the heavenly bodies, is personified as a hero. 5. As a bridegroom] The comparison suggests the vigour and beauty of youth as well as the splendour of wedding attire. A race] RV 'his course' from E. to W., the two 'ends' of heaven mentioned in v. 6. 6. There is nothing hid, etc.] another way of putting the universal scope of the sun's testimony.

7-9. Here we have a sudden transition from nature to revelation. The word law (torah) means 'teaching' or 'instruction,' and describes not only the Law of Moses, but all the commandments of God. It is described as a testimony (see Ex 25^{16,21}) or witness to God's character and requirements (v. 7), as statutes (RV 'precepts'), a commandment (v. 8), judgments or moral decisions (v. 9). Each term is connected with some practical benefit which the Law confers on men.

7. Converting] RV 'restoring.' 8. Enlightening the eyes] imparting refreshment and vigour to the soul: see on 13³. 9. The fear of the LORD] another expression for the Law, which produces this fear in the heart. Clean] opposed to impurity of life. Enduring for ever] as the expression of God's eternal righteousness. 10. The honeycomb] rather, 'the droppings of the honeycomb,' the purest of the honey.

12. Understand] RV 'discern.' Cleanse] RV 'clear,' in the sense of 'acquit.' Unconscious sins could be atoned for (Nu 15²²⁻²⁶), and for such sins forgiveness is asked here.

13. Presumptuous sins] those deliberately committed, in contrast to those of ignorance and inadvertence. For such transgressions the Law provided no atonement (Nu 15^{30,31}), and the Psalmist prays to be restrained from committing them. Innocent from the great transgression] RV 'clear from great transgression.' 14. Strength] RV 'rock.'

PSALM 20

This and the following Ps. form a closely connected pair. The one is a prayer for a king going out to battle, and the other is a thanksgiving for his triumphant return. Both have the same title. There is nothing against the early date of the Pss., and David may be their subject, but it is hardly natural to regard him as their author. In Ps 20, vv. 1-5 are the prayer of the people, v. 6 is the confident utterance of an individual (perhaps a priest or the king himself), and in vv. 7-9 the people again take up the strain.

1. The name] is equivalent to the God to whom it belongs. It expresses all that is known about Him. Defend thee] RV 'set thee up on high,' over all enemies. 2. The sanctuary] God's dwelling-place on Mt. Zion is here meant, as the next clause shows. But see v. 6. 3. Remember . . accept] The words refer to the sacrifices both of the past and of the present. Sacrifices were usual before going out to war: see 1 S 7^{9,10} 13^{9,12}.

4. According to thine own heart] RV 'thy heart's desire,' i.e. victory. Counsel] plan of campaign: see 2 S 17. 5. Thy salvation] the deliverance to be wrought by the king's success. Set up our banners] lift them up and wave them in triumph.

6. Now] A single person here takes up the song after the sacrifice has been offered. Faith is assured that the offering has been accepted and the king's prayers heard. His anointed] the king: see 2². From his holy heaven] God's real dwelling, of which Zion is but the type.

7. Some] refers to heathen enemies, like the Egyptians (Ex 14 Isa 31¹). Remember] RV 'make mention of,' as a watchword.

8. Brought down] RV 'bowed down.'

9. Read with LXX 'O Lord, save the king: and answer us when we call.'

PSALM 21

The title and authorship have been discussed under Ps 20, to which this forms a sequel. Its contents include a thanksgiving to God for His blessings to the king (vv. 1-7), an address to the king promising future victories over his enemies (vv. 8-12), and a closing ascription of praise to God (v. 13). The Ps. is used on Ascension Day.

1, 2. The prayers for victory in Ps 20 have been answered. 3. Preventest him] lit. 'goest to meet him.' A crown] the victory confirming his rule, like a second coronation.

4. In OT. times long life on earth was regarded as one of the greatest of blessings: see 1 K 3¹¹. The language here is ideal, but it was not unusual to speak so of kings (1 K 1³¹ Nch 2³). 5. Thy salvation] the victory bestowed by God, which reflects divine attributes—'glory,' 'honour and majesty'—upon the king. 6. With thy countenance] RV 'in thy presence.'

9. Oven] RV 'furnace,' as fuel for a furnace. 10. The king will destroy young and old among his enemies—the terrible custom of ancient conquerors. 11, 12. Read. 'For though they intend . . though they imagine . . they shall not prevail, for thou shalt make them turn . . thou shalt make ready,' etc.

PSALM 22

The Ps. has two sections, in the first of which (vv. 1-21) the writer earnestly seeks God's help in a time of extreme trouble, while in the second (vv. 22-31) he breaks into a song of thanksgiving and praise. The trouble is caused by strong and relentless enemies who scorn his trust in God, and persistently threaten his life. The thanksgiving is remarkable for its anticipation of the world-wide acknowledgment of God that is to follow the Psalmist's deliverance. The last-named fact has led some to the view that the Ps. describes a national rather than a personal experience, while the use made of it in the NT. has caused others to regard it as wholly prophetic of the sufferings of Christ. There seems to be a real personal element in the Ps., but at the same time the writer as a righteous sufferer has a representative character, and his words have a partial fulfilment in the experiences of the faithful remnant in Israel, and a complete fulfilment in those of Jesus Christ, which are the supreme type of righteous suffering leading to the establishment of a universal kingdom of God. The contents of the Ps. explain its use on Good Friday.

Title.—(RV) 'Set to Aijelet hash-Shahar' (the hind of the morning); probably the name of some well-known song, to the melody of which the Ps. was intended to be sung.

1. The opening words (in the Aramaic form) were quoted by our Lord on the Cross (Mt 27⁴⁶). It has been supposed that He repeated the whole Ps., and that the remainder was drowned in the tumult and jeers of the mob. 2. And am not silent] RM 'but find no rest.' 3. The praises of Israel] which have deservedly surrounded God in the past, and which He will not cease to deserve by ceasing to deliver His people. The thought is expanded in vv. 4, 5.

6. This v. describes the Psalmist's humiliation in terms similar to those used of the suffering Servant of the Lord in Isaiah (41¹⁴ 49⁷ 52¹⁴ 53^{2,3}). 7. Shoot out the lip.. shake the head] gestures of contempt and hatred. 8. These very words were used by the priests in mockery of our Lord as He hung on the Cross (Mt 27⁴³). 12. Bulls.. strong bulls of Bashan] suggesting the strength and aggressive rage of the Psalmist's enemies. Bashan was the N. part of the region E. of the Jordan, and was a rich pasture land. 15. The parching effects of a fever supply another metaphor for the Psalmist's trouble.

16. Dogs] which haunt Eastern towns and villages in savage and cowardly packs—fit emblems of the Psalmist's fierce and yet contemptible foes. They pierced my hands and my feet] The reference is still to the dogs, who snap at the exposed parts of those whom they attack. The singular coincidence between this v. and what was done at the Crucifixion is not noted in NT. They pierced] taken from LXX and Vulgate. (Other versions read, 'they bound.' Heb. has, 'like a lion': see RM.

17. I may tell all my bones] i.e. count them all. They are visible through his emaciated flesh. The words may be either a literal or a figurative description of the writer's miserable state. 18. The conduct of his enemies is that of robbers. The application of this v. in Jn 19²⁴ is well known. 20. My darling] RM 'my only one,' my precious life. From.. the dog] cp. v. 16. 21. Thou hast heard me] a sudden conviction of faith which gives a new tone to the rest of the Ps. Unicorns] RV 'wild-oxen.' In this and the preceding v. the figures of vv. 12, 13, 16 (bulls, lions, dogs) are repeated. 22. These words are put into the mouth of Christ in Heb 2¹². 26. The meek] the afflicted righteous, like the 'poor' and the 'humble.' Eat and be satisfied] in the meal which accompanies their sacrifice (Lv 7¹⁶), or to which they may be invited by the Psalmist when he presents his thankoffering.

Your heart shall live] RV 'let your heart live,' the writer's prayer for his sacrificial guests.

27-30. These vv. extend the circle in which God is to be praised. It includes all the inhabitants and rulers of the earth, and all the generations to come.

29. They that be fat, etc.] RV 'the fat ones of the earth,' the mightiest rulers. Eat and worship] join in the sacrificial feast. Or perhaps the words mean 'shall worship Him alone.' They that go down to the dust] all mortal men, perhaps specially referring to the kings of the earth with their transient glory.

None can keep alive, etc.] Read with LXX (joining this clause with the beginning of v. 30) 'and as for him that could not keep his soul alive, his seed shall serve Him' (Jehovah). The weakest and most distressed will leave a posterity to praise God. 30. It shall be accounted, etc.] RV 'It shall be told of the Lord unto the next generation.'

PSALM 23

This is a Ps. of simple and unclouded confidence in God, who is described first as a shepherd (vv. 1-4) and next as a host (vv. 5-6). The beautiful imagery of the first part would be natural on the lips of the king who was a shepherd in his youth. The reference to 'the house of the Lord' in v. 6 may be a continuation of the figure of the host, and need not indicate a date after the building of the Temple.

3. Leadeth] RV 'guideth.' An Eastern shepherd goes before his flock. For his name's sake] in consistency with the character which He has already made known.

4. Shadow of death] rather, 'deep darkness': see Jer 13¹⁶ Am 5⁸. The rod was a short oaken club for defence; the staff a longer pole for use in climbing, or for leaning upon. An Eastern shepherd still carries both.

5. In the presence of mine enemies] as when David enjoyed the hospitality of Barzillai (2S 17²⁷⁻²⁹). Anointest] RV 'hast anointed,' as a host anoints an honoured guest: see Lk 7⁴⁶. Runneth over] God's hospitality is lavish and generous. 6. Goodness and mercy, like two angels, 'pursue' the Psalmist, determined, as it were, to run him down. For ever] lit. 'for length of days,' referring to prolonged earthly life rather than to life beyond the grave.

PSALM 24

This Ps. is generally, and very appropriately, connected with the occasion when David brought up the ark from the house of Obed-edom to the tent prepared for it on Mt. Zion. It declares the universal sovereignty of God the Creator (vv. 1, 2), and describes the character of those who may approach His earthly dwelling (vv. 3-6). Then there follows a twice-repeated scene, in which the gates of Jerusalem are summoned to open, that God, as represented by the ark, may enter; while the warders ask who the approaching conqueror is, and the people reply that He is the Lord of hosts (vv. 7-10).

1. The fulness] all that fills it, all that is in it. 2. This v. expresses the ancient idea of the structure of the universe, with 'waters under the earth' (Gn 7¹¹ Ex 20⁴). 4. Cp. Ps 15. 5. Righteousness] is a gift of God and a part of the salvation He bestows.

6. O Jacob] RV 'O God of Jacob.' Selah] see on 3⁴.

7. Lift up your heads] as if to make the entrance more roomy. Everlasting] RM 'ancient,' with an illimitable history behind them.

10. The LORD of hosts] one of the great OT. titles of God. The 'hosts' may include the armies of Israel, as well as the stars and angels who form 'the host of heaven.' Selah] see on 3⁴.

PSALM 25

This is the second of the 'acrostic' or 'alphabetic' Pss. (cp. 9, 10). As it now stands there are a few irregularities in the arrangement, some of which appear again in Ps 34. The closing v. suggests the circumstances of the exile, but it is probably an addition, as the last letter of the alphabet is reached in v. 21. The rest of the Ps. contains nothing to indicate its date or authorship, and its value is independent of any view that may be taken as to these. Some have supposed that the writer speaks in the name of the nation, but much of the Ps. has a distinctly personal character. It falls into three parts—a humble prayer for defence, instruction, and forgiveness (vv. 1-7); a meditation on the character and ways of God (vv. 8-14); and a further prayer for deliverance from trouble (vv. 15-21).

1. Aspiration reveals and determines character. The man who lifts up his soul to God stands contrasted with him who lifts up his soul to vanity (24⁴). 2. I trust in thee] RV 'in thee have I trusted.' 5. Lead (RV 'guide') me in thy truth] i.e. 'in thy faithfulness.'

6, 7. Note the threefold use of remember. God's remembrance is sought, not for the Psalmist's sins, but for His own changeless character of grace, and, in accordance with that character, for the Psalmist himself. It has been suggested that the writer, living late in Israel's history, colours his personal prayer with the thought of the nation's early sins and of God's past deliverances. 7. Mercy] RV 'lovingkindness,' as in v. 6. So in v. 10.

8. Sinners] a truly evangelic thought. God's grace is not for those who have deserved it alone, but for all who seek it in penitence.

9. In judgment] in the principles of practical righteousness.

10. Covenant... testimonies] God's law is viewed in the one case as the basis of His gracious contract with Israel, and in the other as a witness to His own character. 11. For thy name's sake... pardon] Forgiveness is asked because it is God's nature to forgive. For it is great] The plea appears strange, but it is the utterance of deep penitence, combined with strong faith in the forgiving grace which is characteristic of God. 12. Teach in the way that he shall choose] God's instruction moulds the will, and directs it to right decisions and resolves. 13. Earth] RV 'land.' The promise of temporal blessing to the good man and his posterity is in harmony with the general thought of the OT. 14. Secret] RM 'counsel' or 'friendship'; confidential fellowship. The earthly blessing is crowned with a spiritual one. 15. The net] the entanglements and perplexities of trouble and sin.

21. There is a seeming inconsistency between the plea of integrity and uprightness and the confessions of sin in vv. 7, 11. But what the Psalmist claims is not perfection, but a sincere love of goodness, and the humble dependence on God expressed in the words I wait on thee.

This Ps. appears to belong to a later age than David's, when the Temple (v. 8), with its altar (v. 6), and its public assemblies for worship

(v. 12), was a familiar institution. The writer, conscious of his own uprightness, protests against the idea of being classed with the wicked, and sharing their untimely fate. He appeals at the outset to God's judgment, and at the close preaches the assurance that it will not fail him.

1. Therefore I shall not slide] RV 'without wavering.' 2. Reins] see on 7⁹. 3. The Psalmist's conscious integrity is not self-righteousness. His knowledge of God's character has made him what he is.

6. Wash mine hands] a figure perhaps taken from the practice of the priests (Ex 30¹⁷⁻²¹), or of the city elders (Dt 21^{6,7}): cp. Mt 27⁴.

Compass thine altar] as the worshippers in the Temple gathered to witness the sacrifices.

7. Publish, etc.] RV 'make the voice of thanksgiving to be heard.' 8. Honour] RV 'glory,' God's manifested Presence, associated with the ark and the mercy seat.

9. Gather not my soul] 'Do not cut it off.' Let me not share their fate. The persons described in vv. 9, 10 are evidently men in places of power, who use violence and have wealth to protect themselves by corrupting justice. 11. Redeem me] Save me from being destroyed with the wicked. 12. An even place] a symbol of comfort and safety.

PSALM 27

This Ps. falls naturally into two parts, vv. 1-6 and vv. 7-14, which are in such marked contrast as to make it probable that here, as in Ps 19, two independent poems have been combined. The one breathes a spirit of fearless and triumphant confidence in the face of hostile armies, while the other, though trustful, is the prayer of one in deep distress, orphaned and beset by false accusers. The warlike tone of vv. 1-6 is in favour of ascribing them to David, and vv. 5-6 do not necessarily imply a reference to the Temple, which would be inconsistent with this view.

1. Strength] in the sense of 'stronghold': see 18². 2. To eat up my flesh] like wild beasts of prey. They stumbled and fell] Past victories inspire present confidence: cp. David's words to Saul (1S 17³⁴⁻³⁶). 3. In this] RV 'even then.'

4. Dwell in the house of the LORD] as the guest of Jehovah: see 23⁶. The figure suggests constant fellowship with God.

Beauty] RM 'pleasantness,' the gracious aspect of the divine Host. To enquire in his temple (or palace)] to find out all that such intercourse with God can teach.

5. The abode of Jehovah, like the tent of a desert chieftain, affords protection as well as hospitality. The figure of vv. 4, 5 may have been based on the visible dwelling-place of Jehovah at Jerusalem, and if so the words used need imply nothing more than the temporary structure erected by David.

8. The original is condensed, but the words in italics express the thought. This v. gives the essence of all divine revelation and of all human response to it. Seek ye my face] as a visitor seeks access to the presence of an Oriental king. The figure is continued in v. 9.

10. RV 'For my father and my mother have forsaken me, but,' etc. 11. A plain path] not a path clearly marked, but one that is level and safe. 13. I had fainted] is a phrase supplied to complete the sense of the abbreviated original. The land of the living] as opposed to Sheol, the state of the dead—an illustration of the value of the present life for OT. faith

This Ps. is in many respects similar to Ps 26, especially in the writer's prayer that he may be distinguished from the wicked, and may escape their fate; and in the confidence which he reaches in the closing verses. In this Ps., however, the peril of death appears more acute (v. 1), and some have supposed that both Ps. were written in a time of pestilence.

1. The pit] the grave, or Sheol, the state of the dead. Unless his prayer is heard he looks for nothing less than death. 2. Thy holy oracle] RM 'the innermost place of the sanctuary,' the Holy of Holies, where God's Presence specially dwells. Here, as in Ps 26, the existence of the Temple seems to be indicated. 3. Draw me not away] to punishment and destruction: cp. 26¹¹. 4. Deeds] RV 'work.' Endeavours] RV 'doings.'

Work] RV 'operation.' These changes bring out the intended contrast between this v. and the next. 5. Destroy] RV 'break down,' in direct opposition to build up.

8. Their strength] RM 'a strength unto his people.' The saving strength] RV 'a stronghold of salvation.' His anointed] the king.

9. Feed them] as a shepherd. Lift them up] RV 'bear them up,' a beautiful continuation of the same figure: see Isa 40¹¹.

PSALM 29

This is a Nature-Psalm, calling on the angels to praise God (vv. 1, 2), describing the manifestation of His power in the thunderstorm (vv. 3-9) and the flood (v. 10), and ending with an assurance of His favour to His people.

1. Give] in the sense of 'ascribe.' Mighty] RV 'sons of the mighty.' The angels are meant. 2. The beauty of holiness] RM 'holy array,' like the robes of the priests in an earthly sanctuary.

3. The voice of the LORD] the thunder. The phrase occurs seven times in the Ps. The waters] not of the sea, but of the storm-cloud:

see 18¹¹. 5. The cedars] the strongest trees, yet riven in the thunderstorm.

6. Them] the mountains which the thunder shakes, besides breaking the trees that grow on them. Sirion] Hermon. Lebanon and Hermon are the highest mountains in Palestine.

Unicorn] RV 'wild-ox.' 7. Divideth (RV 'cleaveth,' RM 'heweth') the flames of fire] The reference is to the sharp, pointed lightning flashes which accompany the thunder.

8. The wilderness of Kadesh] in the extreme S. of Palestine, as Lebanon and Hermon are in the extreme N. 9. Maketh the hinds to calve] an actual effect of terrifying thunderstorms; or perhaps the meaning is, 'whirl the oaks.' Discovereth] RV 'strippeth bare.' by the wind, or the strokes of lightning. His temple] or palace, is not the great temple of Nature, but heaven itself, where the angels minister (vv. 1, 2). Doth every one speak, etc.] RV 'everything saith, Glory,' but better, 'every one,' i.e. of the angels. From the heavens they look down with wonder and delight upon the storm, in which they see the manifestation of the divine glory.

10. Sitteth upon the flood] RV 'sat as king at the Flood,' the great traditional convulsion of nature (Gn 7, 8), which revealed God's mercy as well as His power and wrath. The attributes then disclosed remain unchanged, and this is the ground of the assurance expressed in v. 11, which is a beautiful conclusion to a Ps. of sublime grandeur. 11. Give strength] The power of this mighty God is given to His people as they need it: see Isa 40²⁹⁻³¹.

Title.—(RV) 'A Psalm; a Song at the Dedication of the House; a Psalm of David.'

There is no obvious connexion between the contents of this Ps. and its title. It is a thanksgiving for recovery from an illness which had threatened to be fatal, and in itself may very well have been written by David. But it is difficult to find in his life an occasion corresponding to the title, though the dedication of David's own palace, or of the site of the Temple, has been suggested. It is more likely that the words, 'A Song at the Dedication of the House,' were inserted into the title at a later time, when the Ps. was adopted for use at the dedication of Solomon's Temple, or of the second Temple, or at the re-dedication of the latter after it had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes (the origin of the Feast of Dedication mentioned in Jn 10²². See Intro. to Daniel). The Ps. opens with praise for the writer's restoration (vv. 1-5), tells next of his troubles and his prayer (vv. 6-10), and concludes with another thanksgiving (vv. 11, 12).

1. Lifted . . up] RV 'raised up,' from sickness. 3. The grave] RV 'Shool,' which, like the pit, means the state of the dead. 4. At the remembrance of his holiness] RV 'to his holy name.' For 'remembrance' or 'memorial' in the sense of 'name' see 9⁶. 5. In his favour is life] better, 'his favour is for a lifetime,' in contrast to 'his anger . . a moment.'

Endure for a night] RV 'tarry for the night' as a passing stranger. 7. Hast made] RV 'hadst made,' referring to the time of health and prosperity. My mountain] would be a figure for stability, but the reading is doubtful. Possibly it should be, 'hadst made me to stand upon strong mountains.' Thou didst hide thy face] a sudden change of experience, by which the Psalmist was shaken out of his self-confidence, and taught his entire dependence on God. 9. This v. shows how little the future life counted for in ordinary OT. thought. The pit] see v. 3. The dust] is the dead body. 11. Sackcloth] the garb of sadness.

12. My glory] my soul.

PSALM 31

The writer of this Ps. gratefully records God's past deliverances (vv. 1-8), appeals to God for help against the enemies who assail him in the present (vv. 9-18), and ends with fervent thankfulness and serene assurance (vv. 19-24). The language suggests a later age than David's, and has many parallels with the book of Jeremiah, the most evident being in the words 'terror on every side' (v. 13, Jer 20¹⁰). These parallels are mostly in the central section (vv. 9-18), and possibly this is an insertion in the middle of an earlier Davidic Ps. In the closing vv. there are several resemblances to Ps 27.

3. For thy name's sake] see 23^{2,3}.

4. Strength] RV 'stronghold.' 5. The first clause of this v. formed one of the Sayings of our Lord on the Cross (Lk 23⁴⁶). The Psalmist's attitude in life was Christ's attitude in death. God of truth] i.e. of faithfulness, of changeless consistency of character. God is always true to Himself. 6. Have hated] RV 'hate.' Lying vanities] idols: see Jer 8¹⁹ 10⁸.

7. Considered (RV 'seen') . . known] with sympathy, followed by succour. 8. Large room] RV 'large place,' the opposite of 'straits.'

9. Belly] RV 'body.' 10. Iniquity] As it stands this clause traces the Psalmist's sufferings to his sin. But the LXX and some other versions read 'affliction,' which agrees better with the context. 11. Cp. Jer 20^{7,8}. 12. A broken vessel] a thing altogether neglected.

13. This whole verse is closely parallel to Jer 20¹⁰. Fear thou on every side] cp. Jer 6²⁵ 20^{3mg.10} 46⁵ 49²⁰ Lam 2²². 15. My times] all the occasions of my life. 16. Make thy face to shine] Smile upon me in Thy favour: see

Nu 6²⁵. 17. This repetition of the prayer of v. 1 may suggest that after all the Ps. is a unity: cp. 25^{2,3} Jer 17¹⁸. The grave] RV 'Sheol.'

19. Wrought... before the sons of men] i.e. openly. 20. The same thought as in 27⁵. Even a desert tent may be a protection if its owner is powerful. Secret] RV 'covert.'

Pride] RV 'plottings.' 21. A strong city] RM 'a fenced city.' A change of figure from the tent of v. 20. If literally understood the words might refer to Jeremiah's experiences during the siege of Jerusalem. 22. Haste] RM 'alarm.' Fear is rebuked by God's answer to prayer.

PSALM 32

The subject of the Ps. is the happiness that follows the confession of sin and the experience of forgiveness. This is generally set forth at the beginning (vv. 1, 2). Then the Psalmist relates his own spiritual history of misery before confession (vv. 3, 4), and of relief after it (v. 5). He next commends the practice of prayer (v. 6), and expresses his own confidence in God (v. 7). In v. 8 God speaks in words of promise, and the closing vv. are devoted to counsel and exhortation (vv. 9-11). The period in David's life which best fits the references in the Ps. is the time of his impenitence after the murder of Uriah, followed by the rebuke of Nathan, and the king's acknowledgment of his sin (2S 11^{26-12²³}). The Ps. is one of those for Ash Wednesday.

Title.—A Psalm of David, Maschil] The word Maschil has been generally explained as 'a didactic Psalm,' a Psalm of instruction. But few of the Pss. so designated have this special character, and the more probable meaning is 'a skilful Psalm' (see 47⁷ RM), one set to more elaborate music than usual.

1, 2. Note the threefold description of wrongdoing as transgression, breaking beyond bounds; sin, failure to reach the true aim of life; and iniquity, moral deformity or perversity—also the threefold nature of pardon as 'forgiveness,' literally here the lifting of the burden of guilt; 'covering,' in the sense of hiding the sin from the eye of the judge, or protecting the sinner from punishment; and 'not imputing,' the cancelling of an obligation to pay the penalty.

2. No guile] This may refer to the sincerity of repentance, or, more probably, to the changed character of the forgiven heart.

3, 4. These vv. may be taken as a description either of actual sickness, which brought sin home to the conscience, or of spiritual suffering represented in physical terms. 4. Is turned into] RV 'was changed as with.'

5. Have I not hid] lit. 'covered,' as in v. 1. It is only when man does not cover his sin that God does cover it. Selah] see on 3⁴.

6. Shall every one] RV 'let every one.' The Psalmist wishes others to take his experience as an example. In a time when thou mayest be found] Another possible rendering is, 'in the time of finding out sin' (RM). In the floods, etc.] RV 'when the great waters' (of trouble, and especially of God's wrath) 'overflow they shall not reach unto him.'

7. Songs of deliverance] possibly songs sung by others. God's grace to one brings joy to many. Selah] see on 3⁴.

8. Guide thee with mine eye] RV 'counsel thee with mine eye upon thee.' God does not leave those whom He counsels to walk in their own strength, but watches over their way.

9. Lest they come near... thee] RV 'Else they will not come near... thee.' The horse and mule are thought of not as dangerous, but only as obstinate and stupid—incapable of being brought where they are wanted except by force. Men ought to draw near to God in unconstrained obedience.

PSALM 33

This is an anonymous Ps. of national deliverance, called forth by some historical occasion which it is now impossible to fix with any certainty. From its central conception of God as the ruler of all the earth and all the nations, it appears to belong to the later prophetic age. The metrical structure is specially regular. The first three and the last three vv. form corresponding groups of 6 lines each, and vv. 4-19 consist of six groups of 4 lines each. The opening call to praise (vv. 1-3) is followed by a description of God's character (vv. 4, 5): of His rule over all the inhabitants of the earth, based on His creative power (vv. 6-9): of His rule over the nations, and of the special privilege of Israel as His people, whose defence is not in military power, but in Jehovah (vv. 10-19). The closing vv. (20-22) respond to the summons at the beginning of the Ps.

1. Ye righteous... the upright] the Israelites who are genuine servants of God. 2. The psaltery and an instrument of ten strings] RV 'the psaltery of ten strings.' The harp and the psaltery were both stringed instruments, the latter being the larger. 3. A new song] to celebrate a new deliverance. The phrase occurs in several Pss., and has a special connexion with the deliverance from the Babylonian exile: see Isa 42¹⁰.

4. Truth] RV 'faithfulness.' 5. Righteousness] is the principle of God's character. judgment] its practical application to the government of the world. Goodness] RV 'lovingkindness.' 7. The depth (RV 'depths') in storehouses] The ancient idea of a reservoir of water beneath the earth: see Gn 7¹¹.

9. Read, 'He spake and it was: He commanded and it stood,' referring to the repeated 'it was so' of Gu1.

10. The heathen] RV 'the nations.' The people] RV 'the peoples.' 12. Cp. Dt33²⁰.

15. RV 'he that fashioneth . . . that considereth.' Their hearts alike] RV 'the hearts of them all.' 17. An horse] The Israelites had no cavalry, and the chariots and horsemen of their enemies appeared specially formidable to them: see Dt17¹⁶ Ps20⁷ 147¹⁰ Prov21³¹ Isa31¹.

PSALM 34

The reliability of this title (A Psalm of David; when he feigned madness (RM) before Abimelech, who drove him away, and he departed) is doubtful, both because the Philistine king in question is called Achish and not Abimelech in 1S21¹⁸, and because the contents of the Ps. are akin to the proverbial wisdom of a later age than David's. The Ps. is an alphabetic or acrostic one, with some of the same irregularities which are found in Ps25. Vv. 10-16 are quoted in 1Pet3¹⁰⁻¹².

1. At all times . . . continually] the utterance of a faith which can maintain gratitude in adversity as well as in prosperity. 2. Humble] RV 'meek,' all patient and trustful souls.

5. They] The Psalmist's individual experience is also a general one. 6. This poor man] may refer to the Psalmist himself, but if so it is as a type of others. 7. The angel of the LORD] a Being frequently mentioned in the OT.: see Ex23²⁰ Isa63⁹. He is not merely an angelic messenger, but is in some sense identified with God Himself. He may be said to stand for God in His self-revealing character, and in His activity among men.

Encampeth] cp. 2K6¹⁷.

10. Young lions] proverbially strong and courageous, and able to provide for themselves. 11. Come, ye children] an address in the tone of the book of Proverbs: see Prov4¹.

15. Are upon] RV 'are toward,' not only in watchfulness, but in favour. See the contrast in the next v. 16. The remembrance of them] their 'memorial' or 'name': see on 9⁶ 30⁴.

21. Evil shall slay the wicked] Sin is self-destructive, and works out its own punishment. Or perhaps the words mean simply, 'a calamity shall slay the wicked.' Desolate] RV 'condemned.' So in v. 22.

PSALM 35

This is a prayer for the defeat and destruction of malignant enemies, whom the Psalmist has formerly befriended, and who now treat him with ungrateful cruelty. The circumstances are partly similar to those of David's persecution by Saul, but no prominent individual is mentioned as hostile, and David's attitude to Saul was more forgiving than that of the Psalmist towards those of whom he complains. The Ps., like Ps31, has many resemblances to the book of Jeremiah, and some ascribe it to that prophet's time. For a discussion of the vindictive tone of such Pss. see Intro. There are three sections—a prayer for the confusion of the writer's enemies (vv. 1-10), an account of their wickedness (vv. 11-18), and a further appeal for the vindication of the right (vv. 19-28).

1. Plead my cause] RV 'strive thou,' as in a court of law: see v. 23. 5, 6. The angel of the LORD] see on 34⁷.

13. My prayer returned] better, 'shall return.' The blessing, withheld from the unworthy, will come back to the Psalmist himself: cp. Lk10⁶. 15. Abjects] the most worthless outcasts: see Job30^{1,8}. And I knew it not] RM 'and those whom I knew not.' 16. With hypocritical mockers, etc.] RV 'like the profane mockers in feasts'—buffoons and parasites, who get a place at table in return for entertaining the guests with scurrilous jokes.

17. My darling] equivalent to 'my soul': see on 22²⁰. 18. In the great congregation] The Psalmist looks for a public vindication of his cause.

19. Wink with the eye] here a sign of triumphant malice. That hate me without a cause] quoted by our Lord, and applied to Himself in Jn15²⁵. 20. Them that are quiet in the land] the same as the 'poor' or 'meek'—the humble and patient righteous.

21. Opened their mouth] in contempt. Hath seen it] i.e. the fulfilment of their wicked desires. 23. My judgment] the vindication of my just cause.

PSALM 36

This Ps. consists of two strongly contrasted pictures, one of the wickedness of the wicked man (vv. 1-4), and one of the goodness of God (vv. 5-9), followed by a prayer that the Psalmist may continue to enjoy God's blessing (vv. 10, 11), and by a confident assurance of the final overthrow of the wicked (v. 12). The Ps. seems to reflect the social conditions of a later age than David's.

1. The transgression of the wicked saith] Sin is personified as an oracle to whose voice the wicked man listens. Within my heart] A better reading is, 'within his heart.' There is no fear of God, etc.] quoted in Ro3¹⁸. 2. Until, etc.] RV 'that his iniquity shall not be found out and be hated.' 3, 4. A description of the character and conduct of the man who is deceived by sin.

5. There is an abrupt transition here to an infinitely nobler theme. 6. Great mountains] RV 'mountains of God.' In these vv. all that is infinite, sublime, and unfathomable in nature is made emblematic of the perfections of Jehovah. 8. God is host as well as protector. The figure is perhaps taken from the sacrificial meals eaten by the worshippers in the Temple (Lv 7¹³). 9. A highly spiritual conception of the nature of man's fellowship with God, anticipating some of the loftiest teaching of the NT. 12. There] The overthrow of the wicked is already a visible fact for the Psalmist's faith.

This is an acrostic Ps., in which the alphabetic arrangement is carried without a break through 22 stanzas of varying length, to which the vv. of the English Bible do not correspond. The contents are closely akin to the maxims of the book of Proverbs, but they are touched with a fervour which elevates them into true poetry. The creed of the Psalmist is that sooner or later, even in this life, wickedness is punished, and righteousness vindicated. This is a theory which, of course, is too simple to cover all the facts of experience, but it is true as far as it goes, and its practical doctrine of 'trust in God and do the right' is sound at all times.

3. No shalt thou dwell . . . be fed] RV 'dwell in the land and follow after faithfulness.' Do not go to other lands: an utterance of patriotism. 8. In any wise to do evil] RV 'it' (fretfulness) 'tendeth only to evil doing.'

9. The earth] RV 'the land' of Canaan. So in vv. 11, 22. 10. It shall not be] RV 'he shall not be.' 11. See Mt 5⁵. 13. His day] of retribution. 14. Conversation] conduct, manner of life.

18. Knoweth the days] regards with favour and watchful care: cp. 1⁶ 31⁷. For ever] from generation to generation. For O.T. thought there was satisfaction in the blessings of one's posterity as well as in those of one's own life: see vv. 26, 27, 29. 20. Fat of lambs] RV 'excellency of the pastures,' the grass and flowers which wither away—a figure distinct from that of the burning which follows.

23. Ordered] RV 'established.' 35. A green bay tree] RV 'a green tree in its native soil.'

36. He passed by] RV 'one passed by.' Perhaps we should read, 'I passed by.'

37. End] RM 'future' or 'posterity.'

39. Strength] RV 'strong hold.'

PSALM 38

This Ps. may be compared with Ps 6. It is the prayer of one who, like Job, is in great bodily suffering (vv. 1–10), and is also deserted by his friends (v. 11), and beset by treacherous enemies (vv. 12, 19, 20). He is conscious that his trouble is due to his sin (vv. 4, 18), and appeals trustfully to God for pardon, healing, and deliverance. The description of personal suffering is too minute for a purely national

Ps. It has been suggested that the author, if not David, may have been Jeremiah (see Jer 20). This is another of the Pss. for Ash Wednesday.

Title.—The phrase 'to bring to remembrance' probably indicates that the Ps. was used in connexion with the offering of the 'memorial' of incense (Isa 66^{3mg}), or of the shewbread with incense (Lv 24⁷), or of the meat offering with incense (Lv 2²).

1. This v. repeats 6¹.

2. Arrows] represent God's judgments as sent from afar, while His hand suggests closer dealing. 3. Rest] RV 'health.' 4. Sin is compared first to a flood, and then to a burden.

7. Loathsome disease] RV 'burning,' inflammation. 14. No reproofs] no arguments in his own defence. 15. His silence before men is explained by his hope in God. 20. While the Psalmist admits his own sin he is at the same time a sufferer for righteousness: see on 25²¹.

PSALM 39

This is a Ps. of great pathos and beauty. The writer's sore sickness, accepted as the punishment of sin (vv. 9–11), has impressed him with the frailty and vanity of human life. He refrains at first from all complaint lest his words should be sinful and harmful (vv. 1, 2). When he does speak it is to utter without bitterness his conviction of life's brevity and nothingness (vv. 3–6). He concludes with a humble prayer that though he is but a pilgrim on earth God may grant him pardon and recovery before he passes from the world (vv. 7–13).

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician, for Jeduthun,' etc. Jeduthun was one of the directors of sacred music in David's time (1 Ch 16⁴¹ 25¹). If the Ps. be of later origin the phrase in the title may mean 'after the manner of Jeduthun,' as in Pss 62, 77.

1. While the wicked is before me] The visible prosperity of the wicked afforded the temptation to complain. 2. Een from good] RM 'and had no comfort.' 3. Complete silence proved impossible. Pent-up feeling found a safe relief in prayer. 5. Vanity] or, 'a breath' (Heb.). 6. In a vain shew] RM 'as a shadow,' like a phantom in a dream: the eager efforts of life are contrasted with the emptiness of their results.

7. What wait I for?] If life ends in vanity what is there to hope for? The answer is 'God,' and the meaning is not so much that God will be the soul's portion in the future life, as that God's presence here redeems life from its nothingness. 8. The foolish] those who have mocked at his troubles. 9. The characteristic tone of the whole Ps. is in these words. The writer accepts with resolute resignation all the facts and experiences of life.

11. This is another v. summing up the philosophy of the Ps. Makest his beauty, etc.] RM 'consumest like a moth his delights': see Isa 50⁷ Mt 6¹⁹. 12. Stranger . . sojourner] The fact that life is transient becomes here a plea for favour. 13. Spare me] lit. 'look away from me,' 'avert thy frown.' Recover strength] lit. 'brighten up.' The day of life may be short, but the Psalmist seeks for sunshine while it lasts.

This Ps. falls into two well-marked divisions, which many think to have been originally separate Pss. In vv. 1-11 the writer recalls with thankfulness how God has heard his prayers and delivered him from trouble (vv. 1-4), declares the greatness of God's mercies (v. 5), presents himself as a living sacrifice (vv. 6-8), and desires the continuance of God's blessing on account of his fearless witness for righteousness (vv. 9-11). In vv. 12-17, on the other hand, the Psalmist is in distress, both from sin (v. 12) and from persecution (vv. 14, 15). He pleads for the speedy confusion of his enemies, and for the deliverance both of himself and of all who seek God (vv. 13-17). This part of the Ps. resembles Ps 35. Vv. 13-17 are reproduced with some variations as Ps 70. Vv. 6, 7 are applied to Christ in Heb 10⁵⁻⁹. The Ps. is probably a national Psalm. In it the nation, or the church, rather than the individual, is speaking. The horrible pit will then be the pit of exile, and the new song will be that sung for deliverance from exile and restitution to the home-land. This is one of the Pss. for Good Friday.

2. Pit . . clay] The combination of these figures for trouble is illustrated by the dun-geon, with mire at the bottom, into which Jeremiah was cast (Jer 38⁶). A rock] a place of firmness and security. 3. A new song] a song of praise for new mercies: see on 33³.

6. Sacrifice and offering, etc.] a striking recognition that spiritual service, even in OT. times, is more than all forms of worship: see 1815²². Mine ears hast thou opened] to understand the true requirements of the Law. The boring of the ears in token of perpetual servitude (Ex 21⁶ Dt 15⁷) is not here referred to. LXX has, 'a body hast thou prepared me,' and is followed in the quotation in Heb 10⁵.

7. RV 'Lo, I am come,' the Psalmist's personal consecration to God's service: see Isa 6⁹. In the volume of the book it is written of me] rather, 'in the roll of the book it is prescribed to me.' The words are a parenthesis, and the reference is probably to Deuteronomy (see 2 K 22⁸⁴), with its spiritual and inward view of obedience. The writer to the Hebrews rightly recognises that Christ's obedience perfectly fulfilled this ideal of devoted surrender to God's will.

9. In the great congregation] among the people assembled at some festival. 10. Have not hid, etc.] In a good sense God's law is hidden in his heart (v. 8, ep. 119¹¹), but here he means that he has not concealed his convictions from cowardice.

The Psalmist has been brought low by sickness, and pronounces a blessing on those who consider such sufferers as himself (vv. 1-3). His own experience has been of an opposite kind. His enemies have triumphantly anticipated his end, and their hypocritical sympathy has only been the guise of malice (vv. 5-8). One friend in particular has done his utmost to injure him (v. 9). He asks God to restore his health that he may requite all this unkindness, and finally expresses his confidence in God's favour and unchanging support (vv. 10-12). In Jn 13¹⁸ the words of v. 9 are appropriately applied to Judas. V. 13 is not a part of the Ps., but forms the concluding doxology to Book 1 of the Psalter.

1. Poor] a different word from that so often used for the afflicted righteous. It means the 'weak' or 'sick.' 2. Blessed upon the earth] rather, 'counted happy in the land.'

6. The visitor who comes in pretended sympathy only seeks information to be maliciously used outside. 8. An evil disease] or, a result of wickedness; lit. 'a thing of belial.'

9. Which did eat . . my bread] The ties of hospitality, which in the East are regarded as specially sacred, had been violated as well as those of friendship. Lifted up his heel] a figure for unfeeling violence and brutality.

10. That I may requite them] a touch of vindictiveness which Christians may not imitate: see Intro. 11. Recovery has begun. The enemy has been disappointed of his triumph. This is already taken as a proof of God's favour. 12. Integrity] The consciousness of an upright purpose is not inconsistent with the confession of sin in v. 4: see on 25²¹. Settest me before thy face for ever] the opposite of the fate predicted by his enemies in vv. 5, 8. To be in God's presence is to enjoy true and unending life.

The second and third Books of the Psalter (Pss 42-72 and 73-89) are but the two parts of a whole, the largest section of which (Pss 42-83) is called the Elohistic Psalter, because the name Elohim (God) is used almost exclusively instead of the name Jehovah (the LORD), which is predominant in the rest of the Psalms. It is evident from the contents of these two books that the Elohistic compiler gathered them from at least three earlier collections, for Pss 42-49 are Psalms of the Korahites (43 is part of 42), as are also Pss 84-89 (except 86); Pss 50 and 73-83 are Psalms of Asaph; while Pss 51-72, 86, are Psalms of David. Ps 72 originally cued a collection of Psalms attributed to David; and it is a plausible conjecture that Pss 42-50 once stood after Ps 72, the Davidic Psalms being thus together and the subscription (72²⁰) appropriate.

Taking Book 2 by itself, we may notice that in the Davidic collection Pss 66 and 67 did not originally belong to it, while Ps 72 is called 'a psalm of Solomon.' The great majority of these Pss. have the rendering in AV 'To the chief musician'; indicating (see Intro.) that they had been included in the collection of the Chief Musician as well as in that of the Elohistic collector, both of these editors working on previously existing collections. Ps 53 is an Elohistic form of Ps 14, and Ps 70 of Ps 40¹³⁻¹⁷; while Pss 57⁷⁻¹¹ and 60⁵⁻¹² are combined in Ps 108. Several of the Davidic Psalms in this book are referred by their titles to incidents in David's life; these are of varying degrees of probability, and are discussed in their places.

It is difficult to classify the Pss. according to their subjects or references, but a rough division may be attempted. Thus, (a) Pss 42, 43, 51, 54, 55, 56, 57, 59, 61, 64, 69, 70, 71 are prayers for personal help and deliverance; (b) Pss 44, 46, 47, 48, 62 are thanksgivings, and breathe the spirit of confidence and triumph; (c) Ps 45 is a marriage ode; (d) Ps 49 is a didactic piece akin to the book of Proverbs; (e) Ps 65 is a thanksgiving in time of harvest. References to the Temple as the centre of worship are found in Pss 42, 43, 48, 50, 65. The following are quoted in the NT.: 44, 45, 48, 50, 55, 62, 67, 68, and 69. The writers of the Pss. in this Book evince the same perfect trust in God and confidence in His power to relieve them from their troubles, as are exhibited in the first Book.

Several of the Pss., such as the 51st, have an unmistakable personal tone; and there are not wanting indications of a highly spiritual view of religious worship and ritual. The desire of the true Israelite is not only for the Temple (42⁴), but 'for God, for the living God.' Burnt offerings are of small account in the sight of Him to whom belongs 'the world and the fulness thereof' (50⁷⁻¹⁴). 'The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit' (51¹⁷).

In this Book the 45th and 72nd Pss. are usually classed as Messianic. They both describe the character of the ideal king, ruling in righteousness, watching over the poor and punishing the oppressor, having dominion over subject nations 'from sea to sea,' and being blessed by all nations, because they have been blessed by him. Probably they were written in connexion with definite historical events—in the one case the marriage of a king, in the other a king's accession to the throne; still they unite themselves with that Messianic hope which gradually took shape among the Jews, and came to fill a large place in their religious thought.

PSALM 42

This Ps. and the following one are closely connected, and it is practically certain that they were originally one. Ps 43 has no separate title, and its closing refrain occurs twice in Ps 42 (vv. 5, 11). Both Pss. belong to time when the Temple worship was in full activity, and the writer is a Levite who is detained in the N. of Palestine (v. 6), and beset by enemies, apparently heathen (42⁹ 43¹⁻³), who taunt him about his God (42^{3, 10}). He longs to return and take his part in the Temple service, and is confident that God will yet fulfil his desire.

Title.—[Maschil] see on Ps 32. For (RV 'of') the sons of Korah] i.e. from a collection compiled by the Levitical guild bearing that name.

2. Appear before God] in the Temple at Jerusalem. 4. Read, 'These things would I remember as I pour out my soul within me.' AV and RV suggest that the Psalmist's memories of better days add to his sorrow; but the meaning is rather that they give him hope. For I had gone, etc.] RV 'how I went with the throng, and led them to the house of God.' Holyday] a sacred festival, the original meaning of 'holiday.' 5. For the help of his countenance] We should probably read, 'who is the health of my countenance and my God,' as in v. 11, Ps 43⁵.

6. Land of Jordan . . Hermonites] RV 'land of Jordan and the Hermons,' the sources of the Jordan in the NE. of Palestine. The plural 'Hermons' refers to the separate peaks of the mountain. The hill Mizar] the 'little mountain,' some lower hill in the same locality.

7. At the noise of thy waterspouts] better, 'in the roar of thy cataracts,' the cascades that rush down Hermon when the snow melts in spring. Thy waves and . . billows] a figure for trouble, probably in this case suggested by the appearance of the Jordan in flood. 8. And my prayer] RV 'even a prayer.' 10. As with a sword in my bones] better, 'as though they would crush my bones,' the whole framework of my being.

PSALM 43

1. An ungodly nation] RM 'an unmerciful nation,' a loveless, heathen people. 2. Cp. 42⁹. 3. Thy holy hill] the Temple on Mt. Zion. Thy tabernacles] or dwelling-place. 4. O God my God] instead of 'O LORD my God'—showing that the Ps. is 'Elohistic.'

PSALM 44

This is a prayer for deliverance from national trouble which has not been deserved by any apostasy or idolatry. The strong assertions of national faithfulness are akin to the spirit of the Maccabean age, but the conditions indicated in the Ps. may be found also at an earlier date, such as the time of the invasion by Sennacherib in the reign of Hezekiah. God has helped His people in the days of old (vv. 1-3), and they are still confident in Him (vv. 4-8), yet He has allowed their enemies to bring them low (vv. 9-16). But they are still loyal to Him (vv. 17-22), and cry earnestly that He would remember them and save them (vv. 23-26).

Title.—See on Ps 42.

2. Heathen] RV 'nations.' People] RV 'peoples,' the inhabitants of Canaan. So in vv. 11, 14. 8. Selah] see on 3⁴. 11, 12. Some are slain, and others sold into captivity.

12. For nought, etc.] God does not gain by such transactions. His name and cause are rather discredited. 13, 14. See the speech of Rabshakch (2 K 18 27-35). 19. Place of dragons] RV 'place of jackals,' a desert, to which condition the country had been reduced. Shadow of death] deep darkness and gloom. 23. Why sleepest thou?] an expression of startling boldness, yet the prayer of v. 26 shows that its daring springs not from unbelief but from faith.

PSALM 45

The poem celebrates the marriage of a king. After the prelude (v. 1) come addresses to the royal bridegroom (vv. 2-9) and bride (vv. 10-12), a description of the bridal procession (vv. 13-15), and a final address to the king (vv. 16, 17). The marriage of Solomon to the Egyptian princess, of Ahab to Jezebel, of Jehoram to Athaliah, as well as later alliances, have all been suggested as the occasion in view. But while the Ps. had no doubt a historic reference, yet the language used of the king is of such a transcendent character that it could only be strictly true of the Messiah, or ideal King, and we find it quoted with a Messianic meaning in Heb 1^{8,9}. The Ps. is consequently used on Christmas Day.

Title.—RV 'Set to Shoshannim.' Shoshannim ('lilies') indicates the melody to which the Ps. is set, or possibly instruments shaped like lilies on which it was played; and A Song of loves describes the nature of the poem.

1. Is inditing, etc.] RV 'overfloweth with a goodly matter.' I speak, etc.] RM 'I speak: my work is for a king.' 3. With thy glory, etc.] RV 'Thy glory and thy majesty.' These are the weapons with which the king girds himself. 4. Because of] in the cause of. 5. In the heart, etc.] RV 'The peoples fall under thee; they' (the arrows) 'are in the heart of the king's enemies.'

6. Thy throne, O God, is] RM 'Thy throne is the throne of God.' This gives a good sense, and meets the difficulty that the human king who is addressed in the first instance could hardly be called 'God.' There are textual reasons for believing, however, that the original reading was simply, 'Thy throne shall be for ever.' Right sceptre] RV 'sceptre of equity.'

7. Oil of gladness] the oil, not of the coronation, but of a festive occasion.

8. Myrrh . . aloes . . cassia] These perfumes are not the substances now so named. Ivory palaces] palatial chambers ornamented with inlaid ivory work. Ahab had such a palace (1 K 22³⁹: cp. Am 3¹⁵). Whereby, etc.] RV 'stringed instruments have made thee glad.' Their music greets the king as he enters.

9. Did (RV 'doth') stand the queen] the new consort, who takes the place of honour.

Gold of Ophir] the finest gold. Ophir was either in Africa or in S. Asia. 11. Thy Lord] rather, 'thy lord': see 1 Pet 3⁶. Worship . . him] rather, 'do him homage.' 12. The daughter of Tyre] the city of Tyre, a personification like 'daughter of Zion,' 'daughter of Babylon.' Tyre was the wealthiest of Israel's neighbours, and was in alliance with David and Solomon. It would naturally grace a royal Israelite marriage with a gift, even if the bride were not, like Jezebel, herself a Tyrian princess. The rich among the people] better, 'the richest among the peoples.'

13. Is all glorious within] RV 'within the palace is all glorious': i.e. in the inner chamber from which she comes forth to meet the king. Of wrought gold] RV 'inwrought with gold.' 16. Instead of thy fathers, etc.] A distinguished posterity is better than a long ancestry, which was lacking in Solomon's case.

Mayest make] RV 'shalt make.' In all the earth] a world-wide dominion is promised for the king's children. 17. People] RV 'peoples.'

PSALM 46

Pss 46-48 form a group which we may assign with little doubt to the reign of Hezekiah, when Sennacherib's army was destroyed (2K 19³⁵). They all strike a note of gratitude, confidence, and trust. Ps 46 is found in Isaiah's references to the deliverance of his people (Isa 29-31, 33, 37). Ps 46 is in three strophes, and the refrain of v. 1 is used also between v. 3 and v. 5.

1. 'Set to Alamothe.' Alamothe is understood to mean 'soprano' (see

1. 'Set to Alamothe.' Alamothe is understood to mean 'soprano' (see ge and strength] the original of Ein feste Burg. 2. 3. The refrain of stress and trouble. 4. 'The river of God's presence and favour: see v. 5, Isa 33²¹; cp. Isa 8⁶. Shall make glad] RV 'make glad.' 5. Right early] RM 'when the morning appeareth.'

6. Heathen] RV 'nations.' So in v. 10.

7. LORD of hosts] see on 24¹⁰. 8. Desolations] rather, 'astonishments' or 'wonders.'

10. Be still] Desist from your vain efforts: cp. 4⁴.

PSALM 47

This Ps., though akin to Pss 46, 48, is less definitely historical, and simply summons the earth to join in a chorus of praise to God as the victorious King, not only of Israel, but of all the nations of the world.

1. People] RV 'peoples.' So in vv. 3, 9.

3. Shall subdue... shall choose] RM 'subdue... chooseth...' 4. The excellency (or 'pride') of Jacob] the fair land of Israel.

5. Gone up] to heaven, in triumph after the battle: see 68¹¹. 7. With understanding] RM 'in a skilful psalm (Muschil).' 8. Reigneth... sitteth] better, 'hath become king... hath taken his seat.'

9. Even the people] RV 'To be the people'—the Gentiles actually becoming the people of the true God. Possibly the right reading is, 'together with the people'—the Gentiles joining with the Jews in homage to Jehovah.

Shields of the earth] the princes: see 89¹⁸ Hos 4¹⁸ (RM).

PSALM 48

This Ps. celebrates the safety and glory of Jerusalem, and the praise of her divine King. The deliverance He has wrought is vividly portrayed, and we can hardly fail to recognise that the overthrow of Sennacherib is in view. The Ps. is used on Whitsunday.

2. For situation] RV 'in elevation.' On the sides of the north] An obscure clause. 'The sides of the north' may mean the Temple hill, as distinguished from the rest of the city:

or, as some think, there may be a comparison of Mt. Zion to the sacred mountain in the remote north on which Assyrian mythology placed the home of the gods: see Isa 14¹³ Ezk 38⁶ 39² (RV).

3. Is known] RV 'hath made himself known.' 4. Kings] The vassal kings of Sennacherib (Isa 10⁸). They gather and march in order till they see Jerusalem. Then they are amazed, and forced to turn back in confusion.

7. Ships of Tarshish] a general phrase for large sea-going vessels. Tarshish was somewhere in the western Mediterranean, perhaps in Spain. Sennacherib's army was like a wrecked navy. 8. As we have heard, so have we seen] History has repeated itself.

10. RV 'As is thy name... so is thy praise.' God's name is His revealed character, which now receives due recognition and response from the whole world. 14. Probably the last v. originally ran: 'For such is Jehovah our God: He it is that shall guide us for ever and ever.'

There is little to fix the date of this Ps. The writer moralises, in the fashion of the book of Proverbs, on the vanity of wealth and honour apart from understanding. The rich man cannot deliver his friends or himself from death, and his prosperity need cause no dismay to those who are less fortunate in this world. The upright, among whom the Psalmist counts himself, will be received by God, and thus made superior to the power of death. Vv. 12, 20 form, by their similarity, a kind of refrain.

1. People] RV 'peoples,' explained by inhabitants of the world. 4. Parable... dark saying] We might render, 'proverb... riddle': see 78² Prov 1⁶. 5. When the iniquity of my heels, etc.] RV 'When iniquity at my heels, etc.' RM gives a still better sense, connecting vv. 5, 6, 'When the iniquity of them that would supplant me compasseth me about, even of them that trust,' etc. 7. See Ex 21³⁰ (RV).

Redeem... ransom] Life that is forfeit to man may be bought back with money, but not life that is claimed by God.

8. This v. is a parenthesis, interrupting the connexion between vv. 7, 9. Is precious, and it ceaseth] RV 'is costly, and must be let alone.'

10. Leave their wealth to others] losing it for themselves. 11. LXX and other versions imply a slight change of reading which gives a better sense: 'Graves are their houses for ever, the dwelling-places for all generations of those who called their lands after their own name.' 12. Being in honour abideth not] RV 'abideth not in honour.'

13. Their posterity] RV 'after them men' Approve, etc.] persist in the same foolish view of life. 14. Like sheep, etc.] RV 'They are appointed as a flock for Sheol; Death shall be their shepherd'—a grim and forcible figure.

In the morning] when God's day of reckoning dawns. Shall consume, etc.] RV 'shall be for Sheol to consume, that there be no habitation for it.'

15. The grave] RV 'Sheol.' The hope expressed is not necessarily that of a definite resurrection after death, but may be that of deliverance from the premature ending of life in this world. But the words he shall receive me show that what the Psalmist values most is life with God as opposed to life without God, and this thought is the germ of the Christian doctrine of immortality: see on 16^{10, 11}.

18. Blessed his soul] congratulated himself on his wealth: cp. Lk 12¹⁹. 19. They shall never see light] shall abide for ever in the darkness of Sheol. 20. And understandeth not] Those who perish like the beasts are not the rich as such, but the rich who do not know God.

PSALM 50

The title (A Psalm of Asaph) is discussed in Intro. to Book 3, where the other Ps. of Asaph are found. The present Ps. is one of solemn warning to those who attempt to serve God by formal sacrifices while their lives are full of wickedness. God will come to judge His people (vv. 1-6). He tells the formalists that He does not need animal sacrifices (vv. 7-13), and asks for praise, obedience, and prayer (vv. 14, 15). He reproves the hypocrites for their sins (vv. 16-20) and ends with a call to repentance (v. 21) and a promise of salvation to true worshippers (v. 22). The teaching of the Ps. is that of the great prophets of the 8th and 7th centuries B.C., and it is probably to be assigned to that period.

1. The mighty God, even the LORD] RV 'God, even God, the LORD.' From the rising, etc.] from the E. to the W., not from morning to evening. 2. Zion, the perfection of beauty] see 48² Lam 2¹⁵. Shined] RV 'shined forth,' from His earthly dwelling-place. 4. Heavens from above] RV 'heavens above.'

5. Saints] the true Israel, whose worship is not hypocritical. A covenant... by sacrifice] The covenant between Jehovah and Israel at Sinai was ratified in every act of sacrifice, as one to which the worshipper bound himself afresh. This shows that the Ps. recognises the true religious value of sacrifice, and only condemns the abuse of it.

7. Against thee] RV 'unto thee.' 8. Will not reprove] because such offerings were not what God most regarded. Or thy burnt offerings, etc.] RV 'and thy burnt offerings are continually before me.' 13. Eat... drink] The primitive idea of sacrifice was that the god partook of the offerings in a physical sense. This view is rejected here. 14. Thanksgiving]

RV 'the sacrifice of thanksgiving.' 21. Kept silence] not in indifference, but in patience.

23. Conversation] RM 'way,' manner of life.

PSALM 51

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician. A Psalm of David: when Nathan the prophet came unto him, after he had gone in to Bath-sheba.'

It is impossible not to feel the general appropriateness of this Ps. to the occasion mentioned in the title, and there is no historic O.T. figure except David to whom we can point as an illustration of the great sin and deep penitence which are the theme of the Ps. The theory that the speaker is the nation of Israel hardly accounts for the highly personal tone of the whole poem. At the same time, the affinity of the thought and language with the closing chapters of Isaiah (see especially on v. 11) favours the view that the writer lived during the exile, in which case he may well have chosen David's great transgression and its results as the subject of a 'dramatic lyric.' On any supposition as to authorship and date vv. 18, 19 are to be regarded as a liturgical addition appended to the Ps. when it came to be used in the Temple services. Part of v. 4 is quoted (from LXX) in Ro 3⁴.

4. Against thee, thee only] David had sinned against Uriah and Bath-sheba as well as against God: but as all obligations to men have their foundation in God's law, so all sin against them is included and hidden in the one fact of offence against God. That thou mightest be justified... be clear] that Thy justice and holiness might be clearly shown. 5. This v. does not reflect any stain on the Psalmist's birth, but traces his sin to the inborn evil of his nature.

6. Truth in the inward parts] truth as opposed to self-deception or conscious hypocrisy, in the inward parts as opposed to mere superficial goodness. Thou shalt make me to know] God is willing to give what He desires men to have. 7. Hyssop] employed in the O.T. ceremonies of purification, a bunch of the herb being used to sprinkle blood (Lv 14^{6, 7}) or water (Nu 19¹⁸) on the unclean. Snow] cp. Isa 1¹⁸. 8. Bones which thou hast broken] see on 42¹⁰.

10. Create in me] RM 'create for me.'

Renew] better, 'make new.' What is sought is something that has never been in the Psalmist's life before. A right spirit] RM 'a steadfast spirit,' that will not yield to temptation. 11. Thy holy spirit] The only other mention of this in the O.T. is in Isa 63^{10, 11}.

12. With thy free spirit] RV 'with a free spirit,' a spirit of willing and unforced obedience. 16. Desirest not] RV 'delightest not in.' Delightest not] RV 'hast no pleasure.'

17. Cp. 34¹⁸.

18. This and the next v. form a prayer for the restoration of Jerusalem, written either during the exile or in the troublous times before Nehemiah's mission. 19. Be pleased with] RV 'delight in.' Burnt offering and whole burnt offering] two expressions for the same sacrifice, the one emphasising its being burnt, the other the completeness with which it was consumed. The conception of the essence of religion here is evidently very different from that of vv. 16, 17, which almost look like a criticism of—some even maintain, a protest against—animal sacrifice. In any case they assert that the sacrifice of the broken heart is that which God loves best.

PSALM 52

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician. Maschil of David: when Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul, and said unto him, David is come to the house of Ahimelech.'

In some respects Doeg (1S22⁹) might stand for the original of the wicked man in this Ps., but the absence of all reference to the massacre of the priests at Nob (1S22¹⁷⁻¹⁹) throws grave doubt upon the correctness of the title. The Ps. appears to reflect the social evils denounced by the prophets of later times (see Am5¹¹ 8⁶ Mic2² 3^{2,3} 7³), and to be directed against some prominent oppressor, whose character and fate are depicted in vv. 1-5, while vv. 6-9 describe the contrasted happiness of the righteous man.

1. Goodness] RV 'mercy.' God] is here 'El,' the Strong One, whose power is greater than that of the mightiest man. 'The goodness of God' is the fact that makes the boast of the strongest evil-doer to be vain. 6. Fear.. laugh] These two emotions are not inconsistent. The one is the solemn awe inspired by the suddenness of the tyrant's downfall, the other the gladness caused by the revelation of God's righteousness.

7-9. These vv. are put into the mouth of the righteous, and are introduced in RV by 'saying.' 7. Cp. Ps49. 8. But I am] RV 'But as for me, I am.' A green olive tree] in contrast with the wicked who is rooted up like a weed (v. 5): cp. 92^{13,14}. 9. Before thy saints] RV 'in the presence of thy saints,' to be connected with I will wait. Possibly we should read, 'I will declare that thy name is good,' etc.

PSALM 53

This is a second version of Ps 14 with the important difference that God (Elohim) is everywhere substituted for the LORD (Jehovah). There are a few other variations and additions, especially in v. 5 (= 14^{5,6}). The changes are interesting chiefly as an illustration of the process of editing which was applied to many

Pss. and many portions of the OT., and in particular of the consistent preferences, on the part of separate writers, for one divine name rather than another.

Title.—Mahalah] variously interpreted: (1) as a corruption of Alanoth (see Ps 46). (2) as the first word of the song to the tune of which the Ps. was set, and (3) as an instrument such as the flute or cithern. For Maschil see on Ps 32.

5. God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee] This is the most important addition in the Ps., and seems to point to some definite historical occasion for which Ps 14 was adapted by the editor.

PSALM 54

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician: on stringed instruments. Maschil of David: when the Ziphites came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?'

Whatever be the value of the title there is nothing in the Ps. to make us reject it, unless it be the allusion in v. 3 to the Ziphites as 'strangers.' For the historical incident see 1S23¹⁹ 26¹. The Ps. consists of a prayer for deliverance from enemies (vv. 1-3), and an expression of confidence and praise (vv. 4-7). For Maschil see on Ps 32. The Ps. is used on Good Friday.

1. Judge me] Do justice to me. By thy strength] RV 'in thy might.' God's 'judgment' is a practical vindication of His people's cause. 3. Strangers] In 86¹⁴ this v. is repeated, with the substitution of 'the proud' for 'strangers,' and possibly we should read 'the proud' here. The difference depends on the interchange of two very similar Heb. letters. 'Strangers,' if not applicable to the Ziphites, may refer to the men of Keilah, who were perhaps Canaanites. Oppressors seek] RV 'violent men have sought.'

4. The Lord] here 'Adonai,' not 'Jehovah.'

5. Reward evil] RV 'requite the evil' that they have done. Thy truth] thy faithfulness, or righteous self-consistency. 6. Freely] RV 'with a freewill offering' (Nu 15³); LXX 'with free will.' O LORD] the one occurrence of 'Jehovah' in this Elohist Ps.

PSALM 55

The author of this Ps. can hardly be David, for he speaks as a citizen of a distracted city rather than as its king, and the friend of whom he complains is his equal and not his subject. There is really nothing to fix the date of the Ps., though some of the experiences of Jeremiah may illustrate it. It falls into three portions, which have been described as marked by despair (vv. 1-8), indignation (vv. 9-15), and trust (vv. 16-23).

3. Cast iniquity upon me] attack me with wicked devices, as they might roll down stones on an enemy. 6. A dove] the wild rock-dove, which can fly fast and far. 8. Hasten my escape] RV 'haste me to a shelter.'

9. Divide their tongues] with a confusion like that of Babel. 13. Guide . . acquaintance] RV 'companion . . familiar friend.' 14. Unto . . company] RV 'in the house of God with the throng.' 15. Quick into hell] RM 'alive into Sheol.' For the light in which we are to regard such imprecations see Intro.

18. From the battle that was against me] RM 'so that none came nigh me.' There were many with me] RV 'they were many that strove with me.' 19. Because, etc.] RV (with comma after old) 'The men who have no changes, and who fear not God.' By 'changes' we may understand ups and downs of fortune, or pauses in their wickedness. A slightly different reading would give, 'who have no faithfulness.' 23. Bloody] RV 'blood-thirsty.'

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician; set to Jonath elem rehokim. A Psalm of David: Michtam: when the Philistines took him in Gath.'

For Michtam see on Ps 16. Jonath elem rehokim ('the dove of the distant terebinths') indicates the song to the melody of which the Ps. was to be sung. As in the case of Ps 34 the title hardly describes accurately the occasion which it mentions (1S21¹⁰), and consequently too much weight must not be attached to it. The Psalmist, with many enemies around him, casts himself on God's mercy, and his confidence utters itself in a twice-repeated refrain (vv. 4, 10).

1. Daily] RV 'all the day long.' So in v. 2.

2. Against me, O thou most High] RV 'proudly against me.' 4. In God I will praise his word] By God's help I will praise Him for the truth of His promises. 7. Shall they escape by iniquity?] A slight change of reading would give, 'Requite them according to their iniquity.' People] RV 'peoples.' This prayer would become more intelligible if national rather than personal enemies were in view.

8. Tellest] countest. Put thou my tears] or, 'my tears are put.' Thy bottle] or 'skin.' God treasures His servants' tears as if they were water or wine. St. Bernard says, 'the tears of penitents are the wine of angels.'

Thy book] in which all things are recorded.

12. Thy vows, etc.] The vows I have made to Thee bind me to Thy service. 13. Will not thou deliver? etc.] RV 'hast thou not delivered,' etc.—an affirmation in the form of a question. The meaning is, 'Yea, and my feet from falling.'

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician; set to Al-tashheth. A Psalm of David: Michtam: when he fled from Saul, in the cave.'

This and the two following Pss. were set to the melody of the song beginning Al-tashheth ('Destroy not'), which was apparently a vintage song (Isa65⁸). The occasion referred to in the title is either David's stay in the cave of Adullam (1S22¹), or the incident in the cave of Engedi (1S24³), but the Ps. has no relation either to the one or to the other. It is a companion to Ps 56. The general situation is the same, but the refrain in this case (vv. 5, 11) is even more triumphant. Vv. 4, 8 (see notes) mark the Ps. as an evening hymn. Vv. 7–11 form Ps108¹⁻⁵. This is one of the Pss. for Easter.

1. Trusteth] RV 'taketh refuge.' 3. From the reproach, etc.] RV 'when he that would swallow me up reproacheth,' i.e. reproacheth God, blasphemeth. His truth] his faithfulness.

4. And I lie, etc.] better, 'I will take my rest even among fiery foes'—an expression of the calm courage of faith.

6. My soul is bowed down] LXX 'They have bowed down my soul'; but perhaps we should read, 'their soul is bowed down,' which makes the v. consist of two contrasts. 7. My heart is fixed] is firm and steadfast in its courage. 8. My glory] my soul, as in 7⁵ 16⁹ 30¹². Psaltery and harp] see on 33². Will awake early] RM 'will awake the dawn,' by singing even before the morning appears.

9. People] RV 'peoples': see on 56⁷.

PSALM 58

This Ps. denounces the wickedness of unjust and oppressive judges, and prays, in a series of powerful metaphors, for their destruction, in order that righteousness may be vindicated, and God exalted as the supreme Judge. It is uncertain whether the injustice complained of is exercised by Israelites or by foreigners, and so the Ps. has been variously placed before and after the exile. In any case it cannot be regarded as David's. For its subject it should be compared with Ps 82.

Title.—See on Ps 57.

1. O congregation] RV 'in silence.' Both are doubtful renderings of a word which occurs only here. The reading now generally accepted gives the meaning, 'O ye gods,' or 'mighty ones,' in the sense of 'judges': cp. 82¹. Sons of men] Judges are reminded that they are human, in spite of their high office: see 82⁷. 2. Weigh] RV 'weigh out.' The 'scales of justice' are abused. 3. Estranged] from God and righteousness. 4, 5. The comparison with serpents is twofold, first as to venom, and second as to obstinate refusal to be influenced. 4. Adder] RM 'asp.' 5. Will not hearken, etc.] cp. Jer 8¹⁷. The ancient art of snake-charming is still practised in the East.

6. Read with LXX 'God shall break,' etc., and in the following vv. 'They shall melt . . . shall be.' This gives solemn prediction in the place of mere imprecation. 7. Cut in pieces] RV 'cut off,' blunted. 8. Read, 'They shall be as a snail which melteth and passeth away.' The idea is perhaps derived from the snail's slimy track, or from the commonness of empty snail shells.

9. He shall take, etc.] Read, 'While the flesh is still raw wrath shall sweep them away like a whirlwind.' Flesh is about to be cooked in a pot, but almost before the fire has kindled a whirlwind scatters the whole arrangement. The figure suggests a judgment of startling suddenness. 10. This v. breathes a spirit of ferocity not unnatural in the warlike days of the OT., but impossible to be reconciled with the spirit of Christ. 11. He is a God] RV 'there is a God.'

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician; set to Al-tashhuth. A Psalm of David: Michtam: when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him.'

For the first part of the title see on Ps 57. The second part, which alludes to 1 S 19¹¹, scarcely explains the contents of the Ps., which has foreign enemies in view throughout (vv. 5, 8, 13). 'My people' in v. 11 has been held to imply that the writer was a king, while David at the time in question was only a subject. It is probable that the Ps. should be assigned to the period of the later Jewish monarchy. Like many other Pss., it presents the three features of danger, prayer, and confidence.

2. Bloody] RV 'bloodthirsty.' 3. Not for my transgression] This might express the Psalmist's conscious innocence before God, but more probably it means that he had done nothing to provoke the hostility of his enemies. 4. Awake] cp. 44²³. 5. God of Israel] specially invoked because His people are being assailed by the heathen. Selah] see on 3⁴.

6. The writer's foes are compared to the savage dogs which infest Eastern cities and prowl round at night in search of garbage. Possibly there is a hint here that Jerusalem was actually besieged. Make a noise] 'snarl.'

7. Swords are in their lips] Their speech is cutting and injurious. Who, say they, doth hear? They question whether there is a God.

9. Because of his strength, etc.] RV 'O my strength, I will wait,' etc. 10. Shall prevent me] i.e. shall come to meet me.

11. Slay them not] must be understood in the light of v. 13. The prayer is that they may not be suddenly cut off, but may be allowed to perish gradually in their sin, in order that Israel may have a more memorable object-lesson in the righteousness of God.

13. Let them know, etc.] Read, 'Let them know unto the ends of the earth that God ruleth in Jacob.' Zeal for God's glory is the one motive of the Psalmist's prayer, however vindictive some of his requests may appear.

14. Almost a repetition of v. 6. It may mean that the contemptible attitude of the heathen described in v. 6 is all that is to be left them. 15. Grudge] RV 'tarry all night.'

15, 16. Read, 'As for them they shall wander . . . But I will sing.' 16. In the morning] Though his enemies prowl all the night it will be in vain.

PSALM 60

Title.—(RV) 'For the Chief Musician; set to Shushan Eduth: Michtam of David, to teach: when he strove with Aram-naharaim and with Aram-zohah, and Joab returned, and smote of Edom in the Valley of Salt twelve thousand.'

Shushan-eduth ('the lily of the testimony') denotes that this Ps. was set to the same melody as Pss 45, 69, 80. For 'Michtam' see Ps 16. The historical occasion in the title is described in 2 S 8^{3-8, 13, 14} 1 Ch 18^{3-8, 12, 13}, but in these passages Abishai is mentioned instead of Joab, and the number of the slain is given as 18,000. 1 Ch 18¹² is probably right in reading 'Edom' instead of 'the Syrians' (Aram) of 2 S 8¹³. The Ps., however, is plainly written after a lost battle, not after a victory. It has been suggested that while David was engaged with the Syrians in the N. of Palestine, the Edomites may have gained a temporary success in the S. before they were routed by David's generals, and that the Ps. may have been written under the shadow of this reverse. Others think that vv. 6-8, asserting God's sovereignty over the whole territory ruled by David, are a Davidic fragment worked into a later poem of national distress. The last six verses form the second part of Ps 108. Vv. 1-4 describe the defeat of Israel. The prayer in v. 5 leads to a confident expectation of extensive conquests by God's assistance (vv. 6-12).

1. Turn thyself to us] RV 'restore us,' not necessarily from captivity. 2. Earth] RV 'land.' The imagery is that of an earthquake.

3. Wine of astonishment] RV 'wine of staggering,' or reeling: see Isa 51^{17, 22}, where God's wrath is similarly compared to stupefying wine. 4. That it may be displayed, etc.] Read with LXX 'that they may betake themselves to flight before the bow.' Israel has raised the standard only to flee. 5. Thy beloved] better, 'thy beloved ones.'

6 f. The Psalmist gives the grounds of his confidence in God. All the nations are His, and He deals with them as He sees good.

6. Rejoice] exult as a victor. Mete] measure. Shechem . . Succoth] W. and E. of the Jordan respectively. Both places were connected with Jacob (Gn 33^{17,18}). 7. Gilead . . Manasseh] both E. of the Jordan, Gilead being N. of Manasseh. Ephraim . . Judah] both W. of the Jordan and again named from N. to S. They were the two most powerful Hebrew tribes, and became the heads of the separate kingdoms after Solomon's death. Hence they are distinguished, the one as the helmet (RV 'the defence of mine head'), the other as the 'sceptre' (RV) of God.

8. Moab . . Edom . . Philistia] Israel's neighbours on the E., SE., and W. respectively. They are all described as reduced to the lowest subjection. Moab is the vessel in which the conqueror's feet are washed, Edom the slave who cleans his sandals (reading 'unto Edom' with RM), or the corner into which the sandals are thrown when soiled (reading 'upon Edom' with RV). Philistia, etc.] Read, as in Ps 108⁹, 'Over Philistia will I shout in triumph.' 9. The strong city] Petra, the almost impregnable capital of Edom. It is the Psalmist who now speaks, asking how Edom is to be conquered. 10. RV 'Hast not thou, O God, cast us off? And thou goest not forth, O God, with our hosts.' 11. From trouble] RV 'against the adversary.'

This Ps. was written at a distance from Jerusalem, and is either the prayer of a king for himself, or the prayer of a subject for himself and the king. In the former case it would naturally be assigned to David, and to the time of his stay at Mahanaim beyond Jordan, during Absalom's rebellion. In the latter it might belong to any time before the exile. In present trouble the memory of past mercies inspires confidence for the future.

2. The end of the earth] or perhaps 'of the land.' Jerusalem is the centre, absence from which is banishment. The rock that is higher than I] 'a rock too high for me,' some inaccessible place of security. 4. Tabernacle] tent. The word may be purely figurative (cp. Ps 23⁷), or it may refer to the 'tabernacle' which David made for the ark. Trust] RV 'take refuge': see Ps 17⁸.

5. Vows] here stand for the prayers which accompanied them. Thou hast given me, etc.] RM 'Thou hast given an heritage unto those that fear thy name.' This may mean that Absalom's rebellion has been crushed, and that the land is in the possession of loyal Israelites. 6. If David is the writer he speaks of himself here in the third person: cp. Zede-kiah's words in Jer 38⁵. The v. is an assurance rather than a prayer. 7. Abide . . for ever] in the continuance of his royal line: see 2 S 7^{12,13,16}. Prepare] or appoint. Mercy (RV 'lovingkindness') and truth are personified as guardian angels: see Ps 57².

PSALM 62

This is a Ps. of the strongest faith, in which the experience of hostility (vv. 3, 4) and the contemplation of life (vv. 9, 10) only provide the background against which a serene confidence in God displays itself. Its tone is not inconsistent with the character of David, who 'strengthened himself in the Lord his God' (1 S 30⁶ RV). Vv. 1, 2 are practically repeated in vv. 5, 6.

Title.—Jeduthun] see on Ps 39.

1. Truly . . waiteth] RV 'my soul waiteth only.' The word rendered 'only' occurs six times in the Ps. 3. Ye shall be slain] RV 'that ye may slay him,' or better still, 'battering him,' a figure continued in the next clause.

As a bowing wall shall ye be, etc.] RV 'like a bowing wall and like,' etc. The comparison applies not to the assailants but to the person assailed.

9. While God is all, men are nothing, whether they be high or low. Vanity or breath, and lie or illusion are the most that they can be called. To be laid in the balance] RV 'in the balances they will go up,' because of their lightness. Altogether] RV 'together,' both high and low combined. 11, 12. Power and mercy] the two sides of the full-orbed character of God, both displayed in His unerring judgments of men.

PSALM 63

Title.—A Psalm of David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah.

The writer of this Ps. is a king (v. 11), who is at a distance from the sanctuary, and in danger from eager foes. If the title be correct it must refer, not to David's earlier experiences in the reign of Saul (1 S 22¹), but to the time when his flight from Absalom led him through the wilderness of Judah, between Jerusalem and the Jordan (2 S 15²³⁻²⁸). His longing for God's presence (vv. 1, 2) passes into joyful confidence (vv. 3-8) and certain expectation of his enemies' overthrow.

1. O God, thou art my God] the 'Elohistic' equivalent of 'O LORD, thou art my God.'

Early] RM 'earnestly.' 2. RV 'So (or 'thus') have I looked upon thee in the sanctuary, To see thy power and thy glory.' The sanctuary may be the temporary abode of the ark at Jerusalem. It is the memory of communion with God there which inspires the Psalmist's present longing. 4. Thus] better, 'therefore.' Lift up my hands] in prayer. In thy name] trusting in the revealed character of God. 5. Hunger is now substituted for thirst to describe the spiritual longing which God satisfies.

6. The night watches] were three in number—the first, the middle, and the morning watches.

8. The clinging effort of the human soul and the upholding grasp of God are the two sides of the relationship of faith. 9. The lower parts of the earth] the under-world of Sheol. 10. Foxes] jackals. 11. By him] by God: see Isa 65¹⁰.

PSALM 64

This is a Ps. on a familiar theme. The Psalmist's life is in danger. He describes the injurious words and malicious plans of his enemies, and foretells how their overthrow will be a warning to all who see it, and a new ground for the righteous to rejoice in God. The same figure (shooting an arrow) is employed both for the assaults of the wicked and for their discomfiture by God.

4. In secret] RV 'in secret places.' The perfect] the upright man: ep. 37³⁷. Fear not] regard neither God nor man. 5. Matter] RV 'purpose.' They say, Who shall see them?] ep. 10¹¹. 6. They accomplish, etc.] better, 'we have perfected, say they, a careful device.'

8. RV 'So shall they be made to stumble, their own tongue being against them,' their evil words coming back upon themselves. See them] 'see their desire upon them': cp. 54⁷.

Flee away] RV 'wag the head,' in scorn: see 22⁷ Jer 48²⁷. 9. Note the contrast with 28⁵.

The allusions to the Temple worship show that this Ps. belongs to a later age than David's. As to its occasion we can gather that a national religious festival at Jerusalem was in view (vv. 1-4), that a striking national deliverance had produced a wide-spread impression of God's power (vv. 5-8), and that a favourable season gave promise of an abundant harvest (vv. 9-13). The presentation of the firstfruits at the Passover (Lv 23¹⁰⁻¹⁴) would suit the first and last conditions, and the repulse of the Assyrian invasion in Hezekiah's reign would fulfil the second.

1. Waiteth] 'is silent,' an obscure expression. LXX has 'praise besemeth thee.' 2. Only flesh] God is thought of as the God, not only of Israel, but of all the world: ep. 5^b. 3. Me . . . our] The Psalmist speaks, now for himself, now in the name of the nation. 4. Even of thy holy temple] RV 'the holy place of thy temple.' 5. By terrible things] by impressive deliverances. In righteousness] connected with 'thou wilt answer us' (RV). 7. People] RV 'peoples.' 8. Thy tokens] the manifestations of Thy power. Outgoings, etc.] the gates of morning and evening, the E. and the W. Rejoice] shout for joy—the inhabitants of E. and W. are meant.

9. With the river, etc.] RV 'the river of God is full of water.' The rain is meant, or its source in the sky. Thou preparest, etc.] RV 'thou providest them corn when thou hast so prepared the earth,' i.e. by the plentiful early rain (Nov.-Feb.). 10. Ridges] RV 'furrows.' Settlest] levellest. Furrows] RV 'ridges.' 11. Read, 'Thou crownest the year of thy goodness' (RM). The prospect of a rich harvest was only the last gift in a year of many blessings and deliverances. Thy paths drop fatness] God is pictured as walking through the land, and causing fertilising showers to fall wherever He treads.

12. The wilderness] not a desert, but open pasture-land—a 'steppe' or 'veldt.' The little hills, etc.] RV 'the hills are girded with joy'—a fine poetic personification of nature, which the next v. continues.

PSALM 66

This Ps. triumphantly celebrates a great national deliverance. The whole earth is summoned to join in the chorus of praise (vv. 1-4). The memories of the exodus are recalled (vv. 5-7), but only as an introduction to more recent trials and triumphs (vv. 8-12), and the Ps. ends with vows of lavish sacrifice (vv. 13-15), and with enthusiastic testimony to God's great goodness (vv. 16-20). The failure of Sennacherib's invasion, and the return from Babylon have each been suggested as the occasion of the Ps., and the former is the more probable. There is a striking change from 'we' and 'us' (vv. 1-12) to 'I' and 'me' (vv. 13-20), which is best explained by supposing that the Psalmist at first merges himself in the nation, and afterwards regards his people's deliverance in the light of a personal blessing, as it has been an answer to personal prayer.

3. Art thou in thy works] RV 'are thy works': see 65⁵. 6. The sea] the Red Sea. Flood] RV 'river,' the Jordan. There] both at the Red Sea and at the Jordan.

8. People] RV 'peoples.' These foreign nations are to praise 'our God,' Israel's God.

9. Holdeth] RM 'putteth,' or better, 'hath set.' There is a definite allusion to a recent deliverance from national ruin. Suffereth not] better, 'hath not suffered.'

10-12. The peril is described in a succession of figures, the refining furnace, the net, the burden, the prostration of the vanquished under the trampling of the victors' horses, fire, water.

11. Affliction] RV 'a sore burden.' 13. Pay . . . my vows] make the offerings I promised.

15. Incense of rams] not actual incense, but the 'sweet savour' of the burning flesh.

16. For my soul] for the deliverance of my life: see v. 9. 17. He was extolled, etc.] RM 'high praise was under my tongue,' ready to break forth when prayer should be answered.

18. RM 'If I had regarded iniquity . . the Lord would not hear.' The answer of God was the proof that the prayer had been offered from an upright heart.

PSALM 67

This short and joyful Ps. is in the first place a harvest thanksgiving (v. 6), perhaps at the Feast of Tabernacles. God's goodness to Israel reveals Him also to the nations (v. 2), and calls forth their praise (vv. 3, 5), their submission (v. 4), and their worship (v. 7). There is a symmetrical parallelism on either side of the middle verse, v. 5 corresponding to v. 3, and vv. 6, 7 to vv. 1, 2.

1. This v. is partly taken from the priestly benediction (Nu 6²⁴), but with the change of 'the LORD' (Jehovah) into 'God' (Elohim).

2. Thy way] of dealing with men. Saving health] salvation. 3. People] RV 'peoples.' So in vv. 4, 5. 4. Righteously] RV 'with equity.' Govern] RM 'lead,' as He led Israel. 6. RV 'The earth hath yielded her increase.'

PSALM 68

This is one of the grandest of the Pss., but its origin and date are involved in much obscurity. It contains expressions borrowed from the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33) and the Song of Deborah (Jg 5), and presents several parallels with the exilic prophecy of Isa 40-66. It may be assigned with some probability to the close of the exile, in which case it is to be regarded as a triumphant anticipation of God's victory over His enemies in the restoration of His people from the Babylonian captivity. After an inspiring prelude (vv. 1-6) the Psalmist recalls some of God's triumphs in the past—at the exodus and in the wilderness (vv. 7-10), in the conquest of Canaan (vv. 11-14), and in the choice of Zion as His dwelling (vv. 15-18). God next appears as the present Saviour of His people and as the Vanquisher of their enemies (vv. 19-23). Then comes a picture of a triumphal procession of a reunited Israel in honour of His victory (vv. 24-27), and of heathen kings bringing tribute to Jerusalem (vv. 28-31). A magnificent doxology (vv. 32-35) closes the Ps., which is another of the Pss. for Whit Sunday.

1. Taken from the invocation of Moses at the moving of the ark (Nu 10³⁵), with the change of LORD (Jehovah) into God (Elohim).

2, 3. The wicked . . the righteous] the heathen and Israel respectively. 4. Extol . . heavens] RV 'cast up a high way for him that rideth through the deserts': cp. Isa 40³. By his name JAH] RV 'his name is JAH,' an abbreviation of Jehovah, as in Hallelu-jah.

5. His holy habitation] heaven: see Dt 26¹⁵.

6. In families] RM 'in a house.' Those . . chains] RV 'the prisoners into prosperity': cp. Isa 61¹ Ps 146⁷. Dwell in a dry (RV 'parched') land] like the rebellious Israelites who perished in the wilderness.

7, 8. A free quotation from the Song of Deborah (Jg 5^{4,5}). Note again the substitution of 'God' for 'LORD.' Selah] see on 3⁴.

8. The heavens also dropped] in the rain which accompanied the thunderstorms of Sinai: see 77¹⁷. 9. A plentiful rain] here a figure for all the blessings of the sojourn in the wilderness. Omit whereby with RV. 10. Hath dwelt] RV 'dwelt.' Therein] in the wilderness. Hast prepared] RV 'didst prepare.' The poor] or afflicted, the needy wanderers in the desert.

11. Gave the word] secured the victory by his simple command. Great was the company, etc.] RV 'the women that publish the tidings are a great host.' In the East it is the women who celebrate victories with song and dance: see 1 S 18^{6,7}. Vv. 12, 13 are the words of the women. 12. Another echo of Deborah's Song (Jg 5³⁰). The kings are the kings of Canaan subdued by Joshua.

13. Among the pots] RV 'among the sheepfolds,' another phrase from Deborah's Song (Jg 5¹⁰), where it rebukes the inactivity of the Reubenites. RV reads, 'will ye lie . . sheepfolds, as the wings of a dove,' etc., in the same sense of reproof. But the best rendering is in RM, 'When ye lie among the sheepfolds' (i.e. when ye return to your homes) 'it is as the wings,' etc., describing the brightness and peace of the prosperous time after the conquest of Canaan. Some understand the silver and gold to refer to the spoils of the victors. 14. It was white, etc.] RV 'It was as when it snoweth in Zalmon.' Zalmon was a wooded hill near Shechem (Jg 9⁴⁵). The scattered kings of Canaan were like the driven snowflakes seen against the dark green background.

15. RV 'A mountain of God' (i.e. a great mountain: see 36⁶), 'is the mountain of Bashan; an high mountain is the mountain of Bashan.' Hermon, which bounds Bashan on the N., is probably meant. Though it is so lofty God has chosen Zion in preference to it (v. 16). 16. RV 'Why look ye askance' (i.e. why are ye jealous), 'ye high mountains, at the mountain' (Zion), 'which God hath desired for his abode?' 17. Thousands of angels] RV 'thousands upon thousands.' God enters Zion in a great procession of His heavenly armies: cp. Dt 33². As in Sinai, etc.] RM 'Sinai is in the sanctuary.' The holy associations of Sinai are transferred to Zion.

18. Having taken possession of Zion God has returned to His heavenly throne. Captivity] RV 'thy captivity,' thy band of captives. See Deborah's Song (Jg 5¹²). For men . . . for the rebellious] RV 'among men . . . among the rebellious.' God's conquered enemies pay Him tribute. St. Paul's quotation in Eph 4⁸ changes 'received' into 'gave.'

19. Loadeth us with benefits] RV 'beareth our burden.' 20. RV 'God is unto us a God of deliverances: and unto JEHOVAH the Lord,' etc. The issues from death] the ways of escape from death, which God can provide.

21. Wound] RV 'smite through.' The hairy scalp] the long flowing locks which were the sign of the warrior's strength and of his devotion to his cause. See Dt 32⁴² RM, and the Song of Deborah (Jg 5²), where we should read 'For that flowing locks were worn in Israel.'

22. Bring my people] RV 'bring them,' i.e. Israel's enemies, who will be gathered for vengeance from the most inaccessible hiding places. Bashan was a country of intricate and rocky retreats. 23. RV 'That thou mayest dip thy foot in blood, that the tongue of thy dogs may have its portion from thine enemies.' God is still the speaker, and Israel is addressed. For the tone cp. 58¹⁰.

24. In] RV 'into.' 26. From the fountain] RV 'ye that are of the fountain,' all the descendants of Jacob: cp. Dt 33²⁸. 27. With their ruler] RV 'their ruler,' the tribe from which the first king was taken (1S 9²¹).

Council] 'company.' Zebulun and Naphtali (see Jg 5¹⁸) represent the northern kingdom, Benjamin and Judah the southern.

28. Read. 'O God, command thy strength: be strong, O God, thou that hast wrought for us.' 30. The company of spearmen] RV 'the wild beast of the reeds,' the hippopotamus, the symbol of Egypt. Bulls, with the calves of the people (RV 'peoples') heathen kings and their subjects. Till every one submit, etc.] RV 'trampling under foot the pieces of silver.' God treats the tribute of the heathen with contempt. 31. Egypt] as Israel's ancient enemy. Ethiopia] as one of the remotest of lands. 33. 34. Cp. Dt 33²⁶⁻²⁷.

This whole Ps. should be compared with Pss 22, 31, 35, 38, and 40. It is the prayer of one who is in deep distress, wrongfully persecuted by enemies, and conscious that, though he is sinful, his sufferings are due to his fidelity to God (vv. 1-12). He pleads for deliverance (vv. 13-20) and calls upon God to take the severest vengeance on his adversaries (vv. 21-28). The Ps. closes with a triumphant strain of praise (vv. 29-36). V. 35 points to a date long after the age of David—either during the exile, or, more probably, in the last years of the Jewish monarchy (see Jer 33¹⁰ 34⁷).

The situation of the writer closely resembles that of Jeremiah, and the numerous parallels between the Ps. and his prophecies give colour to the conjecture that he may have been its author. This Ps. is more frequently quoted in the NT. than any other, except Ps 22.

Title.—Shoshannim] see on Ps 45.

1. Are come in unto my soul] threaten my very life. 2. Mire . . . deep waters] to be understood figuratively of danger and distress.

3. Weary of] RV 'weary with.' 4. I restored, etc.] RM 'I had to restore,' etc., possibly a proverbial phrase for unjust treatment. 7. Cp. Jer 15¹⁵. 8. Cp. Jer 12⁹.

9. The zeal, etc.] The Psalmist was consumed by his devotion to God's cause. Thine house] either the actual Temple, profaned by idolatry, or the Jewish nation, fallen from its high ideal. For the latter sense, see Jer 11¹ 12⁷ 23¹¹. The clause is quoted in Jn 2¹⁷.

The reproaches, etc.] see Jer 6¹⁰ 20⁹. 'The words are applied to Christ in Ro 15³.'

11. Sackcloth] the sign of mourning. A proverb] or byword. 12. The gate] the open space beside the city gate where worthless loafers gathered.

13. In an acceptable time] lit. 'in a time of good pleasure,' i.e. at the time thou pleasest.

The truth of thy salvation] the faithfulness of Thy saving grace. 15. The pit] may be, like the waters, a general metaphor for trouble but it is more likely that the grave is meant.

18. Cp. Jer 15²¹. 19. Thou hast known] RV 'thou knewest': cp. Jer 12³ 15¹⁵ 18².

20. Hath broken my heart] cp. Jer 23⁹.

21. Gall] some bitter and poisonous plant, perhaps the poppy. Vinegar] wine become sour and undrinkable. The language is figurative, and perhaps proverbial, for cruel mockery of one in trouble. In spite of the verbal coincidence in Mt 27³⁴, the treatment of Christ by the soldiers had not this character, but was intended to allay His sufferings; and, except as to the fact of His thirst (Jn 19²⁸), there is no direct reference in the Gospels to this v.

22. And that which . . . welfare] RV 'and when they are in peace.' This v. is quoted freely along with v. 23 in Ro 11⁹. 23. A prayer that blindness and paralysis may fall upon the Psalmist's enemies. 25. This v. is quoted freely (from LXX) in Ac 1²⁰. 26. Talk to the grief] RV 'tell of the sorrow.' LXX 'add to the sorrow.' 27. Add iniquity, etc.] cause their guilt to be filled up, rather than forgiven. Into thy righteousness] into the salvation which God's righteousness secures for His people. 28. The book of the living] RV 'of life,' the list of the righteous who are to be preserved alive. The reference is not to the future but to the present life.

31. Praise is the truest sacrifice: cp. 50^{13, 14}. Hath horns and hoofs] is full grown as well as ceremonially clean (Lv 11³). 33. His prisoners] perhaps an allusion to the victims of the first captivity (2 K 24¹⁰⁻¹⁶).

PSALM 70

This Ps. is simply a repetition of Ps 40¹³⁻¹⁷, with a few variations. 'LORD' (Jehovah) is changed into 'God' (Elohim) except in v. 1^b. On the other hand, 'Elohim' is changed into 'Jehovah' in v. 5^b. By a change of one letter in the Hebrew 'turned back' is substituted for 'desolate' in v. 3, and 'make haste unto me' appears instead of 'thinketh upon me' in v. 5. The five vv. composing the Ps. constitute a cry to God for help and deliverance.

Title: see on Ps 38.

PSALM 71

This Ps. of prayer (vv. 1-13) and praise (vv. 14-24) was apparently written by an old man (vv. 9, 18) and in the time of the exile. Some parts of it are undoubtedly national, but much of it expresses personal experience and desire and faith. It is largely made up of extracts from other Pss., yet it has a unity and a beauty of its own.

1-3. Practically taken from 31¹⁻³. 5, 6. See 22^{9,10}. 7. As a wonder unto many] a striking example of God's mysterious chastisement of His own: see Isa 52¹⁴. 12. See 22¹¹ 40¹³.

13. See 35^{4,26}; cp. also v. 24.

15. I know not the numbers] cp. 40⁵. 16. Go in the strength] RV 'come with the mighty acts,' bringing them as the subject of the song.

18. This generation] RV 'the next generation.' 20. For me read 'us' all through this v. (RV). The Psalmist predicts a resurrection of his nation which is, as it were, dead and buried in its exile. 21. Thou shalt increase] RV 'increase thou.' Comfort me on every side] RV 'turn again and comfort me.'

PSALM 72

Title.—A Psalm for (RV 'of') Solomon.

The title in AV suggests that David is the writer, and Solomon the subject, of this Ps., but, as RV shows, the authorship is really ascribed to Solomon. The Ps., however, appears rather to be the prayer of a subject for the king. Some actual ruler—Solomon, Hezekiah, or another—is no doubt in view, but, as in Ps 45, the royal figure is so idealised that the Ps. becomes truly Messianic, and applicable only to the perfect divine King, though it is nowhere expressly quoted in this sense in the NT. The justice and beneficence of the king's reign, the world-wide extent of his dominion, the prosperity of his country, and the perpetuity of his fame, are successively described. Vv. 18, 19 are the closing doxology of Book 2 of the Psalter, and v. 20 is an instructive editorial note.

1. Judgments . . righteousness] the qualities of a great and upright ruler: see v. 2. The king's son] a parallel expression for the king.

2. Thy poor] the class who suffered most from unjust and oppressive rulers. 3. By righteousness] RV 'in righteousness.' Under a righteous government peace will be the fruit that grows on all the wooded slopes of the land: see Isa 32¹⁷. 5. They shall fear thee] not the king, but God. LXX reads instead, 'He shall endure as long as the sun, and while the moon doth shine.' 6. Upon the mown grass] to start the new growth. LXX and Vulg. render, 'upon a fleece': cp. PBV 'into a fleece of wool.' 7. The metaphor of v. 6 is continued. 'Righteousness' (LXX) and peace are the vegetation which springs up after the fertilising showers.

8-11. These vv. should be read as a prayer rather than as a prediction. 'May he have dominion . . May they bow,' etc. 8. From sea to sea] from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean. The river] RV 'the River,' the Euphrates in the E. The ends of the earth] the extreme W.: see Ex 23³¹ 1 K 4²¹. 9. They that dwell in the wilderness] the wandering desert tribes. Lick the dust] the attitude of abject submission. 10. Tarshish] probably Tartessus in Spain: see on 48⁷. The isles] the coast-lands of the Mediterranean. Sheba] Saba in S. Arabia. Seba] an unknown locality, elsewhere connected with Ethiopia (Isa 43³ 45¹¹).

12. The poor also, etc.] RV 'and the poor that hath no helper.' 14. Precious shall their blood be] Human life will be protected, and not held cheap, as it is where tyranny flourishes.

15. He shall live] better, 'May he live, and may men give him . . may they pray,' etc. For him] PBV renders, 'prayer shall be made ever unto him': an indefensible translation, which has arisen from an exclusive reference of the Ps. to Christ.

16, 17. These vv. also are best read as a prayer. 'May there be . . may his name endure,' etc. 16. An handful] RV 'abundance.'

In the earth] better, 'in the land.' Shake like Lebanon] wave or rustle like the cedars of Lebanon. They of the city, etc.] better, 'may men spring forth out of the city like grass of the earth.' 17. Be blessed] RM 'bless themselves': see Gn 22¹⁸ 26⁴ (RM), and cp. Isa 65¹⁸.

20. See Intro. to Book 2.

BOOK 3 (PSALMS 73-89)

There are two groups of Pss. in this book, Pss 73-83 being Psalms of Asaph, and Pss 84-88 (except 86) Psalms of the Sons of Korah. The likeness of the title of Ps 89 to that of Ps 88 suggests that it belongs to the same group. The Sons of Asaph and the Sons of Korah were guilds of singers connected with the second Temple (2 Ch 20¹⁹ Ezr 2⁴¹ Neh 7⁴⁴), and these groups of Pss. belong to collections made by them for the Temple services.

The Psalms of Asaph, though of different dates, are of a similar character, having many features in common. They are national and historical Pss., setting forth God's working in history, expressing national wants, and suggesting lessons from the past for use in the future. These Pss. have a definite doctrine of God. On the one hand, He is the Shepherd of Israel (80¹), and the people are the sheep of His pasture (74¹ 77²⁰ 79¹³). This idea is frequently suggested, and it is elaborated at length in Ps 78. On the other hand, God is the Judge (75⁷), defending Israel against enemies (76³⁻⁶), executing His judgments against the wicked (76^{8,9}), and also administering justice to the poor and defending them from oppressors (82²⁻⁴). Another feature of these Pss. is the way in which history is used for instruction, admonition, and encouragement. Ps 78 is a lesson of comfort and courage from the past experiences of the nation (cp. 77¹¹ 80⁸⁻¹⁰ 81^{7,10} 83^{9,11}).

The Psalms of the Sons of Korah are largely devoted to the exaltation of the Temple worship. Those who dwell in its courts are blessed (84⁴); a day spent there is better than a thousand elsewhere (84¹⁰). Jerusalem is the favourite place of God (87²); to be born there is a high privilege (87⁵); and a special blessing attends those who have it (87⁶).

The problem of the prosperity of the wicked presses upon all the Psalmists, and the author of Ps 73 dwells upon it. Only religion enables him to bear the burden that oppresses him (73¹⁷); but when comforted by the thought of God's presence and healed by communion with Him, he is able to persevere in faith and hope.

Ps 89 is frequently referred to in NT., e.g. Ac 13²² (v. 20), 2 Th 1¹⁰ (v. 7), Rev 1⁵ (vv. 27 and 37); while Ps 78² is applied in Mt 13³⁵ to Christ's teaching by parables.

The Pss. of Asaph, like those of Book 2, are 'Elohistic'; the Korahite Pss. are 'Jehovistic,' like those of Books 1, 4, and 5 (see Intro. to Book 2).

PSALM 73

This Ps., like Pss 37 and 49, and the book of Job, deals with the perplexing problem presented to thoughtful minds by the prosperity of the wicked and the sufferings of the righteous. The Psalmist has been deeply exercised by this question (vv. 2-14), and after struggling with doubt (vv. 15, 16) has learned in the sanctuary of God to understand the end of the wicked (vv. 17-20), and to repent of his own unbelieving thoughts (vv. 21, 22). He has found rest in the conviction that the only true and lasting blessedness lies in the fellowship of God—a fellowship which ensures present guidance and future welcome (vv. 23, 24), which is the object of his supreme desire (v. 25), and which is independent of all possible change (v. 26). Separation from God is destruction (v. 27). Nearness to God is happiness (v. 28). There is no indication in the Ps. as to its date, except the allusion in v. 17 to the existence of the Temple.

Title.—See Intro. to Book 3.

1. The conclusion reached by faith precedes the account of the struggle with doubt. [Of a clean heart] a spiritual rather than a merely national conception of Israel. 3. Foolish] RV 'arrogant.' 4. Most scholars read, 'For they have no torments; sound and stalwart is their body.' 6. Compasseth... chain] RV 'is as a chain about their neck,' in the sense of an ornament: see Prov 1⁹. 7. Render, 'Their iniquity cometh forth from the heart: the imaginations of their mind overflow.'

8. RV 'They scoff, and in wickedness utter oppression.' 9. Against] RV 'in,' a description of pride. 10. His people] the followers and imitators of the wicked man. Return hither] better, 'turn hither,' after the wicked man's example. Wrung out to (RV 'by') them] rather, 'are supped up by them. They drink in the wicked man's principles, or share in his prosperity: see PBV.

12-14 are best understood as the utterance of the Psalmist's doubts. 15. Say] RV 'had said.' Should offend against] RV 'had dealt treacherously with.' Thy children] God's true people, of whom the Psalmist was one, and to whom he felt that he dare not be disloyal. This thought is a practical refutation of doubt, even before the theoretical answer is found.

16. To know] RV 'how I might know'

17. Then... end] RV 'and considered their latter end.' Difficulties are resolved and the soul strengthened against the temptations of doubt in the presence and communion of God, as enjoyed in His sanctuary. 20. When thou awakest] better, 'when Thou stirrest up Thyself.' Their image] not themselves. The end of the wicked is nothingness. It is only a shadow of them that survives for God to contemplate.

22. Foolish] RV 'brutish.' 23. Thou hast holden, etc.] Though the grasp of faith on God may waver, fellowship with Him depends most of all on His grasp of His people.

24. The experience of God's fellowship contains in itself a promise that it will continue and become closer. This thought plainly leads to belief in immortality. 26. My flesh and my heart] both the outer and the inner man. Though both of these should perish, something would yet remain in eternal union with God. 27. Whoring] a familiar OT. figure for departure from God.

PSALM 74

Pss 74 and 79 seem to reflect the same historical situation, and are usually ascribed to the same author. Both were written in a time of national calamity, when the Temple was profaned (Ps 74), and the Israelites ruthlessly slaughtered (Ps 79) by a heathen enemy. The occasion described must have been either the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar's army (586 B.C., 2K 24 2Ch 37¹¹⁻¹⁴. Jer 39¹⁻⁸ 52¹⁻¹⁴), or the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes (168-165 B.C.: see 1Mac1-4 and the Intro. to Daniel). V. 7 seems to point to the former, vv. 8, 9 to the latter period. After an opening appeal to God (vv. 1, 2) the Ps. describes the ravages of the enemy in the Temple (vv. 3-7), and the distressed condition of Israel (vv. 8, 9). A second appeal (vv. 10, 11) is followed by recollection of God's past mercies, especially in leading His people from Egypt to Canaan (vv. 12-15). Next comes an ascription of praise to God as the Ruler of Nature (vv. 16, 17), followed by a final prayer that He will vindicate His own glory, which the heathen have dishonoured (vv. 18-23).

Title.—Maschil] see on Ps 32.

1. Smoke] Like a dark thunder-cloud threatening a flock: see 18⁸. 2. The rod . . redeemed] RV 'which thou hast redeemed to be the tribe of thine inheritance.' 3. Lift up thy feet unto] Hasten to see. 4. Their ensigns] either military standards or religious emblems: see 1Mac1^{47, 54, 55, 59}. 5. A man . . lifted up] RV 'They seemed as men that lifted up.' The thick trees] RV 'a thicket of trees.'

8. Synagogues] The mention of these points to the later date for the Ps., as they only arose after the return from the Babylonian exile. 9. Our signs] either God's miraculous interpositions, or Jewish religious customs such as sacrifice, circumcision, and sabbath-observance, all of which Antiochus Epiphanes forbade under the heaviest penalties: see 1Mac1^{45, 48, 50}. No more any prophet, etc.] This hardly applies to the Babylonian capture of Jerusalem, when both Jeremiah and Ezekiel were alive, and when the former had foretold that the captivity would last 70 years. For the absence of prophets in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes see 1Mac4⁴⁶ 9²⁷ 14⁴¹.

11. The last clause is condensed in the original. RV adds to the last clause, 'and consume them.'

13. The sea] the Red Sea: Ex14²¹. The dragons] 'sea monsters,' a figure for Egypt.

14. Leviathan] probably the crocodile, another figure for Egypt: cp. Ezk29³⁻⁵ 32¹⁻⁵.

The people inhabiting the wilderness] the wild beasts of the desert. 15. Cleave the fountain] i.e. cleave the rock from which the fountain flowed: see Ex17⁶ Nu20⁸. Rivers] the Jordan: Josh3¹³ 4²³. 16, 17. The signs of God's presence in nature. 18. The foolish people] RV 'a foolish people,' a heathen nation: see Dt32²¹. 20. Of the earth] better, 'of the land,' the hiding-places to which the Israelites were pursued by their enemies: see 1Mac1⁵³ 2²⁷⁻³⁸. 23. Increaseth] RV 'ascendeth.'

PSALM 75

In contrast with the plaintive strains of Ps74 this is a Ps. of thanksgiving for some national deliverance (v. 1). It celebrates God as the Judge of all the earth, who interposes in His own time amid the confusions of men (vv. 2, 3). His enemies are warned against pride (vv. 4-8) by the certainty that His cup of punishment is prepared for the wicked (v. 8). The Ps. ends with an ascription of praise (v. 9), and a declaration of God's righteous purpose (v. 10). In vv. 2, 3, 10, God Himself is the speaker. There is nothing to indicate the date or occasion of the Ps., which presents some parallels with the Song of Hannah (1S2¹⁻¹⁰).

Title.—(RV) Al-tashheth] see on Ps 57.

1^b. RV 'for thy name is near: Men tell of thy wondrous works.' God's 'name' means His saving presence (Isa30²⁷). 2. God speaks. Receive the congregation] RV 'find the set time' for judgment. 3. Bear up] RV 'have set up.' God's moral order stands sure even when it seems that 'the world is out of joint': cp. 1S2⁸. Selah] see on 3⁴. 4. Fools] RV 'arrogant': cp. 1S2⁴. 4, 5. 'Lifting up the horn' and having 'a stiff neck' are figures for self-exaltation and obstinacy. 6. Read, 'For neither from . . cometh judgment.' Foreign invasions of Israel generally came from the N., and deliverance might naturally be looked for from some of the other quarters mentioned.

7. Setteth up] RV 'lifteth up': cp. 1S2^{4, 7}.

8. A cup] The same figure for God's punishment is found in Isa51¹⁷ Jer25^{15, 18} 48²⁶ 49¹².

PSALM 76

Like the previous Ps. this is a song of national deliverance, which may have been called forth, as the title in LXX suggests, by the overthrow of Sennacherib's army (2K 19³⁵ 2Ch 32²¹ Isa 37³⁶). In vv. 1-6 God is described as returning to His dwelling-place in Zion from the mountains where He has overthrown His adversaries. In vv. 7-9 another figure is introduced which represents God as uttering sentence from heaven upon His enemies, while the earth is hushed in silence. V. 10 explains how God gains glory even from the rebelliousness of men, and vv. 11, 12 call the whole world to render Him the homage which is due to His terrible majesty.

Title.—Neginoth] see on Ps 4.

2. Salem] Jerusalem. 3. Selah] see on 3⁴.

4. More glorious . . . than] RV 'glorious . . . from.' Mountains of prey] God comes back like a lion from hunting and slaying His foes.

8. Judgment] RV 'sentence.' 10^b. RV 'the residue . . . gird upon thee.' The spent and powerless anger of men is worn as an ornament by God, or becomes His sword by which they are destroyed.

PSALM 77

The Ps. records the writer's experience of personal perplexity and darkness, which, however, has been caused by the contemplation of Israel's national distress. It may be dated appropriately in the time of the exile. Vv. 1-3 describe the Psalmist's trouble, in which even prayer has brought no comfort. Vv. 4-9 speak of his meditations on the brighter past, which lead to the question whether God has finally rejected His people. In vv. 10-20 he turns for comfort to the story of God's wonderful works of old, and dwells especially upon His deliverance of Israel from Egypt (v. 15), His sublime manifestation of power at the Red Sea (vv. 16-19), and His guidance of His people through the wilderness (v. 20). At this point the Ps. comes to an abrupt close.

Title.—Jeduthun] see on Ps 39.

1. Cried . . . gave] RV 'will cry . . . will give.'

2. My sore ran] RV 'my hand was stretched out,' in the attitude of prayer. 3. Selah] see on 3⁴. 4. Mine eyes waking] rather, 'the guards of my eyes.' The eyelids are kept from closing. 6. My song in the night] a former time of happiness and praise: see Ps 42⁸ Job 35¹⁰.

10. This is my infirmity] The Psalmist here recognises that his doubts are due to his own weakness and not to any change in God. 10^b. RM reads, 'That the right hand of the Most High doth change,' which may be taken as an exclamation, mentioning the idea only to dismiss it as impossible. 11. Remember] RV 'make mention of.' 12. Talk of] RV 'muse on.'

13. In the sanctuary] RV 'in holiness.'

14. People] RV 'peoples.'

15. The sons of Jacob and Joseph] Jacob represents the kingdom of Judah, and Joseph (father of Ephraim and Manasseh) the northern kingdom of Israel. The division of the nation is clearly hinted at: see on 80^{1,2}.

16. The waters] the Red Sea: Ex 14²¹⁻³¹.

17. Sound] thunder. Arrows] lightning.

18. Heaven] RV 'whirlwind.' 19. /s . . are] RV 'was . . were.' Footsteps . . not known] when the waters had returned to their place.

PSALM 78

This long historical Ps. may be compared with Pss 105, 106, and with Dt 32. It traces the course of God's relations with His people from the exodus down to the time of David, and dwells on the repeated manifestations of Israel's rebelliousness, on the chastisements by which they were visited, and on the patient mercy of God which continued to bless them in spite of all their sins. The Ps. does not follow a strict chronological order, but records first Israel's ingratitude for God's provision of food and drink in the wilderness (vv. 12-31), and afterwards the plagues of Egypt (vv. 43-51), the journey to Canaan (vv. 52-55), the defections of Israel in the days of the Judges (vv. 56-58), the calamities of the Philistine wars (vv. 56-64), and the establishment of David's kingdom (vv. 65-72). While the conduct of the whole nation is in view throughout the Ps. the tribe of Ephraim is singled out for special condemnation at the first (vv. 9-11), and emphasis is afterwards laid on its rejection in favour of Judah, and on the rejection of Shiloh in favour of Jerusalem as the national sanctuary (vv. 67-69). The date of the Ps. is subsequent to the building of the Temple (v. 69), but apparently before its destruction by the Babylonians. The phrase 'the Holy One of Israel' (v. 41) is characteristic of Isaiah's prophecies (Isa 6¹⁸ 10¹⁷ 29²³), and suggests that the Ps. was written in or after his time. The historical allusions are confined to the primitive narrative of the Pentateuch (JE), which was earlier than the exile. The references to Ephraim indicate a time after the disruption of the kingdom (1K 12 2Ch 10), but the object of the Ps. was probably not to rebuke Ephraim, but rather to warn the whole nation by recalling the lessons of the past.

1. Law] RM 'teaching.' 2. Parable] in the sense of 'didactic poem.' Dark sayings] lit. 'riddles.' The history of Israel is an enigma, requiring an explanation such as the Psalmist gives. These two words occur together in 49⁴ Prov 1⁶ Ezk 17². The v. is quoted in Mt 13^{34,35} with reference to Christ's method of teaching by parables. 3, 4. The vv. are connected. Read, 'The things which we have heard . . . we will not hide from their children': cp. Dt 4⁹ 6⁷ 11¹⁰.

9. This v. does not refer to a particular incident, but is a general figurative description of Ephraim's opportunity and failure, anticipating what is said in v. 67. Even before the revolt of Jeroboam Ephraim had shown a tendency to rivalry with Judah (2S 19⁴¹-20²²).

12. Zoan] Tanis, a city in the Delta of the Nile: see v. 43. 18, 21. Cp. Ex 16, 17 Nu 11.

26. The wind that brought the quails (Nu 11³¹). 29. Their own desire] RV 'that they lusted after.' 36, 37. There was no real change of heart. His covenant] see Ex 24⁷.

40. Provoke] RV 'rebel against.'

41. Limited] RV 'provoked.'

43-51. The plagues in Egypt. 44. Floods] RV 'streams.' 45. Divers sorts] RV 'swarms.'

47. Frost] RM 'great hailstones.' 48. Hot thunderbolts] lightning (Ex 9²⁴). 49. By sending evil angels among them] RV 'a band of evil angels,' the disasters being personified as messengers of God. 51. Tabernacles] RV 'tents.'

Ham] or Kem, meaning 'black,' because of the soil, was the Egyptian name for Egypt.

54. Sanctuary] the land of Canaan, as sacred to God. This mountain] the mountain land of Canaan: cp. Ex 15¹⁷. 55. Heathen] RV 'nations.' Divided . . an inheritance] see Josh 13, etc.

56-64. The reference is to the days of the Judges. 57. Unfaithfully] RV 'treacherously.'

A deceitful bow] which causes the archer to miss the mark (Hos 7¹⁶). 60. Shiloh] see on Jg 18³¹ 1S 13²⁴ Jer 7¹²⁻¹⁴ 26⁶.

61. Strength . . glory] tho ark: see 1S 4.

64. Priests] see 1S 4¹¹. Made no lamentation] In the perils of the time mourning rites could not be observed: see Job 27¹⁵.

65. For this bold figure cp. Isa 42^{13,14}.

66. In the hinder parts] RV 'backward.'

67. Joseph . . Ephraim] Joseph was the father of Ephraim. Both names are used for the northern kingdom as a whole. Shiloh, where the ark had been, was in the territory of Ephraim. Now it was taken to Zion.

69. High palaces] RV 'heights,' the heavens.

Like the earth] firm as the earth. 71. Great with young] RV 'that give suck,' as in Isa 40¹¹.

PSALM 79

For the occasion and date of this Ps. see intro. to Ps 74. It gives a pathetic picture of the calamities that have fallen upon God's people (vv. 1-4), entreats God to withdraw His anger from them, to forgive their sins, and to avenge them on the heathen (vv. 5-12), that they may give Him perpetual praise (v. 13).

1. Jerusalem on heaps] This is truer of the Babylonian captivity than of the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. 6. Quoted from Jer 10²⁵. 8. Former iniquities] RV 'the iniquities of our forefathers,' which are regarded as justly punished by the present calamities. Prevent] in the Old English sense of 'go before,' anticipate our need. 9. Here as in Ps 74 God's regard for His own glory is the Psalmist's chief plea.

10^b. RV 'Let the revenging of the blood of thy servants which is shed be known among the heathen in our sight.' 11. The sighing of the prisoner] Some of the people had been carried into captivity. 12. The prayer for vengeance expresses a moral sentiment less advanced than that of the NT. It springs, however, not from mere personal or national vindictiveness, but from a sincere religious indignation at the dishonour done to God's name.

PSALM 80

This Ps. is an appeal to God to save His people from the adversities that have come upon them, and have made them the laughing stock of their enemies (vv. 1-7). Their past history is recalled under the figure of a vine, once flourishing, but now wasted by wild beasts and fire (vv. 8-16). Special prominence is given to the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin (v. 2). The Ps. was probably written at least after the fall of the northern kingdom (721 B.C., 2K 17^{5,6} 18⁹⁻¹¹), if not during the Babylonian exile. The Psalmist either belonged to that kingdom or had a special sympathy with it in its misfortunes. After the kingdom of Israel came to an end its rivalry with Judah was largely forgotten, and the later prophets cherished the hope of a restoration which would embrace the whole nation (Jer 31¹⁻¹⁵ 31¹⁻²⁰ Ezk 37¹⁵⁻²⁸).

Title.—Shoshannim-Eduth] see on Ps 45 and 60.

1. O Shepherd of Israel] a representation of God characteristic of the Asaphic Pss. (see Intro. to Book 3). Joseph] the father of Ephraim and Manasseh. The name is applied to the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. Dwellest between, etc.] RV 'sittest upon the cherubim': see Ex 25²⁰⁻²² Ezk 1²⁵ 10¹. 2. Ephraim . . Benjamin . . Manasseh] These three tribes were the descendants of Rachel. They encamped together in the wilderness, and followed immediately after the tabernacle when Israel was marching (Nu 2¹⁸⁻²⁴). The Psalmist prays that they may be restored to their ancient place of favour. 3. This v. recurs as a refrain in vv. 7, 19. Turn us again] bring us back from captivity. Cause thy face to shine] from Nu 6²⁵.

8. For the vine as an emblem of Israel see Isa 5¹⁻⁷ 27²⁻⁶ Jer 2²¹ Ezk 17¹⁻¹⁰. 11. The sea] the Mediterranean on the W. The river] RV 'River': the Euphrates on the E. These were the ideal boundaries of Israel (Gn 15¹⁸ Ex 23³¹ Dt 11²⁴ Ps 72⁸), which were reached for the time in the days of Solomon (1K 4²⁴).

13. Boar . . wild beast (RV 'beasts']

Israel's enemies, especially, perhaps, the Assyrians. 15. Vineyard] RV 'stock'; another reading gives 'protect.' 16. They perish] The figure of the vine is dropped here.

17. Let thy hand be upon] to protect. The man of thy right hand] the nation of Israel personified, with a special allusion to the name Benjamin, which means 'son of the right hand': see v. 15. Son of man] another expression for the nation in its human weakness: cp. the use of the phrase in Ezekiel (21, etc.).

18. Quicken] make alive, revive.

PSALM 81

After a summons to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles (vv. 1-3) this Ps. recalls the meaning of Israel's national festivals as memorials of their deliverance from Egypt (vv. 4-7). From v. 6 onward God is the speaker. In vv. 8-10 He repeats His ancient command to Israel to worship Him alone, and in vv. 11, 12 He tells of their disobedience and its consequences. The concluding vv. express His desire that Israel may now prove more loyal than of old, that He may bless them with victory over their enemies, and with all outward prosperity (vv. 13-16). There is nothing to fix the date of the Ps., except that the allusion to the feast in vv. 1-3 shows that either the first or the second Temple was in existence when it was written, and that vv. 14, 15 point to a time when Israel was confronted by enemies. It was after the return from the exile that the Feast of Tabernacles came into greatest prominence (Ezr 3⁴ Neh 8¹³⁻¹⁷ Zech 14¹⁶⁻¹⁹).

Title.—Gittith] see on Ps 8.

3. In the time appointed] RV 'at the full moon.' The Feast of Tabernacles began on the 15th day of the seventh month (Lv 23³⁴), i.e. at full moon. The beginning of the same month (the new moon) was celebrated by the Feast of Trumpets (Lv 23²⁴). 5. He went out through] RV 'he went over' (RM 'against'): cp. Ex 13, etc. 'He' refers to God. Where I heard . . . understood not] rather, 'I heard the speech of one that I knew not,' i.e. of God. The Psalmist puts himself in the place of the ancient Israelites, and thus introduces the words of God which follow. Before the exodus God had been unknown to Israel by His name 'I Am,' or 'Jehovah' (Ex 3^{13,14} 6²⁻⁸).

6. Pots] RV 'basket.' Baskets for carrying bricks, etc., are often represented on the Egyptian monuments. 7. Secret place of thunder] the pillar of cloud and fire: see Ex 14²⁴. Meribah] = 'Strife': see Nu 20¹³.

Selah] see on 3⁴. 9. is a quotation of the first commandment (Ex 20³ Dt 5⁷). 10. Open thy mouth, etc.] So Orientals feast their favoured guests. 12. And they walked] RV 'that they might walk.'

13-16. The verbs refer to the present—Would hearken . . . would walk . . . subdue . . . turn . . . submit . . . endure . . . feed . . . satisfy. 15. The haters of the LORD] i.e. Israel's enemies.

Unto him] probably means 'unto Israel.'

PSALM 82

This Ps. is an impeachment of unjust judges, who are officially called 'gods.' It represents them as put upon their trial at God's tribunal (v. 1). God Himself denounces their wickedness (v. 2), and reminds them of their duties (vv. 3, 4). In v. 5 He declares that they are incorrigible, and in vv. 6, 7 pronounces sentence upon them. V. 8 is the Psalmist's own prayer that God may manifest His righteous judgment to all the nations. The date of the Ps. is quite uncertain. Oriental judges have been corrupt in all ages.

1. Of the mighty] RV 'of God' (EV). A heavenly assembly is meant, as in Job 1⁶ 21 Zech 3. The gods] the judges of Israel, so called as the official representatives of God on earth. See Christ's explanation in Ju 10^{31,32}.

2. Accept] RV 'respect.' 3. Defend] RV 'judge.' 5. They know not] The judges are deaf to reproof. Out of course] RV 'moved.' Injustice leads to the wreck of society. 6. See on v. 1. 7. The v. contrasts the purely human fate of the unjust judges with the superhuman dignity of their calling.

PSALM 83

This Ps. describes a confederacy of God's enemies, the object of which is to attack and exterminate Israel (vv. 2-5). A list of the allies is given (vv. 6-8). The Psalmist appeals to God to interpose (v. 1), and to deal with these hostile nations as He dealt with the Midianites (Jg 6-8) and the Canaanites (Jg 4, 5) of old (vv. 9-12). Vv. 13-18 continue the prayer for their overthrow, in order that they may seek and acknowledge the true God. No historical occasion is known on which all the nations mentioned were leagued against Israel. The Ps. is connected by some with the invasion in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20), by others with the opponents of Nehemiah (Neh 4^{7,8}), and by others still with the enemies of Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac 5).

3. Thy hidden ones] those in God's protection: cp. 27⁵ 31²⁰. 5. Are confederate] RV 'make a covenant.' 6, 7. Edom . . . Moab . . . Ammon] The neighbours of Israel on the SE. and E. 6. Tabernacles] RV 'tents.' Ishmaelites] wandering desert tribes.

Hagarenes] or Hagarites, a nomadic tribe in the region E. of Gilead (1 Ch 5¹⁰). 7. Amalek] a tribe of the desert S. of Palestine.

Gebal] a district of Edom, S. of the Dead Sea. The Philistines] RV 'Philistia,' between Palestine and the Mediterranean on the SW.

Tyre] a city and kingdom on the NW. sea board of Palestine.

8. Assur] RV 'Assyria.' This empire did not come into close contact with Israel till after the time of Jehoshaphat. After the fall of Assyria the name was used generally for the region of the East, even under the Persian kings (Ezr 6²²). The children of Lot] the Moabites and Ammonites (Gn 19³⁶⁻³⁸) already mentioned, and apparently the leaders of the hostile combination.

9. Sisera . . Jabin . . Kison] see Jg 4, 5.

10. En-dor] not mentioned in Jg 4, 5, but it was in the locality referred to in Jg 5¹⁹: see Josh 17¹¹. 11. Oreb, and . . Zeeb] the princes of Midian (Jg 7²⁵). Zebah, and . . Zalmunna] named as kings of Midian in Jg 8²¹. 13. A wheel] RV 'the whirling dust.' 15. Persecute] RV 'pursue.'

PSALM 84

This Ps. sets forth the attractiveness of the Temple and its worship (vv. 1-4), and the happiness of the pilgrims who gather to it from different parts of the land (vv. 5-7). After a prayer for God's favour (vv. 8, 9), it speaks of the privilege of the humblest office in the Temple (v. 10), and closes by describing the graciousness of God (v. 11), and the blessedness of trusting Him (v. 12). The Ps. belongs to a period when the Temple was standing, and when its services were regularly carried on. If v. 9 is a prayer for the king, it must be the first Temple that is in view. Pss 42, 43 have points of resemblance to this one, and may possibly be by the same author.

Title.—Gittith] see on Ps 8.

1. How amiable] RM 'how lovely,' and how lovable. 4. They that dwell in thy house] the priests and other Temple officials. 5. The ways of them] RV 'the high ways to Zion.' The reference is to Israelites whose hearts are set on the journey to Jerusalem. 6. Baea] RM 'balsam trees,' which grow in dry situations. This fact gives the v. its point. The pilgrim heart finds refreshment even on thirsty ground.

A well] RV 'a place of springs.' The rain . . pools] RV 'the early rain covereth it with blessings.' 7. From strength to strength] The pilgrimage brings no weariness, but the opposite: see Isa 40³¹, and cp. 'The Pilgrim's Progress.'

9. Our shield] This phrase may either refer to God (see v. 11) or to the king, in parallelism with 'thine anointed' in the following clause: see 89¹⁸ RV. Look upon the face] regard with favour. Thine anointed] probably the king. Some suggest that the high priest or the nation as a whole may be meant.

10. Better than a thousand] spent elsewhere.

A doorkeeper] This was the special duty of the sons of Korah, who are mentioned in the title of the Ps. (1 Ch 9¹⁹).

PSALM 85

This Ps. looks back upon the mercy which God has shown to His people in bringing them back from captivity (vv. 1-3), entreats Him to remove the displeasure that has again fallen on them, and to deliver them from present troubles (vv. 4-7), and ends with a hopeful picture of the blessings that will follow the answering of the prayer (vv. 8-13). It evidently belongs to a time soon after the return from the Babylonian exile—either the days of discouragement before the building of the second Temple (Ezr 4^{4,5,24} Hag 1 Zech 1¹²⁻²¹), or the period of Nehemiah (Neh 1³). The Ps. is one of those for Christmas Day.

2. Selah] see on 3⁴. 9. That glory may dwell] The reference is to the Shechinah, the symbol of God's presence.

10, 11. Mercy . . truth, etc.] These characteristics, which are thus personified, are, first of all, attributes of God, but they are also to be reflected in the lives of His people. This is shown by the mention of earth as well as heaven in v. 11. 12. Material prosperity will accompany spiritual blessings. 13. Set us . . steps] RV 'make his footsteps a way to walk in.'

This is a Ps. of general supplication for help in trouble, and breathes a devout spirit of gratitude and confidence towards God. Specially remarkable is the hope of v. 9 that God will be universally worshipped. The Ps. is made up of quotations from other Pss. and portions of the OT., and is to be dated after the return from the exile.

1. Hear] RV 'answer.' Poor and needy] see 40¹⁷ 70⁵. 2. Preserve my soul, etc.] see 25²⁰. Holy] RV 'godly'; rather, 'one whom thou favourest.' 3. Daily] RV 'all the day long.' 4. See 25¹. 7. See 50¹⁵. 8. See Ex 15¹¹ Dt 3²¹. 9. See 22²⁷⁻³¹. 11. See 26⁵ 27¹¹. Unite my heart] deliver me from divided purposes and affections.

13. The lowest hell] RM 'Sheol beneath,' the state of the dead: see 56¹³. 14. See 54⁸. Assemblies] RV 'congregation': see 22¹⁶.

15. See Ex 34⁶. 16. See 25¹⁶.

The son of thine handmaid] another phrase for 'thy servant': see 116¹⁶.

PSALM 87

This Ps. expands the thought of Ps 86⁹. Zion is the chosen dwelling of God (vv. 1-3), the spiritual birthplace of the other nations (vv. 4-6), and the source of joy to them all (v. 7). In v. 4 God is the speaker. The mention of Babylon as no longer an enemy of Israel, but as receiving spiritual blessing from Zion, shows that the Ps. was written after the bitter experience of the captivity was over.

1. His foundation] i.e. God's. The holy mountains] the hills on which Jerusalem stood.

2. Zion] Jerusalem. The dwellings of Jacob] other cities of Judah. 3. Selah] see on 3⁴. 4. Rahab] Egypt : see Isa 30⁷ 51⁹ Ps 89¹⁰.

To them that know me] RV 'as among them that know me.' This man] RV 'this one,' this nation. So in v. 6. 5. This and that man] RV 'this one and that one.' This and that nation shall be converted to God.

6. People] RV 'peoples.' God is represented as making a register of the nations which have been born into His kingdom.

7^a. RV 'They that sing as well as they that dance shall say.' The nations which have been born again will rejoice in their new connexion with Zion, and will address her accordingly. 7^b. Springs] RV 'fountains.'

PSALM 88

This is the saddest and most despairing of all the Pss. The writer is apparently the victim of some incurable disease like leprosy, with which he has been afflicted from his youth (v. 15), and which cuts him off from the society of men (vv. 8, 18). His life is already a living death (vv. 3-6), and beyond death he has no hope (vv. 10-12). He traces his trouble to God's displeasure (vv. 7, 14, 16), yet it is to God that he turns in pathetic appeal for relief (vv. 1, 2, 9, 13). Nothing is known as to his identity, or as to the date of the Ps.

Title.—Mahalath] see on Ps 53. Leannoth] may mean 'for singing.' Heman] see 1 K 4³¹.

3. The grave] RV 'Sheol,' the under-world of the dead. 4. Strength] RV 'help.' 5. Free] RV 'cast off.' 6. Pit . . darkness (RV 'dark places') . . deeps] expressions for Sheol.

9. Mourneeth] RV 'wasteth away.' 11. In destruction] RV 'in Destruction.' The Heb. is Abaddon, used as a proper name for Sheol : see Job 26⁶ 28²² 31¹² Prov 15¹¹ 27²⁰ Rev 9¹¹.

13. Prevent] RV 'come before.' 17. Daily] RV 'all the day long.'

We have here another national and historical Ps., written when the Jewish kingdom and its king had fallen very low before their enemies, contrasting the promises made to David with their seeming lack of fulfilment in the course of events, and appealing to God to vindicate His faithfulness. Vv. 1-4 are introductory, announcing the Psalmist's purpose of praising God, and recalling the covenant made with David. The following vv. celebrate God's glory among His heavenly hosts (vv. 5-7), in His victory over His enemies, especially Egypt (vv. 8-19), and in the world of nature (vv. 11, 12). Vv. 13, 14 declare His attributes of strength, righteousness, mercy, and truth, and vv. 15-18 speak of the blessedness of His people and their king. His promises to David are repeated at length (vv. 19-37), and the present humiliation of king and people are graphically described (vv. 38-45). The closing vv. are a prayer, in which the Psalmist pleads the shortness of his own life, and the reproaches of the heathen, as reasons for a speedy manifestation of God's faithfulness to His word (vv. 46-51). V. 52 is the closing doxology of Book 3 of the Psalter. The Ps. was probably written during the exile, and it has been supposed that the king of vv. 39-45 is Jehoiachin, who was deposed and carried away to Babylon in his youth, after a reign of three months (2 K 24⁸⁻¹² 2 Ch 36⁹⁻¹¹ Jer 24¹ 29²), and kept a prisoner there for thirty-seven years (2 K 25²⁷).

Title.—Maschil] see on Ps 32. Ethan the Ezrahite] mentioned in 1 K 4³¹ and 1 Ch 2⁴.

3, 4. God is here the speaker : see on vv. 19-37. Selah] see on 3⁴. 5. Congregation of the saints] RV 'assembly of the holy ones.' The angels are meant. 6. Sons of the mighty] angels : see 29¹. 7. Assembly of the saints] RV 'council of the holy ones,' as in v. 5. Had in reverence of] RV 'feared above.' 8. Or to thy faithfulness] RV 'and thy faithfulness is.'

10. Rahab] Egypt : see on 87⁴. 12. Tabor and Hermon] the most prominent mountains of Palestine. 14. Justice] RV 'righteousness.'

Habitation] RV 'foundation.' 15. The joyful sound] perhaps the sound of trumpets on the occasion of Israel's national and religious rejoicing. 17. Our horn] see 75^{4,10}. 18. RV 'For our shield belongeth unto the LORD : and our king to the Holy One of Israel.' The 'shield' is the same as the 'king,' who is under God's protecting care.

19. In vision] 28^{7,17}. Thy holy one] RV 'thy saints,' the nation of Israel. I have laid help, etc.] I have given a brave man My aid to defend Israel.

19-37. are a poetical expansion of 28⁷⁻¹⁰.

22. Exact upon him] RM 'do him violence.'

25. In . . in] RV 'on . . on' : see on 80¹¹.

27. My firstborn] The position formerly given to the nation (Ex 4²²) is here assigned to its king. 30 f. The promises of the past are recalled in view of the sad present. Israel had suffered for his sins. Should he not be restored? 37. And as the faithful witness, etc.] The meaning is uncertain. The 'faithful witness' may be the moon, or we may read, 'and the witness in the sky (God) is faithful.'

38. Abhorred] RV 'rejected.' Thine anointed] Israel's king. A particular individual, probably Jehoiachin, seems to be in view in this and the following vv., though they may also be understood of the nation as a whole.

39. Made void] RV 'abhorred.' 40. The thought passes from the king to the nation. For the figure cp. 80¹². 45. The days of his youth] a phrase specially appropriate to Jehoiachin. 46. Shall] RV 'how long shall.' 47. Wherefore... in vain?] RV 'For what vanity hast thou created all the children of men!' 48. Hand of the grave] RV 'power of Sheol.' 50. People] RV 'peoples,' the enemies of Israel.

52. The doxology marks the close of Book 3: cp. 41¹³ 72^{18,19}.

The Pss. in this book, as in that which follows, are mostly of comparatively late date, and suitable for use in the worship of the sanctuary.

The two books seem to have been conjoined at one time, and to have formed the third great division of the Psalter. In the 17 Pss. of Book 4 several smaller groups or collections are to be distinguished. Pss 93, 95-100 are called the 'theocratic' Pss., because they celebrate God as King, finding in the restoration of Israel from Babylon the evidence of His rule over the world. These Pss. are probably to be dated soon after that event, when it was still the one thought in men's minds. Pss 90, 91, 94 and 102 probably belong to the exile, as their language suggests such a time of national humiliation and sorrow. Pss 103 and 104 go together, and are probably by one author, who belonged to the period of the return. Pss 105 and 106 form a pair of about the same date. The whole book is 'Jehovistic' in its use of the divine name.

The Pss. of the fourth book may be classified thus, the divisions necessarily overlapping one another: (a) Penitential Pss., 90, 91, 94, 102; (b) Pss. of Thanksgiving, 92, 93, 95-100, 103-106; (c) National Pss., 94, 97, 99, 102, 105, 106; (d) Historical Pss., 105, 106; (e) a Gnostic Ps., 101.

Most of the Pss. in this book are anonymous, but Pss 101 and 103 are ascribed by their titles to David. LXX, however, also gives as Davidic Pss 91, 93-99, 101, 103 and 104.

There are definite references to the Temple worship in several of these Pss., indicating that the sacred building was restored to permit of the sacrifices being offered and public worship performed. The musical service was rendered with instrumental accompaniments (98^{5,6}); the people were called upon to join in praise (95¹ 96¹ 98^{1,4}) and kneel in prayer (95⁶); offerings were to be made in the courts of the Temple (96⁸).

The Messianic hope appears in this book in the form of an expectation of Jehovah's coming in judgment. This was strengthened, if not wholly suggested, by the restoration from captivity, in which the pious Israelites saw the beginning of that coming. The people were led to look for a still greater day when their enemies would be finally overthrown, and the faith of those who had trusted in God would be completely justified (see Pss 96-98).

PSALM 90

The title of this Ps. (A Prayer of Moses the man of God) ascribes it to Moses, but several considerations have been pointed out which suggest a later date for its composition. The average length of life in the time of Moses is supposed to have been greater than that mentioned in v. 10 (Dt 34⁷ Josh 24²⁹). Israel's national life seems not to be just beginning, but to have lasted already for many generations (v. 1). The recent past has been a time of calamity rather than of deliverance (v. 15). The Ps. contains resemblances to the book of Deuteronomy, which is now generally regarded as much later than the time of Moses, and these resemblances may have suggested the title. At the same time, there is much in the Ps. which is consistent with the title, and some scholars still maintain its Mosaic authorship. If not written by Moses it may most probably be assigned to the exile. The Ps. contrasts the eternity of God with the transience of human life (vv. 1-6), traces the brevity and troublesomeness of man's existence to God's displeasure with sin (vv. 7-12), and ends with a prayer for God's forgiveness and favour (vv. 13-17). It is appropriately used in the Burial Service.

1. See Dt 32⁷. 2. Mountains] see Dt 33¹⁶.

3. Return] to dust (Gen 3¹⁹). 4. A watch in the night] of which the sleeper is unconscious. There were three night-watches among the Israelites (Lam 2¹⁹ Jg 7¹⁹ 1 S 11¹¹).

5. They are as a sleep] or, 'they fall asleep' in death. 9. Spend] RV 'bring to an end.' As a tale that is told] RM 'as a sigh,' a breath.

10. Their strength] RV 'their pride.'

11^b. RV 'and thy wrath according to the fear that is due unto thee?' Who understands Thine anger against sin so as to give Thee fitting and holy reverence?

12. Apply... wisdom] RV 'get us an heart of wisdom': see Dt 5²⁹ 32²⁰. 13. Repeat] see Dt 32³⁰.

14. Early] RV 'in the morning.' 15. According to] i.e. in proportion to. 17. The work of our hands] The phrase occurs in Deuteronomy seven times.

PSALM 91

This Ps. describes the safety of those who trust in God, and may have a special reference to the nation of Israel at a time when other nations were involved in calamity. The dangers that threatened Babylon towards the end of the exile have been suggested as a probable occasion for it. The Psalmist sometimes speaks in the first person (vv. 1, 2, 9), and sometimes addresses his promises to the godly man, or to the nation, in the second person (vv. 3-8, 9-13). God Himself is the speaker in vv. 14-16.

1. Secret place] covert. Shadow] the shelter which a mother-bird gives her brood, as in v. 4; see 17⁸. 3. And . . pestilence] LXX 'from the destroying word,' the snare being explained as malicious speech: see 38¹². 'Pestilence' comes later, in v. 6. 5. The terror, etc.] assaults by night, as compared with attacks by day. 6. Destruction] plague. Pestilence and Plague are here personified: see 2S24¹⁶, 17 Isa37³⁶. 9. Because . . refuge] RV 'For thou, O Lord, art my refuge!' Eren . . habitation] RV 'Thou hast made the Most High thy habitation.' 11, 12. These vv. are quoted in the accounts of our Lord's temptation (Mt4⁶ Lk4¹⁰). 13. Dragon] RV 'serpent.'

PSALM 92

This is a Ps. of praise, called forth by some special manifestation of God's loving-kindness. This general theme is set forth in vv. 1-4. Vv. 5-11 contain reflections on the meaning of God's works, a meaning which is hidden from the foolish (v. 6). The wicked seem to flourish only that they may be destroyed (v. 7). God is supreme, and His enemies must perish (vv. 8, 9). This has been proved in the experience of the Psalmist, or of the nation for which he speaks (vv. 10, 11). Vv. 12-15 describe the abiding prosperity and blessedness of the righteous. The Ps. contains no definite indication of date, but it may most probably be taken as a song of the return from exile.

4. Works] doings—a different word from 'work' in the same v. 7, 8. refer to a definite event which the Psalmist has in view. Read, 'did spring . . did flourish . . it was that they might be,' etc. 10. Shalt . . exalt] RV 'hast exalted.' Unicorn] RV 'wild-ox.'

Shall be] RV 'am.' 11. Shall see . . shall hear] RV 'hath seen . . have heard.'

13, 14. The righteous are compared to trees in the Temple courts. 14. Fat and flourishing] RV 'full of sap and green.'

PSALM 93

This Ps., along with Pss 95-100, celebrates God as King. The thought which is common to this whole group seems to have been awakened by a national deliverance, which was probably the return from the Babylonian captivity. The present Ps. is brief, and speaks of God's sovereign rule, His majesty and strength (v. 1), the eternity and steadfastness of His royal throne (v. 2), His supremacy above the waves of the sea (vv. 3, 4), and the holiness of His Temple (v. 5).

1. The world . . is (or, 'shall be') established] see 75⁸ 82⁵. God's rule is the security of all moral order in the world. 3, 4. The floods and waves are emblems of the heathen nations.

4. Noise] RV 'voices.'

PSALM 94

This is a national Ps., written at a time when Israel was oppressed by foreign enemies. It may be connected either with the days of the exile or with some later period of national distress. The opening vv. appeal to God to show Himself as judge of the earth (vv. 1, 2). The misdeeds of the oppressors are next described (vv. 3-7), and a rebuke is addressed to certain Israelites who were tempted to give up their faith in God (vv. 8-11). The next vv. speak of the blessings of adversity (vv. 12, 13), and the certainty that God will not forsake His people (vv. 14, 15). The Psalmist has found in God his only refuge and comfort (vv. 16-19), and concludes his Ps. with the conviction that He will overthrow the wicked (vv. 20-23).

1. Shew thyself] RV 'Shine forth.' 2. A reward] RV 'their desert.' 4. How long, etc.] RV 'They prate, they speak arrogantly,' etc. The v. is a statement, not a question.

7. The oppressors not only injure Israel, but despise Israel's God.

8. Understand] RV 'consider.' Brutish. fools] These words refer to Israelites who are tempted to adopt the heathen point of view.

9, 10. These vv. form an argument for the knowledge and effectual government of God.

10. Heathen] RV 'nations.' Shall not he know?] These words are supplied to complete the sense. The Psalmist breaks off his argument abruptly. 11. This v. is quoted with some modification in 1 Cor3²⁰. 14. The first clause is quoted in Ro11². 15. Return unto righteousness] shall again be just. 17. Almost] RV 'soon.' Silence] the grave, or Sheol.

PSALM 95

This Ps. (the 'Venite,' 'Invitatory Psalm') consists of a call to praise God as King, as the Creator of the world, and the Shepherd of His people (vv. 1-7), followed by a warning against unbelief, drawn from the fate of the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness (vv. 7-11). There is nothing to mark its date, but like the other Pss. of the same group it may be referred to the days of the return from Babylon.

4. Strength of the hills] RV 'heights of the mountains.' 7. If ye will] RV 'Oh that ye would.' 8. In the provocation] RV 'at Meribah' (Nu 20¹³). Temptation] RV 'Massah' (Ex 17⁷).

7-11. These vv. are quoted in Heb 3⁷⁻¹¹, and are the basis of the argument that follows.

PSALM 96

This is a triumphant song of praise to God (vv. 1-3), contrasting His power and glory with the nothingness of the heathen idols (vv. 4-6), calling all the earth to worship Him (vv. 7-9), exulting in His rule (v. 10), and calling all nations to rejoice in the prospect of His coming in judgment (vv. 11-13). The tone of the Ps. is closely akin to that of Isa 40-66, and was in all likelihood inspired by the deliverance from exile. The existence of the second Temple will then be implied in vv. 6, 8. This Ps. has been wrought into the composite poem of 1 Ch 16⁸⁻³⁶.

3. Heathen] RV 'nations.' So in v. 10.

People] RV 'peoples' So in vv. 7, 10, 13.

9. The beauty of holiness] RM 'holy array.'

13. God's judgment is welcomed and not feared, for it means the deliverance of His people and the overthrow of their enemies.

PSALM 97

This is another 'theocratic' Ps., declaring how God has taken vengeance on His enemies in a way to which all nature responded (vv. 2-6), denouncing idols and their worshippers (v. 7), expressing the joy of the cities of Israel at His judgments (vv. 8, 9), calling His people to hate evil (v. 10) and to share the gladness which ought to be their portion (vv. 11, 12). The Ps. is a 'mosaic' of phrases from other Scriptures, and, like the preceding Ps., is probably to be referred to the end of the exile.

1. Isles] the coastlands beyond Palestine, an expression for the Gentile world. 2. Whatever may be mysterious about God's rule, it is certainly founded on righteousness: see 89¹⁴.

3. See 18⁸. 4. See 77¹⁰⁻¹⁸. 5. See Jg 5⁶.

8. Zion] Jerusalem. Daughters of Judah] the other cities of the land: see 48¹¹. 9. See 83¹⁸. 11. Light is sown] A more probable reading is, 'light hath arisen.' 12. At . . holiness] RV 'to his holy name,' this being the true meaning of 'remembrance' or 'memorial': see 32¹¹ 30⁴.

PSALM 98

This Ps. closely resembles Ps 96, especially in its beginning and ending, and is to be referred to the same occasion. It celebrates a deliverance which God has wrought for Israel in the sight of all the earth (vv. 1-3), summons all men (vv. 4-6), and all nature

(vv. 7-9) to praise Him. V. 6 proclaims Him as King, and v. 9 anticipates with gladness His coming to judge the world.

2. Heathen] RV 'nations.' 5. A psalm] RV 'melody': see Isa 51³. 9. People] RV 'peoples': see 96¹⁸.

PSALM 99

This Ps. is like the preceding ones in the prominence it gives to God's Kingship, and no doubt belongs to the same period with them. God's holiness, too, is emphasised in the refrain of vv. 3, 5, 9. The Ps. begins with a call to worship God with the awe and reverence which are due to Him (vv. 1-3). His righteous rule in Israel is a reason for repeating the summons (vv. 4, 5). The history of His dealings with His people from the days of Moses and Aaron to the time of Samuel is summed up (vv. 6-8). V. 9 is almost a repetition of v. 5, and implies that the Temple has been restored.

1. People] RV 'peoples.' So in v. 2.

Between the cherubims] RV 'upon the cherubim': see on 80¹. 2. Zion] The Temple at Jerusalem is God's dwelling and the seat of His rule. 3. For it is holy] RV 'holy is he.' 4. The king] God: see v. 1. 5. His footstool] The ark is so called in 1 Ch 28², but if this Ps. was written after the exile the ark cannot be directly referred to here. The language may be a survival of an earlier usage.

For he is holy] RV 'holy is he,' as in v. 3.

6-8. These vv. may be taken as an illustration from the past of the principle on which God still deals with His people, or they may be translated by present tenses, as referring to the intercessors in Israel whose prayers God has answered in the deliverance from captivity, and who are figuratively called 'A Moses . . a Samuel.' 8. Both in the past and in the Psalmist's time God has shown at once His hatred of sin and His forgiving love to His people. Inventions] RV 'doings.'

PSALM 100

This famous Ps. (the 'Jubilate,' 'Old Hundredth') does not give God the title of King, but its contents are otherwise so similar to those of the previous 'theocratic' Pss. that it is naturally grouped along with them both as to subject and date. It calls the world to worship God (vv. 1, 2), describes Him as the Creator and Shepherd of His people (v. 3), points to the second Temple as the seat of His service (v. 4), and closes with an ascription of praise which was often repeated in post-exilic worship (v. 5).

3. Us] refers specially to Israel, ye being addressed to the nations: see v. 1. And not we ourselves] RV 'and we are his.' The sheep of his pasture] see 95⁷, and the 'Asaphic' Pas. (73-83). 5. Is everlasting] RV 'endureth for ever': see 1 Ch 16^{34, 41} 2 Ch 7³⁻⁶ 20²¹ Ezr 3¹¹ Ps 106¹ 107¹ 118¹⁻⁴ 136, 138^s, etc. The Chronicler evidently transposes into earlier times Pss. which were written after the exile, and the same thing appears to be the case with this formula of praise.

PSALM 101

This Ps. is the prayer of a ruler, apparently of a king. Many scholars believe that the title which ascribes its authorship to David is correct, and connect it with David's desire to have the ark brought from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (2 S 6¹⁰). Others suppose it to have been written by Hezekiah, Josiah, or one of the Maccabees. The writer first utters his resolves as to his personal life and conduct (vv. 1-4), and then announces his purpose of choosing his servants only from among the upright, and of discouraging and exterminating all forms of wickedness (vv. 5-8).

2. When wilt thou come unto me?] This interjected phrase may refer to David's longing for the presence of God, as symbolised by the ark, in his capital. 4. Not know a wicked person] RV 'know no evil thing.' 7. Tarry in my sight] RV 'be established before mine eyes.' 8. Early] RV 'morning by morning.'

PSALM 102

This Ps. belongs to the closing days of the exile, and utters the hope of Israel's restoration (vv. 13-22). The Psalmist has been supposed by some to speak simply in the name of the nation, but it is more probable that he describes his personal distress, though this was caused by the captivity and humiliation of his people. In v. 14 he speaks of his fellow-countrymen in the plural, and his shrinking from premature death (vv. 11, 23, 24) breathes a distinctly personal note. He is wasted away with lonely sorrow (vv. 1-7, 9), mocked by enemies (v. 8), and conscious that his affliction is a token of God's displeasure (v. 10). But the eternity and changelessness of God are the ground of his hope (vv. 12, 24-28) both for himself and for the whole of God's people.

3. Like smoke] RM 'in smoke.' An hearth] RV 'a firebrand.' 5. Skin] RV 'flesh.' 6, 7. describe figuratively the Psalmist's mournful love of solitude.

6. Desert] RV 'waste places.' 8. Are sworn against me] RV 'do curse by me,' the literal meaning of 'execrate.' 10. Lifted... up... cast down] RV 'taken... up... cast away.'

11. That declineth] that vanishes when the sun sets. 12. Remembrance] RV 'memorial,' i.e. name: see Lam 5¹⁹. 13. Favour] RV 'have pity upon.' So in v. 14. The set time] see Isa 40² 61².

15. Heathen] RV 'nations.' 16, 17. Shall build... appear... regard... despise] RV 'hath built... appeared... regarded... despised.'

18. The people] RV 'a people.' The restored Israel will be a new nation.

19. His sanctuary] heaven, as the parallelism shows. 21. To declare] RV 'that men may declare.' 22. People] RV 'peoples.'

25-27. Quoted in Heb 1¹⁰⁻¹². 27, 28. The changelessness of God is a guarantee that His kingdom will endure among men. This is an argument for national rather than for personal immortality. For the higher Christian truth see Jn 14¹⁰.

PSALM 103

In this Ps. the hope of the previous one has been fulfilled, and sorrow has given place to thanksgiving. Its probable date is soon after the return from exile. The Psalmist utters his personal gratitude and praise (vv. 1-5), and tells how God has shown to Israel in his own day the same power and grace which He showed in the days of Moses (vv. 6-12). Special emphasis is laid on God's fatherly pity for His people in their frailty, and on the eternity of His mercy as shown to generation after generation (vv. 13-18). An ascription of praise to God as the universal King, in which all His angels and all His works are called to join, closes the Ps. (vv. 19-22).

5. See Isa 40³¹. The eagle's strength seemed to indicate perpetual youth. 6. Righteousness and judgment] RV 'righteous acts and judgments,' i.e. deliverances. 17. Expresses the same assurance as 102²³⁻²⁸. 19. Prepared] RV 'established.' 21. Ministers] servants, referring to the angels.

PSALM 104

This is a Ps. of Nature, celebrating God's glory as seen in His works both inanimate and animate. It is an expansion of the closing vv. of Ps 103, and like that Ps. begins and ends with the phrase, 'Bless the Lord, O my soul!' The two Pss. are probably the work of the same author. Ps 104 follows to some extent the order of the creation-poem in Gn 1, and may be compared also with Job 38-41. Vv. 5-9, 19 speak of the creation of the world, but the greater part of the Ps. describes its present condition and arrangements, which need not be analysed in detail. The closing vv. consist of an ascription of praise (vv. 31-34), and a prayer for the destruction of the wicked (v. 35).

3. Chambers] lit. 'upper chambers': see Am 9⁶. The waters referred to are those above the firmament (Gn 1⁷ Ps 148⁴), which are the source of rain: see v. 13. Wings of the wind] see 18¹⁰.

4. His angels spirits] read either, 'his angels winds,' or 'winds his messengers' (RV). The former rendering is the more natural, is parallel to that of the next clause, and is adopted in Heb 1⁷, where the v. is quoted. The latter reading seems to give a simpler sense, but the other is quite intelligible also. As God manifests His own glory in the universe, so He manifests the power of His angels in the winds and the lightning. 7-9. These vv. are parallel to Gn 1^{9,10}. God's command to the waters is conceived as having been uttered in thunder (v. 7). 16. Full of sap] RV 'satisfied,' as in v. 13. 19. See Gn 1¹⁴⁻¹⁸. 22. Gather themselves together] RV 'get them away.'

25. So is this great and wide sea] RV 'Yonder is the sea, great and wide.' Things creeping, etc.] or, 'things moving,' etc.: see Gn 1²¹. 26. Leviathan] see Job 41, where the crocodile is referred to. Here a sea-monster is meant. 31. The glory . . shall endure . . the LORD shall rejoice] RV 'Let the glory . . endure . . let the LORD rejoice.' 34. My meditation of him shall be sweet] RV 'Let my meditation be sweet unto him': see 19¹⁴. 35. The point of the Psalmist's prayer is that evil may be banished from the world, though he identifies sin with sinners, and seems to include their destruction in his wish. Praise ye the LORD] This sentence should probably be read as the beginning of the next Ps.

PSALM 105

This Ps. and the following one form a closely connected pair, and may be looked on as by the same author. From the closing vv. of Ps 106 it appears that they were written after the first return from exile had taken place, but while many Israelites were still scattered among the heathen. Both Pss. are partly wrought into the composite poem in 1 Ch 16. Ps 105 is a song of thanksgiving, recalling with gratitude God's covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (vv. 8-12), His guidance of Israel into Egypt, with special reference to the history of Joseph (vv. 13-23), His goodness to them there in the days of oppression (vv. 24, 25), His deliverance wrought through Moses and Aaron by means of the plagues (vv. 26-38),

His mercies in the wilderness (vv. 39-41), and finally His gift of Canaan to His people in fulfilment of His ancient promise (vv. 42-45).

1. People] RV 'peoples.' So in vv. 20, 44.

14. Kings] Pharaoh (Gn 12¹⁷), and Abimelech (Gn 20^{17,19}). 15. Anointed] a phrase not literally applicable to the patriarchs, but used by the Psalmist because they were the heads of the nation, like the kings of later times.

Prophets] Abraham is so called in Gn 20⁷.

19. His word] Joseph's interpretation of the butler's and baker's dreams (Gn 40²⁰⁻²²).

28-36. The ninth plague is placed first, the third and fourth are transposed, and the fifth and sixth are omitted. 31. Divers sorts] RV 'swarms.' Coasts] RV 'borders.' So in v. 33.

44. Heathen] RV 'nations.' Inherited] RV 'took in possession.' 45. Praise ye the LORD] see on 104³⁵. Ps 105, like Ps 106, probably begins and ends with 'Hallelujah.'

PSALM 106

As Ps 105 gives thanks for God's goodness, so Ps 106 confesses Israel's sin and acknowledges God's mercy, both being illustrated in an historical retrospect from the deliverance from Egypt down to the return from captivity: cp. Ps 78 Ezk 20.

1. See on 100⁵. 7. Provoked him] RV 'were rebellious.' So in vv. 33, 43. 8. For his name's sake] see Ezk 20¹⁴. 26. Lifted up his hand] swarc. To overthrow] RV 'that he would overthrow.' So in v. 27. 28. See Nu 25² Hos 9¹⁰. The dead] the lifeless heathen gods.

29. Inventions] RV 'doings.' So in v. 39.

32. Strife] RV 'Meribah': see 95⁸.

34. Nations] RV 'peoples.' Concerning whom] RV 'as.' 35. Were mingled] RV 'mingled themselves.' Heathen] RV 'nations.' So in vv. 41, 47. 37. Devils] RV 'demons': see Dt 32¹⁷. 46. Implies the return from captivity.

48. This doxology concludes Book 4 of the Psalter, but appears at the same time to have been an original part of Ps 106. Let all the people say, etc.] A direction to guide the people in worship. 1 Ch 16³⁸ shows how it was carried out.

BOOK 5 (PSALMS 107-150)

This book, which seems originally to have been joined with Book 4, contains forty-four Pss., the vast majority of which are of late date. The contents of these Pss. are a surer guide to the period to which they belong than is the case in the other books, as many of them give either direct references or unmistakable hints regarding experiences of the exile or the return. Thus Ps 107¹⁰⁻¹⁶ refers to the years of captivity, as does also Ps 137. Other Pss., such as 126, refer to the joy of the return, and others still, e.g. 132, are prompted by the rebuilding of the Temple.

The feature of this book which is most marked is its liturgical character. Many (though not all) of the Pss. contained in it are not individualistic but congregational, and bear traces of having been composed for use in public worship. Pss 115⁹⁻¹⁸ 116¹²⁻¹⁹ 118, 135 and 136 may be cited as good illustrations. Many smaller groups have been incorporated in this book, and can be easily recognised. The principal are the Hallel Psalms (113–118), the Songs of Ascents or Pilgrim Psalms (120–134), and the Hallelujah group (145–150). Psalm 108 is composed of Pss 57⁷⁻¹¹ and 60⁵⁻¹², and was obviously compiled for liturgical purposes. Ps 136 is a chant with responses for choir or congregation after each verse.

Fifteen of the Pss. of this book bear the title 'Of David,' indicating that they were taken by the final editor from the earliest or Davidic psalter. One of these (Ps 142) has a historical note, which describes it as 'a prayer when he was in the cave'; but there is nothing in the Ps. to justify the reference. The book is Jehovistic in its choice of the divine name, Jehovah occurring 236 times and Elohim only 7 times.

PSALM 107

The Psalmist sings the lovingkindness of the Lord, giving examples from (a) Israel in the wilderness (vv. 4–9). (b) people in captivity (vv. 10–16). (c) people in sickness (vv. 17–22). (d) vicissitudes of sea-going men (vv. 23–32). (e) and a rescue from drought (33–42). The Ps. has a refrain at intervals (vv. 8, 15, 21, 31).

1. For his mercy endureth for ever] evidently a well-known refrain: cp. Ps 136. Mercy] better, 'lovingkindness.' 2. Redeemed] perhaps from exile. 3. Lands] i.e. foreign lands.

4. The v. might refer to wanderings on the way from Egypt, but the reference to 'a city of habitation' (v. 7) points rather to return from Babylon to Jerusalem. 10. Sit] RV 'sat.' Iron] perhaps metaphorically: cp. 105¹⁸. The reference is evidently to captivity, i.e. slavery. 11. The words of God] as declared by His prophets. 14. Bands] i.e. their state of subjection: cp. 2³.

16. Cp. Isa 45². 17. A new illustration. Read, probably, 'Sick men, because of the way of their transgression,' etc. 20. Sent] RV 'sendeth.' The phrase is noteworthy as heralding, unconsciously perhaps, the Word (Jn 1¹⁴).

23–30. A striking description of mariners in a storm. 27. Are at their wit's end] RM 'all their wisdom is swallowed up.' 30. Their desired haven] RM 'the haven of their desire.' The word rendered 'haven' is an Assyrian loan-word, and properly means an 'emporium' or 'mart.' It is found here only.

33. General instances of God's kindness in various districts. Some suggest that this is a later addition to the Ps. It has great likenesses to Job and Isa 40–66. 34. Barrenness] better, RV 'a salt desert'—perhaps thinking of Sodom: cp. Job 39⁶. 35. Cp. Isa 41¹⁸.

39. Again] better, 'and when'; but the v. is abrupt and the connexion obscure.

40. Quoted from Job 12^{21, 24}. It interrupts the connexion, and by some is omitted. 41. Cp. Job 21¹¹: 'He set the needy on high from (above) affliction, and established (for him) families as a flock.' 43. Cp. Hos 14⁹, a closing admonition.

PSALM 108

This is a composite Ps. 1–5 is practically Ps 57⁷⁻¹¹, and 6–13 is the same as 60⁵⁻¹². For notes on individual vv. the reader is referred to these two Pss. Probably the two fragments were brought together in a separate collection from Book 2, and subsequent perhaps to the formation of that book. This Ps. preserves its Elohist character. It bears the title, 'A Song, a Psalm of David.' It is one of the Pss. for Ascension Day.

PSALM 109

The strongest of the imprecatory Pss. (see Intro.). Probably it is just to regard the Psalmist as speaking in the name of the whole nation, vexed and harried by foreign enemies, e.g. Antiochus Epiphanes. The theory that the Psalmist recounts the curses used against him by his enemies is untenable. Calvin notes the awful use of this Ps. by certain monks, who hired themselves out to recite it against private enemies.

6. Satan] RV 'an adversary.' The word has both meanings in Hebrew. Satan was the accuser who blamed men before God: cp. Job 1, 2 Zech 3. 7. Let his prayer become sin] truly a horrible curse: cp. Prov 15¹. 8. Let another take his office] cp. the reference to Judas Iscariot (Ac 1²⁰). Hence this was known to the early Fathers as 'Psalmus Iscarioticus.'

10. Let them seek, etc.] better, 'let them be driven out far from their desolate homes.'

11. Spoil] better, 'make spoil of.' 23. I am tossed up and down] better, 'I am shaken off like a locust.'

PSALM 110

A fragment of an ode of victory to a priest-king—'Worthy,' says Luther, 'to be set in a frame of gold and diamonds.' A truly Messianic Ps., finding its fulfilment in the triumphs of Christ in the world, and quoted Mt 22⁴³ Mk 12³⁶ Lk 20⁴² Ac 2³⁴ Heb 1¹³ 5⁶: see Intro.

1. Lit. 'Oracle of Jehovah to my lord.' The Psalmist seems to hear God addressing the king, whom Jehovah invites to a seat at His right hand, the place of honour. Our Lord applies this v. in the Messianic sense in which it was evidently understood by His countrymen.

2. Send] better, 'stretch . . . (saying), Rule thou,' etc. 3. Thy people, etc.] better, 'Thy people offer themselves in the day of thy mustering,' i.e. of the army for battle. In the beauties of holiness] Many scholars, with slight change in Heb., render, 'on the mountains of holiness,' i.e. on the holy mountains. 'From the womb of the morning comes to thee the dew of thy youth,' i.e. thy young men gather to thy standard in the morning like the dew for vigour and freshness. 4. The king is to be priest as well. This might be true of a Davidic prince: cp. 2S6¹⁴, or of Simon Maccabæus, cp. 1Mac 10²¹. But it is ultimately most certainly Messianic: cp. Zech 6¹¹⁻¹³. 'After the manner (RM) of Melchizedek,' who was king and priest in Salem, i.e. Jerusalem: cp. Gn 14¹⁸.

5. The LORD] i.e. Jehovah. The v. describes the victory of the king. Shall strike] RM 'hath stricken.' 6. The Hebrew is difficult, but the meaning is clear. Dead bodies cover the field; heads of men are smitten over a wide area (in the pursuit). 7. The victor king stoops to drink of the brook by the way, and with renewed strength (head uplifted) continues the pursuit of the flying enemy.

PSALM 111

Pss 111, 112 are closely connected both in form and substance, and are apparently the work of one author. They are alphabetical (see Intro.). A liturgical introduction is prefixed to both, viz. 'Praise ye the Lord': in Hebrew 'Hallelujah.' The theme of Ps 111 is the refrain of Ps 107, 'Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men.' The Ps. is used on Easter Day.

1. Assembly] RV 'council'; the word means, 'a secret gathering.' 5. Meat] i.e. food.

6. That he may give them] RV 'in giving them.' Probably the writer refers to the conquest by Joshua. 9. Redemption] i.e. from Egypt. He . . commanded, etc.] i.e. He made a covenant, which was never to be violated. 10. The fear, etc.] a very frequent saying among the sages of Israel: cp. Prov 1⁷ 9¹⁰, etc. The meaning is that religion is the foundation of all wisdom.

PSALM 112

See on Ps 111. This also is an alphabetical Ps., every half-verse beginning with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The subject is specially the blessedness of the truly religious man.

5. A good man] RV 'Well is it with the man that.' He will guide his affairs with discretion] RV 'he shall maintain his cause in judgment,' i.e. in court of law. 9. His horn] symbol of strength and power.

PSALM 113

This Ps. begins the group (113-118) known in the Jewish Church as the Hallel Psalms, or Hymns of Praise, from hillel, to praise. They are sung at the Passover Feast—Pss 113, 114 before the second cup, and 115-118 after the fourth cup; formerly recited also at the other two feasts, at the New Moons, and on the eight days of the Feast of Dedication (Cheyne). Ps 113 has been called the Magnificat of the Old Testament. Note the liturgical introduction and conclusion ('Hallelujah' = 'Praise ye the LORD') for use in the Temple service.

6. 'Who stoopeth down to look in heaven and on earth.' 9. The barren woman] a grievous sorrow to a Jewish wife. There is here an echo of Hannah's song (1S 2¹⁻¹⁰).

PSALM 114

This has been called 'one of the finest lyrics in literature.' Probably it is a post-exilic psalm wherein, under the figure of the old exodus from Egypt, the Psalmist chants the return from Babylon. In all ages of the Church it has been used to celebrate the release from the bondage of sin. Hence it is a hymn for Easter night.

1. Strange language] i.e. unintelligible speech—foreign. 2. Was] RV 'became.'

3. Saw it] i.e. the presence of God. The allusion is to the dividing of the Red Sea and of Jordan, the opening and closing events of the deliverance from Egypt. 4. Skipped] i.e. trembled: cp. Sinai, Ex 19¹⁸. 5. What ailed?] The answer is, the presence of God.

8. Cp. Ex 17⁶ Nu 20¹¹.

PSALM 115

In LXX 114, 115 are one Ps., while 116 is divided into two. Apparently Ps 115 was written to be sung antiphonally: cp. the responses in vv. 9, 10, 11—the first eight and the last three verses to be sung by the congregation. Probably it is a very late Ps. The writer proclaims the vanity of idols, and ascribes all help and blessing to Jehovah alone.

1. Israel is reviled by idolatrous foreigners, and appeals to God to vindicate His honour.

3. God is the God of heaven, therefore He can save His people. 4. This the idols cannot do.

9. A Levite sings, 'O Israel, trust thou in the Lord.' The choir respond, 'He is their help and their shield': so 10, 11. 12-15. is sung by a different person.

16. 'The heavens are the heavens of Jehovah,' etc.: His peculiar dwelling as opposed to the earth, which is the habitation of men. 17. Silence] i.e. Sheol, where there is no communion with God.

PSALM 116

Pss 115-118 were probably the hymns sung by our Lord and His disciples. Some modern scholars, however, deny this, on the ground that, in Christ's time, the Hallel was only in its beginning, and consisted simply of Ps 113, or, at most, also of Ps 114: see Mt 26³⁰ Mk 14²⁶. Ps 116 is apparently a song of thanksgiving after severe illness, but the Ps. has been used by both churches and individuals in spiritual as well as temporal deliverances. The Psalmist's experiences pass through various stages, viz. suffering (v. 3), prayer (vv. 4, 5), deliverance (vv. 6-9), thanksgiving in public (vv. 12-19). At v. 10, LXX begins a new Ps.

3. Hell] RM 'the grave.' He was at the gates of death. 9. His life will be preserved.

10, 11. The sense is most obscure. Two meanings are proposed: (a) I believed even when I spoke, saying, I am greatly afflicted, even when I said in my haste, All men are liars; (b) I believe (for I will speak) that I was greatly afflicted. In my alarm I said, All men are liars. 13. The Psalmist intends to offer a sacrifice, and already anticipates the feast which follows when he would solemnly raise the cup to Jehovah in gratitude for deliverance; hence he calls it the cup of salvation.

15. Precious] i.e. of such consequence to God that He will require penalties for it.

PSALM 117

The shortest chapter in the Bible, and the middle chapter. It is a doxology, calling all peoples to praise Jehovah. It may have been appended to some Ps.

PSALM 118

This Ps. was evidently written for the Temple worship on the occasion of some great festival (v. 24), when it might be used as a processional hymn. It has been variously referred (a) to the time when Zerubbabel laid the foundation of the second Temple; (b) to the time of Nehemiah; (c) to the cleansing of the Temple by Judas Maccabeus. It is a noble song. Luther declared that he owed more to Ps 118 than to all the princes and friends who supported him.

Vv. 1-18, dealing with the subject of God's mercy, which has brought them out of trouble, are sung by the procession antiphonally in half-verses; 19 is the request of the procession before the gates, and 20 the Levite reply; 21-24 are sung antiphonally; 26 is the cry of the Levite choir within; while 29 is a closing liturgical chant for the whole congregation.

3. House of Aaron] the élite of the nation.

5. In distress] lit. 'in a strait place.' The LORD] RM 'Heb. Jah,' a contraction of Jehovah. 12. Are quenched] but Bæthgen, with a slight change of Hebrew, renders, 'they flared forth like a fire of thorns,' and this makes admirable sense. Omit for.

13-16. The thought changes to the scene of the encounter. 14. Quoted from Ex 15².

15. The right hand, etc.] This and the following v. are what the voice says. 19. Gates of righteousness] i.e. the gates of the Temple whence God's righteousness streams forth, or it may mean the gates into which righteous men enter: cp. v. 20.

22. The stone] i.e. Israel primarily. The builders] the nations of the world. There is, however, a tradition that such a stone really existed in the building of the second Temple. The ultimate application to Jesus Christ is most fitting: cp. Mt 21⁴² Ac 4¹¹, etc. 24. The day] a day of triumph.

25. Save now] Heb. hoshéu na anna; hence, 'Hosanna,' which became a liturgical formula: cp. Mt 21⁹. 26. Cometh] better, 'entereth' (the courts of the Lord). 27. Which hath shewed RV 'and He hath given.' Bind, etc.] The Hebrew is obscure. 'Bind the sacrificial victim with cords even till you come to the horns of the altar,' or, less likely, 'Bind the procession with festal garlands and approach the horns of the altar.' There is nothing about binding the sacrifice to the horns, etc.

The longest Ps. and the best example of an alphabetical Ps. There are in it twenty-two stanzas; each of the 8 vv. of each stanza commences with the same Hebrew letter. The subject is practically the same throughout, viz. the great help and guidance and comfort to be derived from studying continually the Law of the Lord. Much ingenuity is displayed in expressing the same thoughts under various forms.

Note in this connexion the following variety of terms—Law, or instruction (torah): Testimonies, or affirmations of God's will; Judgments, or judicial pronouncements as to the Law; Statutes (lit. 'inscriptions'), or published enactments; Commandments, Precepts, or injunctions.

It is difficult to locate the Ps. in time or circumstances. Such devoted meditation on the Law is a feature of later Judaism which arose chiefly after the exile. This is also true of the mechanical arrangement of the Ps. If the writer records his own experiences they must have been very trying—trouble, sorrow, the hostility of powerful foes, and even captivity. But some scholars believe that the writer sometimes records his own experiences, sometimes the experiences of the pious remnant of Israel.

19. Stranger] or, 'sojourner,' passenger, with but a short time to learn God's will. 21. The proud] perhaps Jews who had been influenced by foreign culture. 25. Quicken] i.e. revive. 29. Way of lying] i.e. faithlessness to God's law. 39. My reproach which I fear] viz. of sinning against God. 43. He prays never to be deprived of the power of testifying to God's truthfulness. 46. Before kings] i.e. in exile.

54. 'Melodies have thy statutes been to me in the house of my sojourning,' i.e. in this brief life: cp. 39¹². 56. 'This (comfort) I have that I have kept thy law.' 70. Fat as grease] dull, gross: cp. Job 15^{20, 27} Isa 6¹⁰.

83. Bottle] R.M. 'winc skin.' Bottles were made of the untanned hide of an animal. In the smoke they would be dried up, shrivelled and useless. Such Israel seemed to be in captivity. 84. How many, etc.] i.e. my days are few.

91. They] i.e. the heavens and the earth.

96. The most perfect earthly things are finite and limited; but God's law is for all needs and for all time. 109. My soul, etc.] i.e. my life is ever in jeopardy. 118. Their deceit is falsehood] better, 'their self-deception is a lie.' 123. Fail for] fail through longing for.

130. The entrance] R.V. 'the opening,' i.e. the unfolding. 132. Uset to do] i.e. art wont to do. 140. Very pure] i.e. true metal: cp. 18⁸⁰. 147. I prevented, etc.] i.e. Before day-break I cried. 148. 'Mine eyes forestall the night-watches,' i.e. when each watch comes I am already awake. 161. Princes] probably it was Israel, i.e. the Jewish nation, that was so persecuted.

164. Seven times] i.e. very often.

165. Nothing shall offend them] R.V. 'they have none occasion of stumbling.' 176. Like a lost sheep] probably refers to the Jews scattered in exile. The last clause of the v. concludes the idea of straying into sin.

PSALMS 120-134

These Pss. are similar in thought, style, and language. Each bears the heading A Song of degrees, R.V. 'A Song of Ascents.' Scholars now agree for the most part in interpreting this title 'A Song of Pilgrimages' (lit. 'goings up'), as indicating the use of these Pss. for pilgrims on their annual journeys to keep the various feasts at Jerusalem. Others explain the 'Ascent' as referring to the return of the exiles from Babylon. This section had doubtless been a separate Psalter with this title, 'Songs of Pilgrimages,' affixed. When these Pss. became a part of the greater collection 90-150, the title was affixed to each Ps. separately. There is also an indication in these titles that the Pss. are specially intended for vocal music. Exquisitely beautiful they are, well fitted for pilgrim songs, either for the Jew to Jerusalem, or for the Christian to that heavenly Zion whose builder and maker is God: see Intro.

PSALM 120

A cry for help to Jehovah in the midst of sore distress, evidently by an exile under foreign oppression.

4. 'Sharp arrows of a mighty man, with glowing coals of broom,' i.e. burning charcoal made of broom. Both expressions are figures for divine judgments: cp. 140¹⁰.

5. Mesech] i.e. the Moschi, a tribe dwelling near the Euxine Sea: cp. Gn 10², also Herodotus 3.94. Kedar] tribes of N. Arabia famous for their black tents: cp. Song 1⁵. Here the two names are probably taken as typical examples of the wild and inhospitable peoples among whom many of the Jews were exiled.

6. Long] the emphatic word 'all too long.' Turbulent tribes fond of war surround the writer.

PSALM 121

The song of the traveller, whose guide is Jehovah.

1. Hills] R.V. 'mountains.' The mountains suggest strength, and the Psalmist asks a question, 'Whence shall my help come?' The answer is given in v. 2: 'from Him who made the mountains and all else.' If this Ps. were sung going up to Jerusalem then the 'mountains' may be the hills around Jerusalem, or those on which that city is built.

5. Shade] i.e. shelter for defence.

6. A belief in the injurious influence of the moon is an almost universal superstition. If e.g. the moon shines on the face of a sleeper he may become blind: cp. 'moonstruck.'

PSALM 122

The writer recalls a journey to Jerusalem and the many sacred memories associated with that much-loved city.

1. 'I rejoiced with them that said unto me.'

2. Shall stand] rather, 'were standing,' i.e. came to be standing. 3. Jerusalem is builded] R.V. 'Jerusalem that art built.' Compact] descriptive of the appearance of the rebuilt city, with the breaches restored and the walls complete, after the return from exile.

4. Go up] better, 'went up,' in days gone by. Unto the testimony] R.V. 'for a testimony' of God's relationship to Israel: cp. 81⁶.

5. Thrones] i.e. tribunals. House of David] either the Davidic line of kings or the princes of the house of David.

6. They shall prosper] R.M. 'let them prosper.'

PSALM 123

The Psalmist looks up steadfastly to God, and expresses his confidence in Him.

4. The scorning of those, etc.] the mocking of them that are at ease—heathen oppressors living in careless security. The circumstances are similar to those in Ps 120.

PSALM 124

This Ps. is sung at the Feast of Purim to commemorate the deliverance from Haman. It is a gladsome lyric, thanking Jehovah for escapo from heathen destruction, and may well have been composed under the impulse of deliverance from the Babylonian exile. In its formation it illustrates a particular rhythmic effect, viz. the ascending scale of a series of phrases.

1. Now may Israel say] what Israel says is vv. 1-5. 3. Quick] RV 'alive,' as Assyria and Babylon did to many nations. 4. Stream] better, 'torrent,' the winter torrent familiar in Palestine. Over our soul] overwhelming the very life of the nation.

PSALM 125

Jehovah is the bulwark of Israel, but evil-doers shall perish. Evidently the nation is under foreign rule : cp. v. 3.

2. The mountains] Jerusalem is high, but the hills, such as the Mt. of Olives and the Hill of Evil Counsel, are higher. 3. The rod of the wicked] RV 'the sceptre of wickedness,' i.e. heathen dominion shall be broken off lest in despair the righteous be tempted to turn aside to sinful practices. 5. Those who hesitate between serving Jehovah and worldliness will be swept away with heathen idolaters.

PSALM 126

A song of those who have been redeemed (from exile), and a hopeful prayer for those who have not yet returned.

1. Turned again the captivity of Zion] either, brought back the exiles who returned to Zion, or, turned again the fortunes of Zion, i.e. perhaps, set her free from foreign yoke.

4. Turn again our captivity] perhaps, 'bring back the exiles.' As the streams in the south] i.e. like the hill streams in the arid S. land of Judah (the Negeb), dry for a time in summer but becoming suddenly swollen torrents in the rains of autumn.

5. A proverb—sow in tears, reap with ringing cries. The reference may be to the difficulties amid which the pioneers of the return from exile had to work : cp. Ezr and Neh.

6. Weepeth] suggestive of the patient labour of the sower. Bearing precious seed] better, 'bearing a measure of seed.' The sower carried the seed in a cloth tied to his body—this cloth full is a 'measure.'

PSALM 127

A warning against over-anxiety in any work. Let it be left in the wise hands of Jehovah, who gives the best blessings without human aid. Perhaps the Ps. was addressed to some too-zealous workers in the restoration of Jerusalem. The title assigns it to Solomon, but probably it was written long after his day. Its proverbial philosophy may have led to its association with his name : cp. Prov 11.

2. Bread of sorrows] RV 'bread of toil' :

cp. Prov 10²². For so he giveth his beloved sleep] a difficult phrase. With a slight change in the Hebrew we may render, 'surely he giveth his beloved in sleep.' Others may toil and worry and vex themselves and make little progress. But to His loved ones God gives prosperity even while they sleep : cp. Mk 4²⁷.

3. Children] according to Jewish belief one of God's greatest blessings, yet given without the laborious thought and care of men.

4. Children of a man's youth would grow up and be able to help and protect him when he is old. 5. But] RV 'when.' In the gate] Here the market was held and justice administered. The man with stalwart sons need not fear false accusers at the judgment-seat : cp. Job 5⁴.

PSALM 128

The man who fears God will be blessed in his family life. The Ps. has been called the 'Home, Sweet Home' of Judaism.

3. By the sides of thine house] RV 'in the innermost parts of thine house,' i.e. in the women's apartment. Olive plants] a precious tree in Palestine. 5. 'May the Lord bless thee out of Zion,' i.e. from His dwelling-place.

6. The Psalmist closes with a note of patriotism : RV 'Peace be upon Israel.'

PSALM 129

A song of deliverance in trouble and the overthrow of the wicked.

3. Made long their furrows] Descriptive of the persecutions Israel had endured.

6. Afore it groweth up] better, 'before it is plucked,' or, 'before it is unsheathed' i.e. before it shoots into blossom. 8. Cp. Ruth 2¹.

PSALM 130

The De Profundis—a song of redemption from trouble through faith in God. Probably a very late Ps. The Ps. is antiphonal. First voice (vv. 1, 2), Second voice (3, 4), First voice (5, 6), Chorus (7, 8).

1. Out of the depths] i.e. from sore trouble.

4. Feared] Rather a startling statement. But the fear of God means true, earnest religion : cp. 19¹⁰ Gn 20¹¹. 6. RV 'more than watchmen look for the morning,' i.e. impatiently. 7. Plenteous redemption] i.e. abundant means of effecting salvation for His people.

8. Redeem, etc.] i.e. deliver not only from the consequences of sin, but from sin itself.

PSALM 131

A song of child-like resignation of one committing himself to God in time of trouble.

2. Behaved] RV 'stilled.' Children were weaned between two and three years of age.

Even] better, 'within me,' or 'upon me,' referring to the child upon its mother's bosom.

PSALM 132

This is the most difficult of the Pilgrim Songs. According to accepted literary criticism it must be a post-exilic Ps. The Temple worship has been restored. The days of David are in the distant past. The circumstances of the time are such that God's promise to David of a perpetual dynasty is recalled as a ground of hope. Accordingly we must believe that the writer either incorporated a fragment from an earlier period, vv. 6-10, or represented Israel speaking, dramatically describing three periods, (1) vv. 6, 7, the time of David; (2) 8, 9, the time of Solomon; (3) 10, the writer's own age. In any case, the Ps. is one of great charm and delicacy, echoing and re-echoing the promise that Jehovah hath chosen Zion for His habitation.

1. 'Lord, remember unto David all his afflictions' (cp. 1 Ch 22¹⁴), i.e. for good—to do him good in consequence: cp. 137⁷. David] perhaps, here, 'the house of David,' or 'the representative of David.'

3-5. David's vow to find a permanent home for the ark: cp. 2 S 7². 6. We heard of it at] i.e. the people heard the ark was at Ephrathah, perhaps the district round Kirjath-jearim, where the ark stayed till a place was prepared for it in Mt. Zion: cp. 1 Ch 13⁵. Fields of the wood] 'field of Jaar,' i.e. Kirjath-jearim, shortened for the sake of rhythm.

8-10. These vv. are found in 2 Ch 6^{41,42}, and undoubtedly refer to the dedication of the Temple by Solomon. 8. Ark of thy strength] the symbolical centre of Jehovah's power in Israel. The ark is mentioned only here in the Psalter. Unless, as suggested above, the whole passage is quoted from the very late book of Chronicles, it is difficult to account for its presence in this Ps. 9. Thy saints] God's chosen people. 10. Turn not away the face] owing to the rejection of his prayer. Thine anointed] means the king.

11, 12. Cp. 1 K 8²⁵. In vv. 11-18 we may trace the divine answer to the prayers of vv. 8-10. 13. This is the keynote of the Ps. 14. See 68¹⁶. 15. A Messianic promise against famine, very welcome in such a country as Palestine.

16. Salvation] here, 'health,' 'prosperity.'

17. The horn] which is generally a symbol of strength, is in Daniel the symbol of a king.

To bud] sprout: see Jer 23⁵ 33¹⁵ Zech 3⁸, where the 'branch' or 'sprout' denotes the Messianic King: see also Lk 1⁶⁹. Ordained] RM 'prepared.' A lamp] symbol of undying prosperity in a house: cp. 1 K 11³⁶ Prov 20²⁰.

18. Flourish] i.e. sparkle.

An exquisite gem of song describing the blessings of unity—suitable for a pilgrim song, when rich and poor, priest and peasant, might fraternise with Zion in sight.

2. Precious ointment] better, 'goodly oil.' It is doubtful whether the second relative clause is parallel to the first referring to the oil, or whether it refers to Aaron's beard. The Heb., like the AV, can be interpreted either way. It is probably best to take it as referring to the oil. So LXX takes it. The idea is to emphasise the richness and fulness of life which friendship gives.

3. RV 'Like the dew of Hermon that cometh down on the mountains of Zion.' Hermon is the most conspicuous feature in Palestine, standing in the extreme N. away beyond the springs of Jordan, and over 9,000 ft. in height. The writer evidently thought that the dew came down from the distant Hermon cool and fresh, and settled on Zion. For there] i.e. in Zion. Peace and harmony are life to the nation.

PSALM 134

A night-greeting addressed to the priests and Levites in the Temple. V. 3 is their reply to the greeting.

PSALM 135

A Ps. of praise suitable for public worship, beginning and ending with the liturgical Hallelujah. It is full of rich mosaics illustrating Jehovah's greatness and the vanity of idols. Pss 134, 135 were sometimes taken as one by the Jews, Ps 135 being an expansion of 134, with certain elements from Ps 115.

4. Peculiar treasure] see on Ex 19⁵. 7. For the rain] i.e. to produce rain, as it was thought: cp. Zech 10¹ RV. Treasuries] storehouses, where, according to ancient belief, the winds were kept. 10, 11. Cp. Nu 21²⁴. 13. Memorial] that by which Jehovah is remembered.

14. Judge] i.e. do justice on behalf of: cp. Dt 32³⁵. Repent himself] i.e. pity, relent towards. 15, 18. See 115⁴⁻⁸. 21. Out of] i.e. from out of.

PSALM 136

A song of praise to God ever merciful. It is sometimes known as the great Hallel, although the Talmud includes also Pss 120-135 under this title. It differs from all other Pss. in the Psalter in that each v. closes with a refrain. 6. Cp. 24². 19-22. Cp. 135^{11,12}.

23. Low estate] i.e. condition of abasement, perhaps the exile or subjection to a foreign yoke.

PSALM 137

A lifelike memorial of the bitter experiences of exile concluding with (a) a strong expression of patriotism, and (b) an outburst of hatred against the enemies of Jerusalem. Probably written soon after the exile.

1. Rivers of Babylon] The river was the Euphrates, from which branched off a network of canals, on whose banks grew the willows here referred to. These were a species of poplar.

2. Harps] The Kinnor was the most ancient kind of harp, properly a lyre. 3. A song] lit. 'the words of a song.' Sing us, etc.] probably in mockery. Hebrew music would not be so good as Babylonian. 5. Forget her cunning] i.e. her skill in playing on the harp.

7. The children of Edom in the day] RV 'against the children of Edom the day,' i.e. the day of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans (2K 25^{8t}), when Edom rejoiced at its fall: see Obad vv. 10-12. 8. Who art to be destroyed] i.e. doomed to destruction.

9. Stones] RV 'rocks.' We cannot defend this terrible curse, but the cruelties of these Eastern oppressors were a provocation which fortunately we cannot now realise.

PSALM 138

Although the title ascribes this Ps. to David, it is generally considered to belong to the post-exilic period, of whose earnest piety it is one of the best examples. According to some scholars the speaker is Israel, but this is doubtful.

1. Before] i.e. in front of, in opposition to the (false) gods. 2. Thy name] Thy character, as hitherto revealed. The present fulfilment of thy promise surpasses the renown of all thy former doings.

3. Strengthenedst me] RV 'Thou didst encourage me,' lit. 'madest me proud.'

6. Afar off] RV 'from afar.' They are not hidden from God's eye, or beyond the reach of God's justice. 8. 'Jehovah accomplisheth (all things) for me.' The works of thine own hands] i.e. the Jewish nation, if Israel is the speaker.

PSALM 139

One of the very greatest of the Pss. No grander tribute has ever been paid to the omniscience and omnipresence of God. The Ps. is ascribed to David, but the Hebrew is decisive in favour of a date very long after David, being marked by Aramaisms.

1-6. God's omniscience. 7-12. God's omnipresence. 13-18. God's wonderful providence in human life. 19-22. God's hatred of sin. 23, 24. A prayer that the Psalmist may be cleansed from all evil.

3. Compassest] RM 'winnowest,' i.e. scrutinisest. 5. Beset] surround, influence. 6. High] the word means 'inaccessible': cp. Dt 2³⁰.

8. Hell] RV 'Sheol,' i.e. the under-world.

9. The wings of the morning] i.e. follow the first rays of dawn which stretch like outspread wings to the far horizon. Uttermost parts of the sea] i.e. the West—Mediterranean. 11. If

I say] The text has, 'and I said.' Cover] some, with slight change, render 'screen me,' and this is evidently the thought of the Psalmist. Even the night, etc.] RV 'and the light about me shall be night'—a parallel to previous clause.

13. Possessed] rather, 'formed,' or 'created.' Reins] the kidneys, seat of thought, feeling, etc., according to Hebrew belief. Covered me] rather, 'woven me together,' like a piece of cloth, with bones, sinews, muscles, etc.: cp. Job 10¹¹. 15. In the lowest parts of the earth] Probably the writer is speaking poetically of the mysterious origin of a human personality in the womb.

16. A most obscure verse. 'Thine eyes beheld my' (yet) 'unformed substance, and in thy book were they all written,' (even) 'the days which were preordained when as yet there was none of them.' The Psalmist himself, all his days, and all their happenings, were in the mind of God before he was born.

18. I am still with thee] either, 'my thoughts still go out to thee and thy wonders,' or, 'I am still in thy thought as an object of care and love.'

19. Surely thou wilt] RM 'O that thou wouldest.' Bloody men] RV 'bloodthirsty men.' 21. The thought is evidently, 'hateful to all right-thinking persons must those be who rebel against such a wonder-working God.'

24. Wicked way] better, 'way leading to sorrow'; the idea is the same. Way everlasting] i.e. the enduring way—well expressed in Prov 12²⁸.

PSALM 140

A prayer for deliverance from enemies (perhaps national), ascribed to David probably because it consists mainly of quotations from, and adaptations of, earlier Pss.

2. 'Continually do they stir up wars': cp. Prov 15¹⁸. 3. Selah] see on 3⁴. 7. Covered] better, 'screened.' 11. Let not, etc.] better, 'a slander shall not.'

PSALM 141

An evening prayer in time of trouble. The Psalmist prays that he may be strengthened to resist temptation, and so escape the fate of evil men.

2. Be set forth] lit. 'raise itself,' like the smoke of incense. 5. Correction from friends is desirable. An excellent oil, which shall not break my head] RV 'as oil upon the head; let not my head refuse it.' For yet, etc.] 'for still my prayer is against their wrong-doing.' 6. An obscure verse. 'When their judges are flung headlong by the sides of the crag, then shall they hear my words that they are sweet.'

7. Also obscure; perhaps, 'Their bones will be scattered at the mouth of Sheol as when one cleaveth and breaketh up the earth,' referring to the judges. 8. But] better, 'for.' Leave not, etc.] RM 'Pour not out my soul,' i.e. let me not die: cp. Isa 53¹².

PSALM 142

A prayer of a hunted soul: ascribed to David 'in the cave,' but not likely to be by him.

3. 'When my spirit is faint within me' (then I remember) 'thou knowest my path.'

7. Prison] metaphorical: cp. 107¹⁰. Compass me about] RM 'crown themselves because of me.' The meaning is, that they will rejoice with him in his rejoicing.

PSALM 143

A late Ps., though ascribed to David, consisting mainly of appropriate reminiscences from earlier Pss.

2. Shall no man living, etc.] perhaps, 'is no man living righteous.' 3. That have been long dead] better, 'that are for ever dead': cp. Lam 3⁶. 4. Is... overwhelmed] better, 'faints.'

Is desolate] better, 'is bewildered.'

6. Selah] see on 3⁴. 7. Hear] better, 'answer': cp. 28¹. 10. 'Let thy good spirit lead me in an even' (i.e. safe, peaceful) 'counlry': cp. 27¹¹.

PSALM 144

This Ps. consists mainly of thoughts and quotations from earlier Pss., e.g. 8 and 18. Vv. 12-15 are, however, quite unlike anything else in the Psalter, and some suppose them to be a quotation from a lost Ps., possibly by David.

2. My goodness] lit. 'my lovingkindness,' but with the change of a single Hebrew letter we can render 'my castle,' which is much more suitable. My people] probably we should render, 'the peoples.' 3. 4. Cp. 8⁴ 39⁵.

7. Strange children] i.e. strangers. 9. See 33².

12. The want of connexion seems to point to a new fragment. Our daughters, etc.] Two renderings are possible: (1) 'our daughters be draped in purple cloth like the hangings of a palace,' or (2) 'our daughters as corner stones carved after the similitude of a palace,' strong and graceful. For 'palace' PBV reads 'temple.'

14. Breaking in] invasion by an enemy.

Going out] either into exile, or to surrender to an enemy. Complaining] RV 'outcry': cp. Isa 24¹¹ Jer 14².

PSALM 145

This is an alphabetic Ps., but the v. with the letter Nun, which should come after v. 13, has been lost. It is a noble Ps., celebrating the praise of God as the bountiful Giver of all good things, used in the Jewish church at morning service, and worthy to be used in all the churches. It is the last Ps. ascribed to David in the Psalter.

5. RV 'of the glorious majesty of thine honour and of thy wondrous works will I meditate.' 13. Here LXX adds the missing v., as follows: 'Jehovah is faithful in all his words and kind in all his works.'

PSALM 146

Here begins the final group, Pss 146-150, known as the 'Hallelujah' Pss., because each begins and ends with that word, meaning, 'Praise ye the Lord.' They sum up the joy of the returned exiles, and form a fitting doxology to the Psalter. They are, of course, specially intended for use in the second Temple. Ps 146 praises God as the true Helper.

9. Turneth upside down] lit. 'causeth to turn aside' (into the trackless desert, where it disappears).

PSALM 147

A song of praise in which the Psalmist recounts God's mercies (1) in restoring Jerusalem, (2) in helping those cast down, (3) in caring for the animal world, and (4) in the changing seasons.

2. Build up] i.e. rebuild, after the captivity.

7. Sing praise] better, 'make melody.'

10. Against self reliance. 11. Hope in his mercy] better, 'wait for His lovingkindness.'

17. Morsels] crumbs (of bread). Frost and snow at Jerusalem are comparatively rare. A change soon follows: cp. v. 18.

19, 20. The writer returns to God's doings for Israel. Judgments] better, 'ordinances,' revealed only to Israel.

PSALM 148

This is the 'Gloria in Excelsis' of the Psalter, wherein all created things, animate and inanimate, are called upon to praise Jehovah.

1. From the heavens] i.e. angels and the heavenly bodies. 4. Waters that be above the heavens] So God divided the waters: see Gen 1^{6,7}.

6. Which shall not pass] RM 'which none shall transgress.' 8. Vapours] smoke or steam: cp. 119³⁴. 13. Excellent] RV 'exalted.'

14. RM 'a horn for his people, a praise for all his saints,' i.e. the giving victory to God's people ('exalting the horn') is a subject of praise.

PSALM 149

A song of praise to God who gives the victory, including vengeance on the enemies of Israel.

4. Salvation] RM 'victory.' 5. Upon their beds] even in the night-season. 9. The judgment] probably referring to the prophecies and Pss. concerning the destruction of the heathen : cp. 18³⁰⁻⁴³ 83¹⁰⁻¹³ Isa 45¹⁴. This honour, etc.] better, 'This' (the overthrow of their enemies) 'shall be an honour for all his saints.'

PSALM 150

This is 'the grand Finale of the spiritual concert,' and worthily closes not only this little Hallelujah group, but the whole Psalter.

1. Firmament of his power] the spreading roof of the sky which His power has made.

3. Trumpet] i.e. Shophar, a kind of horn.

Psaltery] i.e. Nebhel, a species of harp, or guitar, or lyre, with a bulging resonance box at one end. Harp] i.e. Kinnor, the most ancient form of harp; a lyre. 4. Timbrel] i.e. Toph, a circle of wood covered with skin and ornamented with brass bells; tambourine.

Stringed instruments] i.e. Minim, properly, 'strings,' i.e. of a harp. Organs] RV 'the pipe,' i.e. Ugabh, perhaps a Pan's pipe : cp. Gn 4²¹. 5. Cymbals] i.e. Tseltselim, evidently of two kinds. High sounding] cp. 1 Cor 13¹.

6. The climax is reached. 'Let every thing that hath breath praise the LORD. Hallelujah.'

PROVERBS

INTRODUCTION

THE Hebrew word Mashal covers a much larger area than our 'Proverb.' The latter signifies a pithy, pointed saying, which, by its obvious correspondence with the facts of human nature and experience, wins popular acceptance. Of such brief, clear and sensible utterances there are abundant examples in the book before us. But it also contains other forms of composition. There are passages in which the subject is continued for several verses, especially in the earlier and some of the later chapters; lengthy descriptions, such as that of the Bad Woman (c. 7) and the Excellent Woman (31¹⁰⁻³¹); homilies and addresses (120-33 8). In other books of the Bible the Mashal has a still wider range of meaning: it is an allegory (Ezk 17²); a figurative discourse (Nu 23^{7,18}); a byword (Jer 24⁹); a taunt (Isa 14⁴); a lament (Mic 2⁴); an argument (Job 29¹). The idea at its root is that of a similitude or parallelism, a comparison with some well-known object, and it is, as a rule, distinguished from the other parallelism with which we are familiar in the Bible, that of the Psalms, in that it is spoken, not intended to be sung.

The proverbs contained in the book which bears this name are not of the kind which spring unbidden to the lips of the people, the 'Bits of ancient observation by his fathers garnered, each

As a pebble worn and polished in the current of his speech.'

They show on their face that they were composed by thinkers, by the class of men who were known as 'the wise' (Job 15¹⁸ Jer 18¹⁸). In some cases this is distinctly stated (1⁶ 22¹⁷ 24²³). They arrange themselves in five main divisions. The Introduction c. 1-9; 10¹-22¹⁶; 22¹⁷-24; 25-29; the Appendix, 31, 31. To the Introduction (1¹) and to two of the collections (10¹ 25¹) the name of Solomon is prefixed. We are not, however, to understand that he was the author of all the sayings under these headings. He was traditionally regarded as the representative of all wisdom, and at 1 K 4³² we read that he 'spoke three thousand proverbs.' The majority of the maxims and discourses preserved in our book belong to times and circumstances altogether unlike his, but we have no means of distinguishing with certainty any that may have originated with him. The collection probably contains many pre-exilic proverbs besides those of Solomon; but it also contains others of a later date and cannot have been cast into its present form till some time after the exile.

Proverbs occupies an important place in what is known as the Wisdom Literature of the Jews. This consists of the Canonical Books, Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, the apocryphal Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon. Job handles the serious problem of the relation between the sufferings of the righteous and the justice and goodness of God. Ecclesiastes discusses the value of life from a pessimistic standpoint. The Wisdom of Solomon seeks to demonstrate, both to the Gentiles and to those Jews who were tempted to apostasy, that there is no true wisdom apart from the faith in the One God. Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus are guides for daily life, not concerning themselves with intellectual difficulties or the controversy between monotheism and idolatry, but devoted to the promotion of uprightness and purity. It was said of Socrates that he brought philosophy down from heaven to earth. He turned men from speculations on the origin of the universe to their duties as individuals and members of the commonwealth. A somewhat similar remark might be made about this branch of the Wisdom Literature. Its chief concern is with the sane and prudent ordering of daily life. It looks on wisdom as the art of living well. It enforces virtue as the way by which the goal of happiness may be reached. It guards against stumbling blocks, pitfalls, and bypaths. It makes great use of prudential considerations. Yet it is religious at heart. The fear of the Lord is its beginning. God's law, revealed in Scripture and experience, or imparted by meditative and observant men, is never forgotten. His government is over all human affairs; His rewards and punishments take effect in this present life, and are sincerely believed in. But wisdom is not regarded as confined to these strictly practical matters. Agur (30³) uses the word almost in the sense of philosophy. And the wisdom which displays its excellence by guiding aright a young man's course is seen to be essentially one with that attribute of God which directed the creation of the world (c. 8).

The ideal of life here enjoined is by no means an unworthy one. Honesty, industry, chastity, considerateness for all, helpfulness towards the distressed; humanity, reverence, and trust towards God are urged unweariedly. There is no base or unworthy maxim, no sanction of the spirit of revenge, like the Italian, 'Wait time and place for thy revenge, for it is never well done in a hurry': no recommendation of fawning obsequiousness, like the Eastern, 'If the monkey reigns, dance before him.' In some respects it is even healthier in tone than its companion books. Compare, for instance, its view of woman (14¹ 18²² 19¹⁴ 31¹⁰⁻³¹) with Eccl 7²⁸ Eccl 25¹⁶⁻²⁶. On the other hand, there are defects. Two weaknesses are especially to be noticed. First, the absence of all belief in a real life beyond the grave. This is a serious drawback. When men came to realise that rewards and punishments are not distributed on earth in accordance with conduct, the foundation was destroyed on which the proverb-writers built their recommendations of virtue. The Wisdom of Solomon, which owes much to its contact with Greek thought, marks a great advance in this particular (2²³ 3, 4²⁰ 5¹⁵ 6¹⁰); and in the teaching of Christ the prospect of a future dispensation of judgment occupied an important place. Secondly, there is no warm and inspiring hope of the reclamation of the foolish and sinful. If a man is on the wrong side of the line it is taken for granted that he will remain there, contrary to the charity and hopefulness of Him who 'came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.'

As to the notes which follow, it should be remembered that our limits of space preclude anything beyond a short explanation, illustration, or paraphrase of the more difficult ambiguous and interesting paragraphs. The reader is strongly recommended to have the Revised Version always before him. In concise sayings, where everything depends on the exact point being touched, the rendering of a single word makes all the difference. The RV or its margin often hit the mark which the AV has missed. For example, the latter uses the word 'wisdom' to represent several words of the original. It is always worth noting where the RV substitutes 'wise dealing,' 'prudence,' 'subtily.' Again, the RV has sometimes availed itself of the help furnished by the LXX. This is of great importance. Passing from mouth to mouth, not deemed equally sacred with the utterances of the Law or even of the Prophets, these adages frequently failed to keep their original form. And the form presented by the Greek Version sometimes recommends itself as the correct one.

One other recommendation may be permitted. Ecclesiastical is well worth reading along with Proverbs. Its tone is very similar, but it was written somewhat later (about 200 B.C.); it is an invaluable aid to the understanding of the Jewish mind.

PART 1 (Chs. 1-9)

The c. falls into three principal divisions.

1-6. Title and Introduction explaining the object of the whole book, which is to instruct the inexperienced and add to the educated man's knowledge. It is assumed that good conduct is an art which can be taught. But the learner must be in sympathy with the subject; a right judgment concerning moral truth is attainable only by those who hunger and thirst after righteousness. The method of instruction is by proverbs, figures, parables and vivid pictures, and is therefore substantially the same as that which our Lord adopted.

7-19. A Warning against Companionship with Robbers. We are at first astounded at finding such a warning necessary. Only in days of weak government, such as the 5th and 4th cent. B.C., when the rulers were mere representatives of a distant foreign monarch, was such a state of affairs possible.

20-33. Wisdom's Call and Threats. Wisdom is represented as a preacher, who goes out into the streets, the broad places near the city gates, the long gateways through which men enter or leave the town, the 'dusky lane and wrangling mart,' there to lift up her voice. As the prophets (Isa 20² Jer 5¹ Mic 1⁸) went amongst their fellows, as Socrates was daily found in the marketplace conversing with all who would, as Jesus Himself ever taught in synagogues and in the Temple, where all the Jews come together (Jn 18²⁰), so Wisdom is not fastidious or exclusive; none can complain that they have been denied the opportunity of hearing. But the hour is now past. The simpletons, the unbelieving scoffers and the crassly stupid are threatened with swift and sudden punishment. For the Wisdom which here speaks is not of quite the same spirit as that of NT., which is peaceful, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy (Jas 3¹⁷): there is more of Elijah than of Christ in it.

4. Read, 'to give prudence to the simple.' The simple, open to each new impression, believes anything. The prudent, or subtle, has learnt caution from experience. 6. Interpretation] RV 'figure' (Hab 2⁶). Dark sayings] RV 'riddles' (Jg 14¹⁸ Nu 12⁸ Ezk 17² Hab 2⁶).

7. A motto for the whole book. True morality is based on a right relation to God. Fear is the keynote of OT. piety: not slavish terror, but reverence and humility.

8. The teacher addresses the learner as 'My son': parents will also give moral instruction.

9. Read, 'a chaplet of grace.' At banquets the heads of the guests were crowned with garlands. Chains] cp. Gn 41⁴² Dan 5²⁹.

12. Grave] 'Sheol' (RV) and the pit are the cheerless under-world, away from God and all real life, which the dead were supposed to inhabit (2¹⁸ 23¹⁴).

17. Warning is useless: they do not see that they are rushing to destruction.

23. Turn and listen whilst I declare my purpose.

31. Mediæval theologians taught that molten gold would be poured down the throats of the avaricious in hell and that other vices also would be punished in kind. 'That they might learn that by what things a man sinneth, by these he is punished' (Wisd 11¹⁶).

32. When simpletons turn away from instruction they shall suffer for it. 'He who will not be ruled by the rudder must be ruled by the rocks.' Prosperity] RM 'carelessness,' false security. 'Serious things to-morrow,' the Greek tyrant said, thrusting under the pillow of his couch the letter which would have saved him from assassination.

CHAPTER 2

THE SEARCH FOR WISDOM

1-4. The condition which must be fulfilled. Spinoza said, 'The effort to understand is the first and sole basis of virtue.'

1. Hide] i.e. as a treasure. 2. The heart in OT. is the seat of the intellect. 4. Wealth was hoarded in the shape of gold and jewels. In times of peril this was buried (Gn 43²³ Job 3²¹ Jer 41⁸ Mt 13⁴⁴). Hence the suspicion with which Orientals have often regarded modern explorers.

5-8. The result. It brings us into relation with Him who is the only source of wisdom and safety.

7. Sound wisdom] read, 'deliverance.'

8. His saints] read, 'His pious' or 'loving ones'; those who love and are beloved by Him (Ps 12¹ 30⁴ 31²³).

9-19. A further result. It saves from the seductions of bad men and women.

10. When] RV 'for.' It becomes part of his very mind.

16-18. The stress laid in these chs. on sensual vice proves that the evil was a flagrant one. The population was drawn to the great towns where such temptations are common. The strange woman (22¹⁴) was not a foreigner but an adulteress or harlot, to whom the man was not related. In later ages Jewish pride entitled such a person 'an Aramæan,' as though no Jewess would stoop so low.

17. The 'friend of her youth' (RV) is her husband (Jer 3²⁻⁶). The covenant of her God] Though there was perhaps no religious ceremony, the marriage relation was a religious one (Ex 20¹⁴ Mal 2¹⁴).

18. Read,

'For her house leads down unto Death,
And her paths unto the Shades.'

She and her guests are on their way to that under-world which is tenanted by the Shades, the disembodied, shadow-like, hopeless dead (9¹⁸). The ancient idea of a future existence, not worthy of the name of existence, prevails all through this book.

CHAPTER 3

THE BLESSINGS OF OBEDIENCE AND OF CHASTISEMENT

The first and third divisions, 1-10, 21-35, are exhortations to good conduct and promises of consequent blessing. The second, 11-20, declares the profitableness of divine chastening and the value of wisdom.

1. Law] or 'direction.' The teacher speaks as one having authority. 3. Mercy] RM 'kindness.' He is to retain kindness and faithfulness, as he would the signet-ring which hangs from his neck by a cord (Gn 38¹⁸ Song 8⁶). or as the phylacteries on arm and forehead:

Ex 13⁹ Dt 6⁸ 11¹⁸. 5. We are easily misled by passion and sin. 'Thanks to our wisdom, we should, once for all, refrain from being clever.'

8. For navel read 'flesh,' as at 4²². This change only requires the addition of a single letter, and it gives us the pair, 'flesh and bones,' which in biblical language make up the body (Gn 29¹⁴ 2S 5¹, etc.). The drying up of the bones is a figure of extreme distress (17²² Ps 32^{4,5}); hence the word 'moistening' (RM) here. 9. To honour is to pay the dues (Isa 43²⁸ Dan 11³⁸ 1 Tim 5⁷). 10. Presses] i.e. 'vata.'

11, 12. Bp. Andrewes prayed: 'From Thine anger, and yet more from Thy ceasing to be angry, good Lord, deliver us.' 15. Rubies] here, and at 20¹⁵ 31¹⁰, more probably, 'red coral.' The finest red coral has always been very costly. 18. A tree of life] a figure derived from Gn 3: see also Ezk 47¹² Prov 11³⁰ 13¹² 15⁴. 19. It is an additional reason for esteeming her, that creation could not have been accomplished without her. 20. The depths, etc.] i.e. the subterranean storehouses from which fountains and rivers were supposed to be derived.

24. Not affrighted by horrible dreams (Job 7¹⁴). 29. Securely] i.e. without suspicion.

32. Secret] 'counsel' or 'friendship' (RM): they belong to His 'Privy Council' (Gn 18¹⁷ Job 19¹⁹ 29⁴ Ps 25¹⁴ 55¹⁴ Am 3⁷). 35. Joseph, Daniel, Ezra, Mordecai are examples.

ANCESTRAL WISDOM. THE TWO PATHS

In vv. 1-9 the teacher lays stress on the fact that his instruction is a repetition of his father's. No teaching was thought valuable save that which was handed down from one generation to another. The best pupil was the one who was 'a cemented cistern which loses not a drop.' Vv. 10-19 might be called the doctrine of the two paths, the two ways of life. 20-27 enjoin strict attention to instruction and to conduct.

7. Lit. 'The beginning of wisdom is, get wisdom' (RM). When we feel our deficiency we shall make a start. Socrates was the wisest of the Greeks because he felt that he was not wise. And with all, etc.] Read, 'Yea, with all thou hast gotten' (RV): cp. Mt 13^{45,46}.

8. Exalt] i.e. prize highly.

12. His life is like a broad road in which are no obstacles to trip up the unwary.

16, 17. There were many rapacious officials whose appetite for oppression grew with what it fed on. 18. The prosperity of the righteous is 'as the light of the dawn' (RM), ever waxing.

23. Watch over the inner life of thought and feeling; on it prosperity depends (1S 16⁷ Mt 15¹⁹). 25. Keep your eye fixed on the goal: let nothing turn you aside into the devious paths of wickedness. 26. Make your way even and level: walk in the smooth, strait path of righteousness.

CHAPTER 5

UNHOLY PASSION. HALLOWED LOVE

A dissuasive from immorality addressed exclusively to men. The two leading thoughts are (1) the disastrous consequences of adultery; loss of honour, property, life, opportunity of repentance, and (2) the sufficiency and desirableness of conjugal love.

6. Read, 'Lest she should ponder the path of life, her ways are unstable, and she knoweth not.' So far is she from entering on the level path which leads to life, her ways are unstable and she is reckless about it.

9-11. All the fruits of a man's labour are preyed on by the false-hearted woman and her confederates:

'Gaming, Women and Wine,
While they laugh, they make a man pine.'

14. He has only just escaped being brought before the assembly of the people, who would have sentenced him to death (Lv 20¹⁰ Dt 22²²).

15-17. A man's pleasures should be sought at home. Read, with RV, 'Should thy springs be dispersed abroad, and rivers of waters in the streets?' 18. It is blessed when enjoyed legitimately. 19. The opening words are an exclamation: 'Lovely hind! Charming wild goat!' 22. He has had the instruction, but took no heed of it. Now it is too late.

CHAPTER 6

DISSUASIVES FROM HURTFUL THINGS

Vv. 1-19 are inserted here from some other collection, and contain warnings against suretyships (1-5), sloth (6-11), falseness (12-15), evils which the LORD hates (16-19). At v. 20 the thread of c. 5 is resumed.

1. The surety appears to have taken the creditor's hand in the presence of witnesses: cp. 2K 10¹⁵. 3. Read, 'Seeing thou art come into the hand of thy neighbour, go, bestir thyself, and beset thy neighbour. Make haste to get out of his power' (Mt 5²⁵). 7. Ants really have an elaborately organised society: in some species there is a king and queen; others keep slaves. 11. One that travelleth] RV 'a robber.' The roads were insecure, as English ones were in the times when 'highwayman' meant 'robber.' 13. Cp. the Arab's prayer: 'O God, pardon us the culpable winking of the eyes.' Here the winking, etc., are signals to confederates. 16. A proud look] lit. 'haughty eyes' (RV): see our word 'supercilious,' from supercilium = the eyebrow.

25. The beauty of an Eastern woman's eyes is enhanced by being painted round with kohl in the shape of an almond. 26. A harlot brings him down to a loaf of bread, to extreme poverty; an adulteress will involve him in utter ruin. 30. The OT. never treats theft leniently. Read, 'Do not men despise,' etc. Yes! and much more an adulterer. 31. In divers cases twofold, fourfold, fivefold restitution was prescribed (Ex 22, etc.): sevenfold means very great (Gn 4¹⁵).

CHAPTER 7

THE BAD WOMAN

A picture drawn from life of the enticing of a young man by a wicked woman.

2. The apple] lit. 'the little man' of the eye, so called because an image is reflected from the pupil of the eye. It is a figure for the most precious and delicate things (Dt 32¹⁰ Ps 17⁸). 3. The Jews wear a long leather band twisted round the arm and fingers during prayer. Passages of Scripture written on parchment and enclosed in a small leather box are at the same time worn on the forehead.

4. My sister] the title by which bride and wife are addressed (Song 4⁹).

6. The window is the opening; the casement is the lattice-work filling it, looking through which one may see and remain unseen.

9. Twilight ends suddenly, and is followed by dense darkness. 11. Stubborn] or 'wilful'; an epithet applied to an unruly beast which has shaken off the yoke (Hos 4¹⁶). 14. Lv 7¹⁶⁻¹⁸ shows that such sacrifices were followed by a feast: the blood and the fat of the intestines were offered to God; the rest of the animal was consumed by the offerer, his family and guests. The woman is therefore inviting to a sumptuous feast.

19, 20. The husband is a merchant, who is absent on a long journey, as is evident from his having taken with him his purse. He will not be home till the 'full moon' (RV).

26. Read, 'Yea, many are those she has slain.' 27. The chambers of death are the many diverse receptacles supposed to be in the under-world: cp. Jn 14².

CHAPTER 8

WISDOM'S CRY

Wisdom now reappears as a preacher, holding forth in all the places where men most do congregate. After expounding in varied ways the excellence of the gifts which she can bestow, she asserts that she was the first of all God's creatures, who stood at His side when He formed our world, and took part in His work as a master workman, whose delight has always been in the lives and affairs of men. In vv. 1-21 we find only the ordinary kind of personification, in which a quality is spoken of as though it were a living individual. In vv.

22-31, however, it is almost as though Wisdom were an actual person, distinct from God. No one can wonder that in the 4th cent. of our era theologians of diverse schools made considerable use of this c. in the controversies respecting the Second Person in the Holy Trinity. But there is no convincing force in the arguments which either side derived from this source. The object of the writer was to recommend that wisdom which is his constant theme, which manifests itself in the right conduct of life, by showing that it is exhibited and exemplified in the wonders of Nature and the Creation of the world. There is also a trace here of the idea which at a later time asserted itself very strongly, that a medium was required to bridge over the distance betwixt the Spiritual Creator and the material universe. Job 28, 38 Eccles 1²⁻²¹ 24 Wisd 7¹⁻⁸ 21 should be read along with this c.

2. The high places are the walls and towers, vantage-points for a speaker. 5. Wisdom] rather, 'prudence' or 'sagacity.' 12. Read, 'I, Wisdom, have made prudence my dwelling,' i.e. I am complete master of it.

14-16. There is no genuine statesmanship apart from wisdom.

22-31. This account of creation reminds us of Gn 1 Job 38. God makes a vault, the firmament, which rests on the surrounding waters (v. 27). He settles the mountains (v. 25) on foundations which are at the level of the floor of the sea (Ps 104⁸ Jon 2⁹). He firmly encloses the fountains of the deep, so that they cannot break through (v. 28). 22. Read, 'The LORD formed me as the beginning of his creation': cp. Col 1¹⁵ Rev 3¹⁴. 23. Or] i.e. ere, before. 30. As one brought up with him] as a nursing or foster-child; RV 'as a master workman.' I was daily his delight] lit. 'I was delight daily day': my whole existence was delight: cp. Ps 120⁷. 'I am peace,' all peace, nothing else. 34. A king or great man would every morning find a crowd of clients waiting to pay their court and receive his bounties. Happy the client at Wisdom's door. 36. He who misses wisdom wrongs himself.

CHAPTER 9

THE RIVALS

Folly and Wisdom invite guests to their respective houses. The consequences of accepting either of the two invitations are described. We are reminded of the Greek parable, 'The choice of Hercules,' which related how the hero, at the beginning of his career, was accosted by two fair women, Virtue and Vice, who would have him tread, one the rough, the other the flowery way.

1-6. Wisdom's invitation.

1. The word Wisdom is in the plural, to indicate her variety and perfection. She has a house, and therefore is always ready to entertain. The seven pillars—a complete number—are in the courtyard, supporting a gallery. 2. The wine was mixed with spices (Isa 5²³). 3. Messengers are sent when the meal is ready (Lk 14¹⁷). 4. Simple] i.e. inexperienced, easily led, capable of being turned either way. Hence Folly (v. 16) has equal hopes of influencing them. 5. Bread] The name for food in general (v. 2). 6. Read, 'Forsake folly.'

7-12 are out of their proper context.

7. He will insult and revile you. 10. The holy] RV 'the Holy One.' 12. Cp. Ezk 18⁴ Gal 6⁵.

'From David's lips this word did roll,
'Tis true and living yet :

No man can save his brother's soul,
Nor pay his brother's debt.'

13-18. Folly is personified as a woman, the traits of whose character are drawn from the description already given of the lewd woman; and unchastity is looked on as the supreme exhibition of folly. 13. She is 'lond' and ignorant. We speak of a 'loud,' meaning a vulgar woman. 17. The forbidden is attractive.

PART 2 (Chs. 10¹-22¹⁶)

Here we reach the first collection of what were supposed to be Solomon's proverbs. Most of them consist of two lines parallel to each other. The parallelism is one of contrast, or agreement, or explanation, or of different persons and objects. It is impossible to trace any principle underlying the order in which the proverbs stand. Several of them are more or less exactly repeated in chs. 25-29.

CHAPTER 10

The main subject, not treated continuously, but recurred to again and again, is the blessing which attends goodness and diligence, the penalty which follows sin and sloth.

2. Treasures of wickedness] acquired by wrong-doing (Am 3¹⁰). In many synagogues this v. is inscribed over the alms-box. To the later Jews 'righteousness' meant almsgiving (Dan 4²⁷ Tob 4¹⁰ 12⁹ Mt 6¹). 4. To deal with a slack hand is to be lacking in energy. 5. 'Make hay while the sun shines.'

7. 'Only the ashes of the just Smell sweet and blossom from the dust.'

10. Winketh with the eye] i.e. to stir up by malicious hints. In the LXX the second half of the v. runs: 'but he that openly rebuketh maketh peace.' 12. Love hides them from sight.

14. Near destruction] destruction nigh at hand.

16. The wealth earned by a good man will be rightly employed and therefore will bring him lasting gain, but revenue spent in self-indulgence and sin brings nothing but loss in the end. 19. Simeon, son of Gamaliel, said: 'All my days I have grown up among the wise, and I have found nought of better service than silence. . . Whoso is profuse of words causes sin.'

21. Feed] instruct. 24. The fear of the wicked] that which he fears.

25. The storm carries him completely away (Ps 14).

CHAPTER 11

1. False weights were exceedingly common (16¹¹ 20¹⁰ Am 8⁹). 6. Transgressors] RV 'they that deal treacherously.' 10. The shouting expresses exultation. 12. Disparaging remarks concerning neighbours are foolish.

14. For counsel read 'statesmanship.'

16. A woman of gracious disposition and manners obtains honour. 18. Worketh a deceitful work] RV 'earneth deceitful wages,' fairy gold, apples of Sodom.

21. Hands were struck in confirmation of a bargain. Hence the meaning here and at 16⁵ is, 'My hand upon it!' 'Assuredly!' 22. A gold ring was and still is worn by Oriental women, depending from the right nostril to the mouth. 24. Wise and liberal expenditure is contrasted with ill-advised niggardly economy. 26. Buying up corn to sell at famine prices was the evil in those days which corresponded to monopolies, trusts, and combines of later times. 'It is a wicked thing to make a dearth one's garner.' 29. He throws his household into confusion by bad management, arbitrariness, etc.

CHAPTER 12

4. A crown, etc.] Possibly there may be a reference to the crown worn on their wedding-day by bride and bridegroom (Song 3¹¹ 8⁹). In Damascus the bridal crown consists of a silver hoop covered with a network of strings of corals. On this net are fastened strings of gold coins.

5. Two kinds of plans. 6. Their very words are an ambush, meant to cause destruction.

9. Even a poor man in those days could afford to have a slave (cp. Ex 21³²), and such a man, although others might look down on him, would be happier than a person who maintained much state and show but was starving all the while.

11. Follow a regular business: to be occupied with 'vain things' (RM), speculations, and the like, brings disaster. 12. Read, 'Wickedness is the net of evil men.' Their own badness entraps them. 16. A fool blurts out his annoyance: a wise man is in no hurry to publish the insult he has received. 18. Thoughtless talk inflicts grievous wounds: if a wise man is present he heals them.

20. The counsellors of peace] Those who promote prosperity. 21. Mischief] i.e. calamity (17²⁰ 28¹⁴). 23. 'Still waters run deep.' 'Empty vessels make the most sound.'

24. Under tribute] forced to do taskwork (1K9²¹). 26. More excellent than] RV 'is a guide to.' Seduceth them] RV 'causeth them to err.' 27. He is too lazy to look after his own food (19²⁴).

2. Read, 'the desire of the treacherous is for violence' (RM). 3. The times were out of joint: those alone were safe who said nothing. 4. Soul] as in v. 2 and many other passages, means 'appetite.' Made fat] abundantly gratified. 5. Read, 'but a wicked man behaves shamefully and abominably.'

7. One 'feigneth himself rich' (RM), to gain consideration; another 'feigneth himself poor,' to avoid giving and paying. 8. Providence equalises matters: wealth may buy one off from peril, but poverty saves us from fear of being robbed. Not rebuke] RV 'no threatening.' 9. The extinction of the lamp is a sign of disaster: cp. 20²⁰ 31¹³ Job 18⁶ Jer 25¹⁰.

10. 'By pride cometh only contention' (RV): willingness to be advised saves from this and many evils.

11. The proverb originally ran: 'Wealth gotten in haste, etc., but wealth gotten by degrees,' etc. 'Come lightly, go lightly.'

14. Such vv. as this indicate the existence of a definite class of wise men, whose teachings were highly esteemed. 15. Read, 'A man of tact obtaineth favour, but the way of the treacherous is their destruction.'

21. Evil] i.e. misfortune. Good] i.e. prosperity. 23. Tillage] RM 'tilled land.' For want of judgment] RV 'by reason of injustice.' The idea is that God blesses the labour of the righteous poor, but the unjust, though they may be rich, will not flourish.

24. Egyptian proverb: 'The ears of the young are placed on the back, and he hears when it is flogged.'

CHAPTER 14

1. The prosperity of the family depends on the wife (31¹⁰⁻³¹). 3. Of pride] RM 'for his pride.' 4. Where there are no oxen men have not to labour at keeping the crib clean, but at the same time there is no profit. The men who unload coal in Calais harbour used to sing: 'The coal is black, but the money's white.'

8. The wise man's concern is how shall he act; the foolish man's how shall he deceive others. 9. Lit. 'the guilt-offering mocketh at fools.' This seems to mean that fools trust in its expiatory virtue, but that on their behalf it has no efficacy. 10. Every one knows where his own shoe pinches (1K8³⁸). 11. Tabernacle] or 'tent,' used for 'house' (1K12¹⁰). 12. He mistakenly thinks that the path of self-indulgence leads to lasting prosperity.

13. Men do not always wear their heart on their sleeve. Black Care sits behind the horseman.

14. We get our deserts. The backslider in heart is he who forsakes God. 15. 'Quick believers need broad shoulders.' 16. Rageth] RV 'behaveth himself insolently'; will not be told, knows better than any one else.

17. Anger is temporary madness. 19. Not always: see Lk 16²⁰. 22. They wander from the way of safety and peace. 24. Riches rightly used are a crown: but a rich fool has no crown, has nought but folly.

28. Let the king follow a policy which shall increase, not diminish, the number of his subjects. 29. Exalteth folly] i.e. exhibits great folly. 30. A 'tranquil' heart (RM) is contrasted with a jealous one. 32. If we transpose two letters we get the following rendering: 'The wicked is thrust down through his evil-doing, but the righteous hath a refuge through his integrity.' In any case, it is hardly in keeping with the rest of Proverbs to find here a reference to the life beyond the grave.

CHAPTER 15

1. Grievous] i.e. annoying. 'If one pour in hot water let the other pour in cold.'

3. Beholding] RV 'keeping watch upon,' as watching over a city (Isa 52⁸), or the prophets over the people (Ezk 3¹⁷). 4. Read, 'a soothing tongue... a wound in the spirit.' 7. Death not so] RM 'is not steadfast.' 8. A costly offering from the one is unacceptable: the mere prayer of the other is accepted (Mk 12¹²).

11. Hell and destruction] RV 'Sheol and Abaddon.' The latter means 'place of destruction': cp. 27²⁰ Job 26⁶ 28²² 31¹² Ps 88¹¹. At Rev 9¹¹ Abaddon is the Angel of Destruction. Subsequently it became the name for the lowest part of Gehenna. 15. 'Cheerful,' not merry: it is not the word rendered 'merry' in v. 13. 16. Religion delivers from harassing care. 17. A stalled ox] is one kept up and fattened for slaughter. 19. The one sees imaginary hindrances: the other's course is a well-made level road.

21. RV 'maketh straight his going': i.e. acts straightforwardly. 23. Well-considered and opportune speech brings joy. 24. Lit. 'The way of life upward is to the wise man': he escapes the premature death of the wicked.

26. RV 'pleasant words are pure' (in God's eyes). 27. Bribery is one of the greatest curses of the East (Ex 18²¹ Ezk 22¹² Eccl 7⁷).

30. The light of the eyes] i. e. good fortune.

31. He who does not wish to learn will be neither welcome nor happy among the wise.

CHAPTER 16

1-9. God's control of human life.

1. Read, 'the preparations of the heart belong to man, but the answer of the tongue is from the Lord.' Man prepares his plans, but the decisive, final word is suggested by God. 'There's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we will.' 2. Cp. 1 Cor 1⁴.

4. Read, 'The Lord hath made everything for its own end.' God is the absolute Sovereign (Am 3⁶). The wicked are created for punishment (Ex 9¹⁶ Ezk 38¹⁶ 39²¹ Ro 9¹⁷). The truth here pointed to would be expressed in milder terms to-day: we should say that nothing escapes the control and the judgment of God. 5. Though hand, etc.] read, 'he will assuredly not go unpunished' (11²¹). 6. Sin is expiated by kindness and faithfulness towards others (Isa 27⁹ 40² Dan 4²⁷ Hos 6⁶).

9. 'Man proposes, God disposes.'

10-15. The vv. relate chiefly to a king's powers and functions.

10. His sentence has the force of a divine oracle. 11. Probably the word, the 'Lord,' is mistakenly inserted: the human king is meant. The merchant carried his (stone) weights about in a bag. Explorers have found in Palestine ancient weights of hematite, limestone, etc. 15. The light of . . countenance] i. e. his friendly regard. The latter rain] is the spring rain, required to ripen the crops.

16-19. The advantages of a right spirit.

17. The road they travel does not lead to misfortune.

20-25. deal with wisdom and its results.

20. He that handleth, etc.] read, 'he that giveth heed to the word' (of God or of the teacher). 21. The sweetness, etc.] Attractive speech disposes the listener to learn.

22. Instruction] RV 'correction': their folly is their punishment.

26. Hunger prompts labour. It has been wittily said that every boy should pray that he may be born poor. 30. Read, 'he that shutteth his eyes (as if pondering deeply) does it to devise froward things: he that (scornfully) compresses his lips has brought evil to pass.' Slanderers and backbiters are meant. 31. RV 'It shall be found,' etc. The NT. does not teach that the righteous are always rewarded with long life.

32. 'Yet he who reigns within himself, and rules Passions, desires and fears, is more a king; And who attains not, ill aspires to rule Cities of men or headstrong multitudes.'

33. The lot was put in the folds of the garment and then shaken out (Jg 1⁸ Isa 34¹⁷, etc.).

CHAPTER 17

1. Lit. 'the sacrifices of strife.' There would be no pleasure in the festal meal which followed a sacrifice (7¹⁴) if it was accompanied with a quarrel. 'A little with quiet is the only diet.' 2. The Israelite slave was a member of the family (Gn 24¹² Dt 5¹⁴, etc.), might become the heir (Gn 15^{2,3}) or marry the daughter (1 Ch 23^{1,87}). 4. Naughty] injurious. 7. The proverb writers show no hope of redeeming the lost. Their verdict is, 'He that is filthy let him be filthy still.'

8. He who gives a bribe regards it as a precious stone, a stone which brings favour; whithersoever he turns he prospers. Philip of Macedon boasted that he had taken more towns with silver than with iron. 10. A hundred strokes would be more than double the number allowed by the law (Dt 25³). 11. The meaning is doubtful. Either, 'An evil man seeketh only rebellion,' or, 'Rebellion seeketh only mischief.' The rebellion may be against God or the king; if the former, cp. Ps 78⁴⁰ for the cruel messenger.

14. Before it be meddled with] RV 'Before there be quarrelling' The bursting of a dam begins with a small crack. 'Little strokes fell great oaks.' 16. Money cannot buy it if the mind is indisposed to it. 19. To 'exalt the gate' may mean to set oneself above the neighbours, and so become a target for their envy. But the original probably ran: 'He that speaketh proud words.' 24. The fool lacks the power of concentration. 27, 28. 'I have found nought of better service than silence.' 'Silence is a fence to wisdom.'

CHAPTER 18

1. Lit. 'One who separates himself seeks desire, quarrels with all wisdom.' This would mean that a solitary recluse follows his own wishes and opposes everything reasonable. But LXX suggests, 'The alienated friend seeks an occasion of quarrel, seeks by all means to stir up strife.' 2. He likes to talk about his own notions. 4. The second half of the v. shows that it is a wise man who is in view; his words are 'as deep waters,' i. e. inexhaustible; he is ever ready to give helpful answers.

8. Wounds] RV 'dainty morsels.' Malicious gossip finds ready acceptance (Jer 15¹⁶).

10. The name of Jehovah is Jehovah Himself as revealed to men, His manifested character (Ps 75¹). Orientals have always ascribed mysterious powers to the divine titles. Mohammedans repeat them one by one as they count the ninety-nine beads. One of the ancient Persian books declares that the recital of God's names is the best defence against all danger.

14. Bear] RM 'raise up.' 16. A superior cannot be approached in the East without a present. 17. 'Hear the other side.' 20. A man's happiness depends on the way in which he governs and uses his tongue (Mt 12³⁶ 15¹¹).

22. A good wife (Eccl 7²⁸). 24. RV 'He that maketh many friends doeth it to his own destruction; but'

'The friend thou hast, and his adoption tried,
Grapple him to thy soul with hooks of steel.
But do not dull thy palm with entertainment
Of each new-batched, unfledged comrade.'

CHAPTER 19

1. Fool] read, 'rich' (28⁶). 2. Read, 'Also, desire without knowledge,' etc. Desires must be controlled by knowledge. The hasty in action will miss his mark. 'While the discreet advise, the fool doth his business.' 3. Perverteth] RV 'subverteth.' It is his own fault, yet he blames God for it. 6. Great nobles and great donors are always sought after.

10. Delight] RV 'delicate living.' He cannot appreciate refinement. Slaves have often risen to great power in the East: the danger is that they may become like the Felix of Ac 23, who was said to exercise royal power with a slave's disposition. 13. The Arabic proverb is, 'Three things render a house uninhabitable—tak (rain leaking through), nak (a wife's nagging), and buk (bugs).'

17. 'So much hast thou of thy hoard
As thou gavest to thy Lord;
Only this will bring thee in Usance rich and free from sin:
Send thy silver on before,
Lending to His sick and poor.
Every dirhem dropped in alms
Tonethes Allah's open palms.
Ere it falls into the hands
Of thy brother.'

18. RV '... seeing there is hope, And set not thy heart on his destruction.' Not to discipline is to destroy. 19. Attempt to soothe him, and he will rage the more. 22. 'Words are as breath, and will is all.' Only the intention counts (23⁶⁻⁵ Mk 12¹² 2 Cor 8¹²). 24. RV 'The sluggard lurketh his hand in the dish,' etc.: the allusion is to the large dish in the centre into which all dip (Mk 14²⁹). 28. Devoureth] i.e. gulps down greedily.

CHAPTER 20

1. Raging] RV 'a brawler.' Is deceived] RM 'reelleth.' It makes a man sneer, quarrel and reel about. 2. Fear] the 'terror' which he causes. Soul] RV 'life.' 4. Read, 'In the autumn . . . therefore when he seeketh,' etc.: the first season begins about October, the second about April. 5. A clever cross-questioner elicits one's plans. 8. Scattereth away] RM 'winnoweth' (1 K 3²⁸).

9. 'What mortal when he saw,
Life's voyage done, his heavenly Friend,
Could ever yet dare tell Him fearlessly:
"I have kept unmingled my nature's law:
The duly-written chart Thou gavest me,
To guide me, I have steer'd by to the end"?'

13. Open thine eyes] i.e. Wake up!

15. Read, 'There is gold and abundance of corals and precious vessels—wise lips are all these.'

16. 'Strangers,' not a strange woman. He does not deserve to escape the consequences of his folly. 19. A 'chatterbox,' not a 'flatterer,' is meant.

25. RV 'It is a snare to a man rashly to say, It is holy,' etc. Reflect before vowing (Eccl 5¹⁴ Mt 15⁸). There is a Greek story of one who found a gold mine, and thereupon vowed a gold ram to Juno: soon he substituted a silver one; then a small brass one; eventually she got nothing. 'The river past and God forgotten.'

26. The wheel of the threshing-cart, crushing in its weight (Am 1³). 27. Conscience is a searchlight, piercing the depths of the heart (1 Cor 2¹¹). 28. It is the king's goodness and reliability that are meant. 30. The blueness, etc.] RV 'Stripes that wound cleanse,' etc. (Ps 119⁶⁷).

CHAPTER 21

1. The 'watereourses' (RV) are the artificial irrigation channels of Egypt and Babylon (Isa 58¹¹). 4. There is no connexion between the two halves of the v. RM 'The tillage of the wicked is sin,' i.e. the result of his labour is sin. 5. One who is in a hurry to be rich hastens to want. 6. By a very slight alteration of the Hebrew text we get the greatly improved rendering of RM, 'Is a vapour driven to and fro; they are snares of death.'

9. A small room is often built on the flat roof of an Oriental house (1 K 17¹⁹ 2 K 4¹⁰ Ps 102⁵). 'A needle's eye is wide enough for two friends: the whole world is too narrow for two foes.'

12. Read, 'The righteous considereth the house of the wicked; he overturneth the wicked to ruin.' Perhaps the righteous means God.

14. Bribes are carried ready for use in a fold of the robe. 16. He will come prematurely to his final resting-place amongst 'the Shades' (2¹⁸).

17. The oil is that used at banquets for anointing (27⁹ Dt 14²⁶ Neh 8¹² Am 6⁶). 18. Cp. 11⁸.

22. Strength of the confidence thereof] the stronghold in which it trusted. 25. He desires ease and self-indulgence. 27. Read, 'When he bringeth it to atone for wickedness' (RM) ep. Lv 19²⁰⁻²². 28. The man who actually heard what he swears to, will speak constantly or 'for ever'; his testimony will never be shaken. 29. A wicked man boldly maintains whatever suits him; a wise man 'considereth his way' (RM).

CHAPTER 22¹⁻¹⁶

7. To be regarded with favour is better than silver and gold. This v. is inscribed in large letters on the walls of Manchester Exchange. Rabbi Simeon used to say: 'There are only three crowns; the crown of the Law, the crown of priesthood, and the crown of kingdom; but the crown of a good name excels them all.'

2. 'A man's a man for a' that.' 6. 'As the twig is bent so the tree's inclined.' In the way he should go] i.e. according to the position and work to which he is destined. 8. The rod, etc.] i.e. the power of his tyranny shall vanish.

12. Read, 'The eyes of the LORD are in him that keepeth knowledge.'

PART 3 (Chs. 22¹⁷⁻²⁴³⁴)CHAPTER 22¹⁷⁻²⁹

These proverbs are very unlike the preceding in tone and style. The author's own personality is brought distinctly into view (22¹⁷⁻²¹ 23¹⁵); he had a high opinion of the value of his maxims; he arranges them in strophes, not in couplets.

18. Fitted] RV 'established together,' i.e. ready (1Pet3¹³). 20. For excellent things RM suggests 'heretofore.' Perhaps we should read 'triple': cp. Hos8¹² RV. 21. RM 'Them that send thee,' i.e. his parents. Perhaps it ought to be, 'them that ask thee' (1Pet3¹⁵).

27. If the debtor has failed to meet his obligation and the unlucky surety has no money, the creditors will seize the poor man's scanty belongings, even to his bed. 28. Landmarks were of extreme importance when there were no fences: see on Ruth2²². 29. Stand before] i.e. serve (1S16²¹ 1K10⁸).

CHAPTER 23

1. RV 'him that is before thee.' Do not excite his contempt. 2. Restrain your appetite. 3. He invites you for his own purposes. 4. Cease, etc.] i.e. desist from the attempt to be rich.

6-8. Estimate the niggard according to his thoughts, rather than his words. Your pleasant conversation is wasted labour.

10, 11. Read, 'The landmark of the widow.' God Himself is the Goel, the redeemer, the next of kin, who protects widows and orphans (Ex22²¹⁻²³ Lv25²⁵ Nu30¹² Ruth4^{3,4} Jer50³⁴).

16. Reins] lit. 'kidneys.' Heart and kidneys were considered to be the seat of mental and spiritual life (Job19²⁷ Ps16⁷ Jer10²⁰ 20¹²). 18. End] lit. 'latter end,' crowning the life. 21. The drowsiness follows nights of intemperance.

27. In Galilee there are scores of ancient cisterns, bottle-shaped, into which one may fall and find it impossible to climb out. 28. The miserable duplicities and 'treacheries' (RV) of an unholy passion.

29. 'Complaining'—not babbling—arises amongst boon companions. Redness of eyes] is due to dissipation. 30. Seek] RV 'seek out,' try it thoroughly. Mixed wine] see on 9².

31. Giveth his colour] i.e. sparkles. Moveth itself aright] RV 'goeth down smoothly.'

34. The midst of the sea] i.e. on the high seas (30¹⁹ Ezk27²⁵). With a slight change in the text we get, 'in a great storm,' instead of, upon the top of a mast. 35. The sot is represented as saying that the blows which were showered on him when drunk have neither injured nor pained him, and as longing to be fully awake from his drunken sleep in order to return again to his carousing.

CHAPTER 24

5. Read, 'A wise man is better than a warrior, and a man of knowledge than a man of strength.' 7. When put on his trial 'in the gate' of the city, where public business was usually transacted, he has nothing to say (Mt 22¹²). 10. Adversity is sent to bring out your strength: if you are slack and irresolute in the day of trial you are proved to be a weakling. 11, 12. Do not seek to evade your responsibilities (Gn4⁹ Jas4¹⁷). 13, 14. Wisdom is as sweet as honey.

16-18. Seven] an indefinite, but considerable number. The wrath will now fall on you.

20. Candle] RV 'lamp' (31¹⁸). 21, 22. Take no part in conspiracies and revolutions.

23-34. is a short collection of sayings, with the heading, 'These also are sayings of the wise.'

26. Every man, etc.] 'He kisseth the lips': i.e. behaves as a true friend. 27. Before 'building the house' (i.e. getting married), make proper provision. 28. This is in opposition to the ancient law of retaliation (Ex21²³⁻²⁴ Lv24¹⁷⁻²¹ Dt19²¹).

pressing the nose, pressing strife. 'The 'curd' (not butter), which is a favourite and refreshing drink in the East, is made by shaking the milk about in a vessel of skin.

CHAPTER 31

THE MOTHER OF LEMUEL. THE EXCELLENT WOMAN

1-9. An exhortation addressed to king Lemuel by his mother, urging him to avoid women and wine. The latter leads to slackness and unfairness in the administration of justice.

1. Read the title thus: 'The words of Lemuel, king of Massa, which his mother taught him.' It is possible that the Massa of Gn 25¹⁴ is meant. 2. The repeated What? appears to point to an inclination towards these excesses. Son of my vows] see 1S 1¹¹.

3. Read, 'Give not thy love to those who destroy kings.' 4. 'More are drowned in the wine-cup than in the ocean.'

6. Of heavy hearts] read, 'the bitter in soul.' The Talmud treats this verse as the foundation of the pious custom of the Jerusalem ladies, who provided medicated wine to dull the pain of those condemned to death (Mk 15²²).

10-31. A complete alphabetical poem, each of its 22 vv. beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet. It describes the perfect housewife, the virtuous, or, as the word rather means, the 'excellent,' the 'capable' woman. Industrious herself, she sees to it that her servants are the same. She sells the products of their spinning and weaving, and buys lands with the money. She watches over the conduct of the entire household. She is kind to the poor and gentle to all. Husband and children pay her honour as the prime source of all their welfare. She is self-respecting and dignified. Religion lies at the root of her character.

The ideal is a worthy one, well adapted to life in one of the towns of antiquity, where the men were engaged in public business (v. 23) and the women were supposed to attend to all domestic and business affairs. No doubt we should need some additional features for the portrait of the highest type of womanhood. This lady is not in the fullest sense the helpmeet for man. She is too much the ruler on his behalf, too little the partner of his thoughts and plans. Tennyson's 'Princess' strikes a note which we cannot afford to miss:

'Let her make herself her own
To give or keep, to live and learn and be
All that not harms distinctive womanhood.

Till at the last she set herself to man,
Like perfect music unto noble words;
And so these twain, upon the skirts of Time,
Sit side by side, full-summed in all their powers,
Dispensing harvest, sowing the To-be.
Self-reverent each and reverencing each,
Distinct in individualities,
But like each other ev'n as those who love.

11. Spoil here means gain. 13. Read, 'worketh at that which her hands delight in.'

15. The portion is either the proper quantity of food or the allotted quantity of material for work. 21. Scarlet dye being costly, the garments would be of good material, thick and warm. 22. Read, 'She maketh for herself coverings' (7¹⁶). There is no justification for the addition, 'of tapestry.' 25. 'She laugheth at the time to come' (RV), because she is prepared for anything.

26. On an Egyptian tombstone is the inscription: 'Peace was in the words which came from his mouth, and the book of the wise Thoth' (the divine scribe of the gods) 'was on his tongue.' A later Jerusalem proverb was: 'Gentleness is the salt which preserves wealth from corruption.' 30. Favour] i.e. charm and attractiveness.

ECCLESIASTES

INTRODUCTION

1. Title. The title 'Ecclesiastes' has been adopted by the English Version through the Latin Vulgate from the Septuagint (the earliest translation of the OT. into Greek from the original Hebrew), which gives it as the rendering of the Hebrew title Kohleth. It is, however, uncertain whether that word (derived from a root meaning 'to collect') denotes (a) a member of a collective body, i.e. an assembly (Gk. Ecclesia, whence the title 'Ecclesiastes'), implying that the writer was one of a body of persons who thought and discoursed on the subjects engaging attention in the book, or (b) one who collects or convenes an assembly, 'the great orator' which RM substitutes for 'the Preacher' in 1¹.

2. Authorship and Date. Was Solomon the author of this book, as 1¹, if taken literally, implies? We may safely reply, No, for (a) the original Hebrew throughout the book shows traces of verbal forms, idioms, and style later than Solomon's time; (b) the writer says, 'I . . . (not 'am,' but) was king' (1¹²); (c) he refers apparently to a series of kings preceding him (1¹⁶); (d) he tells us that he was king 'in Jerusalem,' thus pointing to a date later than the Disruption on Solomon's death, when there began to be kings outside Jerusalem; (e) Solomon would not have drawn with his own hand a picture of moral evils (ep. 4¹ 5⁸ 8⁹ 10^{6,7,16}), for which he would be held himself in large measure responsible; (f) there is no reference to features characterising Israelitish history in Solomon's day. Besides all these reasons for placing the book later than Solomon's time, it bears distinct traces of the Greek culture established throughout the civilised world after the break up of the Empire of Alexander the Great (died 323 B.C.). Such traces, e.g. appear in (a) the writer's advice to enjoy the present life (2²⁴ 3²² 5¹⁸ 9⁷); (b) his comments on human weakness and disorder (5⁸ 7^{7,8,9}, 14^{9,16} 10^{16,17}), on the vanity and brevity of life (e.g. 1²⁻¹⁷), and on the common destiny of human and brute creation (3^{18,19}); (c) his references to man's inventive capacity (7²⁹), and (d) his remarks on the phenomena of nature (1^{5,6}).

Thus the book is decidedly later than the days of Solomon. On the other hand, an acquaintance with its language seems to be shown in the apocryphal book called 'Ecclesiasticus,' written circ. 180 B.C. We may, therefore, with confidence place Ecclesiastes earlier, though probably not much earlier, than that date.

But if belief in the traditional authorship is on these grounds to be put aside, we need have no scruple in at once rejecting the notion that the writer, whoever he may have been, had the smallest intention of fraud or deceit in thus assuming Solomon's character for literary purposes. Such personation is nothing more than has been practised alike in ancient and modern times with perfectly straightforward motives. Plato's dialogues or the speeches in Thucydides (to take two of the best known cases in classical literature) are examples of language put into the mouths of great men, not as having been literally spoken by them, but as expressing the sentiments which in the writer's opinion under given circumstances might fairly be attributed to them.

We may notice that the claim to personate the great king, such as it is, is more conspicuous in the earlier than in the later part of the book. The thought of Solomon gradually fades from the writer's mind, and he proceeds to give us undisguisedly his own attitude towards life and its problems in words that do not even mean to suggest the Solomon of Israelitish history.

3. Design of the Book. The main purpose of the author is evidently to offer men counsel, the result of his own experience, as to the principles on which they shall order their lives. The Divine Creator, he is sure, carries on the world in accordance with a plan, but that plan is hidden from us. What rule, then, shall we follow? Man, God's creature, by nature aims at happiness. How shall happiness be attained? A glance around us shows that it does not go simply by merit; for instances are patent where virtue suffers and vice is prosperous. What path, therefore, shall we follow to gain our quest? Shall it be wisdom, or unrestrained pleasure, or devotion to business, or the pursuit of wealth? None of these will avail. Our rule must be to alternate wholesome labour with reasonable relaxation, assured that, although the ways of God's judgments are obscure, all well-doing shall in the end be shown forth as approving itself to the Divine Judge.

Many a devout reader, turning over the pages of this book, has been conscious of a sort of uneasy wonder that it should form part of the Bible; so different is its general tone from that of the sacred volume as a whole. For—

(a) Throughout the whole book the gaze is turned inwards. Existence is represented as a puzzle beyond our powers to solve. In other O.T. books the writer feels that he is showing us God's hand in His dealing with individuals or with nations. But here God is a God who 'hides Himself,' and we must grope on in the dark in our endeavour to become acquainted even with 'parts of His ways.'

(b) Elsewhere, specially in the prophetic and devotional books, God is not only a King and moral Governor, a Creator and a Judge, but He is tender, willing to forgive the penitent, ready to succour and sustain. But to the writer of this book God is only the Judge, austere, needing care in approach, omnipotent, and righteous. The element of love in His character is hidden. That He is, in the full sense of the word, the Divine Father, is seen dimly or not at all. The book thus shows the low-water mark of the religious thoughts of God-fearing Jews in pre-Christian times.

(c) Human existence is looked at mainly on its darker side. It is at once monotonous and vain. There is nothing new anywhere. Its good things, even if attained, are fleeting. Close upon the enjoyment of them the 'days of darkness' follow, and they 'shall be many.' The book thus emphasises in a way not found in the rest of the O.T. the lack of a clear vision of a future life which had not yet been brought to light by Christ.

But these very peculiarities, which have caused perplexity to devout readers, form, when rightly viewed, a signal part of the credentials of the book as a constituent part of the 'Divine Library,' which, through its various elements, historical, prophetic, devotional, ethical, was destined in God's providence to appeal to the needs of successive periods of man's existence. To the question characteristic of much of the thought of the present day, 'Is life worth living?' the book gives the best answer which a Jew, at once influenced by heathen philosophy, and placed amidst political and social miseries, could give. There is a wide-spread habit of mind, called by the convenient name of pessimism, which takes a gloomy view of human existence, either because of the miseries of the world in general, or because of the deficiencies to be found in man's nature. Now it is in Ecclesiastes, and Ecclesiastes alone, that this tendency is dealt with upon anything resembling the lines in which it expresses itself in the working of men's minds in our own generation.

It is, then, in a very real sense a present day question, which is here treated. If thoughtful people are now saddened by the sorrows and sufferings of the world, and by the evil that goes unpunished, so too was 'the Preacher.' But the point for us to notice here is that, unlike many now, he retained his reliance on God's justice, although devoid of our mainstay, viz. the Christian faith which was then unborn. The forms of philosophical culture familiar to him were not unlike some of our own, while one special form of argument which we can use was unavailable in his day. The steady growth of sympathy with every kind of suffering and need, the widening sense of human brotherhood—this practical result of the fuller realisation of the meaning of Christ's teaching and life constitutes for us a special form of argument on the side of the Christian faith. He had no such help to retain his hold upon the God of his fathers. Nevertheless, we mark that his faith, however imperilled at times, did not fail him. How much less, then, should ours fail to whom God has been revealed as a God of love through Christ Incarnate, and the Sacrifice for sin.

4. Analysis of Contents. Although the general aim of the book is clear, the connexion of thought is not always easy to follow. There are many breaks, repetitions, and deviations into side-issues. The following is an outline of the contents.

Introduction. Man's life is saddened by its brevity, and by the purposeless and monotonous repetition which meets him on all sides (1¹⁻¹¹). Various methods may be tried in order to obtain relief, viz. the pursuit of wisdom (1¹²⁻¹⁸), of enjoyments and of art (2¹⁻¹¹). Of these wisdom is the noblest, and yet all of them are but vanity (2¹²⁻²³). The best course is to alternate toil with frugal enjoyment; though even this also is vanity (2²⁴⁻²⁶). At least, however, we can see that God is a God of order (3¹⁻⁸); yet man's insight into God's plan is extremely limited. The best course, therefore, is to combine the enjoyment of God's gifts with uprightness of life (3⁹⁻¹⁵). True, man and beast alike return to the ground; nevertheless, if not here, then hereafter wrong, shall be righted (3¹⁶⁻²²). The ill inseparable from both poverty and success cut men off from the helpful companionships of life (4¹⁻¹²). Wisdom prevails over the highest rank; but even so there is nought that is lasting (4¹³⁻¹⁶). In religious life ignorance and hypocrisy prevail (5¹⁻⁷), in political and social matters cruelty and avarice (5⁸). Greed of gain is unsatisfying and in the end futile (5⁹⁻¹⁷). Let a man, avoiding these, make tranquil enjoyment his aim (5¹⁸⁻²⁰). Length of life only increases man's liabilities to suffering; yet, though he be possessed of all possible advantages (6¹⁻⁶). The only wise course is to use what we have, avoid all vain grasping at that which is beyond our reach, and accept the limitations which the very name man suggests (6⁷⁻¹²). Advice for the conduct of life (7¹⁻¹⁴). Avoid extremes whether of asceticism or excess (7¹⁵⁻¹⁸). Wisdom is rare, yet needed by all. Righteousness, seldom found among men, is absolutely unknown among women (7¹⁹⁻²⁹). Wisdom is needed by none more than those who have to do with kings' courts (8¹⁻⁵). Many as are the disorders and disappointments of life, it must still be that God will in the end show Himself a just Ruler. Make, therefore, a cheerful use of the good things of life, while convinced that His ways are 'past finding out' (8⁶⁻¹⁷). Death is universal, and what lies beyond is in the darkest shadow (9¹⁻⁶); nevertheless, combine innocent enjoyment with diligent work (9⁷⁻¹⁰). The wise, the strong, and the rich are all the puppets of chance. One foolish slip may bring about much havoc (9¹¹⁻¹⁴). There is practical wisdom in patient and quiet regard to duty (10²⁻⁷). The incautious reformer brings untoward results to himself (10⁸⁻¹¹). The fool's talk, unlike that of the wise man, is wordy and wearisome, and also abusive (10¹²⁻¹⁵). A boy-ruler is a disaster to the kingdom; but the prudent will submit in silence (10¹⁶⁻²⁰). Fulfil plain duties, even if success be dubious. While the powers of youth remain, let life though fleeting, be as bright as may be (11¹⁻¹⁰). The service of God will not bear postponement to the winter of life (12¹⁻⁵). The outcome of the whole book is summed up (12⁸⁻¹⁴).

ALL IS VANITY

1-11. The writer describes himself. He declares that all things are transitory and without result, whether they be the works or the life of man, or the natural forces of heat, air, and water. Language cannot do justice to nature's wearisome sameness. The oblivion which overtakes all.

1. Preacher] see Intro. §§ 1, 2.

2. Vanity of vanities] lit. 'breath of breaths'; the form of expression being a Hebrew way of indicating the superlative degree. Of all fleeting things existence is the most fleeting. The same figure is used in Pss 62⁹ 144⁴ of the brevity of man's life. The word vanity, occurring thirty-eight times, strikes the keynote of the book. All things living and otherwise bear the stamp of the transitory.

3. What profit] Man toils; but even granting that he gains some tangible result, he cannot retain. 4. The earth abideth] Man is so far from being lord of the earth, that it survives ever fresh generations of its inhabitants, and so by contrast brings out more clearly the brevity of their existence. 5. Hasteth to his place] The sun, on the supposition of his apparent motion across the heavens from E. to W. by day, returns eastward beneath the earth by night.

6. The wind, etc.] We may render more closely thus: 'Going toward the south, and circling toward the north; circling, circling goeth the wind, and on its circlings returneth the wind.' The sameness involved in the constant renewal of its changes of direction is brought out by the wording. The 'circling, circling,' the changing, at once endless and monotonous, marks here too an emptiness of aim. 7. Unto the place] The writer supposes that the salt water percolates by underground fissures, getting rid of its salt on the way, and so through hidden channels returns to the sources whence it had set out.

8. All things are full of labour] RM 'all words are' too 'feeble' to set forth the case, so vast is the subject. 9. The thing] History has been repeating itself from all time, and will do so evermore.

10, 11. Is there] He calls on any one who may doubt his word to point to something which is really new. The only reason that events strike us as new is because that which has been is swept into oblivion. Previous generations have no existence for us, and we in like manner shall have no existence for those who come after us.

12-18. The writer, availing himself of his status, recounts how he had tested the various aspects of life in their aims and results, but all to no profit. Everything is perverse or defective. Great as were his acquirements, the result is nil, nay, worse than nothing.

12. Was king] see Intro. § 2.

13. My heart] We should say my 'mind,' but the heart was considered by the Jews to be the seat of the intellectual powers as well as of the emotions. All things] the different ways that men work, and their hopes and fears in so doing; their circumstances, pains, pleasures, feelings, aims. Perhaps, he says to himself, men of various trades, modes of life, surroundings, will enlighten me, or help me to bear my burden. This sore travail, etc.] Men who are endowed with any activity of mind cannot but be interested in all human endeavour; and their researches and enquiries, unsatisfying though they be, are a part of God's order.

14. Vexation of spirit] RV 'striving after wind': ep. Hos 12¹. The satisfaction that might have been expected from these studies is not to be attained. Air itself is not more elusive to the grasp. 15. Crooked] for the phrase here ep. Isa 40⁴. The world is disordered, and there is no cure discoverable.

Numbered] The required numbers are lacking, which were needed to make up the sum of human action, and no amount of skill in arithmetic can supply the deficiency.

16. Great estate] RV 'Lo, I have gotten me great wisdom above all,' etc. (omitting 'am come to great estate and'). He has had exceptional advantages in gaining wisdom, and has made the most of his opportunities. Yet even so he has failed. What hope, then, can there be that others will solve the problem that remains dark to him? All they] see Intro. § 2. Wisdom and knowledge] knowledge, the possession of facts; wisdom, skill in employing them. 17. And folly] He tries whether the study of folly may perchance give him some grasp of its opposite, viz. wisdom. But this too only serves to confirm him in his general conclusion. Vexation of spirit] see on v. 14.

18. Much grief] Sir Isaac Newton spoke of himself as a child picking up a few pebbles on the shore of the wide sea of knowledge. So the more the veil is lifted, the wider is seen to be the extent of that which is still unknown. Bodily and mental exhaustion, sleepless and futile endeavour—this is the picture which concludes the writer's sketch of his quest after the highest good in the shape of wisdom.

CHAPTER 2

EPICUREANISM AND WISDOM ALIKE
PROFITLESS

1-3. The writer makes enjoyment his quest, while aware that it is folly, and avoiding excess in a philosophic spirit.

1. I will prove thee with mirth] Wisdom, whether sought in nature or in human things, having proved unsatisfying, he now makes a cast in another direction. Increase of knowledge is increase of sorrow; but what, if he were to try the fascination of enjoyment?

2. It is mad] He knows all the time that no solid comfort will be the issue. Mirth is a brief madness: cp. 7⁶. 3. To give myself unto] RV 'to cheer my flesh with.' Yet acquainting mine heart] RV 'mine heart yet guiding me.' Whatever indulgences he may yield to, he is careful not to drift, and so vitiate his experiment. Through all he retains a prudent self-control.

4-6. He tries another method, viz. culture and art.

4. I made me great works] The occupation of mind and exercise of taste may help him in his quest. Houses] Personating Solomon, he thinks of the palaces built by that monarch (1K 7¹⁻¹²): cp. the cities mentioned in 2Ch 8⁴⁻⁶. 5. Orchards] pleasure ground; RV 'parks.' 6. Pools] essential in a land where water is scarce, as well as pleasing in effect. The wood that bringeth forth trees] RV 'the forest where trees were reared.'

7-11. He acquires slaves, herds, and flocks, and precious metals, musicians, and inmates of the harem. Without being the slave of these delights he yet indulges in every desire of his heart, but, as before, all is vanity.

7. Got] RV 'bought.' 8. Silver and gold] cp. 1K 9²⁸ 10^{2,14,15,27}. Peculiar treasure] The specialities and rarities of each country found their way to him. Of kings and of the provinces] cp. 1K 10¹⁵, where Solomon receives precious things as tribute from the kings of Arabia and the governors of the country. Musical instruments, and that of all sorts] RV 'concubines very many' (but RM agrees with AV). The meaning of the Heb. is obscure. Probably, however, the reference is to the grosser sort of sensual enjoyments: cp. 1K 11¹⁻³.

9. I was great, and increased] now in splendour and luxury, as before in knowledge. In closing the account of this experiment he expresses himself as he did at the end of his endeavour to find satisfaction in wisdom (1¹⁰).

10. My portion of all my labour] At least he had the zest of joys obtained through toil or ingenuity. 11. Vexation of spirit] cp. 1¹¹. None of these could satisfy the cravings of his spirit.

12-17. Wisdom is to folly as light to darkness; yet the same end awaits both. Life, therefore, is nothing but a weariness. The cycle of experiments being completed, there is nothing to do but to hark back to the first of them, and to consider knowledge and its opposites.

12. What can the man do] None can hope to attain or approach to the favourable conditions under which Solomon carried on his quest of the highest good. After the king? even that which hath been already done] RM 'after the king, even him whom they made king long ago?' the writer now letting go his personation of Solomon, and looking back at him as an historical personage.

13. Wisdom excelleth folly] for, at any rate, in seeking it there is no fear of self-reproach.

14. I've in his head] Unlike the fool, the wise man can see what and where to choose.

15. Why was I then more wise?] rather, 'what was the use of troubling myself to surpass others?' 16. There is no remembrance] not meaning that no memories of famous men had survived them, but that such cases were too rare to be of any solace against the practical ills of life. 17. Vexation of spirit] see 1¹¹.

18-23. Besides, no one knows what his heir may do.

20. Went about] RV 'turned about,' i.e. looked back sadly at the absence of the permanent element in the labours of my life past. 21. Equity] RV 'skilfulness.' Hath not laboured] The heir acquires good things without earning them. This too shows the dismal tangle of human affairs. 22. Vexation] RV 'striving' (but RM as AV).

24-26. Whatever enjoyment there is in life is from God, and He thereby favours the righteous, not the sinner.

24. Eat and drink] enjoy in moderation the good things of life: cp. Jer 22¹⁵.

25. Hasten] RV 'have enjoyment.' More than I?] RM 'apart from Him?' i.e. it is only through God's ordinance that simple bodily pleasures can change to joy the sadness which is the natural outcome of the pursuit of knowledge. This acknowledgment shows that the writer, after all, clings to the faith of his fathers. The rendering of AV (based on a slightly different rendering of the Heb.) would mean, 'Who is in a better position than I to testify that all good comes from God?'

26. That he may give] The sinner's possessions pass to the just man, to be used aright: cp. Job 27^{16,17} Prov 13²². Vexation of spirit] see on 1¹¹. The sinner's toil and expectations are alike great; his joys nil.

CHAPTER 3

THE PRACTICAL IDEAL. ACCEPTANCE OF THE UNIVERSAL SCHEME

1-15. God is a God of order.

The problem which the writer has set himself is not yet solved. He has found that wisdom, culture, pleasure, are all good, though, even if we combine them, there is still something lacking, and they will not explain the mystery of existence. In continuing to seek for a rule of life that shall lead him to the highest good, he reminds himself that God is a God of order, and wisdom lies in adapting ourselves to that order. It is at a time appointed by the Creator that the individual life begins and ends, and the same is true for all the events intermediate between birth and death which make up the sum of human existence. All our undertakings are thus subject to His unchangeable decrees.

2. To plant . . . to pluck up] i.e. to begin and end a career. 3. To kill] perhaps, to make war or peace. To break down] e.g. to make a way for what shall better meet the needs, secular or spiritual, of a new generation.

5. To cast away stones] Probably the whole v. means peace and war, the former expressed by leisure to clear away stones from a vineyard (ep. Isa 5²), and to indulge in family joys, the latter by the action of a hostile force spreading stones over fertile lands (ep. 2 K 3¹⁹), and by the claims of military service. 6. To get . . . to lose] to add to, and to forego gains.

7. To rend . . . to sew] to act in a way that involves the sundering of friendship . . . to knit hearts together again.

9-14. Man's work, ignorant though he be, is fulfilling God's design. Let him aim at pleasure and uprightness, while the whole scheme of things from first to last is in the hands of God.

9. What profit] how can he be sure that he has found the right season?

11. The world] rather, as RM, 'eternity.' Though man's powers are bounded, he is capable of recognising the grand and immeasurable scope of God's ordering of all things. His mind reflects the universe. This is better than, taking AV, to explain it as referring to man's natural love of living in the world. So that] RV 'yet . . . so that.'

12. No good . . . a man] RV 'nothing better for them than.' 14. That men should fear] God's unchanging ordinances are for the purpose of calling forth man's reverence. We must trust Him with our future. 15. Requireth] RV 'seeketh again,' bringeth back in an unchanging sequence: ep. 1⁹.

16-22. Men wrest judgment; but God shall right all wrongs, though how, is beyond our ken.

16, 17. The judges of his time troubled the writer. Yet in God's purposes, either here or in the future, unrighteous decisions shall be reversed.

18. Manifest] RV 'prove,' i.e. sift or test whether they will be upright, in spite of the knowledge that death comes to them no less than to the beasts. Beasts] RV 'but as beasts.'

19. That which befalleth . . . them] RM 'The sons of men are a chance, and the beasts are a chance.' They are the sport of hazard alike in birth and in death. 20. All are of . . . again] 'Nature the womb and tomb of all' (Lucretius).

21. That goeth] RV 'whether it goeth upward . . . downward,' thus neither denying nor affirming that there is an intrinsic difference in the soul of man. Christ had not yet come to bring 'life and immortality to light.' Yet contrast the brighter hope of 12⁷. 22. There is nothing better] If man is no better off than a beast, let him at least learn, like them, to enjoy the present. Bring him] RV 'bring him back,' to see the results of his work.

CHAPTER 4

VICISSITUDES OF LIFE. 'OH, THE PITY OF IT!'

1-3. The mass of human suffering and the absence of pity are such that better off are the dead and still more the unborn.

It is not only through God's ordinance, but by reason of man's perversity, that he is disturbed and perplexed by the social disturbances around him. The world is full of trouble. The weak are oppressed by the strong.

4-6. Success involves envy. Better besecure and at peace. 4. Right] RV 'skilful,' RM 'successful.' For this . . . neighbour] RM 'it cometh of a man's rivalry with his neighbour.' Effort is stimulated by competition, but then what man has gained by toil is marred by the hostility of the less fortunate. Vexation of spirit] see on 1¹⁴. 5. Even the fool who idly runs through his substance is for the time better off, for he is at peace.

7-12. Two more ills of life are covetousness and loneliness.

8. There is one alone] The avaricious has none to share his wealth or to succeed him; yet his toil is insatiable.

9-12. The advantages of companionship are shown by four illustrations, three of which are such as have special fitness in the mouth of an Oriental writer. Two companions in travel find their partnership of value, whether (a) they are walking upon a rough and steep path, or (b) sleeping at the end of the day in a narrow chamber with unglazed windows, or (c) in a sudden encounter with thieves, who have availed themselves of the darkness of the night to dig through the earthen walls in search of valuables. Lastly, (d) a threefold cord is strong to resist. 12. RV 'And if a man prevail against him that is alone.'

13-16. A man may rise from the lowest to the highest station by wisdom; yet even so there is no permanence.

13. Child] RV 'youth.' 14. He cometh] i.e. the poor and wise youth. Whereas also . . . poor] RV 'yea, even in his kingdom he (the child) was born poor.' Thus in RV the subject of the whole v. is the youth, whereas in AV two persons are spoken of, viz. the prisoner who rises through wisdom to be a king, and the king who becomes a beggar.

These vv. have been taken to refer to actual events, perhaps in the writer's own day; but no satisfactory reference for them has been found. Thus they had best be understood as a general statement.

15. With the second, etc.] RV 'that they were with the youth, the second, that stood,' etc. 16. There is] RV 'there was.' Even of . . . them] RV 'even of all them over whom he was.' The sketch is continued; there is an endless stream of those who crowd to pay court. They also] RV 'yet they,' etc. Oblivion will soon wipe out all.

CHAPTER 5

DISHEARTENING OUTLOOK ON LIFE

1-8. Disorders in the religious, in the political world. In the earlier part of this c. the writer turns from secular to religious matters. He points out the irreverence which belongs to worship offered without due thought.

1. Keep thy foot] cp. Ps 119¹⁰¹ Prov 1¹². Either be silent, or use thoughtfully framed words of prayer, as contrasted with hasty offerings combined with ungodliness of life.

And be more ready to hear] RV 'for to draw nigh to hear is better.' 3. A dream cometh] excessive distractions by day bring disordered visions at night. Even so excess in words shows folly in him who utters them. Is known by] RV 'with a.'

4. Defer not to pay it] A vow is not essential, but once made it is binding: cp. Dt 23²¹⁻²³. Vows had an important place in the religion of Israel, as we see from Gn 28²⁰ Nu 6²⁴. Jg 11³⁰ 1 S 11¹¹ Mk 7¹¹ Ac 18¹⁸ 21²³ 23²¹. Cp. also the rule of the Pharisees (Mt 5³³), which, however, does not add the caution to think before speaking.

6. Suffer not, etc.] i.e. suffer not your hasty vow to lead you into wrongdoing. The angel] either the angel who, according to Rabbinic belief, presided over the sacrifice (this is, however, somewhat out of harmony with the tone of the book), or the priest, to whom the person who makes the vow addressed himself. RM has 'messenger of God' (see Mal 2⁷).

An error] He has brought an offering of inferior value, or gives a frivolous excuse for the non-fulfilment of the vow. And destroy] Punishment will ensue. He here recognises that the world is no mere machine: there is a righteous Judge.

8. Violent perverting] The cruelties of a satrap, or pasha, were part of a system extending through every grade. Each watches (regardeth) with jealousy those below him, and seeks his opportunity for plunder. He that is higher than the highest regardeth] For highest RV has 'high.' The supreme ruler is no exception. There be higher than they] those who in an Eastern court practically bear rule over the nominal governors. The whole v., however, is obscure with perhaps an intentional ambiguity, and it is possible to explain it as meaning that there is a chance of getting justice by appeal from a lower to a higher tribunal, yea, even to the king himself.

9-17. The evil of avarice.

9. RM 'But the profit of a land every way is a king that maketh himself servant to the field'; because a ruler whose taste lies in that wholesome direction is unlikely to be given to amassing wealth: cp. 2 Ch 26¹⁰.

10, 11. Avarice is attended by two evils: (a) it is never content; and (b) responsibility, trouble, and expenditure increase in the same proportion. 14. There is nothing in his hand] Through a reverse of fortune the wealth, which should have descended to the son, has disappeared. The case is thus the converse misfortune to that of 4⁸. There the riches were to be had, but the heir was lacking.

18-20. Riches are not inconsistent with happiness.

20. For he shall not much remember] He will not be overtroubled by the knowledge that these pleasures are fleeting, and that life itself is uncertain.

CHAPTER 6

LIFE AN ENIGMA

1-6. Riches will not secure happiness.

1. Common among] RV 'heavy upon.'

2. A stranger] because he has no child to whom to leave it. The Easterns have a dread of being without a child, to keep the parents' name in remembrance: cp. Gn 15². 3. And his soul] RV 'But his soul.' Misfortunes may render him miserable, though he has abundance of children and of years of life. Examples are Rehoboam (2 Ch 11²¹) and Ahab (2 K 10¹). That he have no burial] The greatest importance was assigned to this tribute of respect: cp. Jer 22¹⁹. 4. He] RV 'it,' i.e. the untimely birth: so in v. 5. 6. Yet hath he seen] RV 'and yet enjoy.' To one place?] The grave embraces all alike.

7-12. The conditions of man's life are essentially uncertain. Man's aim is in the main directed to the satisfaction of his bodily desires. Yet at best this cannot be perfectly attained. The wise, no less than the fool, the poor equally with the rich, finds imperfect satisfaction in life.

8. That knoweth to walk before the living?] In other words, that has the skill so to conduct himself as to earn respect in the eyes of his fellows. 9. Better is] To enjoy what we have is better than yearning after things which elude our grasp. Vexation of spirit] see on 1¹⁷.

10. That which hath been] RM 'Whatever he be.' Is named already] RV 'the name thereof was given long ago.' Man] RM 'Heb. Adam.' Thus the sense of the v. is, 'From the beginning man's nature has corresponded to his bodily frame. He is known as man (Adam), because he was made out of the earth (Heb. Adamah), and he must accept his position: cp. Isa 45⁹ Ro 9²⁰.

11. Things] RM 'words,' perhaps the profitless discussions common in the philosophical schools (e.g. on fate and free-will).

12. Man can neither judge what is really for his happiness in life nor foresee the future fate of that in which he may be interested.

CHAPTER 7

PRACTICAL APHORISMS

1-6. Things useful to remember in life. The writer has just warned us that we cannot rely on either the present or the future. We can, however, guide ourselves in the conduct of life by bearing in mind useful truths. Thence he now proceeds to give.

1. Precious ointment] This was a much-prized luxury in the East (cp. Ps 45⁸ Am 6⁶ Mt 26⁷ Lk 7³⁷), but to be held in esteem is still better. There is a play on words in the Heb. (Shem, 'a name,' and Shemen, 'ointment'), which can scarcely be reproduced in English. Plumptre suggests, 'A good name is better than good nard.' The day of death] Even in this respect, however, a man's life cannot be judged happy till its end is reached.

2. The living will lay it to his heart] Oriental mourning is elaborate and prolonged. Hence there is abundant opportunity for those who take life in earnest to obtain a hearing for their counsels.

6. As the crackling of thorns] Frivolity is like the fire which the wayfarer lights from the thorns that he has gathered, and which goes out as suddenly as it has sprung up, leaving only dead ashes: cp. Ps 58⁹.

7-14. Ill-treatment may well provoke anger, yet pause and exercise control. Accept the present with submission. Wisdom and money are both valuable, but wisdom is the better of the two. All things are in the hands of God.

7. Oppression] RV 'extortion': sufferings inflicted on the weak by the strong. Mad] RV 'foolish.' The heart] RV 'the understanding.' To be condemned by one whose decision is determined by a bribe causes a man to lose all power of calm judgment. 8. Better is the end] The connexion seems to be this: the danger of being warped in our view by outward circumstances is such a real one that we cannot pronounce an unqualified judgment upon anything till the end is reached. 10. Thou dost not enquire wisely] We have not the materials for a just comparison.

11, 12. Some men through the attainment of wisdom or wealth have reached a vantage ground in the battle of life. Of the two wisdom is to be preferred, as possessed of a quickening power which money cannot bestow.

11. Them that see the sun] i.e. the living.

12. A defence] lit. a shadow: cp. Isa 30^{2,3} 32².

13. Who can make that straight, etc.] If trouble be God's will for us, we cannot change it. 14. Consider] Ask yourself what you may learn from it. Over against] RV 'side by side with.' Both run through the course of human life. To the end, etc.] So that we cannot forecast the part which the one and the other will play in the future.

15. The anomalies of life.

15. A just man that perisheth, etc.] It was perplexing enough that there should be but one end to the righteous and the wicked (3¹⁹). It is more so when we see the just man cut off by an untimely death and the evil-doer enjoying a green old age.

16-18. Extremes, whether of asceticism or of excess, are bad.

17. Over much wicked] The expression seems strange, as though moderate wickedness were allowable. But the sense is probably as follows: the author had just said, 'Be not righteous over much,' perhaps alluding to the over-scrupulousness of the Jews in observing ceremonies, etc.: cp. Mt 23. He may now be meeting the thought of those who would reply, 'There is no fear that we shall exceed in that direction,' and he warns them that there is an opposite kind of excess to which they are more prone. Excess in either direction, and folly, tend to disturb and shorten life.

18. From this] RV 'from that.' Whatever the nature of the experience to which God subjects you, take cognisance of the evil as well as of the good. That in using such language he is not condoning sin is clear from the last part of the v. If only he fear God, he shall come forth unscathed.

19-22. Be wise enough not to be over sensitive to criticism, since you also indulge in it.

19. Wisdom strengtheneth] There is a power greater than brute force.

23-28. Wisdom eludes the grasp. Sweeping condemnation of the female sex.

24. That which is far off] RV 'That which is far off.' 'That which is,' viz. God's world-plan, all the phenomena of the world and of human life, can only be realised by us in fragmentary form. 25. Madness] As in 2¹², wickedness and madness are closely connected.

26-28. The writer gives us the general result of his experience of human character. Among men he has found but one true friend. The other sex he condemns without exception. We cannot tell why, ignorant as we are of the circumstances of his life. We must, however, remember that the position of women in the East has always been favourable to the growth of habits of frivolity, cunning, and licentiousness; also that elsewhere (c. 9 : cp. perhaps also 48) he modifies this judgment. It remained for Christianity to bring woman back to her rightful position as a helpmeet for man.

29. Many inventions] From the Fall in Eden there has been a continued display of manifold ingenuity to thwart God's benevolent purposes for man.

CHAPTER 8

KINGS' COURTS NEED WARY WALKING

1-17. Be discreet in relation with a ruler. God's purpose must be carried out. His rule must be righteous, though this is often not seen in actual life. God's ways are just, and past finding out.

The writer now enters on a subject which it would not have been wise to treat too plainly, viz. the need of showing tact in dealing with the arbitrary power of an absolute monarch. No part of the book is more decidedly at variance with the Solomonic authorship than this c.

1. Who is, etc.] Which of his readers has skill to see the meaning of his language, intentionally left obscure? Boldness] RV 'hardness.' Skill of this kind refines the features.

2. Oath of God] Ptolemy Soter, king of Egypt (305-285 B.C.), having transplanted certain Jews from Palestine to Alexandria, caused them to swear allegiance to his successors. It is possible that the reference here may be to that event. If so, we have an indication of the place and time of writing.

3. Be not hasty] Do not rashly throw up office. Stand, etc.] RV 'persist.' Do not take sides with the ruler's open or covert enemies. The expression, however, in the Heb. is obscure, probably of set intention.

5. Whose keepeth, etc.] Submission is a practical guide in life. Time and judgment] The wise man will bide his time, hoping that justice will be done in the end.

6. To every purpose] God's purpose must eventually prevail, and retribution, if deserved, come even on the highest. Therefore] RV 'because.' Misery] RM 'evil.' Wickedness, like a lead, bears the bad man down to his doom.

8. Spirit] RM 'wind,' which it is God's prerogative to control. No discharge] Under the Jewish law exemption from service in war was granted in certain cases (Dt 20⁵⁻⁸). In the battle with death no such release may be had.

9, 10. These vv. are expressed in such guarded language that to us they are scarcely intelligible. The line of thought is probably as follows. Although death swallows up the wicked in the end, nevertheless the writer's wide experience ever brings back to his mind cases where a man has exercised misrule to the hurt of his fellow-men. And then these evil men have received a stately burial, and been gathered to their fathers with all due observances. On the contrary, those who had lived virtuously have been dishonoured, expelled from the Temple and the Holy City, and dismissed from the minds even of the people among whom their good deeds had been done. Both honour and oblivion had been misplaced. 10. Who had come] RV 'and they came' to the grave. And gone... so done] RV 'and they that had done right went away from the holy place, and were forgotten in the city.'

12. I know that it shall be well] The writer, after all, is one of those who 'keep' (or at any rate revert) 'to the sunny side of doubt.' The rule of final justice, he says, must hold.

14, 15. But now it is often not so. Therefore temperate enjoyments, joined with labour, are the most abiding possession of man : cp. 2²⁴, etc. 16, 17. These problems are beyond man's power.

16. For also, etc.] RM 'how that neither by day nor by night do men see sleep with their eyes.'

CHAPTER 9

LIVE WORTHILY WHILE YOU MAY

1-3. The future is in God's hands. Good and bad alike must die.

1. Considered in] RV 'laid to.' Declare] RV 'explore.' No man... before them] RV 'whether it be love or hatred, man knoweth it not; all is before them.' Whether God's dealings with them shall be such as to suggest His favour or displeasure is unknown, because the part of life not yet traversed cannot be penetrated. 2. There seems no discrimination in the lot of men.

4. A living dog] Life has at any rate one advantage over death. The miserable hope that either positive happiness, or at least better fortune than in the past, may lie before them. The saying receives its point from the contempt with which a dog is regarded in the East. 5. The living know] A conscious recognition of the inevitable is better than the oblivion which belongs to death.

7-10. Couple enjoyment and work.

8. White] as symbolical of cheerfulness (2Ch 5¹²), and perhaps here, as later (e.g. Rev 3⁴), of purity. White was constantly worn at feasts. Ointment] Sweet fragrant unguents for perfuming the person. 10. Be not half-hearted in any duty. The present alone is yours : cp. 'in diligence not slothful' (Ro 12¹¹ RV). In St. Paul's day the darkness had been lighted up, and this precept consequently transformed in the words which close the great Resurrection chapter (1 Cor 15⁵⁵).

11-18. Results must be left to God. Wisdom is better than strength, yet it is despised.

17. Are heard in quiet] RV 'spoken in quiet are heard.' There are times when men's voices are hushed to listen to wise counsel. 18. One sinner, etc.] One man's evil deed may bring to nought wide-reaching purposes of good.

CHAPTER 10

PRACTICAL ADVICE TOUCHING LIFE'S PUZZLES

1-8. Cultivate wisdom and tact, specially in the dangers that attend upon courts, but also in ordinary operations.

1. Dead flies, etc.] This v. really belongs to the end of c. 9. As a few of the poisonous flies abounding in hot countries would render valueless a whole jar of perfume, so a man by a slight admixture of error may render nugatory much of his own skilful or upright conduct.

2. At his right hand . . . left] A wise man's mind directs him to appropriate conduct. A fool is sure to do the wrong thing. He is gauche. 3. Saith to every one] He advertises his folly by his speech. 4. The advice of 8^s is repeated. St. Peter (1 Pet 2²⁰⁻²³) is able to add to the same precept a new and inspiring motive. Yielding pacifieth great offences] RM 'gentleness leaveth great sins undone': both sides will be saved from committing serious misdeeds. 6, 7. He hints that through the ruler's error of judgment, as he gently puts it, the wrong people have received promotion.

8, 9. Prudence is needed in many applications. Otherwise you may dig a pit to entrap your enemy, and then fall into it yourself; or, in pulling down a fence, if you are not heedful, one of the serpents lodging in the crannies may bite you. Similarly the quarrying of stones and the felling of timber call for watchfulness. 10. If you are not wise enough to act with tactful sagacity, you must compensate for this by extra force.

11. RV 'If the serpent bite before it be charmed, then is there no advantage in the charmer.' The snake charmer, who has neglected to use his voice with proper skill in order to effect his object, will have cause in his own person to discover that the mere fact of his proficiency will not avail him.

12-15. Description of folly and its results.

12. Are gracious] there is beauty in his talk. Will swallow up himself] he often will have to eat his own words. 14. A fool talks confidently and fluently of the future, as though it could be foreseen. 15. He wears himself with ineffectual attempts, because he is incapable of carrying on the most ordinary affairs of life.

16-20. Much depends on the ruler. Whatever he be, he must be revered.

16, 17. The case referred to can hardly be an imaginary one. Ptolemy Epiphanes succeeded his father Philopater as king of Egypt at the age of six years (205 B.C.), and during his minority there was much strife between the Syrian and Jewish factions in Egypt, and, on the part of some in high places, licentious indulgence all day and every day (eat in the morning).

18. When the timber-work of a house is neglected, it gives way. So will it be also with the fabric of the state. Droppeth through] RV 'leaketh.'

19. If a man is wealthy enough to pay his way, there need be but little stint to the pleasures, lawful or unlawful, in which he may recklessly indulge. But in proportion to the height of the position he occupies, will be the injury done. But] RV 'and.' Answereth] i.e. provides. 20. Nevertheless silent submission to authority is the only safety for an ordinary person.

CHAPTER 11

LIFE AFTER ALL IS WORTH LIVING

1-3. Fulfil the duty of beneficence, knowing that results are in the hands of God.

1. Cast thy bread, etc.] show kindness, even where a return is least to be expected. A blessing in some sort, although it may be long delayed, will result. There is perhaps a reference to the sowing of seed on irrigated land.

2. Give a portion, etc.] be not niggardly or calculating in the bestowal of favours. You know not when you may need them yourself.

3. The fixed laws by which the world is governed. Where the tree falleth, etc.] There is no reference here to the state of man after death.

4-6. Man's knowledge is limited, while God's purposes are inscrutable. Winds, clouds, and the whole ordering of nature are His. Submit to His decrees, and do thy daily part, leaving the issue to Him.

7-9. Existence has its pleasures, but its span is brief. Youthful enjoyment is commended, provided it be such as need not dread God's judgment. 8. RV 'Yea, if a man live many years, let him,' etc. The remembrance that life is brief is to be itself a motive for enjoyment while it is possible.

9. Rejoice, O young man] Youth is naturally cheerful. Be it so. But there must be present that which shall check excess, viz. the knowledge that the Divine Judge will mark and punish sinful indulgence; not always in this life (for cp. 8¹⁴), but, if not, then beyond the grave. 10. Childhood and youth] RV 'youth and the prime of life.' Vanity] i.e. fleeting.

CHAPTER 12

IN LIFE REMEMBER DEATH AND JUDGMENT

1. The Creator is to be remembered in youth. When the powers of mind and body are failing, it will be too late.

1-7. Commentators have differed much as to the interpretation of this passage. It has been taken by many as a description of the gradual failing of one bodily organ after another till death supervenes. In that case we may explain vv. 2 f. thus: The light grows dim to the aged sense, and reason is dulled and ceases to illuminate. The old man weeps in his distress, and the troubles that draw forth those tears ever recur (v. 2). The limbs tremble: the arms, once strong, are become bent and feeble; the few teeth that are left no longer do the work of mastication; the eyes grow darkened (v. 3). The means by which the processes of nourishment and sensation have been carried on, in other words, the body's means of communication with the outer world, are shut; the voice is low and feeble; the slightest sound breaks in upon rest (or, 'the bird shall rise with a cry,' i.e. the voice assumes the piping treble of age), and music no longer gives pleasure (v. 4). Fancied terrors haunt the soul, and bar the path. The sleeplessness, of which the almond tree (the Heb. name for it meaning 'the early waker,' cp. Jer 1¹¹) is a symbol, becomes the old man's lot; the lightest weight is a burden, and nothing rouses the flagging appetite, because he is setting out on his journey to the tomb, and the hired mourners are already awaiting him; even before the actual dissolution comes (v. 5), and the golden bowl of the lamp of life is broken, and the silver cord, by which it is suspended, loosed; and the pitcher, which has gone so oft to draw at the fountain of life, is shattered, and so is the wheel, which works the rope and bucket to raise water from the deep-sunk well (v. 6). Some refer these last two clauses respectively to the action of the lungs and of the heart.

Others, however, have explained these vv. as setting forth a description of a storm and the alarm which it produces, under which figure are indicated the signs which accompany death. The following is a sketch of that interpretation of the passage which sees in it a description of the time specially fatal to aged persons in Palestine, that is to say, the last few days of winter, marked by a violent tempest; the picture being continued by a description of the spring time of nature, which, however, brings no returning vigour to those who are in the extreme winter of their days.

There comes on the storm of exceptional severity, which concludes the broken weather of winter (v. 2). Servants and masters are alike dismayed. The grinding women cease from their work, and the ladies of the harem, stricken with fear, no longer idly gaze from the lattices on the passers by (v. 3). Ordinary work has ceased, and the house is shut up. But soon the last and greatest storm of winter is over, and the advent of spring is welcomed by the bird-note, to imitate the sweetness of which is the despair of the professional daughters of song (v. 4). Nature is joyous, but the aged are full of suspicion that danger lurks about and above their path. And yet there is on every side evidence of renewed power. The almond tree blossoms; the locust crawls out from its shelter; but the aged are not in sympathy. They are beyond the influence of appetising stimulants; for they are approaching the grave, and the hired mourners are near (v. 5). Then follow the figures of speech, already touched on, indicating bodily dissolution (v. 6).

8-13. Eulogy of the Preacher and his method. Summary of his teaching.

This is the Epilogue, and was probably added by a different hand. It answers to a commendatory preface in the case of a modern book.

10. Acceptable words] He feels that proverbs were a form of speech that will find favour.

11. The words of the wise, etc.] Leaders of thought in each age have the gift of fixing their words securely in the memories of their disciples (goals . . . nails), a gift which comes to them from Him who is the supreme Guide and Disposer of the affairs of men (one shepherd). Masters of assemblies] R.M. 'col-lectors of sentences.'

12. Be admonished] Jewish teaching was largely oral. Gentile philosophers, on the other hand, committed their speculations to writing, sometimes, e.g. Epicurus, to the extent of many volumes. Among such it was easy to be bewildered and wearied.

13-14. The writer's conclusions. There is a moral Governor of the world. Here or hereafter there shall be a recompense, good or evil.

THE SONG OF SOLOMON

INTRODUCTION

1. Contents. Two points strike every careful reader of the poem: the extreme difficulty of determining its meaning as a whole and deciding as to the class of poetry in which it is to be placed; and the fascinating beauty of its details. The former is evident on a mere glance at the attempts which have been and still are being made to define its scope and character. The Jews admitted it into the Canon on the supposition that it depicts the relations between Jehovah and His people. But for that interpretation the doubts which gathered round it and were not authoritatively discouraged till the Synod of Jamnia (90 A.D.), would never have been dispelled. The Christian Church followed the same general line, explaining the Song as an allegory of the love between Christ and the Church or Christ and the soul. In this sense St. Bernard wrote no fewer than eighty-six sermons on the first two chapters. The headings of chapters and pages in the English Bible express the same idea. In all ages, however, amongst both Jews and Christians, there were thinkers who perceived that the theme is not divine love but human. In course of time the poem came to be regarded by many as a drama. The adherents of this view were divided as to the plot. Some took it to be the story of Solomon's love for a country maiden, whom he raised to the rank of queen, himself for a while adopting a simpler mode of life, and although he eventually reverted to luxury and polygamy the poem remained as a protest against undue self-indulgence. The other and more plausible version of the dramatic theory is that the maiden was carried off to Solomon's harem and exposed to the blandishments of the monarch, who was seconded by the ladies of the court. But she continued faithful to her shepherd-lover, to whom, in the end, the king magnanimously restored her. Another opinion has recently been maintained with much confidence and has found considerable acceptance. According to it we have to do neither with drama, opera, nor unity of any kind, but with a collection of love-ditties, partly composed for, and all suitable for use at, marriage festivals. The title 'king' (1⁴, 12⁷) is explained by the fact that in Syria bride and bridegroom play the part of queen and king during 'the king's week,' the first week of married life. Seated on a throne which is erected on the village threshing-floor, they receive the homage of the whole country-side. Nuptial songs and dances are executed by the bridesmen, the chorus of male and female bystanders, and the wedded pair. A plausible account can thus be given of the abrupt transitions, the apparent lack of connexion between the parts of which Canticles is composed. But the whole of the facts are not quite explained. Amidst all the admitted inconcinnity there is an equally undeniable unity. The recurrence of certain expressions (2⁷ 3² 8⁴; 2¹⁷ 4⁶ 8¹⁴) is doubtless meant to mark breaks in what is conceived of as a single poem. The sentiments and style are too similar throughout to have sprung from divers writers. Nor is this to be met by the assertion that we have before us a collection of folk-songs which resemble each other because they all belong to the same period and locality. Canticles reads like the work of an author who composed amatory poems on various occasions and subsequently wove them into a garland of verse. Perhaps some of the shorter pieces have fallen out of the places which he assigned to them: this has been forcibly argued with reference to 8¹¹ 8¹³. But when we remember the irrelevance, from our point of view, of the verses which are often sung in Eastern lands to-day we shall be slow to deny that the singers and hearers of the Song of Songs understood allusions and perceived a fitness which are hidden from us. We shall be compelled to admit that there is no definite line of advance, no initial simplicity, followed by complication, rounded off by a dramatic dénouement. Matters are as far advanced at 1⁴ 2¹ as at 8⁴.

Yet the following brief analysis shows that the book falls into what may fairly be called seven cantos. Canto I, 1²-2⁷: A rural bride declares her ardent affection for her husband, deprecates the townswomen's criticism of her beauty, desires to know where she may find her beloved. The lovers praise each other. Canto II, 2⁸-2¹⁷: She relates a visit he once paid her and the invitation he addressed to her. Canto III, 3¹-3¹¹: Her thoughts of him and search for him by night. An interlude. Canto IV, 4¹-5¹: He depicts and eulogises her charms. He is ready to escort her through the most dangerous regions. Her invitation and his response. Canto V, 5²-6⁹: A waking dream, with painful ending. She describes her lover. He has entered his garden. Once more he dilates on her loveliness, which surpasses that of the ladies belonging to the royal harem. Canto VI, 6¹⁰⁻⁸¹: A short dialogue betwixt these ladies and her. Again he praises her and she replies in terms of love and desire. Canto VII, 8⁵⁻⁸¹⁴: An inquiry. The bride reminds her husband of their early experiences, celebrates the might and spontaneity of love, remembers how carefully her brothers guarded her. He sets forth her preciousness in figurative language. Then he begs her to sing. She closes the poem with a repetition of 2¹⁷.

2. Value. At the first blush we are surprised to find in the Bible a poem on human love. But we must remember that the mutual attraction of the sexes is of God's ordaining. So far from being intrinsically evil, it contains for both parties an immeasurable possibility of blessing. And the love which is here sung is ordered, regulated, legitimate. The imagery is too suggestive, and the description of physical charms too minute, for our taste, but it was produced by an Oriental for Orientals. More reticence does not necessarily imply truer purity. No doubt we should have welcomed a clear recognition of the intellectual, ideal, and spiritual side of marriage, but it would be a mistake to argue that the poet was a stranger to this better part. And such love as 8⁷ describes is based on broader foundations than those supplied by mere sensuous charms alone.

Again, whilst it is admitted that the poem was not meant to be understood either typically or allegorically, all true human love is, in the Apostle's sense of the word, a mystery (Eph 5²³⁻³³) which carries the Christian's mind upward to the union of the soul with Christ. Sensuous thoughts and images are never to hold us prisoners. The earthly is a stepping-stone to the heavenly. Spenser tells us that, having in the green time of his youth composed two Hymns in praise of Love and Beauty, 'and finding that the same too much pleased those of the like age and disposition, which being too vehemently carried with that kind of affection, do rather sucke out poyson to their strong passion, then hony to their honest delight,' he afterwards resolved, 'by way of retraction, to reforme them, making, in stead of those two Hymnes of earthly or naturall love and beautie, two others of heavenly and celestiall.' In this he is a safe guide—

'All the glory and the grace of things,
Witchcraft of loveliness, wonder of flesh,
Fair symmetry of forms, deep harmonies
Of line and limb—are but as shadows cast
From hidden light of Beauty and of Love.'

It would be a dull eye that missed the beauty or the poem. Its author responded immediately to every charm of Nature or of Art. Above all was his soul attuned to Nature. He carries us along with him into the open air, to the vineyards, the villages, the mountains. He awakes us at daybreak to catch the scent of the forest trees, to gather the apples and the pomegranates, to listen to the grateful plash of falling waters. How he loved the flocks of wild pigeons, the crocuses, the fields embroidered with lilies! His verse is fragrant with the breath of spring. And the soul of artistry within him was moved by the pomp of the court, the magnificence of a royal litter, the glittering whiteness of an ivory tower, the proud display of warriors' shields, the ornaments and costly dress of women. No other poem in the Bible can be compared with this. It still merits the title, prefixed by the men who inserted it in the Canon, 'The Song of Songs,' the most beautiful, the one that most nearly corresponds with the ideal of its class.

3. Authorship. But whilst we admit that the title is a fitting one, we must remember that it has no authority to determine date or authorship (see v. 1). The internal evidence is conclusive against Canticles having been written by Solomon, and points to a date subsequent to the exile, not earlier than the 4th cent. B.C. The language alone suffices to prove these points: it is of the very latest strain of biblical Hebrew.

4. The following are improvements on the Authorised Version:—

CHAPTER 1

4. RV 'Make mention of,' for remember
RV 'Rightly do they love Thee,' for the upright, etc.
6. RV 'Swarthy,' for black.
7. RM 'Wandereth,' for turneth aside.
9. RV 'A steed' (better still, 'a mare'), for a company of horses.
13. RM 'Bag,' for bundle. 'That lieth' for he shall lie.
14. RV 'Henna-flowers,' for camphire.

CHAPTER 2

1. RM 'Autumn crocus,' for rose.
4. Lit. 'House of wine,' for banqueting house.
5. RM 'Cakes of raisins,' for flagons.
7. RM 'Gazelles,' for roes.
RV 'Awaken love, until it please,' for awake my love, till he please.
9. The sense requires that she gaze forth at him, not be at her.
13. RV 'Ripeneth,' for putteth forth.
RV 'The vines are in blossom, they give forth their fragrance,' for the vines with the tender grape give a good smell.
14. RV 'Covert of the steep place,' for secret places of the stairs.
15. RV 'Vineyards are in blossom,' for vines have tender grapes.
16. RV 'Feedeth his flock,' for feedeth.

CHAPTER 3

6. 'What' is better than Who.
7. RV 'It is the litter of Solomon,' for his bed, which is Solomon's.
9. RV 'Palanquin,' for chariot.
10. 'Inlaid with ebony from,' for paved with love for.

CHAPTER 4

1. RV 'Thine eyes are as doves behind thy veil,' for Thou hast doves' eyes within thy locks. RV 'Lie along,' for appear.
2. RV 'Ewes that are newly,' for sheep that are even.
- RM 'Are all of them in pairs,' for every one bear twins. RV 'Bereaved,' for barren.
3. RV 'Mouth . . behind thy veil,' for speech . . within thy locks.
4. RM 'With turrets,' for for an armoury.
6. RV 'Be cool,' for break.
9. RM 'One look from,' for one of.
12. RM 'Barred,' for inclosed. 'Garden,' for spring.
13. RM 'Paradise,' for orchard.
- RV 'Henna,' for camphire.
15. RV supplies 'Thou art.'

CHAPTER 5

1. RM 'Of love,' for O beloved.
2. RV 'I was asleep,' for I sleep.
3. 'Tunic,' for coat.
5. RV 'Bolt,' for lock.
7. 'Wrapper,' for veil.
12. RM 'Sitting by full streams,' for fitly set.
14. RM 'Topaz,' for beryl.
- 'Lapis lazuli,' for sapphires.
16. RM 'Speech,' for mouth.

CHAPTER 6

4. 'Awe-inspiring as bannered hosts,' for terrible as an army with banners.
10. RM 'Pure,' for clear.
11. RV 'Green plants,' for fruits.
- RV 'Budded,' for flourished.
12. RV 'Set me among,' for made me like.
13. RV 'The dance of the Muhannaim,' for the company of two armies.

CHAPTER 7

1. RM 'Steps,' for feet; 'in sandals,' for with shoes. 'The turnings' or 'windings,' for the joints.
2. RV 'Mingled wine,' for liquor.
5. RV 'Held captive in the tresses thereof,' for held in the galleries.
8. RV 'Breath,' for nose.
12. RV 'Whether the vine hath budded, and its blossoms be open,' for if the vine flourish, whether the tender grape appear.
13. RV 'Doors,' for gates.

CHAPTER 8

1. RV 'And none would despise me,' for Yea, I should not be despised.

2. RV 'Spiced wine. Of,' for spiced wine of.
5. RV 'I awakened,' for I raised.
6. RM 'Hard,' for cruel; 'Sheol,' for the grave. RV 'Flashes,' for coals; 'a very flame of the LORD,' for a most vehement flame.
7. 'Would any man despise him,' for it would utterly be condemned.
9. RM 'Battlement,' for palace.
10. RV 'Peace,' for favour.
12. RV 'Shall,' for must.
13. RV 'For,' for to.

CHAPTERS 12-27

THE ARDENT AFFECTION OF THE LOVERS

2-7. Songs of the bride : her enquiry and his answers.

2. Love] The original has 'loves,' i.e. expressions of love, repeated kisses and embraces.

3. Ointments] Orientals have always been passionately fond of perfumes. The literatures of Egypt, Greece, and Rome abound in references to them : in the Bible see Ps 23⁵ 45^{7,8} Prov 7¹⁷ 27⁹ Lk 7⁴⁶ Jn 12³. A modern traveller writes : 'Arabs are delighted with perfumes ; the nomad housewives make treasure of any they have, with their medicines ; they often asked me, "Hast thou no perfumes to sell ?" ' The 'poured-out' unguent gives forth its fragrance : even so is the beloved's name praised of many.

4. The king, i.e. the bridegroom, has brought the bride into his house, and she, freed from any taint of envy, nay, with an ingenuous pride, mentions the love with which others 'rightly' (RV) regard him. Some scholars prefer to read, 'Bring me, O king,' etc. 5. In speaking of herself as black and 'swarthy' (RV), she is acknowledging herself to be a country girl : in the current songs of Palestine town-girls are called 'the white' ; those of the country 'the black.' For Kedar see Gn 25¹⁸ Isa 42¹¹ 60⁷. The Arab tents are often made of black goats' hair or black woven stuff. If our present text is correct the maiden claims a beauty of her own, comparable to that of the richly embroidered curtains in Solomon's palace. But possibly the reference may be to the Salamites, who followed the Kedarcians in occupying the territory S. of Palestine. Her face has been bronzed by the sun's 'looking upon her,' as the prince of Morocco, in the 'Merchant of Venice,' speaks of his complexion :

'The shadow'd livery of the burnish'd sun,
To whom I am a neighbour, and near bred.'

6. Her mother's sons have made it impossible for her to avoid this, treating her with that arbitrary tyranny which male relatives so often display in the East. 'I have known an ill-natured child,' says Doughty, 'lay a stick on the back of his good cherishing mother' : cp. 1S 17²⁸. Her own vineyard, her complexion, she was forced to leave uncared for. 7. Running to her lover, she would fain spend the siesta hour, the hot midday, with him. Failing to find him, she would have to wander aimlessly (RM) beside the other shepherds, in whom she took no interest.

8. With kindly banter he bids her lead out her little flock of female kids and take her chance of finding him. 9-11. It would not occur to us to compare a woman to a beautiful mare: but an Eastern at once appreciates the simile. In Damascus 'the mare comes before wife and child': she may be worth £40,000, and there really is no more beautiful creature. The Egyptian horse was once prized much as the Arab now is (2 Ch 9²⁵).

10. With the 'string of jewels' (RV) compare a song which may be heard now in Syria:

Put golden coins upon her, and under her neck a string of pearls.'

The necklace usually worn consists of three rows of pearls. Lady Burton says of a Samaritan woman: 'Upon her head she wore a coat of mail of gold, and literally covered with gold coins, of which a very large one dangled on her forehead. She wore diamond and enamelled earrings, and a string of pearls coquettishly arranged on one side of her head in a festoon.'

12-14. The king, i.e. the bridegroom, is reclining on his divan or couch, and the bride's presence is as delightful to him as the scent of the costly oil of the Indian nard (Mk 14³). The odoriferous myrrh is a gum, which exudes from the bark of a spiny shrub growing in Arabia and India. Women wore little flasks of this on their breast. 14. The henna (RV 'the flower of paradise') has fragrant yellowish white flowers, growing in clusters like grapes. It is still found in the wadi of En-Gedi, the most delightful spot on the W. shore of the Dead Sea, an oasis of luxurious vegetation. The sentiment of these vv. is thus reproduced in a song still popular in Palestine:

'Make of me a silver necklace,
And toss me about on thy breast.
Make of me a golden earring,
And hang me in thine ear.'

15. He compares her eyes to doves. Eastern women spend much pains on their eyes, painting them round with kohl to add to their apparent size and increase their expressiveness. And the comparison of maidens to doves is exceedingly common in the popular poetry:

'Lovely girls are there, like a flock of doves.'

16, 17. She looks forward to their union in the sweet rural district, amongst the cedars and the firs. It is as in the bower which Milton found in the earthly Paradise:

'The roof
Of thickest covert was in woven shade,
Laurel and myrtle, and what higher grew
Of firm and fragrant leaf: on either side
Acanthus, and each odorous bushy shrub
Fenc'd up the verdant wall;

Here in close recess,
With flowers, garlands, and sweet-smelling herbs,
Espoused Eve deckt first her nuptial bed.'

1. She compares herself to a simple wild flower, the crocus (RM) of Sharon. The plain, which extended from Joppa to Caesarea, was proverbial for its flowers (Isa 35²), and travellers continue to revert to this feature: 'We constantly had reason to admire the faint harmonious colouring of the wild flowers on the untilled plain. Caesarea was surrounded by fields of the yellow marigold. Other flowers were also conspicuous—the red pheasant's eye, in some cases as big as a poppy; blue pimpernels, moon-daisies, the lovely phlox, gladiolus, and high hollyhocks.'

2. He will not suffer her to depreciate her own value: compared with other women she is a lily among thorns (Prov 31²⁰). The Hittite lily, in the north of the Holy Land, grows in the midst of thorns, which lacerate the hands of the flower-gatherers. The soil near Beth-lehem, in the S., is enamelled with lilies and covered almost everywhere with dwarf thorns.

3-7. In this strife of mutual compliments she now likens him to the beautiful, flowering, fruit-bearing apple tree, which gives a welcome shade, gratifies the sense of taste, and is to Orientals a symbol of love. 4. He has brought her to a 'house of wine' (RM), a place of feasting and enjoyment, where the banner floating over them was not merely inscribed with the word Love, but was Love itself. The entire description is figurative, and if the language were not sufficient to indicate this we should be driven to the conclusion by the fact that it was not considered decorous for women to be present at banquets (Esth 1¹² Dan 5^{10, 23}). In Egypt the house where a marriage-festival is in progress is marked by rows of flags and streamers stretched across the street. 5. She begs her friends to sustain her with cakes of pressed raisins (RV), such as were given to those who were fainting for hunger (1 S 25¹⁸ 30¹² 2 S 6¹⁹ Hos 3¹). 7. And they are to leave her and her beloved for the present undisturbed by the festal dances and songs. The request is repeated 3⁵ 8¹, and on each occasion is evidently meant to mark one of the main divisions of the poem. The adjuration, by the gazelles (RM), and by the hinds of the field, is suggested by the beauty and the timidity of those graceful creatures.

CHAPTERS 28-217

A VISIT AND AN INVITATION

8-13. After an interval she relates one of his visits to her home. He comes swiftly and easily; hills and mountains are no obstacle. He stands behind the wall of her mother's house, and she gazes at him through the lattice, for she has seen his approach from afar. The unglazed, latticed windows of an Oriental house admits air and a softened light, allow those within to see out, and prevent their being observed from outside. 10. He would have her accompany him to the open country. 11. It is the right season. The winter and the rains are over, for in that climate there is a cloudless sky from the beginning of May to the end of October.

12. It is the time of flowers: 'Everywhere this day the earth was beautifully green, and carpeted with flowers. The air was fresh and balmy and laden with the sweet scents of spring. . . The sky was so blue, the mountains and plains looked so beautiful, the birds, insects, the wild flowers, the fresh balmy breeze, the sweet smells, and gentle sun, the black tents, all combined to make one glad to be alive.' 'Come here in spring, O traveller!' Lady Butler says, 'and not in the arid, dusty, burnt-up autumn.'

13. The early figs are growing spicy; the vines are all blossom and fragrance. It is the season when a young man's mind turns lightly to thoughts of love. Even in our cold England the poet sings—

'Twas when the spousal time of May Hangs all the hedge with bridal wreaths,
And air 's so sweet the bosom gay
Gives thanks for every breath it breathes;
When like to like is gladly moved,
And each thing joins in Spring's refrain,
"Let those love now who never loved;
Let those who have loved love again."

14, 15. He begs her to lay aside her coyness, for she is concealing herself, like a dove in an inaccessible mountain gorge. Where there is no village pigeon-house the wild doves of Syria build in hollows of the steep rocks. At the monastery of St. Saba 'one sees, sailing on outstretched wings from out of those caverns, flights of the fair blue pigeons.' 15. She sings him the little ditty concerning the foxes that ruin the vineyards: any song, on any theme, would have pleased him, and short poems that seem to have no special relevance to the occasion are still in common use amongst the peasants and the Bedouin.

16, 17. She declares their unchangeable, mutual devotion, and bids the shepherd, who pastures his flock in the fields bright with lilies, come to her.

17. At midday the heat is overpowering—

'All round the coast the languid air did swoon, Breathing like one that hath a weary dream.'

But at sunset the day 'breathes' (RM); a cool breeze blows, and the shadows gradually disappear (Gn 3⁸ Job 14²). The gazelles (RM) descend at night to the plains to feed; they leap and run safely on the mountains of Bether. The meaning of the last word is not clear: it may be the name of a locality not mentioned elsewhere in Scripture; it may signify 'the cloven mountains'; it may be the same as the bēsamim (= spices) of 8¹⁴, or, as RM suggests, the spice malobathron.

CHAPTER 3

NIGHT THOUGHTS AND AN INTERLUDE

1-4. There is a charming lightness of touch and quickness of movement in the story she tells, and it is all the more interesting for our having to supply the prosaic connecting links. 'The Unrest of Love' is an apt title. We can only understand it as a maiden's dream.

2. The broad ways are what we should call the squares; wide, open spaces by the city gates and elsewhere. 4. The 'mother's house' is the women's apartments, into which a strange man dare not enter.

6-11. It is possible that this is a song of the bridegroom's companions on the morrow of the wedding, when the throne is set up for the bridal pair. But more probably it is a kind of interlude, intended to convey the sense of contrast between the simple, fearless life of the happy pair, and the luxurious but anxious state which the most magnificent of Hebrew kings had kept. The singer sees in imagination King Solomon's procession. He makes us hear the questions and remarks of the crowd, as in the last scene of Shakespeare's 'Henry the Fourth.' 6. One man asks, 'What is this litter (RV) that is coming out of the wilderness, the uncultivated grazing land?' The pillars of smoke are caused by the burning of sweet perfumes. Frankincense was an aromatic gum-resin obtained from balsamic plants which grow in Arabia and Eastern Africa. The powders of the merchant are powdered perfumes. The question of v. 6 is answered in vv. 7, 8, and possibly we have a third speaker in 9, 10. In any case, another word is here used for 'litter' (RV), a word which came afterwards to be specially employed for the litter in which the bride was carried in procession.

9. King Solomon's palanquin (RV) is made of the costly woods of Lebanon, cedar and cyprus. 10. The pillars supporting the canopy are of silver, the arms of gold, the seat (RV) covered with a costly purple fabric. And, as the Hebrew words for love and 'ebony' are very similar, the closing part of the description may originally have run, 'inlaid with ebony from the daughters of Jerusalem.' 11. The women of the chorus are to fancy themselves meeting the procession and feasting their eyes with the sight of the king in all his glory. At a Jewish wedding both bride and groom wear crowns in Syria at the present day the bride wears one. In Bulgaria she has a crown of alloyed silver.

CHAPTERS 4-5¹DESCRIPTION OF HER CHARMS HLR
INVOLUTION

1-7. This short poem belongs to the class which the Arabs call wasf in which the bride's charms are described. They are sung while she is being dressed or when she exhibits herself in her nuptial array or on the day subsequent to the ceremony. Here is one that is still to be heard in Palestine.

'Oh, her eyes are like the line of ink drawn by the stylus

And her hair when she dyed it with henna like birds' feathers,

Her nose as the handle of a glittering Indian sword,

Her teeth like bulstones, yet even more lovely,

Her cheeks like rosy apples of Damascus,

And her breasts lovely pomegranates, hanging on the tree,

Her neck like that of a scaled antelope,

And her arms staves of pure silver,

And her fingers sharp pointed pens of gold.'

1. The maiden's eyes are here compared to doves, peeping out from behind the veil (RV). As is usual with Syrian brides her hair is not braided, but hangs loosely down, like a flock of black goats which graze along the slope of a mountain, and look as though they were suspended from it (RV). 2. Her teeth are white, regular, a perfect set. Her cheek resembles the rich colours of the pomegranate. She has a swan's neck, a graceful slender tower hung round with ornaments, is the tower of David—whatever that may have been—was hung with shields (1 K 10¹⁶ 2 K 11¹⁰ Ezk 27¹¹ 1 Mac 4⁴⁷). For sweetness she may be compared to mountains on which odouriferous shrubs abound.

8. The idea conveyed by this abrupt and obscure seems to be that she will be perfectly safe, even in regions remote from home, and where many dangers lurk, if only her lover is at hand. His presence ensures happiness and security. The exclamation 'Look' etc reminds us of a modern traveller's remark concerning the southern part of Lebanon 'I have travelled in no part of the world where I have seen such a variety of glorious mountain scenes within so narrow a compass.' Amana may perhaps be the name of what is now called Jébel ez Zebédini, below which is the source of the river Amana or Abana (2 K 1¹). On some inscriptions of the Assyrian kings the range of Anti-Libanus is called Amman. Here, and at 1 Ch 5²⁻³, Shenur is distinguished from Hermon. The highest point of Hermon, Jébel el-Shukh, 9,166 ft high, is visible from the greater part of Palestine.

9-15. He praises her in celestial terms. In the ancient Egyptian love songs the lovers call one another 'brother and sister'. One glance from her eyes, one pendant hanging from her neck, is enough to steal his heart, as it is said of Judith (16⁹), 'Her sandals ravished his eye.'

10. The smell of her garments is like the fresh and healthy odour of the cedars or as we in England should say, of the pinewoods. cp Gn 27²⁷ Ps 45⁶.

11. Honey and milk are most highly prized amongst Orientals (Isa 7¹⁵).

12. She is as a garden buried (RV) to strangers.

13. Her charms are like the young plants in an orchard of pomegranates, protected from the depredations of wild beasts.

14. The saffron is the autumnal crocus, the dried flowers of which are employed in medicine, dyeing and perfumery. The thick creeping rootstock of the calamus is pungent and aromatic. The resin of aloes is used in the preparation of incense. 15. The flowing (RV) streams, etc., reminds us of the many streams which run into the sea between Tyre and Beyrout.

16. Accepting his figurative description of her she bids him welcome. The colder north wind and the warmer south are naturally mentioned, not the east which brings drought nor the west, which carries moisture from the sea.

C 5. 1. The bridegroom's reply. He bids his friends follow his example. 'Drink ye, drink freely of the delights of love' (RV).

CHAPTERS 52-60

A DREAM HIS BEAUTY AND HIS

2-7. Another dream of hers, with a painful ending. The accumulation (v. 2) of names of endearment reminds us of the frequent repetition by a Palestinian bridegroom during the wedding dance, of Ya haluti, Ya muli, O my property, O my possession!

2. Heavy dew falls, especially during spring, and in the second half of the night. The Spanish poet whom Longfellow translated had in his mind our passage and Rev 3²⁰.

'Lord, what am I, that, with unceasing care thou didst seek after me,—that thou didst wait with unhealthily dews before my gate, And pass the gloomy nights of winter there.'

How oft my guardian angel gently cried,
'Soul, from thy easement look, and thou shalt see How he persists to knock and wait for thee.'

And our Lord's parable (Lk 11⁵) presents a parallel to v. 3. The tunic had been put off (Ex 22²⁶ Dt 24¹⁸). The feet, shod only with sandals, needed washing each night. 4. A hole is still cut in the door of Syrian houses, through which the owner can insert his arm and the key. 5. 'Myrrha stacta,' liquid myrrh, which flowed from the bark of the plant, was the finest and most costly. In two modern Egyptian poems we find: 'My love hath perfumed herself on the nights of the festival,' and 'O thou, with sweet hands!'

7. The watchmen treat her as a mere night-wanderer: cp. the solicitude of Boaz for Ruth (Ruth 3¹⁴). They tore off her wrapper (Mk 14^{51, 52}), a light garment which rested on the shoulders, or was thrown round the head as a veil.

9. The chorus prepares the way for her eulogy of her beloved.

10-16. Nuptial songs in praise of the bridegroom's beauty are at the present day comparatively rare in Palestine. His head is the most fine gold, an expression which recalls Shakespeare's 'Golden lads and girls.' His eyes are doves, building in a ravine through which a stream flows. Possibly the fact that these birds delight in clear water and frequently bathe in it may explain the 'sitting by full streams' of the RV, or, 'sitting upon fulness,' which literally represents the original.

13. The 'banks of sweet herbs' (RV) have also been rendered, 'towers of perfumes.' The lips are compared to red lilies, red being the dominant colour of the flora of that land.

14. The fingers are round and shapely; the nails like topazes; the body (RV) a plate of ivory encrusted with lapis lazuli, blue veins showing through the lighter skin. 15. The pillars of marble remind us of a song still current in those regions: the singer avers that his dear one's foot is of white silver, which would be scratched if she walked even on cloth.

C. 6. 1-3. The chorus enquire where he may be found, and she, in dreamy and indefinite language, informs them.

4-9. He again strikes in, celebrating her beauty. Tirzah is in a lofty and delightful situation, surrounded by olive groves: its name (= 'Delight') implies its attractiveness. Jerusalem has always been lovely to an Israelite's eye (Ps 48² 50² Lam 2¹⁵, etc.). A pure and charming woman is 'awe-inspiring as bannered hosts' (RM). Coventry Patmore speaks of 'her awful charm of grace and innocence sincere':

'And though her charms are a strong law
Compelling all men to admire,
They go so clad with lowly awe
None but the noble dare desire.'

5. Her eyes have thrown him into confusion. 8. She is far above all the queens and concubines, the ladies of the harem, who are just now at hand. 9. She is her mother's only, i.e. dearest, one (Gn 22²), and her pure one.

CHAPTERS 6¹⁰⁻⁸⁴

A DIALOGUE. HER LOVELINESS

10-13. A dialogue between these ladies and her. They compare her to the dawn, stooping down to look on the earth from the sky. It is still common in Arabic poems to address the beloved as 'Moon,' or 'Full moon'!

11, 12. She tells of her visit to the nut-garden, where, ere she was aware of it, her soul, i.e. her desire, set her in the chariots of Ammi-nadib. The precise meaning of this expression cannot be determined. The general sense appears to be that she was sunk in reverie, carried away in a lover's dream, a flight of fancy. Aroused from this, she would shyly hasten away. 13. But the chorus beg her to return and perform for them the 'Dance of Mahanaim' (RV), a sword-dance, no doubt, such as the bride executes, sword in hand, on the evening of the marriage, amidst a half-circle of men and women, whilst a poem (wasf = 'description') of the character of 7¹⁻⁶ is being sung. The title Shulamite is derived from the town-name Shulem (otherwise spelled 'Shunem'), from which Abishag, the fairest maiden of her day, came (1K 1⁴): obviously it is another way of calling her 'fairest among women' (1s 5⁹ 6¹).

1-6. The wasf begins with a eulogy of her dancing: her steps in sandals (RV) are lovely, and the circling movements of her body are graceful as ornamental chains. In Eastern dancing the twisting and vibration of the body are of more consequence than the rapid movement of the feet. The title 'noble's daughter' may be merely a conventional compliment, or it may point to the dignity of her character: cp. 'a daughter of Belial,' 1S 1¹⁶. 2. The Talmud states that the proportions for mixed wine (RV) were two-thirds water, one-third wine. In Syria the colour of wheat is considered to be the most beautiful for a human body.

4. Her neck is like a tower of ivory, long, and dazzling white. But what about the swarthiness of 1s 6⁷? The answer is that the exactness and consistency of prose are not to be expected in an epithalamium. Heshbon lies five and a half hours E. of the N. point of the Dead Sea, in a fertile, well-watered region: there are several deep wells cut in the rock, and a large reservoir. 5. Carmel was regarded as the 'Park' of the land: there alone were rocky dells, with deep jungles of copse. A 'king is held captive in the tresses' (RV) of the bride's hair: cp. the Arab song:

'Oh, thy thick hair hangs down;
Seven plaits of it take us captive.'

6-10. The bridegroom begins with a general assertion of the delightfulness of his beloved:

then, in like manner as the Greek poet Theocritus compares Helen to the straight cyprus tree, our poet likens the bride to the tall, straight palm, the loveliest of all trees in his eyes, 'man's sister,' as the Arabs call it. Something of the same feeling appears in the English poem:

'A daughter of the gods, divinely tall,
And most divinely fair.'

One or two slight changes in the text, partly supported by the ancient versions, make of v. 9 an expression of desire that her mouth may be like the best wine for her beloved, 'gliding over his lips and teeth.' Syrian women cried out to an English lady: 'Go on! when you speak Arabic, your words drop out of your mouth like sugar.'

10-14. Again she declares her affection. An intense delight in rural life breathes through these lines. 13. For the effect ascribed to the mandrake see Gn 30¹⁴⁻¹⁶. It is not a very common plant in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, but grows freely in Galilee; its reddish-golden apples, about an inch and a half in diameter, emit a somewhat sweet odour. On a shelf over the inner door (RV) of the house she has laid up some of the old fruits for him.

C. 8. 1f. Obviously this is supposed to be spoken in the days of their first love, before others were aware of it. Amongst the Bedouin, brothers and cousins on the father's side are the only male relatives who may kiss a maiden. In place of the very difficult expression, who would instruct me, two ancient versions have a clause parallel to the preceding one, 'and to the chamber of her who conceived me.' In Persia wine is obtained from pomegranates.

CHAPTER 8⁵⁻¹⁴

MEMORIES. THE CLOSE

5. The chorus enquire who this happy bride may be. And the bridegroom points her to the apple-tree where he had once found her asleep, and to the spot where she was born. These are lovers' reminiscences, sweet to them, trivial to others.

6, 7. Her passionate clinging to him, and her assertion of the irresistibility, the indestructibility, the unselfishness of genuine love.

6. She would fain be as inseparable from him as the seal-cylinder, which men wore on a cord round the neck, or the seal-ring on the right hand (Gn 38¹⁸ Jer 22²⁴). Love is strong as resistless death. Jealousy can be hard as Sheol (RV), the place of the dead.

'Turning all love's delight to miserie,
Through fears of loosing his felicitie.'

And this is especially true of Orientals: 'A son of the East cannot quietly enjoy his inward felicity, cannot love without being consumed with the suspicion that others will rob him of this sweet treasure; and jealousy, the passion which gives birth to hatred and blood-feuds, establishes its way in his heart, growing apparently out of a morbid excess of sentiment.' Othello kills the person he most dearly loves. It is 'a very flame of the Lord' (RV), resistless, fierce, consuming (Gn 23⁹ Ps 80¹⁰ Jon 3² Ac 7²⁰).

7. Render, 'If a man were ready to give the whole substance of his house for love, could any one despise him?' No. It is better worth the purchase than anything else on earth.

8, 9. The solicitude which the brothers once felt concerning their sister. If she repels all improper advances they will do her honour: if she is weak they will carefully guard her. When she hath no breasts, she is not of marriageable age. To be spoken for is to be asked in marriage.

10. Our heroine can proudly assert her purity, and her beloved honours her.

11, 12. In figurative speech he expresses his contentment. King Solomon has a fertile and profitable vineyard at Baal-hamon (perhaps the town mentioned in Josh 19²⁸). Any one would give for its produce a thousand shekels (about £130). Those to whom it is entrusted will not make less than two hundred shekels profit. But the happy lover is well satisfied that Solomon should have his thousand shekels and the keepers their two hundred, provided he may have his dear one. The Arab poet sings, 'Take away all roses; one little garden is enough for me.' Solomon here is the typical wealthy king, the Cræsus of Hebrew fancy (1 K 10²¹): cp. also Eccl 2⁸.

13. The bridegroom once more (sec 2¹¹) begs her to sing. His companions are the young men (Jg 14¹¹) who attended him all through the festivities.

14. Her final word, of invitation to her husband, is a slightly modified repetition of the refrain 2¹⁷.

ISAIAH

INTRODUCTION

WE know comparatively little of the personal life of Isaiah. He was the son of Amoz (1¹), and from his influence at court it has been inferred that he was of royal blood, a rabbinic tradition making him nephew to king Amaziah. He was married and had at least two sons to whom were given symbolic names, embodying the substance of his teaching (7³ 8^{3,15}). Isaiah lived in Jerusalem, and there, in close connexion with the king and court and in the centre of the national life, he exercised his ministry. He received his call to be a prophet in the last year of Uzziah (740 B.C.), and his latest prophecies which can be dated with certainty are connected with Sennacherib's invasion of Judah (701 B.C.), so that his ministry extended over a period of at least 40 years. How long Isaiah survived the crisis of Sennacherib's invasion we know not, but according to a Jewish tradition, alluded to by Justin Martyr about 150 A.D. ('Dial. Trypho,' cap. cxx), he suffered martyrdom by being sawn asunder during the persecution of the true servants of Jehovah under king Manasseh. It is thought that the traditional manner of Isaiah's death may also be alluded to in Heb 11³⁷.

THE HISTORICAL SETTING OF ISAIAH'S PROPHECIES

Reign of Uzziah. In the last year of this king Isaiah received his call (740 B.C.), c. 6.

Reign of Jotham (740-736). It would seem that Isaiah's ministry was not immediately exercised, for no utterances have come down to us which can with certainty be assigned to this reign.

Reign of Ahaz (736-728). About 736 the prophet becomes a more prominent figure. Chs. 2-5 form a summary of his teaching at this period, and throw much light upon the internal condition of Judah during the reign of Jotham, and at the time of Ahaz's accession, while they exhibit Isaiah as an ardent religious and social reformer. The period of the prophet's youth had been an age of prosperity and material progress for Judah under Uzziah and Jotham. The relations of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah were on the whole harmonious, and both were free from aggression from without. Uzziah conducted successful campaigns against the tribes bordering on Palestine, reducing the Edomites and Ammonites to vassalage. He greatly strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem and reorganised the army. He also did much to develop the resources of the country and to encourage commerce, the port of Elath (on the Red Sea) being rebuilt in his reign. Under Jotham a like policy was pursued, and the country enjoyed prosperity and peace. But though outwardly prosperous Judah was, at the time of Ahaz's accession, inwardly corrupt. The development of national wealth brought with it social evils; the accumulation of large estates in the hands of a few holders (5⁸), oppression of the poor (3^{14,15}), perversion of justice (5^{7,23}), luxury and wrongful indulgence (2⁷ 3^{16f.} 5^{11,12,22}). In religion there was a corresponding decay; the land was full of idols (2^{8,20}), and the people, having lost their faith, were given to superstitions, magic and necromancy (2⁶ 3³), or had become callous, indifferent and sceptical (5¹⁹). Isaiah's teaching in view of this condition of affairs is outlined in the vision wherein he received his call. Jehovah is the all-Holy (6³), and as the Holy One of Israel (a characteristic title in this book) cannot let these things go unpunished, but is bound to vindicate His holiness (6^{11a} 2^{9b}); this He will do by a searching judgment (6^{11,12} 2¹⁰⁻²² 3³⁴⁻⁴¹ 5²⁶⁻³⁰), which will not, however, destroy the nation, but a faithful remnant shall be left (6¹³ 4²⁻⁶) through which Israel will attain its glorious destiny.

The Syro-Ephraimite invasion. It is in connexion with this crisis in the history of Judah that Isaiah first comes forward as a statesman. Tiglath-pileser, the Assyrian monarch, had inaugurated a new epoch for that Empire by forming a great scheme of conquest which should unite all W. Asia under his sway. The smaller states naturally took alarm and sought by combination to keep off the common enemy. Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, thus made an alliance, and further endeavoured to compel Judah to throw in its lot with them. Towards the end of Jotham's reign they first assailed Judah (2K 15³⁷), and before Ahaz had long been on the throne they made a determined attack with the object of overthrowing the Davidic dynasty, and setting on the throne of Ahaz a nominee of their own, probably a Syrian, who would follow their line of policy (7⁶). The invasion caused a panic in Judah, and Ahaz suffered serious losses. The passages bearing on the crisis are chs. 71-91 98-104 171-11 (the last two being more especially concerned with the kingdom of Israel): cp. 2K16⁹⁻⁹ 2Ch28¹⁴. Ahaz formed the project of calling in the aid of Tiglath-pileser (2K16⁷ 2Ch28¹⁶), a course which Isaiah strongly opposed, foreseeing that it would bring calamity upon Judah (717-20); he urged that Judah had really nothing to fear from Rezin and Pekah, whose power was doomed to speedy overthrow (74 84 174³), and urged reliance in faith upon Jehovah (79) as the only way to secure the safety and prosperity of the kingdom. Ahaz, however, persisted in his policy of buying the support of Assyria, with the result that Judah became a dependency of that Empire, and was further committed to religious apostasy (2K16^{7,8,10-18}). While the seeds of future trouble and disaster were thus sown, as Isaiah foresaw, Judah was saved from the danger of the moment, for the Assyrians overran Syria, captured Damascus (732 B.C.), slew Rezin, and deported the people (2K16⁹): the kingdom of Israel was also at the same time reduced to a dependent condition and the people of its N. tribes taken captive to Assyria (2K15²⁰).

Reign of Hezekiah (727-699). This reign forms the third period of Isaiah's prophetic activity. Hezekiah was guided by the true prophets of Jehovah, and with the support of Isaiah and Micah (Jer26^{18,19}) carried out a great reformation in religion, so that Isaiah's ministry was exercised under more favourable conditions than before. About the time of Hezekiah's accession, Tiglath-pileser was succeeded on the throne of Assyria by Shalmaneser IV. Egypt at this time was ruled by Shebek (Sabaco, or So) of the Æthiopian dynasty. Efforts were apparently made in the early years of Hezekiah's reign to unite the smaller states with Egypt in order to oppose the Assyrian advance westward. Hoshea, king of Israel, actually allied himself with So (2K17⁴), and a strong party in Judah favoured a like course. This line of policy Isaiah consistently opposed. Earlier he had endeavoured to dissuade Ahaz from committing himself to Assyria and from entangling Judah politically, urging him to 'take heed and be quiet' (74). Now that Judah had become tributary to Assyria, he discouraged the project of attempting, in combination with neighbouring states and relying on Egyptian aid, to throw off allegiance, for he saw that prosperity for the future lay in accepting the situation, and that restless plotting against Assyria would involve disaster; 'in returning and rest shall ye be saved, in quietness and confidence shall be your strength' was the burden of his advice (30¹⁵). Most especially were his utterances directed against the politicians who looked upon Egypt for support against Assyria, exposing their scepticism, mistrust in Jehovah, and misplaced confidence in material power which could not avail them in the time of need (chs. 28-31). Shalmaneser led an army to Palestine to subdue the disaffected states; and, after a siege of three years, Samaria was captured (722 B.C.) by his successor Sargon, the Israelites were taken into exile, and the northern kingdom came to an end. Sargon then advanced against the Egyptians whom he completely overthrew in battle at Raphia (720 B.C.), thus justifying Isaiah's warnings as to the futility of trusting in the power of Egypt. Sargon was again in Palestine in 711 B.C., quelling revolts of some of the smaller states. To this period belong chs. 19, 20 (and perhaps 22¹⁻¹¹), and at this time were probably delivered the utterances concerning the fate of some of the neighbouring nations and tribes in view of the Assyrian advance westward (15, 16, 18, 21¹¹⁻¹⁷ 23). Sargon was succeeded by Sennacherib in 705 B.C. Again attempts were made to stir up revolt against Assyria on a large scale with the support of the Æthiopian Tirhakah, now king of Egypt (704 B.C.); in the negotiations a leading part was taken by Merodach-Baladan, king of Babylon (c. 39). Hezekiah at this time refused to be guided by Isaiah's counsel of submission to the suzerainty of Sennacherib and joined the rebellion. Sennacherib promptly set out to put down his vassals. Babylon was captured (21¹⁻¹⁰): Hezekiah was reduced to submission and made to pay a heavy fine (2K18¹³⁻¹⁹), and the Assyrians advanced against Egypt. A little later, seeing the unwisdom of leaving so strong a fortress as Jerusalem intact in his rear, Sennacherib sent an embassy to demand its surrender, contemptuously defying Jehovah's power to defend it. The history of the crisis is told in chs. 36, 37, and the prophecies bearing on this great invasion of Sennacherib (701 B.C.) are contained in chs. 10⁵⁻¹² 14²¹⁻²⁷ 17¹²⁻¹⁴ 33 37^{6,7,21-35}. The prophet taught that Jehovah is supreme over all, the Assyrian invader was but His instrument appointed to chastise His people for their sins; he could not therefore defy Jehovah with impunity; but when his work was finished would be punished for his arrogance; a sudden disaster should overtake the Assyrians, and Jehovah would preserve Jerusalem inviolate, a prophecy which received a remarkable fulfilment (37³⁶). This was the culminating point of Isaiah's ministry, and no prophecies of a later date which may be with certainty assigned to him have come down to us.

THE WORK OF ISAIAM AS A PROPHET

It was the work of a prophet, in the first place, as a preacher of righteousness, to speak in the Name of Jehovah, and it is in this capacity that Isaiah appears about the time of Ahaz's accession, rebuking the idolatry, superstition and oppression that were rife in the nation, announcing the approaching divine judgment for these things, yet holding out hope of a golden age in the future, for a faithful remnant would be preserved to be the nucleus of a new people, true to its divine calling. This doctrine of the remnant is specially characteristic of Isaiah; for, while we meet with it in other prophets (Amos, Zephaniah, Habakkuk), it forms the keynote of his teaching and is an essential and persistent element in it. The idea takes shape in his call to be a prophet (6¹³), it is embodied in the name of one of his sons (7³), and is referred to again and again in his discourses (4³ 10²¹ 30^{18,7}). But Isaiah's position and influence at court gave a wide scope to his genius, so that he comes before us as a statesman, and adviser of kings; both under Ahaz and under Hezekiah it was his work to endeavour to guide the counsels of the nation in accordance with the principles of true religion, and with the will of Jehovah as revealed to himself. Thus he attempted to dissuade Ahaz from buying Assyrian aid in the crisis of the Syro-Ephraimite invasion, and in Hezekiah's reign was the consistent opponent of the policy of alliance with Egypt. But it was also the characteristic function of a prophet to foretell the future, and in connexion with his work as a statesman Isaiah uttered some remarkable predictions which received speedy and striking fulfilment. During the panic caused by the invasion of Rezin and Pekah, Isaiah supported his exhortations to equanimity by foretelling the speedy ruin of the hostile kingdoms (7¹⁶ 8⁴), and the event proved him right. Again during the Assyrian invasions in Hezekiah's reign Isaiah consistently taught the inviolability of Jerusalem and repeatedly predicted sudden and unlooked-for disaster to the Assyrians in the moment of their apparent triumph (10^{16,33} 14²⁵ 17¹²⁻¹⁴ 37^{6,7,21-35}), prophecies which received a remarkable fulfilment in the mysterious mortality in Sennacherib's army which obliged that monarch to abandon his designs against Jerusalem. These forecasts must have been quite beyond the range of a politician's calculation, and can only be adequately accounted for by the possession of prophetic insight. The future of Judah is, in Isaiah's view, bound up with the fortunes of the royal house, whose continuance he affirms (9⁷), though he anticipates for it dark days and apparent overthrow (10¹¹) in the near future. The deliverer of God's people from its foes, and from the Assyrian in particular, is to be a king of David's line whose reign is to introduce a golden age for the whole world, being marked by righteousness and universal peace. While earlier prophets (Amos and Hosea) had merely foretold the permanence of David's line, Isaiah goes further, fixing his attention on an individual Messianic King, whose character and work he outlines (9^{6,7} 11¹⁻⁹). He is the agent of Jehovah, but He is more than this, for Isaiah calls Him by the Divine Name (9⁶) and pictures the spirit of Jehovah as resting upon Him in all its fulness (11^{2,3}). Thus, according to Isaiah, Jehovah was to be fully present in the person of the Messianic King, who was to be His perfect manifestation as Ruler of His people. It is true that Isaiah connects the appearance of this glorious monarch with the defeat of the Assyrians, the last enemy of Judah on his horizon, his view of future times being foreshortened, and it may be doubted how far he understood the true import of the words that he spoke concerning the person and work of the King, seized as he was by overmastering inspiration and carried quite beyond himself; but Christians can read his utterances in a larger, fuller light, and see how wonderfully they were fulfilled in the Person and work of Jesus Christ our Lord.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

B.C.
745	Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria
740	Call of Isaiah
735	Ahaz, king of Judah
734	Pekah, king of Israel, defeated and slain by the Assyrians
732	Rezin, king of Syria, slain, and Damascus taken by the Assyrians
727	Shalmaneser, king of Assyria
726	Hezekiah, king of Judah
722	Sargon, king of Assyria. Fall of Samaria and end of kingdom of Israel
711	Siege of Ashdod by the Assyrians
710	Defeat of Merodach-Baladan and capture of Babylon by Sargon
705	Sennacherib, king of Assyria
701	Great invasion of Judah by Sennacherib
607	Nineveh taken by the Babylonians. Rise of the Babylonian Empire under Nebuchadnezzar
586	Jerusalem taken by Nebuchadnezzar. End of kingdom of Judah
549	Beginning of Cyrus' victorious career
538	Capture of Babylon by Cyrus, followed by decree for the return of the Jewish exiles

NON-ISAIANIC SECTIONS

A careful study of the internal evidence (the contents, allusions, implied historical setting and literary style) has led the majority of modern scholars to the conclusion that some portions of this book as we now have it are not the work of Isaiah the son of Amoz, but were added to his prophecies at a later period, much in the same way as psalms by later writers were added to the original collection ascribed to David, and as prophecies of various dates by unknown authors were appended to the written works of Zechariah. The most considerable sections which have thus been separated by critical study from the works of Isaiah are:—

(1) Chs. 40–66, now assigned by quite a general consensus of opinion to an author (or possibly authors) who lived towards the close of the Babylonian exile.

(2) Chs. 13–14²³ (see notes).

(3) Chs. 24–27 (see notes).

(4) Chs. 34, 35 (see notes).

(5) Chs. 36–39, parallel, and in the main identical, with 2K 18^{13–20}¹⁹. An historical appendix added because of its bearing on Isaiah's prophetic activity in the reign of Hezekiah.

The reasons for separating chs. 40–66 from the acknowledged prophecies of Isaiah are:—

(a) The standpoint of the writer is that of the Babylonian exile, more than a century after Isaiah's death: he is living amongst, and speaking to, the Jews in exile. See e.g. 42²² 43²³ 47⁶ 52⁵. Jerusalem is no longer inviolate as in 1–39, but has been for some time deserted and in ruins (44²⁶ 58¹² 61⁴ 63¹⁸ 64^{10,11}), and the return of the captives to their own land is anticipated in the immediate future (46¹⁸ 48²⁰). In Isaiah's time Assyria under Shalmaneser, Sargon, and Sennacherib was the dominant world power. But in 40–66 the Babylonian Empire, which under Nebuchadnezzar had succeeded to the power of Assyria, is tottering to its fall, and destined to be overthrown by Cyrus who has embarked on his victorious career. Isaiah's name and personality, again, so prominent in 1–39, are never alluded to in 40–66. Now, however far an OT. prophet may project his vision into the future, the standpoint from which he does so is always that of his own time, and his words are for the warning or encouragement of those of his own age. But on the supposition that Isaiah is the author of these chs. not only does he project his vision into the future, but first projects himself to a standpoint in the future, and, though living while the kingdom of Judah was still in existence and Jerusalem outwardly flourishing, addresses himself to the encouragement of the Jews of a future age, when they should be in exile, and their city and Temple a heap of ruins. But this would be a case without parallel in OT. prophecy, and it is therefore much more likely that these chs. are the work of one who actually lived towards the close of the exile.

(b) The argument in chs. 41, 45 seems to depend on the fact that Cyrus, the Persian conqueror, has begun his victorious career. The action of Cyrus is appealed to as a proof that Jehovah has not forgotten His people and will perform His promises. The passages concerning Cyrus are not prophecies of his coming (as is sometimes said), but rather triumphant appeals to the fact that he has come. His career is followed with anxious interest, and his successes are regarded as accumulating evidences of Jehovah's care for His people, and of the working out of His will in the course of human history. This points to a date shortly after the middle of the 6th century B.C.: for Cyrus, whom the Jews rightly anticipated as their deliverer, first appeared about 550 B.C., overthrew the Median empire in 549, and after other achievements captured Babylon in 538, and gave permission for the return of the captive Jews to their own country.

(c) When we look into chs. 40–66 we find that they differ considerably from the earlier part of the book both in language and style. This by itself is not a conclusive argument, because a man's style may alter a great deal at different periods in his life, being liable to modification from varying circumstances, age, or change of subject matter; nevertheless it materially strengthens the case when taken in connexion with the other arguments noticed. Some of the more striking differences of style observable are:—

(1) Some words or expressions characteristic of 1–39 are absent from 40–66, such as: the title 'the Lord Jehovah of hosts' (1²⁴ 31^{10,16,33} 19⁴); the word used for 'idols' (2^{8,18,20} 10¹¹ 19^{1,3} 31⁷); the use of the figure of Jehovah 'arising' or 'being exalted' (e.g. 21^{1,19} 51¹⁶ 28²¹ 30¹⁸); the expression 'glory' of a nation (e.g. 51⁸ 87^{10,18}); the figure of Jehovah's 'hand stretched out' in judgment (e.g. 5²⁵ 9^{12,17,21} 10⁴ 14^{26,27} 23¹¹ 31³); a peculiar word for the 'blinding' of the eyes, variously rendered in AV 'shut' (6¹⁰), 'closed' (29¹⁰), 'dim' (32³); a striking word 'stir up' (9¹¹), 'set up', 'set' (19²); the expression, 'head and tail, palm branch and rush,' figuratively used (9¹⁴ 19¹⁵); the term 'fruitful field' (10¹⁸ 29¹⁷ and other places); the very characteristic word 'remnant' (in the name Shear-jashub, 7⁸ 10^{20,21} 11¹¹ and elsewhere); an unusual word for 'many' (16¹⁴ 17¹² 28²).

(2) On the other hand, noticeable words or expressions recur in 40–66, which are absent from undoubted prophecies of Isaiah, such as: 'all flesh' (40^{5,6} 49²⁶ 66^{16,23,24}); the expression 'as nothing' (40¹⁷ 41^{11,12}); the exhortation to 'lift up the eyes' (40²⁶ 49¹⁸ 51⁶ 60¹); the verb 'choose' in connexion with Jehovah's choice of His people (41^{8,9} 43^{10,20} and frequently); the verb 'praise' and cognate noun (42^{8,10,12} 43²¹ and often); a rare expression for 'things to come' (41²³ 44⁷ 45¹¹); the verb rendered 'spring up' or 'spring forth' (e.g. 42⁹ 44⁴ 45⁸); an uncommon word for 'bow down' (44¹⁵, 17, 19 46⁶); an unusual word meaning to 'break forth' into singing (44²³ 49¹³ and other places); the title 'Holy City' (48² 52¹); references to the 'mirage' (49¹⁰, also 35⁷ [non-Isaianic]); the phrase 'to clothe oneself,' or, 'be clothed with,' used figuratively (49¹⁸ 50³ and elsewhere); frequent reference to the 'sons of Zion' (49¹⁷, 22, 25 51²⁰ and often); utterances of Jehovah beginning with the words 'I am' (45^{5, 6, 18} and very frequently).

Some of the most striking differences in phraseology have been noted by way of example, but much longer lists might be given. It is true that those who argue for unity of authorship are able to point to certain resemblances, such as the use of the characteristic title 'Holy One of Israel' and the recurrence of Tohu ('chaos,' Gn 1²); but the undoubted affinities between the two parts of the book may be explained, it is thought, by the influence of the prophecies of Isaiah upon the author of 40-66.

(d) As there is considerable divergence in phraseology between the two main divisions of the book, so the underlying ideas and doctrines are in some respects widely different, e.g.:

(1) The conception of the faithful remnant so characteristic of chs. 1-39, though it may be implied in a few places (59²⁰ 65^{8, 9}), has no important position in 40-66, and Isaiah's word 'remnant' (Shear) does not occur.

(2) The conception of Jehovah in chs. 40-66 shows an advance on that of the acknowledged prophecies of Isaiah. It is broader and fuller, bringing into prominence, not the transcendent greatness and holiness of God, but His infinite wisdom, knowledge, and power, as seen in the creation, sustaining, and government of the world.

(3) Chs. 40-66 are marked by the introduction of subjects that are new. The most remarkable of these is the wonderful conception of 'the servant of Jehovah.'

(4) Again, subjects that are not new in themselves receive in chs. 40-66 quite different treatment. Jerusalem in 1-39 is the capital and sanctuary, threatened yet secure in Jehovah's protection. In 40-66 the city is already ruined (61⁴), but destined to be gloriously restored, and the delineation of the glories of the new Jerusalem, with intimation of the part that the nations of the world shall take in its restoration, forms a remarkable feature of the later chapters of the book (see especially c. 60).

(5) Very remarkable is the change which comes over Messianic prophecy when we pass to chs. 40-66. In the utterances of Isaiah the hopes for the realisation of the ideal future are centred in a Scion of the House of David (9⁷ 11¹); but the promises so imperfectly realised during the period of the kingdom are in 40-66 transferred from the Messianic king to the nation as Jehovah's chosen servant; not, however, to the people considered in themselves, but in dependence on an individual, a personal representative of Jehovah, in whom as a perfect servant are summed up the ideal qualities of Israel.

Taking together the arguments thus briefly summarised, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that chs. 40-66 are not the work of Isaiah, but of a prophet who exercised his ministry towards the end of the period of the Jewish exile in Babylon. There is no reason why the student of Holy Scripture should be disquieted by such a conclusion, for it does not follow that the trustworthiness and inspiration of chs. 40-66 must be given up. The author of these chs. does not claim to be Isaiah, and the name of that prophet is not even mentioned in them. Belief in the inspiration and divine authority of the OT. cannot fairly be held to bind us to a particular theory or to human traditions, as to the literary structure of the several books. This has to be investigated by the ordinary methods of literary research, because God's revelation has come down to us embodied in a literature which has not been exempted from the ordinary conditions of literary composition and transmission.

JEHOVAH'S ARRANGEMENT OF HIS PEOPLE

This c. is general in character, and much of it (e.g. vv. 10-17) might refer to almost any period. This general character of the prophecy renders it especially suitable as an introduction, and may account for its position at the beginning of the book. It gives us a picture of the internal condition of Judah in Isaiah's age, and not only brings out his characteristic teaching, but more than any other OT. passage indicates the general line of prophetic doctrine. Owing to the corrupt state of the nation Jehovah will avenge Himself by a judgment, through which, while it proves the destruction of sinners, the people will be purified, and its ideal character realised by the remnant that shall be left (vv. 24-26: cp. v. 9). Some indication of date is afforded by vv. 7-9, where the prophet states that the land is wasted by foreign invaders and the capital cut off from outside help. The prophecy might accordingly be assigned to (1) the invasion by Rezin and Pekah in the reign of Ahaz (71¹, 735 B.C.); (2) an invasion by Sargon (20¹, 711 B.C.); or (3) the invasion by Sennacherib (chs. 36, 37) in Hezekiah's reign, 701 B.C. It is in favour of (1) that the prophecy occurs in connexion with others belonging to the reign of Ahaz (chs. 2-5), and perhaps the rebuke of formal worship suits this period best; the 'strangers' of v. 7 would then be Pekah's Syrian allies. Most recent commentators, however, assign the prophecy to date (3). There is a similar rebuke of formal religion in 29¹³ (same period), though the tone of this c. is unlike that of those prophecies which undoubtedly refer to Sennacherib's invasion (e.g. chs. 29, 30).

2-9. Judah's unnatural conduct and its consequences. 10-17. Sedulous worship of Jehovah is no defence, because a merely formal service is displeasing to Him. 18-23. Jehovah offers reconciliation on condition of amendment. 24-31. The gracious offer being refused, sentence is passed.

1. See Intro.

2. Children] Jehovah claimed Israel as His son at the exodus (Ex 4²²). 3. The unnaturalness of Israel's conduct is similarly contrasted with the behaviour of the animal creation, in Jer 8⁷. 4. Seed of evildoers] i.e. consisting of evildoers (14²⁰). Are corrupters] RV 'deal corruptly.' The Holy One of Israel] The use of this title is characteristic of Isaiah, and traceable to the impression made by the vision wherein he received his call and heard the seraphic 'Ter-Sanctus.' See Intro.

5. RV 'Why will ye be still stricken, that ye revolt?' etc. Why expose yourselves to further punishment? Read, 'Every head . . . every heart.' The noblest parts of the body stand for the rulers and counsellors of the body politic.

7. As overthrown by strangers] lit. 'as an overthrow of strangers,' i.e. (a) as an overthrow wrought by strangers, or (b) as when strangers (whom God cares not for) are overthrown.

8. Cottage . . . lodge] solitary huts where watchmen lived: cp. Lam 2⁶ RV. The figures express isolation. Owing to the occupation and devastation of the country by invaders the city is left helpless.

9. The cities of the plain had perished through lack of a righteous remnant (Gn 18²⁴⁻³²). The possession of such a remnant had proved the salvation of Judah.

10. The rulers of Jerusalem are addressed as rulers of Sodom, and the nation as people of Gomorrah. Thus are emphasised both their wickedness and their peril: cp. Ezk 16⁴⁸⁻⁵⁰.

The law of our God] referring not to the written law, but to the divine teaching which follows, delivered through the prophet: see 28^{8, 16}.

11. I delight not] cp. Pss 40⁶ 51¹⁶ Am 5^{21, 22} Mic 6⁷. 12. Tread] RV 'trample'; like beasts without understanding. The worship was merely formal. 13. Vain oblations] Not the offerings in themselves, but their hypocritical character is reprobated. Iniquity] lit. 'nothingness,' 'worthlessness.' 14. New moons] referring to the monthly festivals (Nu 28¹¹ 1 S 20⁶).

15. Your hands, etc.] The hands, uplifted in prayer, are stained with blood.

16, 17. Condition of acceptance with God.

17. Judgment] i.e. justice. Relieve the oppressed] RM 'set right the oppressor.'

18. Let us reason] i.e. that the right may appear. Forgiveness will follow obedience and repentance.

21. An harlot] figuratively expressing the faithlessness, through its idolatry, of the nation which had been betrothed to God: cp. Ex 34¹⁵ Dt 31¹⁰. Judgment] i.e. justice, as in v. 17.

22. Mixed] read, 'weakened.' The images describe the degeneracy of the rulers; the best have become debased. 23. Companions of thieves] i.e. conniving at misdeeds of justice: cp. Mic 7³.

24. Mine adversaries] the evildoers in Jerusalem. God will purge the city of them.

25. Purely purge, etc.] RM 'purge away thy dross as with lye,' lye, or potash, being used as a flux in purifying metals. Tin] i.e. alloy. 27. With judgment . . . with righteousness] i.e. (a) through the manifestation of God's justice and righteousness, or (b) through the justice and righteousness which the regenerate people exhibit. Her converts] i.e. those of her who return (to Jehovah).

29. They shall be ashamed . . . ye have desired] The subject in each clause is the same in thought, though the person of the verb is changed. Such abrupt change of person is not uncommon in Hebrew, especially in the prophets, e.g. Mic 7¹⁹ Mal 2¹⁵.

29. The oaks] mentioned as connected with idolatrous worship: cp. 2 K 16¹ 17¹⁰. Sacred trees were supposed to be inhabited by a deity, to whom the worship was offered. The prophet indicates that such nature worship will disappoint its votaries. The gardeners referred to as the scene of heathen rites: cp. 65². 30. The fate of the wicked described in imagery suggested by v. 29. 31. Read, 'And the strong' (i.e. the wealthy and powerful man) 'shall be as tow, and his work' (i.e. the idolatrous image) 'as a spark.' The meaning is that his sin will be the cause of his ruin.

CHAPTERS 2-5

ISAIAH'S PREACHING EARLY IN THE REIGN OF AHAZ

Chs. 2-4 are closely connected, and c. 5 is generally thought to belong to the same period, though it probably represents discourses delivered rather later. There are two points which serve as indications of date: (a) The influx of foreign fashions, both in religion (26,9) and in common life (316-23, where the difficulty of explaining the names for the various articles of female attire from the Hebrew suggests that the articles, like the names, were of foreign importation). (b) The weak and capricious character of the king and his advisers (312). These features point to the reign of Ahaz, who was an innovator in religion (2K 16^{2-4,10}), but in that case these chs. must be placed quite early in his reign, because we should gather from the mention of deep-sea ships (216) that Elath, the one seaport of the kingdom, was still in the possession of Judah, while we read in 2K 16⁶ that the Syrians captured it during the invasion by Rezin and Pekah.

C. 2. 2-4. Isaiah quotes a prophecy that the nations shall resort to Zion, and there learn true religion, with the result of universal peace. 5-9. Before this future can be realised, God's own people must trust in Him and forsake their idolatry. 10-22. The retributive judgment that is coming on the nation is described in detail.

C. 3. 1-15. The ruin of social order in Judah, traceable to the misconduct of the rulers, who shall be punished.

16-C. 41. The sin and punishment of the ladies of Jerusalem. 2-6. The day of the LORD, though a day of judgment for the wicked, will prove a day of salvation for the faithful remnant.

C 5. 1-7. Judah compared in a parable to an unfruitful vineyard. 8-24. The charge of bringing forth evil fruit is proved in detail.

[25-30. The coming invasion and dark prospect.]

CHAPTER 2

2-4. occur also with a few slight variations in Mic 4¹⁻⁴. The passage appears to be borrowed in Isaiah, because (a) it suits its context better in Micah, and (b) it is more complete in Micah, Mic 4¹ being a part of it. If Isaiah is quoting from Micah, the latter prophet must have spoken the words before the occasion referred to in Jer 26¹⁸. Both prophets may be quoting from some ancient and well-known prediction regarding the future of Zion.

2. In the last days] RV 'in the latter days.' The phrase has the general meaning of 'future time' (Gn 49¹ Dt 4⁸⁰ Jer 23²⁰). Its use in the prophetic books makes the expression practically equivalent to 'Messianic times,' and the Apostles in NT. use the corresponding Gk. in the sense of 'the Christian dispensation' (Ac 2¹⁷ 1 Pet 1²⁰ 1 Jn 2¹⁸ Heb 1^{1,2}). In the top of] RM 'at the head of.' Under the figure of a physical change is set forth the supremacy of Israel's religion: Zion will be recognised as the spiritual capital of the world.

3. People] RV 'peoples.' The law] RM 'teaching' or 'instruction,' such as was given by prophets and priests: see 8¹⁰. 4. Among] RV 'between.' The nations will submit their disputes to the arbitration of Israel's God. The conviction of the universality of the religion of Israel is here plainly shown.

5. The prophet urges the people to repent, that they may fulfil their destiny.

6. Therefore] RV 'For.' Replenished from the east] alluding to the influx of settlers and foreign customs from that quarter. Soothsayers, etc.] Soothsayers are forbidden amongst the Israelites in Dt 18¹⁰. We find an Israelite king sending to consult at the Philistine town of Ekron (2K 1²). Please themselves in] RV 'strike hands with': i.e. 'make compacts with' born heathen. The reference is to bargains and commercial undertakings (2K 14²² 16⁶).

7. The increase of wealth and military organisation here referred to were features of Uzziah's reign (2 Ch 26¹⁻¹⁵). 9. Boweth down . . humbly himself] i.e. before the idols.

12. The day of the LORD of hosts shall be] RM 'the LORD of hosts hath a day.' 'Day' might mean (a) day of battle or victory, cp. Am 5¹⁸⁻²⁰, the earliest mention of the Day of the LORD, or (b) day of judgment. This became the usual meaning; so regularly in NT. Cp. 1 Cor 4³⁻⁵. 13-16. The proud will be humbled by the destruction of the things that minister to their pride. 15. Alluding to the works and fortifications of Uzziah and Jotham (2 Ch 26^{3,10} 27^{3,1}).

16. Ships of Tarshish] i.e. deep-sea ships used for foreign trade. Tarshish is supposed to have been in S. Spain, at the furthest limit of Phœnician commerce. Judah at this time possessed a mercantile fleet, the station of which was at Elath, on the Red Sea (2K 16⁶).

Pleasant pictures] The word rendered 'pictures' means something figured or with imagery upon it. A cognate word is used of idolatrous imagery (Nu 33⁶²) and of idolatrous images painted on walls (Ezk 8¹²). Since the word here occurs in close connexion with ships, the reference may be to the sails, which were often embroidered with figures in ancient times. Some prefer the meaning 'watch-towers,' the root having in Aramaic the sense 'to look out.'

20. Cast his idols] in disgust at their inability to help. 21. Men will try to hide from God in terror. 22. Wanting in LXX, and perhaps a gloss.

CHAPTER 3

1. Stay and the staff] A prophecy of famine: cp. v. 7, as the clause following explains. But if the latter clause is a gloss then 'stay and staff' would refer to the classes upon which the stability of the life of the community depends.

'Staff' in the Heb. is the fem. form of 'stay.'

2. The prudent] RV 'the diviner,' at this time in high estimation (26). The ancient] RM 'the elder,' who held offices in villages and towns (Ruth 4^{2,4} 2 K 10¹). 3. Artificer] ep. Jer 24¹; but RM 'charmer.' Eloquent orator] 'skilful enchanter.' 4. Children.. babes] in character rather than in years.

6, 7. The meaning is, the state of society shall be such that a man who apparently has the bare necessities of life shall be invited to be dictator, but in vain.

9. The shew of their countenance] i.e. their expression; the meaning being that their character may be read in their face. But RM has, 'Their respecting of persons doth witness,' etc. 12. Cp. v. 4. They which lead thee] lit. 'they that set thee right,' i.e. they that should set thee aright. The reference is to king Ahaz and his counsellors, amongst whom the queen-mother was prominent. 13. People] RV 'peoples.' 14. Ancients] see v. 2. For ye] the pronoun is emphatic: RV 'It is ye that have eaten up.'

16 f. A protest against prevalent luxury as evidenced in the extravagant toilette of the ladies of Jerusalem.

16. Tinkling] caused by silver bells on the ankles. 18. Cauls] RM 'networks.' Round tires like the moon] RV 'crescents'; mentioned as Midianitish ornaments (Jg 8^{21,26}).

19. Chains] RV 'pendants,' or 'eardrops'; mentioned as Midianitish ornaments (Jg 8²⁶).

20. Bonnets] RV 'headtires.' The same word is used of a bridegroom's headdress (61¹⁰).

Ornaments of the legs] RV 'ankle-chains.' Headbands] RV 'sashes,' such as were worn by brides (49¹⁸ Jer 23²). Tablets] RV 'perfume boxes.' Earrings] RV 'amulets.'

21. Nose jewels] fastened to the nostril: see Gn 24²². 22. Changeable suits of apparel] RV 'festival robes.' Wimples] RV 'shawls.' Crisping pins] RV 'satchels.'

23. Glasses] RV 'hand mirrors.' Hoods] RV 'turbans.'

24. Instead of, etc.] RV 'instead of sweet spices there shall be rottenness.' Rent] RV 'rope,' i.e. binding the captive. Burning] RV 'branding,' i.e. of a slave.

25, 26. Thy, her] the pronouns refer to Zion. 26. Sit upon the ground] a posture of mourning: cp. Lam 1¹.

CHAPTER 4

1. The women do not claim to be kept as the man's wives, but only pray that he will remove from them the reproach of being childless (cp. Gu 30²⁸), so depopulated has the land become. The v. belongs to c. 3.

In that day] i.e. when the Day of God's judgment (2¹² 3¹⁸) is over.

2. Branch] not here a title of Messiah (the word is not the same in 11¹) but referring to the verdure of the land. Fertility of the soil is often a feature of the ideal future in the prophets (30²³ Am 9¹³ Zech 9^{16,17}). For the expression 'branch of Jehovah,' cp. 'cedars of God,' Ps 80¹⁰; 'trees of Jehovah,' Ps 104¹⁶.

Escaped] referring to the godly remnant (6¹³). 3. Shall be called holy] i.e. as actually being so: cp. 1²⁶. Written] i.e. enrolled as a citizen. 4. Spirit] RM 'blast.' 5. Upon every dwelling place] RV 'over the whole habitation.' A cloud, etc.] the sign of God's protecting presence; the imagery is from the exodus (Ex 13^{21,22} 14^{19,20}). Upon all, etc.] 'over all the glory shall be spread a canopy,' i.e. for shadow and refuge, as explained in the next v. 6. Tabernacle] RV 'pavilion.'

CHAPTER 5

1-24. Judah, God's unfruitful vineyard, and the judgment upon it.

1. 1] i.e. Isaiah. To my] rather, 'for my,' or 'of my.' The beloved, as appears later, is Jehovah: cp. our Lord's parable (Mt 21³³). The allegory is rhythmical in form: cp. Song 8¹¹⁻¹⁴. 2. Tower] watch-tower: see on 1⁸.

3 f. God speaks.

7. Judgment] i.e. justice. Oppression] perhaps better, 'bloodshed.' A cry] i.e. of the oppressed.

8-10. Unjust seizure of land resulting in barrenness and want of population. 8. Place] RV 'room.' 10. Bath] about 8 gallons. And the seed, etc.] RV 'and a homer of seed shall yield but an ephah.' An ephah is the tenth part of a homer, which was 10 or 12 bushels (Ezk 45¹¹).

11. That continue until night] RV 'that tarry late into the night.' 12. Regard not, etc.] i.e. have no regard for the working of the Lord's will in the events of history. 13. Are gone into captivity] an example of the 'prophetic perfect.' The future is regarded as so certain that it is described as past. 14. Hell] Heb. Sheol, i.e. the place of departed spirits. RM 'the grave': cp. Gn 37³⁵. 15. Cp. 2^{9,17}.

17. After their manner] RV 'as in their pasture.' So desolate will the cities be.

Strangers] RM 'wanderers.' The meaning is that nomad tribes wander over the land at pleasure.

18. The people have chained themselves to sin like beasts of burden. 19. They scoff at the declared judgments of God. 20. The perverting of all moral distinctions. 23. Bribery and injustice.

25-30. The position of these vv. is doubtful. Very probably they should be connected with the prophecy, 9⁸⁻¹⁰. In that section the closing words of v. 25 occur four times as a sort of refrain.

26. Lift up an ensign] i.e. as a signal to muster them: cp. 11¹⁰ 18³ 49²² 62¹⁰. Nations] i.e. those under the dominion of the Assyrian king and serving in his army. Hiss] The metaphor is from collecting a swarm of bees (7¹⁸). 30. They shall roar against them] i.e. the enemies against God's people.

CHAPTER 6

THE PROPHET'S CALL

This c., which recounts the prophet's call and commission, would stand first in a chronological arrangement of the book. The opening words remind us of the vision of Micaiah (1K 22¹⁹), and we should compare the visions of Jeromiah and Ezekiel which inaugurated their prophetic activity. In St. John's vision (Rev 4) the same anthem, 'Holy, holy, holy,' is sung by the six-winged living creatures round about the throne. Isaiah's vision foreshadows such leading elements of his thought as, (1) the majesty of God, (2) the uncleanness of the people, (3) his conviction that he had a divine message for them, (4) their stubbornness and heedlessness, (5) the necessity of judgment, (6) the idea of the remnant.

1-4. Isaiah's vision of Jehovah enthroned and the worship of heaven. 5-7. He confesses his sin and is absolved. 8-13. He receives his prophetic commission.

1. The year that king Uzziah died] 740 B.C. See Intro. The prophet, when meditating perhaps on the condition of the nation and its gloomy prospects, is favoured with a vision of the glory of God. Train] i.e. the skirts (RM) of his royal robes.

2. Above it] RV 'above him.' The seraphims] here only in OT. the word denotes supernatural beings. It is derived from the verb 'to burn,' and may simply indicate the fiery or glowing appearance of Jehovah's attendant angels (Ezk 1^{13,14}). Elsewhere, however, the same word stands for venomous serpents (Nu 21⁶ Isa 14²⁹ 30⁶), and it may here be intended to convey the meaning that the guardians of Jehovah's throne are of serpentine form. This is scarcely borne out by the context (vv. 6, 7), though in Ezekiel's vision of heaven animal forms are introduced (Ezk 1¹⁰).

Covered his face] in reverence.

3. Holy, holy, holy] The threefold repetition denotes emphasis or intensity (Jer 7⁴). It is significant that the title of Jehovah most characteristic of Isaiah's prophecies is 'the Holy One of Israel.' In the light of later revelation Christians have not unnaturally seen here a foreshadowing of the Holy Trinity: cp. Rev 4⁸. 4. The posts of the door moved] RV 'the foundations of the thresholds were moved.' Smoke] a symbol of the divine presence, as in Ex 19^{9,18} 1K 8^{10,11}.

5. Lips] the pure praises of the seraphim made Isaiah think by contrast of his own sins of the lips. For mine eyes have seen, etc.] No man could see God and live (Ex 33²⁰). 6. Live coal] Fire is the symbol of purification: cp. Mal 3² Mt 3¹¹. 8. For us] the plural in the mouth of God as in Gn 1²⁶ 3²² 11⁷. Jehovah consults with the angels around His throne; similarly in Micaiah's vision (1K 22^{19,20}: cp. Ps 89⁷).

10. The result of the prophet's preaching described as though it were the purpose. Most of his hearers will stubbornly reject his message, with the result that they will become dead to all impressions. The heart] regarded by the Hebrews as the seat of the understanding: cp. Hos 7¹¹. Convert] RV 'turn again.'

11, 12. Isaiah feels that such a state of things cannot be allowed to continue, and is assured that Jehovah will interpose with a terrible judgment of war and exile. 12. There be a great forsaking] RV 'the forsaken places be many.'

13. RV 'And if there be yet a tenth in it, it shall again be eaten up: as a terebinth, and as an oak, whose stock remaineth, when they are felled; so the holy seed is the stock thereof.' The meaning is that the coming judgment is not a single one but a series. Yet as when an evergreen tree is cut down the stump remains from which new shoots may grow, so there will be a faithful remnant of Israel left, to be the germ of a renewed people. This doctrine of the remnant is characteristic of Isaiah: cp. 4³ 7³ 10^{20,21}.

CHAPTERS 71-97

THE SYRO-EPHRAIMITE INVASION

The group of prophecies contained in this section belongs to the reign of Ahaz, when Judah was threatened by the allied forces of Syria and Israel (7¹ 2K 15³⁷ 16⁵⁻⁹ 2Ch 28⁶⁻¹⁵). With the reign of Tiglath-pileser, the Assyrian empire entered on a new epoch, that monarch aiming at bringing the whole of W. Asia under his sway. With a view to resisting the Assyrian advance and preserving their independence, Rezin, of Syria, and Pekah, of Israel, formed an alliance, and their war against Ahaz was apparently undertaken in order to force Judah to join the coalition, the immediate object of the invaders being to dethrone Ahaz and set over the kingdom one who would be willing to favour their projects (7⁶). Isaiah foresaw that Syria and Israel were doomed to fall before the Assyrian power, and, therefore, exhorts to calmness and confidence in Jehovah (7^{4,8,16} 8⁴). Ahaz, on the other hand, was set upon seeking aid from Tiglath-pileser, a policy which Isaiah reprobated as indicating want of trust in Jehovah, and as certain to lay Judah also open to disaster from Assyrian inroads (7¹⁷⁻²⁵).

C. 7. 1, 2. The occasion of the prophecies following. 3-9. In view of the panic caused by the Syro-Israelite invasion, Isaiah is sent to the king with a message of encouragement (10-16), which is confirmed by the sign of Immanuel. 17-25. The disastrous consequences of the policy of seeking aid from Assyria foretold.

C. 8. 1-4. The speedy ruin of Syria and Israel foretold by the sign of Maher-shalal-hash-baz. 5-8. The Syrian invasion of Judah foretold. 9-15. The nations' fear in the present crisis contrasted with the assurance that should spring from trust in Jehovah. 16-20. Isaiah's own confidence in his message. 21-C. 9. 7. The coming calamity and the bright future that lies beyond. Those parts of the land which first suffered from the Assyrian shall be correspondingly glorified, for the Messiah shall appear and the kingdom of David shall be established on an indestructible foundation.

CHAPTER 7

1-16. Isaiah assures Ahaz by a sign that Judah will be delivered from Syria and Israel.

1. See prefatory note to the section.

2. Ephraim] the popular name for the northern kingdom (9^{8,9}). His heart was moved] i.e. the heart of king Ahaz, because of the formidable confederacy against him. Serious reverses suffered by Judah at this time are recorded in 2 Ch 28³⁻¹³.

3. Shear-jashub] i.e. 'a remnant shall return.' Already in the reign of Ahaz the prophet had summed up the characteristic feature of his teaching (see on 6¹³) in a symbolic name given to his son. Similarly he called another son Maher-shalal-hash-baz ('spoil speedeth, prey hasteth') that he might impressively indicate the speedy spoliation of Syria and Israel (8^{3,4}). Thus the prophet and his family were for signs to the people (8¹⁸). There is a special significance in the presence of Shear-jashub at this meeting of Isaiah with king Ahaz. The prophet has to foretell invasion and spoliation of Judah by the Assyrians (v. 20), but the presence of Shear-jashub gives assurance that a remnant shall return. The conduit] The king's object doubtless was to stop the waters outside the walls of the city (2 Ch 32³), so that the enemy, in the siege that was imminent, might be without supply of water. Upper pool] probably the same as the upper watercourse of Gihon on the W. of Jerusalem (2 Ch 32³⁰). A lower pool is mentioned in 22⁹.

4. Neither be fainthearted, etc.] RV 'let not thine heart be faint because of these two tails of smoking firebrands.' The prophet regards them as no more than expiring torches.

6. Tabeal] the name is Syrian, not Hebrew: see prefatory note.

8. Within threescore, etc.] We should probably regard this prophecy as fulfilled when the power of the northern kingdom was finally broken by the importation of foreigners under Esarhaddon (Ezr 4²). On account of the manner in which this prediction interrupts the parallelism, some modern scholars regard it as an addition by a later editor.

9. The need of faith is emphasised; without it there is no security.

11. Ask thee a sign] to prove that he may trust in Jehovah's promise. Ahaz's choice should be unlimited, he might ask a sign in heaven or from the nether world.

12. Neither will I tempt, etc.] Ahaz gives utterance to a sound principle (Dt 6¹⁶). But Jehovah had offered a sign, and to refuse it showed distrust of God. Ahaz had already made up his mind to the Assyrian alliance and cloaks his self-will with the language of faith.

13. The prophet's indignation.

14. A virgin] The Hebrew word is not the distinctive one for virginity, but denotes rather one of maturing and marriageable age: cf. e.g. Gn 24⁴³ Ex 2⁸. In the first place, this prophecy must have been intended by Isaiah as a sign of encouragement to Ahaz—before a child shortly to be born, could arrive at years of observation the enemies of Judah would be brought to nought. At the same time, it is evident that the child is no ordinary one, from the way in which the prophet refers to him as Lord of the land (8⁸), and from the titles given to him in 9⁶. The child is, in fact, the Messiah, whose advent Isaiah seems to have expected in the near future in connection with the Assyrian invasion (9¹⁻⁷ 11¹⁻⁹). The prophet's anticipations were realised, but in a manner far surpassing his expectations, in the birth of our Lord.

Immanuel] i.e. 'God is with us' (8¹⁰). The child whom the prophet has in mind received this symbolic name as being a pledge of God's presence with His people. Christ, the true Son of David, is in the highest conceivable sense Immanuel. The sign given by Isaiah is not concerned with the manner of the child's birth, but rather connected with his name Immanuel. Accordingly in Mt 1²³ the emphasis is upon the name.

15. Butter (RM 'curds') and honey] i.e. simple pastoral products, not bread and meat, because the land has gone out of cultivation; the 'honey' was probably wild honey. That privation is implied is clear from the context (vv. 20-22). That he may know] so some ancient versions, but better, 'when he knoweth' (RV), or 'till he know.'

16. Though the child about to be born must in his early years endure privation, yet before he comes to years of discretion Judah's present enemies shall be brought to nought. The land, etc.] RV 'the land whose two kings thou abhorrest' (i.e. 'fearest horribly') 'shall be forsaken.'

17-25. The disastrous consequences of any alliance between Judah and Assyria foretold.

17-19. Isaiah foresees that Judah will be involved in the struggle between Egypt and Assyria and will be invaded by both powers. their armies penetrating everywhere like swarms of insects.

17. Ephraim departed] alluding to the disruption of the kingdom in Rehoboam's reign. Since Ephraim was the most powerful of the seceding tribes the northern kingdom was called by its name (v. 2; 9^{8,9}).

18. Hiss] see 5²⁰.

19. Desolate] RV 'rugged.' Bushes] RV 'pastures.'

20. A razor that is hired] The reference is to Ahaz's policy of calling in the aid of Tiglath-pileser. Retribution would come through that very power on which Ahaz relied, and the land would be laid bare.

21-25. A pastoral life will be the only possible one, because the land is laid waste, and where vineyards once flourished men will hunt wild beasts in the thickets, or seek pasturage for their cattle.

22. The v. means there will be curds and wild honey, and nothing else.

23. Every place, etc.] RV 'every place, where there were a thousand vines at a thousand silverlings, shall even be for briars and thorns.' Silverlings] i.e. pieces of silver, shekels; 1,000 shekels would be an average price.

25. RV 'And all the hills that were digged with the mattock, thou shalt not come thither for fear of briars and thorns.' Vines were usually grown on terraces on the hills of Palestine. Lesser cattle] RV 'sheep.'

CHAPTER 8

1. Take, etc.] read 'Take thee a great tablet, and write upon it with the pen of a man, Maher-shalal-hash-baz.' A man's pen] i.e. such as a common man would use for writing in large characters that all might understand the words. Maher-shalal-hash-baz] i.e. 'The spoil speedeth, the prey hasteth.' The inscription intimated the speedy spoliation of Syria and Israel (v. 4).

2. And I took] RV 'And I will take,' the speaker being Jehovah as in v. 1. Witnesses] who would be able when the fulfilment came to testify that the prophecy had been delivered.

3. The prophetess] i.e. the prophet's wife.

Call his name] see on 7³. 4. This prophecy was fulfilled, Damascus being captured by the Assyrians in 732 B.C., and Samaria ten years later: cp. 10⁹.

6. This people] i.e. the Ten Tribes (referred to as 'this people' again in 9¹⁰), who refused the mild rule of the House of David, and, having set up their own king, have allied themselves with Rezin. The waters of Shiloah] The gently-flowing stream that issued from Zion near the sanctuary (Ps 46⁴) symbolises the divinely-appointed government of the House of David, and is contrasted in the next v. with the wide flood of Euphrates, symbolising the devastating power of Assyria, which within a short period overthrew the kingdoms of Israel and Syria (2 K 16⁹ 18^{9,10}), as Isaiah repeatedly foretold: cp. 7^{8,16}.

7. The river] i.e. as elsewhere, the Euphrates (Josh 24²); denoted in RV by a capital R.

8. Pass through] RV 'sweep onward into.'

To the neck] The head, therefore, will escape. So Isaiah regularly indicates the preservation of a remnant in the judgments that are coming upon the nation. The stretching out, etc.] The image is suddenly changed from that of a devastating flood to that of a bird of prey swooping with wings outspread.

O Immanuel] The country thus threatened is the land to which the divine pledge has been given and embodied in the child Immanuel (7¹⁴⁻¹⁶). At the thought the prophet is filled with confidence in the protection of Jehovah; hence the triumphant strain of defiance in which he addresses the invaders in the vv. that follow.

9, 10. Alliances formed against God's people must end in disaster and hostile purposes must fail, for 'God is with us.' 9. People] RV 'peoples.' Gird yourselves] i.e. for warfare.

10. God is with us] alluding to the significance of the name Immanuel (v. 8. cp. 7¹⁴).

11, 12. The prophet has been divinely warned not to show the unreasoning fear of the Syro-Ephraimite alliance which the men of Judah exhibit.

11. With a strong hand] In Heb. phraseology the coming of prophetic inspiration is spoken of anthropomorphically as seizure by the hand of Jehovah (2 K 3¹⁷ Ezk 1³ 3²² 8¹ 37¹).

12. A confederacy] alluding to the alliance between Israel and Syria, which caused so much fear in Judah (7²). The same word is, however, elsewhere rendered 'conspiracy' or 'treason' (2 K 17⁴ 2 Ch 23¹³): so RV 'conspiracy' here. In that case the allusion would be to the cry of 'Conspiracy!' which, as some suppose, was raised against Isaiah and his followers by those in Judah who opposed the line of policy he advocated, and favoured Ahaz's project of alliance with Assyria. Similarly, the political opponents of Jeremiah attempted to discredit his teaching by accusing him of treachery against his country (Jer 37¹³).

13. The meaning is, 'recognise Jehovah in His true character as the all-holy One' (so He had revealed Himself to the prophet, 6³), 'and stand in awe of Him accordingly.'

14. Sanctuary] The secondary meaning of 'refuge' is here the prominent one (1 K 1⁵⁰ 2²⁸).

Both the houses] i.e. the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel. Every revelation of God puts men on their trial and sifts them: to those who accept it in faith and turn to Him it means deliverance, but those who reject it bring judgment on themselves. This was seen in God's revelation of Himself in Christ; to those who accepted Him He gave power to become sons of God (Jn 1¹²). He came to save the world (Jn 12⁴⁷); yet it may also be said that for judgment He came into the world (Jn 9³⁹), because those who received Him not brought judgment on themselves, and found Him to be a rock of offence. Thus Isaiah's words are quoted in NT. with a Christian application (Mt 21⁴⁴ Ro 9³³ 1 Pet 2^{7,8}).

15. Many among them shall stumble] RV 'many shall stumble thereon.'

16. Bind up] i.e. tie up the parchment roll on which the prophet's teaching has been written, and lay it aside to be consulted later.

The testimony] i.e. the inspired admonition which the prophet has just delivered. The law] not referring to the written law of God, but used in the wide sense of 'instruction' or 'teaching' (RM): the inspired teaching given by the prophet himself (cp. 1¹⁰ 5²⁴ 30⁹), which he commits to writing and delivers to his disciples.

18. The ground of the confidence just expressed. The prophet and his children are by their names Isaiah (salvation of Jehovah), Shear-jashub (a remnant shall return, 7³), and Maher-shalal-hash-baz (8³), pledges of a brighter future in fulfilment of the prophet's words. Wonders] i.e. omens: cp. Ezk 12^{6,11} 24^{24,27} Zech 3⁸. This v. is quoted in NT. Heb. 2¹⁸, without regard to its original context, but the writer simply uses it there that he may express in scriptural terms the truth of the community of nature between Christ and His people.

19. Seek unto] i.e. with a view of consulting as an oracle, despairing of other help. Familiar spirits] The forms of necromancy referred to are forbidden in Dt 18¹¹, and the nature of the practices reprobated is well illustrated by the famous example of the witch of Endor (1 S 28^{7,8}). Peep] i.e. 'chirp' (RV) as a bird (10¹⁴): referring to the thin and feeble voice of ghosts from Sheol (29⁴). For the living to the dead] RV 'on behalf of the living should they seek unto the dead?'

20. The law... the testimony] i.e. Isaiah's own teaching, which, by his direction, had been written down and carefully preserved (v. 16).

If they speak not, etc.] The meaning seems to be, 'If they speak not according to this word' (viz. 'to the law and to the testimony') 'surely there is no morning for them' (RV): i.e. the only hope of a brighter dawn lies in being guided by Isaiah's teaching. But another rendering is possible, 'Surely according to this word shall they speak for whom there is no morning' (RM), i.e. they will recognise too late the value of the principles inculcated by Isaiah.

21. Curse their king, etc.] RV 'curse by their king and by their God.' The expression is the same as in 1 S 17⁴³. 22. Dimness, etc.] RV 'gloom of anguish; and into thick darkness they shall be driven away.' Note the close connexion with c. 9, where a brighter future is predicted.

CHAPTER 9:1-7

1. RV 'But there shall be no gloom to her that was in anguish. In the former time he brought into contempt the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, but in the latter time hath he made it glorious, by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, Galilee of the nations.' By the contempt brought upon the land of Zebulun and Naphtali the prophet signifies the spoiling of the country and deportation of the inhabitants by Tiglath-pileser (narrated 2 K 15²⁹). Galilee of the nations] lit. 'the circuit,' or 'district of the nations.' The region indicated lay in the extreme N. of Naphtali and received its name, probably, from the intermixture in that locality of Israelites with the former inhabitants. The term (Galil) later became the proper name Galilee.

2. Walked in darkness] as described in 8^{21,22}. Have seen] The light of the new age to which the prophet looked forward was of course in the future, but to his vision it is so assured that he describes it as having already dawned. Such use of the past tense (prophetic perfect) is frequent in the prophetic writings. Dwell] RV 'dwelt': the tense being parallel to 'walked' in the preceding clause.

Vv. 1, 2 are referred to in Mt 4^{15,16} as fulfilled in our Lord's Galilean ministry. We need not suppose that Isaiah had this distinctly in mind. He only speaks in these verses in general terms of the light of the new and glorious age shining upon that district which should be the first to suffer the affliction of conquest and captivity. When Christ, the true Sun of Righteousness, illumined that very same district it was natural that the Evangelist should see the ultimate fulfilment of the prophecy which Isaiah, unconscious of the wonderful fulfilment which awaited his words, had uttered.

3. And not increased the joy] So Heb. written text, ancient Greek versions and Vulg. But Heb. traditional reading, Syr., and LXX give 'increased the joy to it,' RV 'increased their joy'; and this reading is demanded by the context, where figures are multiplied to indicate excessive joy. The past tenses (prophetic perfect, see v. 2) are again used to describe what is yet in the future. Before thee] appearing as worshippers before Jehovah in His sanctuary (Dt 12¹²).

4. Staff of his shoulder] i.e. with which he is beaten by the taskmaster. The dominion of Assyria shall be broken. As in the day of Midian] referring to the memorable victory of Gideon (Jg 7, 8).

5. Read, 'For all the armour of the armed man in the tumult, and the garments rolled in blood, shall be for burning, for fuel of fire.' After the great victory over the oppressor the weapons of war are burnt (Ezk 39⁹) as a prelude to the era of peace which is to follow.

6. From a general description of the future reign of peace the prophet goes on to picture the king upon whom it depends, and whom he apparently identifies with the child of 7¹⁴. Then he proceeds to indicate the features of his rule by a series of majestic titles. Wonderful, Counsellor] RM 'Wonderful Counsellor,' or 'Wonder-Counsellor.' The title implies that the future king's rule shall be guided by a divinely-inspired wisdom (11²⁴) which shall command the awe with which men regard the counsel of God. The word 'wonderful' (with its cognates) is constantly used of the divine action (Ex 15¹¹ Jg 13¹⁹ Ps 118²³), and is applied to the divine name (Jg 13¹³). The mighty God] The word 'God' has been explained by some in the sense of 'ruler' or 'king.' The plural of the same word is sometimes so employed (Ex 21⁶ Ps 82^{1, 6}). Isaiah, however, here uses the singular, and directly applies the very same title to Jehovah elsewhere (10²¹; cp. Dt 10¹⁷ Jer 32¹⁸). It should be noted also, (1) that the significance of the word 'God' (El) as a title of Jehovah was at this time in the prophet's thoughts in the name Immanu-El; and (2) the titles that precede and follow this one seem to have a mysterious divine significance. For such direct ascription of a divine title to the Messianic King the nearest parallel is Ps 45⁶: cp. Zech 12⁸ 1 Ch 29²³. The everlasting Father] Father because of the protecting care exercised by him over his people. Everlasting because his kingdom is to be for ever (v. 7). Prince of Peace] peace being regarded as a prominent feature of that great future (2³⁻⁴) which the Messiah is to inaugurate (Mic 5⁵ Zech 9¹⁰).

7. David] The mention of David implies that the ideal king is to be of the lineage of David. The v. might be explained as a promise that the dynasty of the great king whom the prophet has in mind should reign in undisputed possession of the kingdom, and should not fail. The prophecy would in that case be parallel to those earlier ones which promise a lasting dominion to the House of David (2S 7¹²⁻¹⁶ Hos 3⁵ Am 9¹¹); but the title, 'Everlasting Father,' which has just preceded, makes it more likely that the promise is one of personal sovereignty to the individual king of whom the prophet is thinking. To order it, and to establish it] RV 'to establish it, and to uphold it.'

Justice] RV 'righteousness.' The zeal, etc.] the jealous love of God for His people is a guarantee of this.

CHAPTERS 9⁸-10⁴

DIVINE JUDGMENTS ON THE KINGDOM OF ISRAEL

This section relates throughout to the kingdom of Israel. It belongs to the same period as the chs. immediately preceding, and treats of the ruin which Isaiah foresaw would shortly overtake the kingdom of the Ten Tribes: cp. 7¹⁶ 8⁴. The prophet traces the fall of Israel to the moral and social condition of its people. His prophecy was speedily fulfilled in the conquest of Syria and Israel by the Assyrian armies. The prophecy falls into four parts, each closing with the refrain, 'For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still.' As the same phrase occurs in 5²⁵, many commentators are of opinion that the short section 5²⁵⁻³⁰ is connected in date and subject with this prophecy.

C. 9. 8-21. Because of its pride and self-confidence foes are stirred up against Israel on all hands, and sudden calamity shall overtake it, followed by internal anarchy.

C. 10. 1-4. The kingdom being hopelessly corrupt cannot stand when attacked.

8. Jacob... Israel] Both names here stand for the northern kingdom, as is made clear by what follows in the next v. 9. Shall know] i.e. shall be taught by experience (Nu 14³⁴).

10. If the language is to be understood literally, the allusion is to the way in which the people set themselves to repair, and more than make up for, the devastation caused by invasion. But it is more likely that the prophet refers in a figure to the frequent changes of dynasty in the N. kingdom; no sooner is one dynasty overthrown than another rises up to take its place in vain self-confidence. This interpretation is suggested by the word 'we will change,' which literally signifies, 'we will make cedars to succeed.' The Arabic Caliph, meaning successor (of the prophet Mohammed), is from the same Semitic root.

11. The adversaries of Rezin] Perhaps we should read (with some Heb. MSS) 'the princes of Rezin'; the meaning would then be that the Syrian allies of Israel (71²) will turn against it. This suits the context, for we read in the next v. the Syrians before. Join his enemies together] RV 'stir up his enemies.'

12. Before] RM 'on the east.' Behind] RM 'on the west.' The point is that Israel is attacked on all hands.

14. Branch] RV 'palm branch': 'palm-branch and rush'—a proverbial expression signifying high and low (19¹⁵).

15. Explanatory of the metaphorical language in v. 14: cp. vv. 20, 21.

18. Briers and thorns] figuratively put for evil men (28²³). 19. Darkened] RV 'burnt up.' 20. He shall] RV 'one shall': not to be taken literally as indicating the approach of famine, but a figurative prophecy of the ruin of the nation through anarchy and civil strife, as is made clear by the first part of v. 21.

C. 10. 1. And that write, etc.] RV 'and to the writers that write perverseness,' referring to the registering of unjust and oppressive legal decisions by the scribes. There is thus a double reference (a) to unjust legislation, and (b) to unjust administrations of the law. 3. Glory] i.e. wealth and possessions, in which the people take pride. See the same word in the same sense Gn 31¹.

4. Without me they shall bow down] rather. RV 'except they bow down,' or 'they shall only bow down.' Ironical—men's only safety will be with the wretched train of captives, or beneath the corpses on the battle-field.

CHAPTERS 10⁵⁻¹²⁶

THE ASSYRIAN INVASION AND ITS SEQUEL.

This is one of the finest of Isaiah's prophecies. The subject is the advance against Jerusalem of the arrogant Assyrian conqueror, who meets with a sudden check and is foiled when his triumph is apparently secure. Then with Jehovah's interposition for the deliverance of Zion is connected a forecast of the reign of the Messianic king (111-10). The occasion to which the prophecy probably refers is Sennacherib's famous invasion in the reign of Hezekiah, 701 B.C. (36, 37 2 K 18¹³⁻¹⁹), but some scholars place it earlier, in the time of the preceding Assyrian king, Sargon. The cities referred to in 10⁹ were captured between 740 and 717 B.C., so that the Assyrian king's boast must at least be later than 717 B.C. It may be true that the line of march which Sennacherib followed was not identical with that which the prophet represents the invader as taking in 10²⁸⁻³²; but Isaiah speaks before the event, and naturally thinks of the Assyrians as approaching Jerusalem by the usual route from the N.; he is drawing a vivid imaginative picture of the threatening danger, and expresses his confident expectation of a wonderful deliverance through a sudden discomfiture of the foe (10^{16-19, 33, 34}). The same remarkable anticipation is a feature of Isaiah's other utterances at this crisis (14²⁵ 17^{13, 14} 33, 37 6, 7, 20-35), and it received a startling fulfilment (37^{36, 37}).

C. 10. 5-11. The Assyrian, though proud of his conquests, is but the instrument of divine punishment, 12-19. and when God's purposes have been accomplished through him he shall be punished for his pride.

20-27. The faithful remnant of God's people, therefore, need not fear. 28-34. Though his advance towards Jerusalem seems irresistible, the Assyrian will meet with a sudden discomfiture.

C. 11. 1-10. The future king of David's line and the nature of his kingdom.

11-16. God's people shall be restored to their own land and re-united.

C. 12. Two hymns of the redeemed. 1-3. A hymn of joy in the deliverance Jehovah has wrought. 4-6. A hymn of praise for God's mighty deeds, which have manifested His glory to all the world.

CHAPTER 10⁵⁻³¹

5. And the staff in their hand] RV 'the staff in whose hand': Jehovah speaks, declaring the Assyrian the minister of His wrath.

6. Hypocritical] RV 'profane.' Nation . . people] not merely referring to Judah, but to be understood generally: the Assyrian has been commissioned in the divine providence to punish godless nations. Similarly in later history Christians recognised Attila as 'the scourge of God.'

7-11. The spirit of the Assyrian is represented; he has no idea of his mission, but is fired by ambition and pride of conquest.

8. Altogether] RV 'all of them.' 9 'The places named were all captured by the Assyrians under Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, or Sargon; Calno (a Chaldean city, cp. Gn 10¹⁰) in 738 B.C., Carchemish (on the W. bank of the Euphrates) in 717; Hamath (on the Orontes, in early times the Hivite capital) in 720; Arpad (near Hamath, with which it is always coupled in OT.) in 710; Samara (capital of Israel) in 722; Damascus (capital of Syria) in 732. The mention of the last two cities amongst the Assyrian conquests shows that at this time Isaiah's prophecy in 8⁴ had been fulfilled.

10, 11. The Assyrian's argument is—how can Jerusalem, with fewer gods to protect it, hope to hold out successfully?

12. Work] i.e. of judgment, or punishment.

13. People] RV 'peoples.' I have put down] RV 'I have brought down as a valiant man them that sit on thrones.' 14. The helplessness of the world before the Assyrians is vividly imaged. Left] RV 'forsaken.' Peeped] RV 'chirped': cp. 8¹⁹.

15. The prophet now speaks in indignant retort to the vain-glorious boasting of the Assyrian; how can he, being but an instrument of providence, exalt himself against Jehovah?

As if the rod, etc.] RV 'as if a rod should shake them that lift it up. or as if a staff should lift up him that is not wood.'

16. The two figures of famine and fire are used to express the destruction of the Assyrian host. 17. The light of Israel] i.e. Jehovah, who, while He gives light to His own people, at the same time consumes their enemies (29^{4,7} 30²⁷ 33¹⁴). In one day] Isaiah anticipates a sudden catastrophe for the Assyrians (vv. 32-34).

18. A standardbearer fainteth] RV 'a sick man pineth away.' 19. Rest] RV 'remnant' (of the Assyrian armies).

20-23. The divine judgment will have a purifying effect on Judah; a remnant shall escape (1⁹ 6¹³) who shall be truly devoted to Jehovah.

20. Upon him that smote them] i.e. the Assyrian, on whose help Ahaz relied (7²⁰).

21. Characteristic teaching of Isaiah, which he had embodied in the symbolic name Shear-jashub ('a remnant shall return'), given to his son (7³). It is noteworthy that in this same verse there occurs also the divine title 'Mighty God,' which the prophet had ascribed to the Messianic king (9⁶). 22. Yet a remnant] RV 'only a remnant.' The consumption, etc.] RV 'a consumption' (i.e. judgment) 'is determined, overflowing with righteousness.'

24. He shall smite, etc.] RV 'though he smite,' etc. After the manner, etc.] alluding to the oppressive cruelty of Pharaoh.

25. Cease] RV 'be accomplished.' God's indignation against His people will be appeased after their punishment, and His anger will then turn to the destruction of their enemies.

26. Scourge for him] i.e. for the Assyrian. According to] RV 'as in.' The slaughter of Midian is also referred to as a typical deliverance in 9⁴. His rod] i.e. Jehovah's, contrasted with the Assyrian oppressor's rod (v. 24). As the Egyptian oppression was followed by the exodus, so the Assyrian oppression is to be succeeded by a similarly striking deliverance.

27. Because of the anointing] i.e. because of the anointed king of David's house to which God has promised a lasting kingdom. But RV 'by reason of fatness.' A new metaphor. Judah is compared to a bullock which grows so fat and strong that a yoke can no longer be imposed upon it. A conjectural emendation by Robertson Smith makes the last sentence of this v. read, 'There cometh up from the north the destroyer.'

28-32. The prophet reverts to the present.

The Assyrian advance and consequent panic vividly portrayed.

28. The towns mentioned are all to the N. of Jerusalem. Passed to] RV 'passed through.'

Hath laid up, etc.] RV 'layeth up his baggage': cp. 18¹⁷ 20. Carriage is used in AV for 'things carried.' 29. Passage] RV 'pass.'

30. Cause it to be heard, etc.] RV 'hearken, O Laislah,' viz. to the noise of the approaching armies. O poor Anathoth] RM 'Answer her, O Anathoth.' 31. Is removed] RV 'is a fugitive.' Gather themselves to flee] rather, 'save their households by flight': cp. Ex 9¹⁹.

32-34. Arrived within sight of Jerusalem, and threatening the city, the Assyrian meets with sudden disaster.

32. RV 'This very day shall he halt at Nob, he shaketh his hand at the mount,' etc.

33. Haughty, etc.] RV 'lofty shall be brought low.' 34. The figure is the same as in vv. 17-19. The Assyrians are to fall like a forest that is hewn down. Note close connexion with c. 11.

CHAPTER 11

1. Rod out of the stem] RV 'shoot out of the stock,' implying that the tree has been cut down. The Assyrians have been compared in the vv. preceding to cedars, which when felled throw out no fresh suckers; now the house of David is likened to an oak whose life remains in it after it has been cut down (6¹³). From the royal family of Judah, though it may seem ruined, is to spring the ideal Ruler in the future. It has been already implied (9⁷), and is here expressly stated, that the Messiah is to be of the house of David (Mic 5²).

2. Leaving the figure Isaiah here indicates the character of the future Ruler. The gifts of the divine Spirit bestowed upon Him are arranged in three pairs, the first pair indicating perfection of intellectual endowment, the second pair full possession of a ruler's practical qualities, and the third referring to the religious spirit which is to crown and direct all other gifts.

3. Make him of quick understanding] RV 'his delight shall be in the fear of Jehovah,' i.e. when He sees it in others. Not judge, etc.] i.e. by appearances or hearsay. 4. The ideal Ruler combines mercy and judgment (Ps 101¹). With the rod of his mouth] The power ascribed to the word of Messiah is a striking feature (49² Zech 9¹⁰), and suggests a superhuman personality (Hos 6⁵). 5. The girdle] stands for readiness for action—He shall be always ready for righteousness and faithfulness.

6. From the person and character of the Ruler Isaiah now passes on to the effects of His rule. Evil having been eradicated from human society, there will be a corresponding regeneration of the rest of creation (65²⁵ Ro8^{19f.}). 8. Cockatrice] RV 'basilisk,' or 'adder' (RM): probably the great yellow viper common in Palestine. 9. My holy mountain] i.e. Zion wonderfully transformed according to the prophecy in 2² (Zech 14^{10,11}).

10. RV 'And it shall come to pass in that day, that the root of Jesse, which standeth for an ensign of the people, unto him shall the nations seek.' Root of Jesse] the same as the shoot growing from the root (v. 1). The great scion of the house of David is not only to be king of Israel, but the nations of the world shall rally to him. Seek] i.e. resort, a word specially used of resorting for prayer (55⁶) or of consulting oracles (8¹⁹ 19⁸). Rest] i.e. resting-place: referring to Jerusalem, the seat of the royal house.

11. Next the prophet speaks of the restoration of the dispersed Israelites from their exile in the various kingdoms by which Judah was surrounded. The second time] The first time was at the Mosaic exodus. Recover] RM 'purchase': cp. Ex 15¹⁶. Pathros] upper, or southern, Egypt. Cush] Ethiopia, still further S. (18¹ 37⁹). Elam] the country at the head of the Persian Gulf. Shinar] i.e. Babylonia.

Hamath] see on 10⁹. Islands of the sea] a phrase found here only in chs. 1-39, but several times in chs. 40-66. It denotes the islands of, and lands bordering upon, the Mediterranean Sea, and sometimes stands for distant countries generally.

13. A further feature of Messiah's sign. The bitter feeling between the N. kingdom and Judah (9²¹) shall cease. The adversaries of] RV 'they that vex.'

14. The reunited people will be victorious over their old enemies, the tribes immediately surrounding Palestine. Shoulders] 'shoulder,' i.e. side or border, as in Josh 15^{8, 10, 11}. Them of the east] lit. 'the children of the east,' i.e. the Bedouin Arabs: Jg 6⁸ 2Ch 21¹⁶.

15, 16. Isaiah pictures a miraculous deliverance of the exiles parallel to the former deliverance from Egypt. The tongue, etc.] i.e. the Gulf of Akaba. Tongue is used for an arm of the sea as in Josh 15² 18¹⁹. The river] i.e. Euphrates. In the seven] RV 'into seven.'

An highway] i.e. a raised road such as Eastern monarchs made for the passage of their armies (19²⁸ 49¹¹). It was] RV 'there was.'

CHAPTER 12

1. The thanksgiving that now follows is the counterpart of the hymn of praise sung after the passage of the Red Sea (Ex 15), and is partly based upon it. Some scholars doubt its Isaianic authorship and date it after the return from exile.

3. Draw water] Under a figure it is indicated that there shall be a continual supply of divine protection and deliverance. Or, if we follow the Talmud, there may be an allusion to the ceremonial of the Feast of Tabernacles, on the last day of which water was drawn from the pool of Siloam by the priests and poured at the altar of burnt-offering (see Jn 7³⁷). 5. He hath done excellent things] from Ex 15¹, 'triumphed gloriously,' the same word. This is known] RV 'let this be known.'

CHAPTERS 13-14²³

THE JUDGMENT OF BABYLON AND ITS KING

This is the first of a series of prophecies dealing mainly with foreign nations. Its subject is Babylon, where the Jews are represented as undergoing exile, from which they are about to be delivered (14¹⁻³) owing to the capture of Babylon by the Medes (13¹⁷). The historical setting of the prophecy is thus much later than the age of Isaiah, in whose time the Assyrians were the great enemies of God's people. On this ground most modern scholars regard this section as non-Isaianic, and date it during the Babylonian exile. As the Medes alone (not Cyrus and the Persians) are mentioned as the instruments used by God in the deliverance of His people, the prophecy must be dated before 549 B.C., the year in which Cyrus overthrew the Medes, who afterwards were united with him in the conquest of Babylon (538 B.C.).

C. 13. 1. Title prefixed to the section.

2-18. Hostile hosts are mustered to carry out Jehovah's purpose of judgment against Babylon, 19-22, with the result that it shall be utterly desolate.

C. 14. 1-3. The deliverance of captive Israel.

4-20. A song of triumph over the king of Babylon. 1st scene: Hades, where the spirit of the vain-glorious monarch is brought low (4-15). 2nd scene: The battle-field, where his dishonoured corpse lies with the slain (16-20). 21-23. The completeness of Babylon's overthrow.

CHAPTER 13

1. Burden] The corresponding verb means 'to lift up' (a) a load, (b) the voice (cp. 3⁷ 42^{2, 11}), used of Balaam lifting up his voice in oracular utterance (Nu 24^{8, 15, 23}). Hence the noun signifies an utterance, or oracle (e.g. 2K 9²⁵), and is often prefixed, as here, to prophetic utterances (Zech 9¹ 12¹ Prov 31¹). Since it is often applied to threatening utterances, the meaning of 'burden' is also suitable. In Jer 23³³ there is a play on the two meanings of the word.

2. Banner] RV 'ensign,' i.e. a signal for the mustering of distant armies (5²⁶). High] RV 'bare,' i.e. without trees; upon such a mountain the signal would be clearly seen. Unto them] i.e. the people whom the prophet has in mind, though they have not yet been mentioned.

Shake the hand] the threatening gesture of besiegers (10³²). 3. Sanctified ones] RV 'consecrated ones,' i.e. warriors. The thought may be that the war is a holy one, Babylon's destroyers being the ministers of Jehovah's vengeance.

4. The prophet hears the noise of the armies assembling at the signal (v. 2). Of the battle] RV 'for the battle.'

6. The Almighty] Heb. Shaddai, a name of God frequent in the Pentateuch, and belonging to the pre-Mosaic revelation (Ex 6³); it is not often found in the prophets, and when it occurs the severe and awful aspect of the divine nature is the more prominent one (Joel 1¹⁵ Ezk 1²⁴ 10⁵).

8. As flames] RV 'faces of flame,' i.e. flushed with agitation.

10. The day of Jehovah is accompanied by signs in the heavens as in Joel 2^{10, 31} 3¹⁵ Zeph 1^{14, 15}. Such language need not be understood literally, but vividly expresses a time of terror and dismay. 12. Precious] RV 'rare'; the slaughter will be so great that few men will be left (24⁶). Golden wedge] RV 'pure gold'; the gold of Ophir was most esteemed.

13. See a similar description Hag 2⁶. The prophets are carried in thought beyond the particular political convulsion in view to the final overthrow of all that is hostile to God.

14. RV 'And it shall come to pass that as,' etc. That no man taketh up] i.e. without a shepherd. They shall . . . turn] i.e. the settlers in Babylon, either taken captive from other countries, or resorting thither for trade (Jer 50¹⁰), will, on the overthrow of the city, disperse to their own lands. 15. The reason for the hurried flight of v. 14; the fall of the city will be accompanied by indiscriminate slaughter.

Joined unto them] i.e. by colonisation. But RV 'taken,' not having been able to make good his escape. 16. The atrocities referred to frequently accompanied the sack of a city (2 K 8¹² Hos 10¹⁴ 13¹⁶).

17. The invaders of Babylon are here first mentioned by name, though the prophet has had them in mind from v. 2. The Medes had settled in the district SW. of the Caspian Sea, and are mentioned in Assyrian annals from Sargon's time onwards (cp. 2 K 17⁶ 18¹¹): see intro. to this section. Shall not regard] i.e. they are not to be turned aside by bribes.

18. Bows] The Medes were noted archers (Jer 51¹¹). 19. Excellency] RV 'pride.'

20. Make their fold] RV 'make their flocks to lie down.' A more terrible desolation awaits Babylon than that which had been foretold for Judah (7^{21, 27}).

21. Doleful creatures] probably owls. Owls] RV 'ostriches.' Satyrs] i.e. uncanny creatures, or demons (so Targum, LXX, and Syr.), such as were thought by the Jews to haunt ruins and desert places: cp. Lk 11²⁴. But as the other names in the context stand for animals many prefer to render, 'he-goats' (RM, Vulg.).

22. The wild . . . houses] RV 'wolves shall cry in their castles.' Dragons] RV 'jackals.'

The anticipation of the utter ruin of Babylon has been literally fulfilled. In 538 B.C. it was captured by the Medes and Persians under Cyrus; and, though its glory lingered for a time, it died away before the beginning of the Christian era, and Babylon is now, and has long been, only a heap of ruins.

CHAPTER 14

1. Strangers] The thought of the voluntary adhesion of strangers is prominent in the later chapters of the book (44⁵ 55⁵ 60⁵).

2. People] RV 'peoples.' Similar anticipations are found in 49²² 60¹⁰ 61⁵; these were in some measure fulfilled in the time of Ezra: Ezr 1¹⁴ 6^{7, 8}.

4. Proverb] RV 'parable' (Hab 2⁶), or 'taunting-song.' The King] Nabonidus was king of Babylon from 555 till its fall 549 B.C. Golden city] rather, RM, 'exactress,' or 'raging one.' 7. The nations rejoice in the peace which follows the fall of their oppressor.

9. The spirit of the dead king of Babylon is greeted by the shades in Hades. The dead] lit. 'feeble ones'; the word is used in Heb. for disembodied spirits (Ps 88¹⁰). It hath raised, etc.] In Hades the dead monarchs are conceived as retaining some shadow of their former greatness: cp. Ezk 32²¹. 11. The grave] RV 'hell,' as in v. 9; i.e. Hades.

12. The fall of the mighty king is compared, first, to the fall of the bright star of dawn from the sky, then, by a sudden change of figure, to the felling of a great tree. Lucifer] RV 'day-star.' Weaken] RV 'lay low.'

13. The arrogant self-deification here put into the mouth of the Babylonian king finds a parallel in some of the Assyrian inscriptions.

Mount, etc.] not Zion, as many ancient commentators explain, comparing Ps 48², but the mount in the far N. where the gods are imagined to reside—the Babylonian Olympus: cp. Ezk 28¹²⁻¹⁴. Sides] RV 'uttermost parts,' and so in v. 15.

16. The scene now shifts to the battle-field, where men gaze upon the dishonoured corpse of the dead king. 18. Lie] RV 'sleep.' In his own house] i.e. in a tomb of his own.

19. An abominable branch] i.e. a blighted branch cut off from a tree and left to rot upon the ground. And as the raiment . . . slain] RV

'clothed with the slain.' The king's corpse lies under heaps of the slain on the field of defeat. The stones of the pit] referring to stones flung together in a hastily-made grave on the battle-field.

20. Shalt not be joined, etc.] To be excluded from burial was the extremest disgrace for a king: Jer 22¹⁹ 2Ch 21²⁰ 24²³. With them] i.e. the honourably buried kings (v. 18).

Shall . . renowned] RV 'shall not be named for ever'; a similar curse is pronounced on Jehoiachin (Jer 22³⁰). The taunt-song ends with this verse, and in vv. 21-23 the prophet speaks in his own person.

21. With cities] as emblems of their dominion. 22. Nephew] RV 'son's son.'

23. Pools of water] The works of irrigation connected with the Euphrates being destroyed the land would become a morass. This, in fact, happened after the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus.

CHAPTER 11²⁴⁻²⁷

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE POWER OF ASSYRIA

A short section belonging to the same period as 10⁵⁻¹² (cp. v. 25 with 10²⁷): the subject is the overthrow of the Assyrian invader, and the prophecy was literally fulfilled in the destruction of Sennacherib's army.

24-27. It is Jehovah's sworn and unalterable purpose to destroy the Assyrian power, that his burdensome rule over Judah and the nations may cease.

25. Upon my mountains] i.e. the mountains of Judah (49¹¹ 65⁹). 26. All the nations] Jehovah's merciful purpose embraces not only His own people, but the nations generally.

CHAPTER 14²⁸⁻³²

WARNING TO THE PHILISTINES

This prophecy is assigned, in the title prefixed to it, to the year that king Ahaz died (728 B.C.). The Philistines are represented as exulting over the death of their oppressor, but are warned that their joy is premature, for worse times are in store for them. The oppressor of Philistia referred to may be (1) Ahaz, whose death may have formed the occasion of the utterance, or, more probably, (2) Tiglath-pileser, whose ally Ahaz had been; in that case Sargon and Sennacherib are indicated by the cockatrice and fiery serpent (v. 29), each one proving more terrible and formidable to the nations of Western Asia than his predecessor.

The joy of Philistia is premature, for, though apparently broken, the Assyrian power will recover and become more formidable than before (v. 29). While Judah escapes, Philistia will suffer from famine and sword (30), and the smoke on the horizon already marks the invader's approach (31). Philistine ambassadors arrived in Judah to arrange a defensive alliance; the prophet's answer is an expression of confidence in Jehovah, who has promised safety to Zion (32).

29. Thou, whole Palestina] RV 'O Philistia, all of thee.' Rod of him, etc.] RV 'rod that smote.' The rod symbolises the Assyrian power, as in 10²¹. Serpent's root, etc.] Each species mentioned is more deadly than the preceding, the fiery serpent being the worst of all (30⁶ Nu 21⁶); the serpent also symbolises Assyria in 27¹.

30. Firstborn of the poor] i.e. the very poor, those inheriting a double portion (Dt 21¹⁷) of poverty. The reference is to the people of Judah, who, though afflicted, shall escape, whereas of the Philistines will be left no remnant to return. 31. Thou . . dissolved] RV 'thou art melted away, O Philistia, all of thee.' The north] the way by which the invader would naturally approach. Shall be alone in] RV 'standeth aloof at.' The meaning is that no soldier is missing from the ranks of the enemy. 32. Trust] RV 'take refuge'

CHAPTERS 15, 16

MOAB'S CALAMITY AND THE WAY OF ESCAPE

This section consists of two parts: (a) 15¹⁻¹⁶, a prophecy announcing that a great disaster is about to fall upon Moab, and (b) 16^{13,14}, a short appendix in which Isaiah affirms the speedy fulfilment of the foregoing prophecy. The first part is not necessarily by Isaiah, and may have been uttered earlier than his time, much of it is also quoted by Jeremiah (48¹⁻¹⁵) Cp. 22⁴, where there is reason to suppose that an earlier prophecy has been used by both Isaiah and Micah. The Moabites inhabited the elevated land E. of the Dead Sea, and though a people related by blood to Israel, the mutual relations of the two nations were hostile from the time of Saul onwards. Saul fought against them (1S 14⁴⁷), and David overcame them (2S 8²). Ahab oppressed them and exacted tribute (2K 3⁴, confirmed by king Mesha of Moab in the inscription known as the Moabite Stone); but after his death the Moabites threw off the Israelite yoke (2K 1¹³, Moabite Stone), and Jehoram's efforts to maintain his authority over them were ineffectual (2K 3⁶⁻²⁷). The exact date of the prophecy is uncertain, but the enemy who will inflict the coming calamity upon Moab is the Assyrian king, either Sargon or Sennacherib, referred to, perhaps, in 15¹ under the figure of a lion.

C. 15. 1-9. Calamity is imminent for Moab, the terror and flight of her people.

C. 16. 1-5. A condition of safety indicated. Let Moab acknowledge the suzerainty of Judah (vv. 1-3); Zion will shelter her fugitives (4), for to Zion the promise of the Messianic king has been given (5). 6-12. Moab's proud spirit prevents her from accepting the condition. Desolation therefore awaits her land. 13, 14. The above prophecy had been delivered at an earlier period. Isaiah affirms that it shall speedily be fulfilled.

CHAPTER 15

1. Burden] sec on 13¹. Because . . night] RV 'For in a night.' Ar of Moab] i.e. city of Moab. The capital (Nu 22³⁶ Josh 13¹⁶) is doubtless meant. The places referred to in the c. are in Moabite territory. Silence] RV 'nought.' Kir] probably Kerak, a fortress on the Dead Sea. 2. He is gone, etc.] i.e. the Moabite people. Bajith] 'the house,' i.e. the temple of the Moabite deity, Chemosh. Dibon] here the Moabite Stone, with inscription by king Mesha (2 K 3⁴), was found in 1869. Nebo] not the mountain (Dt 34¹), but a Moabite city in its vicinity, thought to be called after the deity of the same name. Baldness, etc.] in token of mourning. Heshbon, Elealeh] neighbouring hill-towns of Moab.

4. His life, etc.] RV 'his soul trembleth within him.'

5. Fugitives] RV 'her nobles.' An heifer of three years old] i.e. not broken in: implying that the place was hitherto impregnable. Places are thus sometimes compared to animals (Jer 46²⁰ Hos 4¹⁰ 10¹¹). Most modern scholars, however, understand the words as a proper name 'to Eglath-shelishiyah' (RV). Mounting up] RV 'ascent': the prophet sees the ascent of Luhith crowded with weeping fugitives.

6. Shall be desolate] because they have been stopped at the source (2 K 3^{19, 25}). Hay . . grass] RV 'grass . . tender grass.' 7. The brook of the willows] Evidently mentioned as the boundary of the land and generally identified with the brook Zered (Nu 21¹² Dt 2¹³). The fugitives are pictured as carrying their possessions to the border for safety. 8. The cry] i.e. of destruction (v. 5). No part of the land escapes. 9. The waters of Dimon] i.e. the Arnon. Dimon is probably a symbolical variation for Dibon, adopted because the sound of it suggests blood (dam). Lions] perhaps to be understood literally (2 K 17²⁵), or it may stand metaphorically for invading foes: Jer 4⁷ 5⁶.

CHAPTER 16

1. RV 'Send ye the lambs for the ruler of the land from Sela which is toward the wilderness,' etc. Mesha, king of Moab, had rendered to Israel tribute of lambs and rams (2 K 3⁴). The prophet here bids the Moabites send tribute to Judah and thus secure protection by renewing their allegiance to God's people; or perhaps in this v. the Moabite chiefs are pictured as exhorting one another to this step. From Sela] in Edom, where the fugitive Moabites have taken refuge. 2. Timid and not knowing which way to take, the people are gathered at the Arnon preparatory to migrating.

3. An appeal from the Moabites to Zion that she will interpose and shelter the fugitives. Take counsel] 'bring counsel,' i.e. give us advice. Execute judgment] 'make a decision,' by interposing between us and our oppressors.

4. The appeal to Zion continued. Read, 'Let mine outcasts dwell with thee (Zion); as for Moab, be thou (Judah) a covert,' etc. The reason follows why safety may be sought at Zion—because of the peace to be enjoyed there under the rule of the Messianic king (v. 5), the establishment of whose kingdom is, in the prophet's view, to follow upon the destruction of the Assyrians. 5. Hasting righteousness] RV 'swift to do righteousness': cp. 11^{4, 5}.

6. The pride] which prevented Moab from accepting conditions: the same national failing is alluded to 25¹¹ (cp. Zeph 2⁸). But his lies, etc.] RV 'his boastings are nought.'

7. Foundations] RV 'raisin-cakes': cp. Hos 3¹. The trade in these would cease through the desolation of the vineyards.

Kir-hareseth] named in 2 K 3²⁵ as a strong fortress.

8. The lords, etc.] RM 'her choice plants did break down the lords of nations,' alluding to the strength of the wine of Sibmah.

Principal] RV 'choice.' Are come . . through . . are stretched out, they are gone over] RV 'reached . . into . . were spread abroad, they passed.' The words describe the area over which the cultivation of the vine extended in Moab, but which is now desolate; or perhaps the language used in this v. may be used figuratively to express the wide extent of Moabite influence: cp. Ps 80⁸⁴, etc.

9. With the weeping of Jazer] i.e. with sorrow as genuine as that of the Moabites themselves. For the shouting, etc.] RV 'for upon thy summer fruits and upon thy harvest the battle shout is fallen.' 11. My bowels] regarded as the seat of the emotions (Jer 31²⁰). The speaker is probably Jehovah, as in v. 10: (63¹⁵).

12. RV 'And it shall come to pass, when Moab presenteth himself, when he wearyeth himself upon the high place, and shall come to his sanctuary to pray, that he shall not prevail.' The allusion is to the worship of the national deity, Chemosh.

13. Since that time] RV 'in time past.' The expression may denote a previous time in the speaker's life (2 S 15³⁴), or a more distant past (44⁸).

14. The years of an hireling] i.e. definitely reckoned, with no grace allowed. Feeble] RV 'of no account.'

CHAPTER 17¹⁻¹¹

JUDGMENT ON SYRIA AND ISRAEL

This section is headed, 'oracle concerning Damascus,' but its subject is in fact wider; it treats of the impending ruin not only of Syria, but also of Ephraim, i.e. the kingdom of Israel (v. 3). This connexion of Ephraim with Syria is best explained by the alliance of the two kingdoms against Judah (7^{1,2}). Isaiah here teaches (as in 7¹⁶ 8⁴) that they will both be completely overthrown, an anticipation which was literally fulfilled (10⁹ 2 K 15²⁰ 16⁹). The date of this prophecy would thus be subsequent to the formation of the Syro-Ephraimite alliance (i.e. the reign of Jotham in Judah, 2 K 15³⁷), and some time before the capture of Damascus by the Assyrians (732 B.C.).

1-3. The imminent ruin of Damascus, in which Israel also will be involved. 4-6. The state to which Israel will be reduced figuratively set forth. 7, 8. The spiritual effect of the chastisement. 9-11. The cause of it—desertion of Jehovah for foreign deities, who cannot help in the day of calamity.

1. Burden] see on 13¹. 2. The cities of Aroer] This Aroer is probably the one in Gad (Josh 13²⁵), and the reference is to the cities belonging to the kingdom of Israel on the E. of Jordan. Some ancient versions, however, read, 'the cities are forsaken for ever.' 3. And the remnant, etc.] RM 'and the remnant of Syria shall be as,' etc. As the glory] explained in vv. 4-6, where it is shown that the glory of Israel shall pass away.

4-6. By three separate figures the gloomy prospects of Israel are set forth: (a) that of an emaciated body, v. 4; (b) that of a harvest field that is reaped, v. 5; (c) that of vines or olives when the fruit is gathered, v. 6. The teaching is characteristic of Isaiah, for the figures imply that for Israel, as for Judah (4³ 6¹³ 7³) there shall be a remnant. 5. As he that gathereth] RV 'as when one gleaneth.'

Valley of Rephaim] SW. of Jerusalem (Josh 15⁵).

8. Groves] Heb. Asherim (RV). These were symbols of the Canaanite goddess Asherah. The symbol seems to have been a pole, tree-trunk, or carved pillar (Dt 16²¹ 2 K 21⁷), erected near an altar (Jg 6²⁵). Images] RV 'sun-images,' pillars dedicated to the sun-god.

9. As a forsaken, etc.] RV 'as the forsaken places in the wood and on the mountain top, which were forsaken from before the children of Israel.' LXX. however, reads, 'forsaken places of the Amorites and the Hivites which were forsaken,' etc. The sense is that Israel shall be punished with a desolation like that which the former inhabitants experienced at the hands of the Israelites. 10. Rock] a title of Jehovah (30²⁹ Dt 32⁴). Shalt thou plant...

shalt set] RV 'plantest... settost.' This is a metaphor of the foreign worships so carefully introduced.

CHAPTER 17¹²⁻¹⁴

DISCOMFITURE OF THE ASSYRIANS

A short prophecy, in which Isaiah foretells sudden disaster for the Assyrian invaders: it is parallel to 14²⁴⁻²⁷, and belongs to the same period.

12-13. The Assyrian hosts advance against Judah, but are suddenly dispersed in a single night.

12. Read, 'Ah, the uproar of many peoples, which roar like the roaring of the seas; and the rushing,' etc. Many people] The Assyrian army was recruited from many nations.

13. Rolling thing] RV 'whirling dust': cp. Ps 83¹³. 14. Specially fulfilled in the destruction of Sennacherib's army (37³⁶).

CHAPTER 18

ETHIOPIA REASSURED

Isaiah here addresses the Ethiopians, who, agitated at the advance of the Assyrians westward, were sending ambassadors to other states to organise resistance. He foretells the sudden overthrow of the Assyrians, as in 10²⁶⁻³⁴ 14²⁴⁻²⁷ 17¹³⁻¹⁴; and this prophecy should accordingly be grouped with those, as relating to Sennacherib's great invasion in the reign of Hezekiah, 701 B.C.

1-3. The Ethiopians need not be anxious, but are bidden, with all nations, to watch.

4-6. For Jehovah will interpose and utterly ruin the Assyrian plans. 7. On witnessing the deliverance, Ethiopia will render homage to Jehovah.

1. RV 'Ah, the land of the rustling of wings,' probably alluding to the buzzing swarms of flies characteristic of Ethiopia (the land between the Upper Nile and the Red Sea and Arabian Gulf), but some see a reference to the disk with wings, which appears in ancient Egyptian paintings as a symbol of Ethiopian sovereignty.

2. Vessels of bulrushes] i.e. made of papyrus, such as are still in use on the Nile. Ount saying and understand the exhortation Go ye, etc., as addressed by the prophet to the Ethiopian ambassadors, bidding them return home and prepare their nation, not for war, but to be spectators (v. 3) of what follows. A nation scattered, etc.] AV implies that the reference is to Judah; but we should doubtless take it as referring to the Ethiopians, and read, 'a nation tall and smooth... that meteth out and treadeth down, whose land the rivers divide' (RV). Notice in all these short prophecies the familiarity of Isaiah, not only with the physical features of the different countries, but with their national characteristics: cp. 16⁶ 19.

4. The v. vividly depicts the calmness of Jehovah in contrast to the unrest amongst the nations. Like... herbs] RM 'when there is clear heat in sunshine.' 5. When the bud... flower] RV 'when the blossom is over and the flower becometh a ripening grape.' The Assyrian plans are maturing (under apparently favourable conditions, v. 4), but just as they become ripe they are suddenly marred. The sudden overthrow of the Assyrians is similarly foretold, 10¹⁷ 14²⁵ 17¹³. 6. Leaving the figure, the prophet refers to the corpses of the slain.

7. A people scattered] Correct the rendering as in v. 2.

CHAPTER 19

THE JUDGMENT ON EGYPT

A prophecy concerning Egypt, probably belonging to the same period as c. 18, and designed to show the speedy collapse of Egypt's power, on which a strong political party in Judah in Hezekiah's reign had placed their hopes (see Intro.). Sargon defeated the Egyptians at Raphia in 720 B.C., and the prophet in vv. 2, 3 may refer to the anarchy and confusion consequent upon that overthrow. At any rate, he shows a remarkable acquaintance both with the country and the people of Egypt.

1-10. The impending calamity of Egypt.

11-15. Its helplessness at the crisis.

16-25. The outcome of the judgment: (a) a state of terror (16, 17); (b) recognition of Jehovah (18-22); (c) followed by a call to share the blessings of God's chosen people (23-25).

1. Burden] see on 13¹. Rideth] cp. Ps 18^{9,10}. The strength of Egypt is broken at Jehovah's approach. 2. Civil war rages between the petty princes of lower Egypt.

4. The Assyrian monarch Sargon may be the cruel lord in the prophet's thoughts; he defeated the Egyptians more than once (720, 711, B.C.).

6. RV 'And the rivers shall stink; the streams of Egypt shall be diminished and dried up.' 7. RV 'The meadows by the Nile, by the brink of the Nile,' etc. 8. With the failure of the river the occupation of the fishermen will be gone. Brooks] RV 'Nile.'

9. Networks] RV 'white cloth.' 10. RV 'And her pillars shall be broken in pieces, all they that work for hire shall be grieved in soul.' Pillars] i.e. the foundations of society (Ps 11³), or principal men (Gal 2⁹).

11. Zoan] or Tanis, in the Delta. 12. The first proof of their folly; they cannot foresee the future. 13. A second proof, by ill-judged counsel they have brought about disaster.

Noph] i.e. Memphis, a chief city of Lower Egypt. Stay] RV 'corner stone': cp. Zech 10⁴. 15. Branch] RV 'palm branch': cp.

9¹⁴; the expressions in the v. are figurative of all classes of society. 16. In that day] the Day of God's judgment. 17. Egypt is filled with terror at the mention of Judah, because of Judah's God.

18. Five] a small number. Language of Canaan] Hebrew. Swear] i.e. swear allegiance. Shall be called] as deserving the name (1²⁶).

City of destruction] i.e. Heliopolis, the city of the sun (Ir-hacheres), but by a slight change in one letter (Ir-haheres), the prophet symbolically indicates its fate—the place where the sun was worshipped will be destroyed. Somewhat similarly Beth-El ('house of God') is written Beth-Aven ('house of nought'), Hos 4¹⁵, and Bosheth ('shame') stands for Baal (Jer 11¹³).

19. There will be visible signs of Egypt's allegiance to Jehovah. Pillar] or obelisk, such as were common in Egypt; the mark of a holy place.

20-22. Isaiah looks forward to a time when, instead of Egypt exercising an evil influence over the destiny of Judah, Judah shall be the means of spiritual blessing to Egypt.

23-25. The prophet in rapt vision sees the historic and traditional enemies of his nation joined with it in membership of one holy people of God, where all share equal privilege. A like wonderful catholic and missionary spirit is shown in Ps 87.

Like Isaiah's other pictures of the ideal future, this prophecy (v. 20-25) yet awaits its complete fulfilment. We may, however, trace partial and, as it were, preparatory fulfilments (a) in the influence of the Persian monarchy, which succeeded the Assyrian empire and did much for the spread of monotheism in the world. Cyrus himself, in his proclamations, recognised Jehovah as the God of heaven (Ezr 1²); (b) the Jewish exiles in Egypt acted as leaven, and under the Ptolemies the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into Greek. Thus, in a wonderful manner was the way prepared for the extension of the gospel of Christ, and the bringing of the nations to the knowledge of the true God.

CHAPTER 20

EGYPT'S CAPTIVITY SYMBOLISED

This c. is assigned in the title to the time when Sargon besieged Ashdod (711 B.C.). The Philistine city was at that time the centre of revolt. Sargon interposed and set up a new king, but the people were dissatisfied and substituted another; the siege and capture of Ashdod by the Assyrians followed. It seems that the Palestinian peoples who revolted against Assyria relied upon the support of Egypt. Isaiah, by putting on captive's garb, and walking the streets of Jerusalem for three years, indicates in a striking manner the vanity of their expectations.

2-6. Isaiah's striking action intended to symbolise the captivity of Egypt and Ethiopia, which would confound those who looked to them for aid.

1. Tartan] rather, 'the Tartan': the official title of the Assyrian commander-in-chief (2K 18¹⁷). Sargon] The only known mention of this monarch until modern times. Inscriptions have now thrown much light on his reign. He followed Shalmaneser (2K 18⁸) 722 B.C. and reigned till 705, when he was succeeded by Sennacherib.

2. Sackcloth] such as prophets sometimes wore (2K 1⁸ Zech 13⁴). Naked, etc.] i.e. in the guise of a captive. Not only by word, but by action calculated to arrest attention. Isaiah strove to impress his message. Such symbolic actions were frequently performed by the prophets (1K 11³⁰ Jer 19¹⁴ 27²). 4. The prophet's strange action explained. 6. Isle] RV 'coast-land,' referring especially to Philistia, which had been foremost in the revolt against Assyria. Flee] RV 'fled.'

CHAPTER 21¹⁻¹⁰

VISION OF BABYLON'S FALL

The subject of this section is the siege of Babylon, and the dismay with which the prophet receives tidings of its fall. The siege referred to can scarcely be the one at the close of the exile, as is maintained by many scholars, because (a) the prophet is much depressed at the thought of Babylon's fall, which he foresees will involve calamity for Judah (vv. 2-4, 10); (b) distance from Babylon is presupposed (vv. 6-9); and (c) Assyrian researches have revealed three earlier sieges, in 710 by Sargon, and in 703 and 696 by Sennacherib. In 710 and 703 the king of Babylon was Merodach-Baladan, who sent an embassy to Hezekiah (39¹), and whose immediate interests were identical with those of Hezekiah with whom he desired an alliance. This would account for the depression in this prophecy; in the capture of Babylon by the Assyrians, Isaiah sees a warning of the fate that may overtake Judah (v. 10). The prophecy accordingly may be dated either after 710 or 703.

1-5. The prophet is filled with terror at a vision of the fall of Babylon. 6-9. To the expectant prophet tidings of its fall is brought by a travelling caravan. 10. His dismay because of the suffering involved for Judah.

1. Burden] see 13¹. Desert of the sea] i.e. Babylonia: sea refers to the Euphrates, the word being used in Hebrew of a large river, as in 19⁶ of the Nile. South] the technical name for the S. of Judah, a region specially liable to tempests: Jer 4¹¹⁻¹⁸ Hos 13¹⁵ Zech 9¹¹.

It cometh] i.e. the tidings conveyed in the prophet's vision. 2. Treacherous dealer] i.e. the Assyrian (33¹). Go up, etc.] the command of the Assyrian to the tributaries serving in his army. Sighing thereof] i.e. caused by Babylon.

5. Prepare.. drink] read these verbs as present indicative, 'they prepare,' etc.: the Babylonian feast is at its height when the cry to arms is raised. Anoint the shield] Leather shields were greased before going to battle that the weapons of the enemy might glide off.

6. The prophet himself is the watchman.

7. RV 'And when he seeth a troop, horsemen in pairs, a troop of asses, a troop of camels, he shall hearken,' etc. 8. RV 'cried as a lion.' 9. Just as he groans aloud in impatience, he sees a company approaching, and recognises that they are the bearers of the expected tidings.

10. Referring to Judah which has suffered much from the Assyrian invader already (10⁷). The news of this fresh Assyrian victory over Babylon is distasteful, but the prophet must deliver his message.

CHAPTER 21¹¹⁻¹²

THE FATE OF EDMOM

An oracle concerning Edom, here symbolically called Dumah ('silence'), because of the silence and desolation in store for it. The prophecy, like that which follows, refers to a time when the peoples concerned were in danger, probably from the Assyrians; and as Sargon was waging war in these districts both in 720 and 711 B.C., the two prophecies may be referred to either of these years.

11, 12. To the enquiring Edomites the prophet gives enigmatic answer—while the immediate future looks bright, calamity is impending.

11. Seir] another name for Edom (Gen 36¹ Dt 2¹²). 12. If ye will, etc.] suggesting the possibility of there being another answer at another time.

CHAPTER 21¹³⁻¹⁷

JUDGMENT UPON ARABIA

This section concerns the N. Arabian tribes. For the occasion see prefatory note on 21¹⁴⁻¹⁷.

13-17. Owing to the incursions of the Assyrians the Dedanite caravans must take to flight, and other Arabian tribes shall share their fate.

13. In the forest, etc.] The trading caravans must turn from their route and hide themselves because of the invasion. Arabia] in O.T. denotes the N. part of what we call Arabia.

Dedanim] a tribe dwelling near Edom (Ezk 27¹⁵). 14. The Edomites (inhabitants of.. Tema) succour the fugitives. Prevented, etc.] RV 'did meet the fugitives with their bread.'

16. According to the years, etc.] see 16¹⁴.

Kedar] a general name for the tribes of N. Arabia (Ps 120⁶).

17. The forecast was fulfilled in the victories over the Arabian tribes by Sargon and Sennacherib, as related in their inscriptions.

CHAPTER 22¹⁻¹¹

JERUSALEM REBUKED

A severe rebuke of the conduct of the people of Jerusalem in a time of calamity. The crisis referred to cannot be certainly identified. The difficulty in assigning the passage to Sennacherib's invasion (701 B.C.) is that other prophecies relating to it are marked by encouragement, not, as here, by a tone of rebuke. Perhaps the present prophecy should be dated 711, the time of Sargon's invasion.

1-7. The unworthy behaviour of the people of Jerusalem when attack is imminent.

8-11. Every measure is taken for defence except to turn to Jehovah. 12-14. Instead of mourning, they give themselves to reckless revelry. Such conduct must bring destruction as its punishment.

1. Valley of vision] This expression in the title is evidently taken from v. 5. It is generally understood to signify Jerusalem.

Housetops] the natural place of concourse (Jg 16²⁷). The city is apparently en fête (v. 13).

2. The joy is the forced gaiety of despair (v. 13). Slain] It is implied that they have died through famine. 3. [Which . . . far] RV 'they fled afar off.' 4. Daughter] poetical personification of the people (10³²). 5. By the Lord] RV 'from the Lord.' Valley of vision] Jerusalem may be so designated as being the home of prophetic vision. 6. Elam . . . Kir] peoples who furnished auxiliaries to the Assyrian army. Uncovered] took off its case in preparation for battle. 7. Shall be . . . shall set] RV 'were . . . set.'

8. Discovered, etc.] RV 'took away the covering,' which concealed the danger from the people's eyes. Thou didst look] The people of Judah are addressed. Instead of looking to Jehovah for help, they rely wholly on their material resources. House of the forest] i.e. the house of the forest of Lebanon (1 K 7² 10¹⁷), part of Solomon's palace, used as an armoury. 9. Seen] i.e. inspected. Vv. 9, 10 refer to hasty measures taken for defence.

Gathered together, etc.] to secure a supply during the siege. 10. Numbered] to see what material could be spared for strengthening the fortifications. 11. Ditch] RV 'reservoir.'

The old pool] probably the pool of Siloam. The maker thereof] RV 'him that hath done this,' i.e. God who has brought this trouble upon them.

12. Weeping] the outward tokens of national repentance. 13. The reckless enjoyment of the despairing people, who urged the shortness of the time that remained to them as an excuse for their excesses. Let us eat, etc.] the argument of men who believed in no hereafter (1 Cor 15³²).

CHAPTER 22¹⁵⁻²⁵

DENUNCIATION OF SHEBNA

This section contains Isaiah's only invective against an individual. He denounces Shebna, the king's chief minister, who may have been a leader of the party which favoured alliance with Egypt. The prophecy was delivered before Sennacherib's invasion (701 B.C.), because at that time we read that Eliakim held the office Isaiah here promises him, while Shebna occupied a subordinate position (36³ 37²).

15-25. The deposition of Shebna. The elevation of Eliakim.

15. Over the house] i.e. steward of the royal palace, a very high office sometimes held by a king's son (2 Ch 26²¹). 16. What hast] RV 'what doest.' Shebna was apparently a foreigner, who ostentatiously presumed to treat Jerusalem as his native place. A sepulchre] Kings and great men in the East used to prepare their tombs in their life-time.

17. Carry, etc.] RV 'hurl thee away violently as a strong man, yea he will wrap thee up closely.' 18. Large country] i.e. a broad land, where it may roll on and on and not return. There the chariots, etc.] RV 'there shall be the chariots of thy glory, thou shame of thy lord's house.' The chariots are another feature of Shebna's ostentation. 19. I will . . . shall he] Though the person is changed, the subject is the same (viz. Jehovah) in both clauses. Such changes of person are common in Hebrew (1²⁰ 10¹²).

22. The key] the symbol of the office. The v. shows the powerful influence exercised by this official. He had the right of admitting to, or excluding from, the king's presence. This is symbolically applied to Christ (Rev 3⁷).

23, 24. The office of Eliakim is to be firmly established. His family will rest upon him, and all kinds of dependents cluster round him. Eliakim means 'God establishes.' 25. The burden, etc.] i.e. the vessels hanging upon the nail; figuratively put for the dependents upon a great man.

25. Perhaps the prophet may revert in thought to the fall of Shebna, but the continuation of the figure of the nail seems to point to Eliakim, whose fall, if he abused his power, would involve the ruin of his dependents. Neither the promises nor the denunciations of the prophecy need be considered as absolute, but rather conditional. Eliakim did indeed succeed to Shebna's office (see preface note), but we do not know that Shebna suffered the penalty of exile (v. 18); this may have been averted by repentance.

CHAPTER 23

THE DOOM OF TYRE

Tyre was a great mercantile centre of the ancient world, and at the time of the Hebrew monarchy chief state of Phœnicia, the parent of many colonies, and mistress of the Mediterranean. It is uncertain what siege of Tyre is here referred to; but see on v. 13.

1-5. The news of the fall of Tyre is spread. 6-9. Tyre must take refuge in her distant colonies, for her doom is purposed by Jehovah. 10-14. But even her colonies will afford no refuge, for the power of Phœnicia will be altogether broken. The fate of Chaldea serves as a warning of coming desolation. 15-18. After seventy years Tyre shall recover her commercial prosperity, but her gains shall be consecrated to Jehovah's service.

1. Homeward-bound ships are greeted at Chittim (Cyprus) with the news that Tyre has fallen. Ships of Tarshish] Tarshish is probably Tartessus, in Spain: the expression denotes deep-sea ships. 2. Isle] 'coastland,' i.e. of Phœnicia. 3. Sihor] i.e. 'black,' a name for the Nile (Jer 21⁹). River] RV 'Nile.' Tyre reaped large revenues from Egypt by carrying her corn. Is... is] RV 'was... was.'

4. Strength] stronghold, i.e. Tyre. Saying, etc.] The once busy quays are deserted, and the prophet pictures the city as a bereaved mother mourning her children. 5. RV 'When the report cometh to Egypt they shall be sorely pained.'

6. Tarshish] Tartessus, in Spain. The Tyrians are bidden to seek refuge in their western colonies on the shores of the Mediterranean. Of these Phœnician colonies Carthage was the most famous. 7. Her own, etc.] RV 'whose feet carried her.' 8. Taken this counsel] RV 'purposed this.' Crowning city] alluding to the many dependent kings in her colonies.

10. A river] RV 'the Nile.' There... strength] 'There is no girdle about thee any more.' The Tyrian colonies, released from all restraint, throw off allegiance. 11. Against... city] RV 'concerning Canaan,' i.e. Phœnicia.

12. Oppressed] or 'defiled.' Tyre was no longer a virgin citadel. Pass over to Chittim] Flight to Cyprus would not secure safety from Assyria.

13. This people, etc.] According to AV rendering, this v. describes the consolidation of the Chaldeans into a nation by the Assyrians. There is, however, no other record of this, and it is better to read, 'This people is no more; the Assyrian hath appointed it for the beasts of the wilderness' (i.e. made it desolate): 'they set up their towers' (siege-towers), 'they overthrew the palaces thereof; he made it a ruin' (RV). The fate of the Chaldeans at the hand of the Assyrians is quoted as a warning for Tyre. Babylon, the Chaldean capital, was taken by the Assyrians in 710 and 703 B.C. (see on 21¹⁻¹⁰). The present prophecy accordingly should be dated between one or other of those years and Sennacherib's invasion of W. Asia (701). 14. Strength] RV 'stronghold.'

15. Seventy] perhaps a symbolic number for a long period. According to, etc.] i.e. with out revolution or change. 16. The v. is figurative of Tyre seeking to renew her commerce. 17. Figurative of her restored traffic.

18. The old occupation will be renewed, but purged of its worldliness.

CHAPTERS 24-27

THE COMING JUDGMENT AND ESTABLISHMENT OF JEHOVAH'S KINGDOM

The subject is the overthrow of a power hostile to God's people, with a description of the deliverance of the Jews and their future glory. The hostile power is not named, and the tone of the whole prophecy is so general that it is impossible to assign it to any occasion. With the anticipated overthrow of the enemy the prophet associates in thought Jehovah's final judgment of the world. Most modern scholars assign this whole section to a date later than the age of Isaiah, urging that (a) Isaiah's time does not afford a suitable occasion, (b) the literary style is unlike Isaiah's, and (c) some of the thoughts are characteristic of a later age, e.g. the conception of guardian spirits of earthly kingdoms (24²¹), and the anticipation of a resurrection of God's people from the dead (26¹⁹). In these particulars the section exhibits affinity with the book of Daniel (Dan 10¹³ 12¹⁻⁴). The wide and general expressions used in these chs. make it easier to apply the important spiritual teaching contained in them to God's people in every age.

C. 24. 1-12. The imminent judgment caused by man's guilt. 13-15. The result—the remnant praise Jehovah. 16-23. The judgments that precede the establishment of Jehovah's kingdom.

C. 25. 1-5. The hymn of those delivered when Jehovah's kingdom is set up. 6-8. The blessings of which Zion shall then be the centre. 9-12. The thanksgiving of the redeemed for the fall of Moab.

C. 26. 1-4. Another hymn of the redeemed. 5, 6. The ground of this thanksgiving, the overthrow of the hostile city. 7-14. Jehovah's judgments teach the world righteousness and destroy oppression. 15-21. The wonderful revival of God's people.

C. 27. 1-6. Jehovah's care for His people.

7-11. Their sufferings are due to their own sin and folly. 12, 13. But restoration awaits them.

CHAPTER 24

2. All class distinctions are obliterated and confused. 5. Defiled] i.e. desecrated by bloodshed (Nu 35³³). Everlasting covenant] The phrase seems to allude to Gn 9¹⁰, the covenant with Noah and his sons. The bloodshed, upon which the great world-empires were founded, was a violation of this primitive covenant.

7-9. The meaning is that every form of enjoyment has ceased. 10. Confusion] or, 'chaos' (Gn 1²), so called because of the desolation awaiting it. No man, etc.] the entrance being blocked with ruins. 11. Crying for, etc.] i.e. 'because of' wine, the vintage having failed (Joel 1⁵).

13. When . . people] RV 'For . . peoples.' Omit 'there shall be.' 14. They] i.e. the escaped remnant, figuratively described in v. 13: cp. 17⁶. The majesty] as shown in their deliverance. They shall cry . . from the sea] i.e. the dispersed remnant shall raise their cry of praise from the far West. The sea, as usual, denotes the Mediterranean.

15. Fires] RV 'east.' Songs of praise arise both in E. and W. (the isles).

16. Glory, etc.] i.e. splendid is the lot of the righteous. My leanness, etc.] RV 'I pine away, I pine away, woe is me!' Songs of joy are premature; the barbarian has yet to complete the desolation. 17 f. The desolation yet to come. 18. Windows, etc.] a judgment like the deluge (Gn 7¹¹). 20. Removed, etc.] RV 'moved to and fro like a hut.'

21. Host, etc.] i.e. the guardian spirits of the nations (Dan 10¹³ 12¹), who are responsible for their respective nations, and whose fate is bound up with theirs. 22. Visited] i.e. favourably, and set free. 23. The prophet has passed in thought to the final convulsion of nature, and the manifestation of Jehovah's kingdom in all its glory.

1. Thy counsels, etc.] RV 'even counsels of old' (i.e. formed of old) 'in faithfulness and truth.' 2. A city] viz. the one that oppressed God's people (24¹⁰). Strangers] aliens from God's covenant people (1⁷). 3. The hostile power is not utterly destroyed; its remnant acknowledges Jehovah. 4. Strength] RV 'stronghold.' 5. As the heat] i.e. as heat is assuaged by the shadow of a cloud. Branch] RV 'song'; viz. of triumph.

6. The temporal and spiritual blessings which the rule of Jehovah will bring to mankind. This mountain] i.e. Zion (21²). Fat things] i.e. of flesh, offered in sacrifice. On the lees] left on the lees to heighten the flavour. 7. Covering] Covering the face was a token of mourning for the dead (2S 19⁴); the taking away of the veil or covering is symbolically put for the destruction of death (v. 8). 8. In victory] so some early Gk. versions and St. Paul in quoting this passage (1 Cor 15⁵⁴). Heb. text has 'for ever' (RV). Will wipe, etc.] quoted Rev 7¹⁷ 21⁴.

Rebuke] RV 'reproach.'

10. Hand] protecting hand. Under him] RV 'in his place,' where he stands. Moab is here mentioned as being a proud (c. 16) and hostile power, a typical enemy. For the dunghill] RV 'in the waters of the dunghill.'

11. He shall spread] i.e. Moab, who vainly endeavours to save himself. He shall bring] i.e. Jehovah. Spoils] RV 'craft.'

CHAPTER 26

1. Salvation, etc.] the assurance of divine protection takes the place of material bulwarks.

4. Everlasting strength] RM 'a rock of ages.' Rock is applied as a title to God (30²⁹ Dt 32⁴). 5. Lofty city] the power hostile to God's people (24¹⁰).

7. Uprightness] 'straightness,' implying freedom from impediment. Weigh] RV 'direct.' 8. In the way of thy judgments] i.e. in the way which God, by His judgments or decrees, set out for His people to walk in. The context (v. 7) shows this to be the meaning. Thy name] i.e. the manifestation of thyself. The remembrance of thee] RV 'thy memorial,' a synonym for 'name': Ex 3¹⁵. 9. Night] the season of meditation (Ps 4⁴).

10. Carries on the thought of v. 9. God's judgments are necessary, because His favour is ineffectual. 11. But they shall see, etc.] RV 'but they' (the adversaries) 'shall see thy zeal for the people' (Israel: cp. 63¹⁶) 'and be ashamed; yea, fire shall devour thine adversaries.'

12. In us] RV 'for us.' 13. Other lords] the oppressors of Israel. Perhaps the prophet also has in mind the deities in whose name they professed to act. Make mention, etc.] i.e. celebrate Thy name in praise. 14. They are dead] i.e. the oppressors. 15. The nation] i.e. Israel. Thou hast, etc.] RV 'thou hast enlarged all the borders of the land.' 18. The fruitlessness of human effort.

Fallen] i.e. been born.

19. Thy dead . . arise] RV 'Thy dead shall live; my dead bodies shall arise.' The pronouns 'thy' and 'my' both refer to Israel. The passage seems to imply that for God's people, as opposed to the heathen (v. 14), the prophet expected a literal resurrection. Some think, however, that a national restoration, surpassing all expectation, is set forth under the figure of resurrection from the dead, as in Hos 6² Ezk 37¹⁻¹⁰. Herbs] RM 'light': i.e. morning dew (Ps 110³). 20. Israel may retire and be secure, while the divine judgments pass by. 21. Disclose her blood] so that it may cry for vengeance (Gn 4^{10, 11}).

CHAPTER 27

1. The powers hostile to God's people are here symbolically represented as monsters. Leviathan the piercing (RV 'swift') serpent perhaps stands for Assyria, watered by the rapid Tigris, and 'leviathan the crooked serpent' (RV) for Babylon, whose river was the winding Euphrates. The dragon] crocodile, i.e. Egypt, as in 51⁹.

2. Sing ye, etc.] RV 'a vineyard of wine, sing ye unto it.' The vineyard is God's people (c. 5); the song begins at v. 3. 4. Who would, etc.] RV 'would that the briers and thorns were against me.' Go through] RV 'march upon.' God's anger against his vineyard has ceased, and He will now turn against their enemies, figuratively represented as briers and thorns (9¹⁸ 10¹⁷). 5. A gracious overture even to God's enemies. 6. He shall cause] RV 'In days to come shall Jacob take root'; the image of the vineyard continued.

7. Hath Jehovah smitten Israel as he smote their oppressors? Is Israel slain according to the slaughter of those slain by Jehovah? The implied answer is No. 8. When, etc.] RV 'when thou sendest her away thou dost contend with her; he hath removed her with his rough blast,' etc. Israel has been smitten but only in measure.

9. The sense is that Israel's sin will be purged on condition that it rejects all idolatry. The fruit] RV 'the fruit of taking away': i.e. the result or proof of contrition required as a condition of taking away. Groves and images] RV 'Asherim and sun-images': see 17⁸. Not stand up] RV 'rise no more.' 10. Defenced city] i.e. of the enemies (as in 25²). Some, however, understand Jerusalem, which must for a season be desolate. 11. It] i.e. Israel.

12. Beat off] RV 'beat off the fruit' as from olive trees (Dt 24²⁰). The ingathering of exiled Israel compared to a fruit harvest. River] RV 'River,' i.e. Euphrates. Stream of Egypt] the stream dividing Palestine from Egypt (1 K 8⁶⁵). 13. Trumpet] summoning the sacred assembly (Nu 10¹⁻¹⁰).

CHAPTERS 28-33

WARNINGS TO JUDAH

These chs. refer to the state of affairs during the reign of Hezekiah, when Palestine was threatened by Assyria, and an influential party in Judah favoured resistance, relying on the support of Egypt; a line of policy consistently opposed by Isaiah.

CHAPTER 28

This c. must be assigned (v. 1) to a date prior to the capture of Samaria by the Assyrians (722 B.C.) and fall of the northern kingdom.

1-6. Samaria's luxury and self-indulgence pave the way to ruin. 7-10. Judah likewise is given up to indulgence and heeds not the prophet's warning. 11-13. Therefore Jehovah will teach the people by means of foreign invasion and disaster. 14-22. Judah's safety lies not in faithless diplomacy, but in trust in Jehovah. 23-29. A parable of Jehovah's way of working, drawn from the action of the husbandman, who conducts his operations in accordance with a wise plan.

1. RV 'Woe to the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim, and to the fading flower of his glorious beauty which is on the head,' etc. The city of Samaria crowning its fair valley is destined to fade and pass away like the flower-garlands of her revellers. 2. A mighty . . one] viz. the Assyrian, Jehovah's agent. 4. Hasty fruit] RV 'first-ripe fig': a delicacy eagerly devoured. 5. In place of the false glory destined to perish, Jehovah is to be a true glory for the faithful remnant. 6. True administration of justice within, and strength to repel the invader. Turn, etc.] RV 'turn back the battle at the gate.'

7. They also] the men of Judah. They err in vision, etc.] They are drunk when engaged in the sacred duties of their office: the tables they have just left prove it (v. 8).

9. They mock the prophet; his teaching is only fit for babes! 10. The people's mockery continued. Must be] RV 'is.' Precept . . line] The words in Heb. are monosyllables such as would be used in teaching little children.

11. Isaiah's retort, Jehovah will teach them through a foreign invader. RV 'Nay, but by men of strange lips and with another tongue,' etc. 12. This is the rest, etc.] cp. 30¹⁵. Jehovah through His prophet had pointed out the way of peace and recovery for the nation that already under Ahaz had suffered much through foreign alliance. But the politicians of Judah were without patient trust in Jehovah, and were preparing further trouble by seeking alliance with Egypt. 13. RV 'Therefore shall the word of the LORD be unto them,' etc. The teaching they refused will prove a burden and a stumblingblock.

15. Made a covenant] they thought that by their policy they had, as it were, bought off death and Hades—made themselves secure.

Lies, etc.] Though the words are put into the mouth of the politicians, the point of view is the prophet's.

16. Zion] as being Jehovah's foundation, shall stand firm. 'The imagery was suggested by the large stones of the Temple. Shall not make haste] i.e. hasten hither and thither to seek security by alliances (e.g. with Egypt), but may wait confidently on Jehovah. The Apostles saw the ultimate spiritual fulfilment of Isaiah's words in the person of Christ (Eph 2²⁰ 1 Pet 2^{6,7}).

17. RV 'Judgment also will I make the line and righteousness the plummet.' Righteousness is the standard by which Jehovah will try conduct. The sense of what follows is that the false refuges and alliances (v. 18), by which men seek to secure themselves, will be swept away. 19. From . . forth] RV 'As often as it passeth through.' A vexation, etc.] RV 'nought but terror to understand the message,' which they before rejected (vv. 12, 13); it is now nothing but terrifying rumours. 20. Depicts in an expressive figure the failure ending in restless discomfort and distress, towards which the policy of the dominant party is tending.

21. Perazim . . Gibeon] referring to David's victories over the Philistines (2S 5²⁰ 1 Ch 14¹⁶). Then God interposed on behalf of His people, His strange work is His work of judgment against them. 22. Their scornful attitude will only lead to heavier foreign oppression. Lest your hands] They are acting in such a way as to fix the Assyrian yoke more firmly upon Judah, and render it more galling. Consumption] RV 'consummation': see 10^{22,23}.

24. The implied answer is No; he doth not do these things continually. 25. Fitches] (i.e. fennel-seed) and cummin were the smallest and most delicate seeds. Cast in, etc.] RV 'put in the wheat in rows, and the barley in the appointed place, and the spelt in the border thereof.' 28. 'Is bread corn crushed? Nay, he . . and though the wheel of his cart and his horses scatter it, he doth not grind it.'

29. Working] RV 'wisdom.'

In vv. 24-29 the skill of the agriculturalist in varying his operations is treated as a reflexion and parable of the divine wisdom. Delicate grains are threshed but not crushed so heavily as to spoil them (vv. 27, 28); so Jehovah's judgments are not for destruction, but to prepare men for their great destiny.

CHAPTER 29

This c. and the three which follow and complete the section, evidently belong to the very eve of Sennacherib's invasion of Judah in 701 B.C.

1-8. Jerusalem is besieged and at the last extremity, but the enemy shall be suddenly discomfited. 9-24. Judah's infatuation at this crisis, contrasted with the very different and teachable spirit that shall mark its future.

1. RV 'Ho Ariel.' Ariel is a symbolic name for Jerusalem, meaning either (1) lion of God, i.e. hero (2S 23³⁰), the lion being the symbol of Judah; or (2) altar-hearth of God.

Dwelt] RV 'encamped.' Add ye, etc.] The meaning is that when the new year succeeds that which is now running its course, and the cycle of feasts has been completed, Jehovah will bring distress upon Jerusalem. Let them, etc.] RV 'let the feasts come round.' 2. And it shall . . Ariel] RM 'Yet it shall be,' etc. In spite of all, the name shall not be falsified. Jehovah will protect His sanctuary as indicated in vv. 6-8. 4. Out of the dust] so deep will be her humiliation. Thy voice, etc.] cp. 8¹⁹.

5-8. As in other prophecies of the same period, Isaiah foretells sudden and overwhelming disaster for the enemy (37³⁰).

5. Strangers] RV 'foes.' 7. Multitude . . nations] The Assyrian army was recruited from many nations. Munition] RV 'strong hold.'

9f. Here the prophet sets out the sins which brought upon Judah the punishment of invasion. Stay . . cry] RM 'Be ye amazed and wonder; blind yourselves and be blind.'

10. Hath closed, etc.] RV 'hath closed your eyes, the prophets; and your heads, the seers, hath he covered.' Even the prophets, who ought to be the nation's watchmen (cp. 21⁸), share the general infatuation.

13. The service of Jehovah is merely formal. Their fear, etc.] RM 'their fear of me is a commandment of men, learned by rote.'

14. Marvellous] because Jehovah acts contrary to expectation against His people (28²¹).

15. The politicians who sought alliance with Egypt endeavoured to conceal their project.

16. Surely, your turning, etc.] RM 'O your perversity! Shall the potter be counted as clay?' The potter stands for Jehovah, whom the politicians of Judah ignored in their schemes.

17. The future change in the aspect of affairs is expressed under the figure of physical transformation. 18. Reversal of vv. 10-12.

20. Terrible one] the foe without. The scorner] within (28¹⁴). 21. For a word] RV 'in a cause': i.e. a case brought for judgment.

Reproveth] pleadeth: the reference is to the corrupt rulers who attempt to silence those that plead for justice. The gate] the place of judgment. 23. There are alternative interpretations: (1) when the nation sees fresh generations growing up under the divine favour, it will serve God more perfectly; (2) when his children see the work of My hands, etc.

CHAPTER 30

1-7. The Egyptian alliance is profitless. 8-11. The perversity of Judah, 12-17. and its disastrous consequences. 18-26. There is a glorious prospect for the repentant people.

27-33. But first Jehovah will destroy the Assyrian.

1. Cover, etc.] seek pretence to conceal their designs (29¹⁵). 4. Were . . came] RV 'are . . come': the ambassadors of Judah go from place to place in Egypt seeking aid.

Zoan (Gk. Tanis) and Hanes (Gk. Heracleopolis) were both cities in the Delta of the Nile. 5. Were all] RV 'shall all be.' A people] Egypt.

6. The burden . . south] a title prefixed to the short utterance, vv. 6, 7. Burden] see 13¹.

South] Negeb, i.e. the desert tract S. of Judah on the way to Egypt. The v. pictures the journey of the Judean ambassadors through a district infested with dangerous beasts, their camels and asses laden with presents, where-with they hope to purchase Egypt's aid.

7. This] i.e. Jerusalem (according to AV), who, instead of thus seeking foreign aid, ought to rest confident in Jehovah's protection (v. 15). But more probably the reference is to Egypt. 'Therefore have I called her Rahab that sitteth still' (RV), i.e. is inactive in the day when help is expected from her (36⁴). 'Rahab' ('pride'): a symbolic name for Egypt, as in 51⁹.

8. Write it] i.e. the foregoing prophecy or the name Rahab (8¹). Table] RV 'tablet.'

9. The law] i.e. oral instruction given through the prophet (8¹⁰). 13. This iniquity] i.e. disregard of Isaiah's admonition and reliance on Egypt is a symptom of ruin, like the bulging of a wall on the point of falling.

15. In returning, etc.] i.e. in giving up your restless trust in man and calmly relying upon Jehovah. 16. It was the reputation of its cavalry especially that made Egypt so desirable an ally (36⁹). 17. One thousand, etc.] the words indicate the complete rout (Lv 26⁸).

Beacon . . ensign] striking symbols of solitariness.

18. Wait] The above threatenings are conditional, Jehovah will wait to give them an opportunity of repentance. Of judgment] and therefore not unduly severe. 20. Removed . . corner] RV 'hidden'; the prophets will not need to hide themselves but will be publicly recognised. 22. The altered frame of mind manifested in destruction of idols. Covering . . ornament] RV 'overlaying . . plating.'

23-26. treat of the corresponding change in nature which shall mark the ideal future (4²). 24. Clean] 'sulted.' Even the cattle shall not lack carefully prepared and seasoned provender. 25. Slaughter] i.e. of the Assyrians.

Towers] siege-towers. 26. Breach] RV 'hurt.'

27. Reverts to the more immediate future, the judgment on the Assyrians which is preparatory to the great future. The name] practically equivalent to 'the manifestation.'

And . . heavy] RV 'and in thick rising smoke,' smoke being a symbol of anger. 28. With . . vanity] i.e. the sifting will reduce them to nothingness. 29. Ye] i.e. God's own people.

Mighty One] RV 'Rock' implies that Jehovah is the strength of His people. 30. Voice] the thunder. Jehovah's wrath is figured as a storm. Scattering] RV 'a blast.'

31. Beaten down] RV 'broken in pieces.' Which smote] see 10²⁴. 32. And . . pass] RM 'And every stroke of doom.' With tabrets, etc.] i.e. with songs of exultation on the part of God's people. With it] RV 'with them.'

33. The destruction of the Assyrian set forth under the image of a funeral pyre. Tophet] 'a Tophet,' i.e. a place of burning. The name was given to the valley of Hinnom, where, previous to Hezekiah's accession, sacrifices were offered by fire (2 K 16⁸). The breath, etc.] It is here indicated as elsewhere (cp. 31⁸) that the destruction of the Assyrians shall not be brought about by human agency.

CHAPTER 31

1-5. Judah should trust not in Egypt, but in Jehovah. 6-9. The wonderful deliverance from the Assyrian.

1. See 30¹⁶. 2. Somewhat sarcastic: Jehovah is wise, as well as the politicians of Judah. Evil] i.e. calamity. 5. Flying] i.e. hovering over the nest to protect it. Passing over] an allusion to the Passover, the same word being used.

6. The children, etc.] RV 'ye have deeply revolted, O children of Israel.' 8. The Assyrian's fall will be brought about by no human agency. For the fulfilment see 37³⁶. Be discomfited] RV 'become tributary.' 9. And he shall, etc.] RV 'and his rock' (i.e. strength) 'shall pass away by reason of terror.' Ensign] the word denotes a standard, or signal, forming the rallying point of an army. In this context the signal is for the gathering of the foes of the Assyrian. Whose fire] see 10^{16, 17}. The presence of Jehovah is as a consuming fire to His enemies.

CHAPTER 32

1-8. Characteristics of the future age. 9-14. A warning of coming desolation to the over-confident people. 15-20. Afterwards shall be a peaceful and prosperous future.

1. The ideal future. 2. Men will defend and protect their inferiors instead of oppressing them. 3. Cp. 29¹⁸. 5f. Moral confusion shall cease; men shall be taken at their true value, their character being clearly seen in their actions. 6. Hypocrisy] RV 'profundeness.'

8. By . . stand] RV 'in liberal things shall he continue.'

9-14. Cp. 316-38. 10. Many . . years] RM 'Days above a year,' i.e. in little more than a year. 12. Lament . . teats] RV 'smite upon the breasts,' a gesture of despairing lamentation over the desolated vineyards. 14. Multitude . . city] RV 'populous city.'

15. A limit is set to the desolation. A bright future is in store, when the outward transformation of the country will correspond with the moral reformation (v. 16). This change alike in man and in nature is attributed to an outpouring of the divine and life-giving spirit. 19. When] RV 'but': a judgment is to precede the time of peace just described.

Coming, etc.] RV 'in the downfall of the forest,' i.e. of the Assyrian. The city] Jerusalem too must be humbled. 20. Refers to the bright future again, when the land shortly to be desolate (vv. 13, 14) shall be fully cultivated. Beside all waters] for the land will be everywhere irrigated (30²⁵).

CHAPTER 33

1-12. The deliverance of Jerusalem from the invader. 13-24. The consequences of the interposition of Jehovah for those that dwell in the city.

1. The Assyrian is addressed. That spoilest, etc.] may mean, (1) that the Assyrian attacked Judah without provocation, or (2) that he has so far spoiled other nations unchecked.

2. Their arm] viz. Jerusalem's defenders'.

3. Disaster overtakes the enemy. People . . nations] refer to the various races subject to Sennacherib and serving in his army.

4. As . . upon them] RV 'as locusts leap shall they leap upon it': the people of Jerusalem seizing the spoil compared to insects devastating the fields.

6. Thy times . . his treasure] The pronoun in each clause refers to the people of Judah. In the last clause there may be an implied rebuke of the tendency of Hezekiah to trust in his material treasure (cp. 39², etc.).

7. Ambassadors of peace] i.e. sent to obtain peace. The reference is to Hezekiah's ineffectual embassy to Sennacherib at Lachish (2 K 18¹⁴⁻¹⁶). 8, 9. describe the country ravaged by the invader. Broken the covenant] cp. 2 K 18¹⁴. 11, 12. set forth figuratively the destruction of the Assyrian army.

14. Jehovah's interposition strikes terror to the unworthy in Zion. Fire . . burnings] i.e. God, who is a consuming fire (30³³ 31⁹).

15, 16. The righteous finds in the manifestation of Jehovah his protection. 17. The king] i.e. the reigning king of Judah, Hezekiah. In his beauty] no longer in sackcloth (37¹). The land . . off] RV 'a far-stretching land,' no longer hemmed in by foes.

18. Meditate] i.e. muse upon it as something past. Where . . receiver] RV 'where is he that counted, where is he that weighed?' The Assyrian officials before whom the people had to appear with their tribute will be no more.

19. The common language of Syria and Assyria was Aramaic, which, though a Semitic tongue, was unintelligible to the ordinary Hebrew-speaking Israelite: cp. 28¹¹ 36¹¹.

20. Zion likened to a tent which nothing can root up. 21. The image is changed to that of a city encircled by a protecting stream: cp. Ps 46¹ Nah 3⁸. 23. Reverts to the present. Zion is like a shattered ship. Nevertheless the spoil from her foes will be so great that even cripples take their share.

CHAPTERS 34, 35

SENTENCE ON THE NATIONS. BLESSINGS

IN STORE FOR GOD'S PEOPLE

These chs. are now generally considered non-Isaianic and referred to the period of the exile, on two grounds: (a) the literary style is unlike Isaiah's. (b) The strong feeling against Edom points to a date subsequent to the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, when the Edomites exulted in the city's fall and sided against the Jews, conduct which provoked bitter resentment (Obad vv. 10-16 Lam 4^{21, 22} Ps 137⁷).

C. 34. 1-4. The judgment upon the nations, 5-17. and upon Edom in particular.

C. 35. The blessings in store for God's redeemed people.

CHAPTER 34

4. Cp. 13¹⁰. 5. Shall be bathed] RV 'hath drunk its fill.' Idumea] RV 'Edom.'

6. Bozrah] a strongly fortified city of Edom (63¹ Am 1¹² Jer 49¹³). See the same imagery Jer 46¹⁰. The men slain by divine vengeance are compared to beasts offered in sacrifice.

7. Unicorns] RV 'wild-oxen.' Come down] i.e. to the shambles. 8. Controversy] 'quarrel.' The calamity of Edom is a punishment from Jehovah for its hostility to Zion.

9, 10. Imagery suggested by the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah (Jer 49¹⁸), and by the volcanic character of the land of Edom.

11-15. A graphic picture of a desolate land haunted by wild and uncanny creatures.

11. Cormorant . . bittern] RV 'pelican . . porcupine.' Stones] RV 'plummet,' implying that the work of destruction will be as thorough as that of building generally is. Confusion . . emptiness] The words are those of Gn 1², and suggest a return to primeval chaos.

13. Dragons . . owls] RV 'jackals . . ostriches': cp. 13^{21, 22}. 14. Wild . . islands] RV 'wolves' (13²²). Satyr] see on 13²¹. Screech owl] Heb. Lilith, the name of a night-demon or vampire; RV 'night-monster.' 15. Great owl] RV 'arrowsnake.' 16. Seek, etc.] An invitation to future generations to compare the event with the prediction, and note its precise fulfilment. Fail] RV 'be missing.'

17. God, who assigns to nations their territories (Ac 17²⁶), has allotted Edom to the desert creatures for ever.

CHAPTER 35

1. While Edom becomes a desert, for God's people, on the other hand, the desert places burst into bloom, the fairest parts of Palestine sharing their fertile beauty with the waste places (v. 2).

7. Parched ground] RM 'mirage': this which so often deceives travellers in the desert will become a real lake.

Dragons] RV 'jackals.' 8. An highway] by which the exiles may return through the desert. 9. Cp. 51¹¹.

CHAPTERS 36, 37

THE INVASION OF SENNACHERIB

An account of Sennacherib's invasion of Judah (701 B.C.) and its sudden termination. The narrative is closely parallel to that of 2K 18¹³-19³⁷ (where see notes), from which it was probably taken, and added to this book by a compiler because of its bearing on the prophetic activity of Isaiah.

C. 36. 1-3. The mission of the Rabshakeh from Sennacherib to Jerusalem. 4-10. The Rabshakeh's first speech—the folly of resistance, relying either upon Egypt, or upon Jehovah. 11-20. The Rabshakeh's second speech—the fall of Jerusalem certain, favourable terms offered in case of surrender. 21, 22. The Rabshakeh's words are reported to Hezekiah.

C. 37. 1-7. Hezekiah sends a deputation to Isaiah, who in reply foretells the retreat of the enemy. 8-13. Sennacherib's second embassy to Jerusalem—trust in Jehovah will not avail to save the city. 14-20. Hezekiah's prayer to Jehovah to vindicate Himself. 21-35. The answer through Isaiah—the Assyrian is Jehovah's instrument, under His control, and shall be turned back from Jerusalem. 36-38. The fulfilment of Isaiah's words.

CHAPTER 36

1. In the fourteenth year] The chronology is difficult. From 38¹ 39¹ we might conclude that Hezekiah's sickness and the Babylonian embassy followed Sennacherib's invasion, whereas chs. 38 and 39 chronologically must precede chs. 36, 37. Samaria fell in 722, Hezekiah's 6th year (2K 18¹⁰); Sennacherib's invasion of Judah was in 701, which would therefore be Hezekiah's 27th year. The date 14th year here given must then be an error. Hezekiah reigned in all 29 years; 15 additional years were promised in his sickness (38⁶), which accordingly must have befallen him in his 14th year. It looks as though the note of time in this v. originally applied to c. 33, where it would be accurate, but has by the compiler been transposed to the commencement of this historical appendix to Isaiah's prophecies.

2. Rabshakeh] is a title, 'the Rabshakeh,' i.e. chief officer, or cupbearer. 6. Broken] RV 'bruised.' Pharaoh] This was Tirhakah, of the Ethiopian dynasty (37⁹). 7. The allusion is to Hezekiah's reformation; the reduction of the number of shrines would seem to a heathen to dishonour the national god.

19. Cp. 10²⁻¹¹.

CHAPTER 37

7. Send . . him] RV 'put a spirit in him.'

22. Virgin] the figure as in 23¹².

24. Sides] RV 'innermost parts.' The height . . Carmel] RV 'his farthest height, the forest of his fruitful field.'

25. Digged] Deserts cannot impede his march, for he digs wells there. Have I dried, etc.] RV 'will I dry up all the rivers of Egypt: the Assyrian boasts that he will pass on to conquer Egypt. 26. Jehovah is here the speaker. Done . . formed it] Referring to the ordering of events in the divine providence.

That thou, etc.] The Assyrian is Jehovah's instrument. 28. Abode] RV 'sitting down.'

29. My hook] Assyrian sculptures represent both captives and beasts as led in this way. Jehovah will treat the Assyrian as His captive, or as a beast which must be tamed and restrained.

30. A sign given to the people of Judah that the Assyrian shall not return. This year, the year of the invasion, since the harvest has been destroyed they must eat the aftergrowth. Since they have not been able to sow this year, next year they must depend upon what grows of itself, but the year after they will be able to sow and reap freely, for the land will be free from enemies.

33-35. Another short utterance repeating the promise of deliverance. 36. The striking fulfilment of Isaiah's words. The angel] The expression points to pestilence as the instrument of the Assyrians' overthrow (1 Ch 21^{11, 12} Ps 78^{49, 50}). 38. The death of Sennacherib took place in 681 B.C., so that it did not immediately follow the discomfiture of his army.

With the sword] in fulfilment of Isaiah's words (v. 7).

CHAPTER 38

SICKNESS AND RECOVERY OF HEZEKIAH

Continuation of the historical appendix to Isaiah's prophecies. The c. is parallel to 2K 20¹⁻¹¹ (where see notes), but contains a considerable addition in the shape of Hezekiah's song of thanksgiving upon his recovery. Chronologically this c. precedes 36 and 37: see on 36¹.

1-8. To Hezekiah in his sickness Isaiah promises 15 more years of life, and confirms the promise by a sign. 9-20. Hezekiah's song of thanksgiving. 21, 22. The remedy for the king's disease was suggested by Isaiah, and the sign was given at the king's request.

1. Thus saith, etc.] The passage affords a striking illustration of the conditional nature of prophetic utterance, for at Hezekiah's intercession the sentence was revoked. 5. Fifteen years] Hezekiah's sickness therefore befell him in his 14th year (714): see on 36¹. Though some long time before Sennacherib's great invasion, danger was already apprehended from Assyria (v. 6). 8. The account in 2K 20⁸⁻¹¹ is fuller. Degrees . . sun dial] RV 'steps . . steps.' Some kind of clock is evidently indicated, probably a pillar standing upon steps and casting a shadow in such a way that a particular portion of time was represented by a step.

10. Cutting off] RV 'noontide.' 11. See the LORD] Hezekiah is probably thinking of the Temple worship. The v. illustrates the gloomy conception of the Hebrews as to the state of man after death: cp. v. 18. 12. Cut off] RV 'rolled up.' With pining sickness] RV 'from the loom.' From day . . night] i.e. in one day. The words refer to the swiftness with which the end comes, not to prolongation of suffering. 13. I reckoned . . lion] RV 'I quieted myself until morning; as a lion,' etc.

14. Mourn] i.e. moan, referring to the sound made by the dove. Undertake for me] RV 'be thou my surety': Gn 43⁹ 44³².

15. Softly] RM 'as in solemn procession' (Ps 42⁴). In] RV 'because of.' 16. By these things] i.e. the word of God and the action of His providence. The reference is to the first part of v. 15: cp. Dt 8³ Mt 4⁴. So wilt thou] RV 'wherefore.' 17. Behold . . bitterness] RV 'Behold it was for my peace that I had,' etc. He sees on looking back that the chastisement had been for his good. My sins] God's favour in restoration to health is viewed as a sign of forgiveness.

CHAPTER 39

ALLIANCE WITH BABYLON DENOUNCED

Conclusion of the historical appendix. The c. belongs to the period when Merodach-Baladan of Babylon was making efforts to bring the various peoples of W. Asia into alliance against the common enemy, the king of Assyria (at this time Sargon, 701). The arrangement of such alliance with Hezekiah was, doubtless, the object of the embassy, and this explains Hezekiah's gladness and exhibition of his resources (v. 2). Congratulation to the king of Judah on his recovery, and enquiry into the astronomical marvel at Jerusalem (38⁸) formed pretexts for the embassy (v. 1; 2K 20¹² 2Ch 32³¹).

1, 2. The embassy from Babylon. 3-8. Isaiah rebukes the king and foretells captivity in Babylon.

5f. Isaiah consistently opposes reliance upon a human ally in place of trust in Jehovah. 6, 7. A remarkable prophecy of captivity in Babylon, though the Assyrians were the foe which at this time threatened Judah.

7. Thy sons] fulfilled in the captivity of Manasseh (2K 21³³), and later in the fate of Jehoiachin (2K 25²⁷). 8. Truth] i.e. stability (Jer 14¹³).

With words of pious resignation Hezekiah acquiesces in the will of Jehovah (cp. 1S 3¹⁹), then in the words that follow—For there shall be peace, etc.—he expresses his thankfulness that the punishment has been postponed. The prediction of the captivity of the royal house must have been a great blow to Hezekiah, especially so since the Hebrews firmly held the principle of the solidarity of the forefather and his posterity. The postponement of the blow was a divine mercy and token of God's favour, for which Hezekiah did well to be thankful. It is quite unnecessary to read a tone of selfishness into his utterance; on the contrary, his spirit at this time seemed rather to have been one of humble contrition (2Ch 32²⁶).

CHAPTERS 40-66

ISRAEL'S RESTORATION FROM EXILE IN BABYLON

On the authorship and date of these chs. see Intro. According to their subject matter, they fall naturally into three divisions of almost equal length (chs. 40-48, 49-57, and 58-66), the close of each division being marked by an intimation that the wicked shall not share in the blessings promised to God's people.

§ 1. CHAPTERS 40-48

The hope of return is grounded by the prophet upon the fact that Jehovah is the only God, the Creator and Ruler of all things, the Disposer of the fate of nations, who guides the course of history according to His will. The tone of this section is argumentative, the respective claims of Jehovah and of the heathen gods being discussed as in a court of justice. The object of the argument is to encourage the Jews in their exile by showing that, since Jehovah is thus supreme, no obstacles will be able to interfere with the restoration to their own land which He has promised. With fine irony the prophet exhibits the infatuation of idol-makers and idol-worshippers; proving that, while the idols are senseless blocks and less than nothing (40¹⁷), Jehovah is Lord of the world and controls all things. The Israelites can testify to His power, because through His prophets He has told them of things before they came to pass. Jehovah is, therefore, set forth as the deliverer of His people. But in the carrying out of His purposes He employs agents: (a) Cyrus, who is commissioned as His shepherd (41²⁸), His anointed (45¹), to perform all His pleasure in the overthrow of Babylon and deliverance of the Israelites from their exile; (b) the nation of Israel, which has its own work to do in the furthering of Jehovah's purposes. The title 'servant of Jehovah,' hitherto applied to individuals, is in these chs. (41⁸ 44^{1,2,21} 48²⁰) applied to the nation in its corporate capacity: perhaps also, though less directly, to the faithful Jews within the nation (42^{1-7,18} 43^{8,10}) on whom would devolve the fulfilment of God's will. The name implies, in the first place, the fact of the nation's election by Jehovah (48^{8,9}), and further the truth that Israel has a mission in the world, viz. to bring the knowledge of true religion to the Gentiles, and be a means of universal blessing (42^{1,4}).

CHAPTER 40

THE PROCLAMATION OF DELIVERANCE

1, 2. The theme of the prophecies following: the period of Zion's trouble and affliction is over. 3-26. Celestial voices give the message of restoration to God's people, who are encouraged by the thought of His infinite power. 27-31. Trust in Jehovah is, therefore, the source of true strength.

2. Warfare] RM 'time of service,' i.e. enforced service and hardship: cp. Job 7¹. Double] i.e. double (ample) penalty (Jer 17¹⁸), in the sufferings of the exile.

3-5. A first voice enjoins preparation for the progress of the great King, who will bring back His people from exile. 3. Crieth, etc.] RV 'crieth, Prepare ye in the wilderness.' The passage was understood by the Baptist as prophetic of his own mission (Jn 1²³), and is so taken by the Evangelists (Mt 3³ and parallels).

4. This imagery is from the practice of Eastern monarchs, who thus made roads for the passage of their armies. 5. Shall see] shall see Jehovah's glorious deeds for His people, and acknowledge Him.

6-8. The message of the second voice. Human things must decay: Israel's oppressors are mortal, but Jehovah's promise is sure. 6. He said] i.e. the prophet himself; then in the words following, in reply to his question, a message is put into his mouth. 7. Spirit] RV 'breath,' or wind.

9-11. The third voice—the good tidings brought to Zion that Jehovah is approaching in triumph, bringing back His people. 9. Read, 'O thou that tellest good tidings to Zion . . . O thou that tellest good tidings to Jerusalem.' 'Thou that tellest' is fem. in Heb. The prophet in spirit sees a maiden, or a company of women

(Ps 68¹¹), bringing the news. 10. His reward, etc.] The figure is that of a conqueror bringing the spoils of war. His work] RV 'recompense,' his redeemed people regarded as the prize of war. 11. The v. indicates in a figure the tender care with which God will support His people on their journey home. Are with young] RV 'give suck.'

12-26. The prophet's object is to show the power of Jehovah to deliver the people from captivity. He emphasises two thoughts: (a) the wonderful order and proportion in the universe show His infinite power and wisdom (vv. 12-17), and (b) no representation can be made of Him. How futile are the idols that men make! (vv. 18-20).

20. RV 'He that is too impoverished for such an oblation,' etc. 24. Shall not] read the tenses as past (RV). The v. expresses the transitory character of earthly powers in the sight of Jehovah. 26. Faileth] is missing.

27. The foregoing argument is addressed to a people who had suffered so long, that they thought God had forgotten them, and were despondent.

CHAPTER 41

CYRUS GOD'S AGENT

1-7. Jehovah and the gods of the heathen compared as in a court of judgment. Jehovah has raised up Cyrus and given him victory, in order to carry out His good purposes, while the heathen gods are powerless to affect the course of events. 8-20. A digression: the events which bring terror to the nations bring deliverance to Israel. 21-29. Comparison of Jehovah with the gods of the heathen continued.

1. The heathen nations lately conquered by Cyrus are called to plead their case as in a law-court.

2-4. The evidence produced on Jehovah's side. It is He who has called Cyrus to his career of conquest in fulfilment of His own purpose. 2. Who raised up, etc.] RV 'Who hath raised up one from the east, whom he calleth in righteousness to his foot,' i.e. to accompany Him. The one thus raised up is Cyrus: cp. 44²⁸ 46¹¹. He is called in righteousness by Jehovah, i.e. in fidelity to His covenant promises, which are to be realised through Cyrus. See the same thought, 42⁶ 45¹³.

5-7. The heathen, alarmed by Cyrus's successes, make alliances for mutual support, and attempt to avert disaster by manufacturing or repairing idols. 7. Saying, etc.] RV 'saying of the soldering, It is good.'

8-10. Israel, on the other hand, descended from the patriarchs, God's chosen people, need have no fear.

8. Servant] with a special mission, as will hereafter appear. But here the emphasis is on what God does for Israel, not on what Israel does for God. Friend] cp. 2Ch 20⁷ Jas 2²⁸. 'The friend of God' is still the usual title of Abraham in the East. 9. Chief men] RV 'corners.' 10. My righteousness] i.e. faithfulness to My purpose as declared in My promises (see v. 2). 11-14. It is impossible that the servant thus chosen and honoured can be cast off (oppressed for ever).

15-16. With Jehovah's aid Israel shall become terrible to its foes.

17-20. Jehovah will make easy their return through the desert, exchanging their misery and need for plenty and happiness, that man may acknowledge Him. 18. High places] RV 'bare heights.' 19. Shittah] RV 'acacia.'

21. The v. reverts to the scene of the court of judgment (v. 1). 22, 23. A challenge to heathen gods to foretell the future, to do something or other to show that they exist.

24. The case is summed up against them.

25. Jehovah, on the other hand, has shown His power by raising up Cyrus. The north . . . the rising of the sun] referring to the Medo-Persian empire. Princes] i.e. of Babylon, who hold Israel in bondage. 26, 27. While the heathen oracles have been dumb, Jehovah has promised restoration to Zion. 26. He is righteous] i.e. has been proved right by the fulfilment of His prophecy. 27. RV 'I first will say unto Zion,' etc. Behold them] the returning exiles. 28, 29. No reply is possible on the part of the heathen; their gods are nought.

CHAPTER 42

THE IDEAL SERVANT

1-9. The characteristics and functions of Israel as the ideal Servant of Jehovah. 10-17. A song of praise to Jehovah. 18-25. The deficiencies of the actual Israel, considered as Jehovah's Servant.

1. My servant] On the conception of these chs. see Intro. Judgment] or 'right.' The Servant's office is to teach the world true religion. 2, 3. He will not be ostentatious nor unduly severe. How Christ corresponded to the ideal is noted in Mt 12¹⁷⁻²¹. 3. Smoking flax] RM 'dimly-burning wick.' Unto truth] RV 'in truth.'

4. The v. implies that the Servant's work will be attended with difficulty, which he will face and overcome. Set judgment] established true religion.

6. Two purposes of the Servant's call indicated, (a) to be the embodiment of a new covenant with Israel (the people), (b) to be the instrument of a revelation to the Gentiles.

In righteousness] i.e. in faithfulness to My purpose as declared in My promises (41^{2,10} 45¹⁸). 7. The thought of enlightenment continued, the imagery being suggested by the condition of the Jews in exile. 8, 9. A return to the thought of Jehovah's superiority to heathen gods. He shows His control of events by foretelling them. 11. Kedar] the tribes of Arabia. The rock] RV 'Sela,' the rock-city of Edom.

13-17. The vv. refer to the coming deliverance: in vv. 14f. the speaker is Jehovah.

13. Jealousy] on behalf of His people: cp. 9⁷. 14. Holden my peace] leaving prayers unanswered (Ps 28¹ Hab 1¹⁵). Refrained myself] not interposing by miracles or mighty acts. During the period of the exile there had been no divine interposition on behalf of Israel. Destroy and devour] RV 'gasp and pant.' 15, 16. The difficulties in the way of the returning exiles will disappear.

18-20. Israel, though called to be Jehovah's Servant, cannot comprehend His message given through the prophet. Note the contrast to the ideal Servant (vv. 1-4), which suggests that, in the end, the Servant will be an Israel within Israel. 19. Perfect] RV 'at peace with me.' 20. Opening the ears] RV 'his ears are open.' 21. RV 'It pleased the LORD, for his righteousness' sake, to magnify,' etc. In accordance with His purpose, Jehovah had sent prophetic teachers: their teaching had been great and glorious, both in itself and in its fulfilment. The law] RM 'the teaching,' given through His prophets. Jehovah, on His part, graciously taught His people, but their insensibility (vv. 18-20) has brought them to their present condition of misery and exile (vv. 22-25). 23. Who among you, etc.] i.e. who will learn the lesson of the past?

CHAPTER 43

THE MISSION OF ISRAEL

1-21. The dispersed Israelites shall be ransomed and restored. They are witnesses before the world that Jehovah is the true God. A second and more wonderful exodus is in store for Israel. 22-28. This deliverance is not a return for service rendered to God, but a free gift.

1. But now] In contrast to the wrath poured upon Israel (42^{21,23}) God will manifest His redeeming love. 3. Egypt, etc.] The meaning is that these nations shall take the place of Israel as vassals. Jehovah is willing to give the richest lands as ransom for His people.

4. Thou hast been] RV 'and hast been.' People] RV 'peoples.' 5, 6. Every nation where Israelites were dispersed must restore them to their home.

8. Blind, etc.] see 42¹⁸. 9f. Another judgment scene, similar to 41²¹. 9. The heathen are challenged to bring witnesses on behalf of their gods, that they can foretell the future.

10-13. The Israelites themselves are Jehovah's witnesses, proving in their experience that He alone is the Eternal, the Almighty, who can save and foretell the future.

14. Babylon] Here for the first time the place of exile is named. Have . . nobles] RV 'will bring down all of them as fugitives, even the Chaldeans.' Whose cry, etc.] RV 'in the ships of their rejoicing.' Babylonia was famous for its shipping; ships belonging to it and other cities on the Persian Gulf are referred to in the earliest Babylonian legends.

16, 17. The imagery for this second exodus is borrowed from the exodus from Egypt.

18, 19. The mighty works of the past shall be forgotten, in view of a still greater deliverance: cp. Jer 23^{7,8}. 20. Dragons . . owls] RV 'jackals . . ostriches.'

22-24. Israel's service has not been such as to deserve Jehovah's interposition. 23. Small cattle] Heb. 'lambs or kids' (mg.). I have not caused, etc.] i.e. I have not laid too heavy burdens on you. 24. Sweet cane] from which anointing oil was prepared (Ex 30²³). Thou hast made me to serve, etc.] i.e. I have had to endure.

26. An invitation to produce any argument in defence of their conduct. 27, 28. Nothing can be urged; they have sinned from the beginning of their national existence; hence the calamity of the exile, which has made them an object of scorn to the world. 27. First father] Jacob: cp. v. 28. 28. Profaned, etc.] i.e. treated the chief priests (cp. 1 Ch 24⁵) as though they were ordinary unconsecrated men. During the exile their priestly functions were in abeyance.

CHAPTER 44

THE IMPOTENCE OF IDOLS

1-23. The reproach of God's people shall be entirely removed. Jehovah the Eternal, who rules the events of history, contrasted with the futile gods of the heathen. 24-28. This great Jehovah pledges the restoration of His people through Cyrus.

2. Jesurun] i.e. 'upright,' a symbolic name of Israel (Dt 32¹⁵), indicating its ideal character. Fear not] i.e. on account of past failure and apparent inability to realise the future which God sets before you. 3. Cp. 43²⁰.

5. The meaning is that the nations of the world will count it an honour to associate themselves with Israel and be reckoned as the Lord's people. Subscribe, etc.] i.e. sign himself as the Lord's. Surname himself] as with a title of honour.

6. Cp. 43^{11,13}. His redeemer] i.e. the deliverer of Israel. 7. A challenge to others to foretell the future, as Jehovah does by His prophet (41²²). RM 'And who, as I, can proclaim? let him declare it,' etc. 8. From that time] RV 'of old.' My witnesses] see 43^{10,12}. No God] RV 'no Rock.' Rock, as a title of God (cp. 17¹⁰ Dt 32^{4,15,18}), expresses the permanent strength and protection He affords.

8-20. The folly of idolaters exposed.

9. They are their own, etc.] RV 'their own witnesses see not,' i.e. the witnesses on behalf of the idols (the heathen), as opposed to Jehovah's witnesses (the Jews), v. 8. 11. All his fellows] RM 'all that join themselves thereto.' They are of men] i.e. of human origin, and, therefore, cannot make God. Read, 'The smith sharpeneth a tool and worketh,' etc. (RM). 12. Description of the making of a metal idol. The maker is frail man.

13, etc. Description of the making of a wooden idol. A line] RV 'a pencil.' Fitteth] RV 'shapeth.' 14. The v. describes the choosing of the wood, and the planting of the tree, for making an idol. Cypress . . ash] RV 'holm tree . . fir.' Strengtheneth] i.e. carefully tends its growth, or chooses, selects. 15-17. The uses to which the tree is put. Part is used for human purposes, part to make a god.

18-20. Idolaters are so infatuated that they do not see the contradiction involved in such conduct.

21-23. A contrast. Jehovah will show His power and graciousness in the deliverance of His people. 22. A cloud] which soon disperses. 24. He is supreme over all things.

By myself] RV 'who is with me?' implying that Jehovah alone does these things. 25. He frustrates false prophets, but pledges Himself to fulfil the predictions of His own prophets as to the restoration of Jerusalem (vv. 26-28).

26. Servant] here a synonym for 'prophet': cp. 20³. Messengers] the prophets generally.

27. The allusion is to the drying up (a) of the waters which would impede the returning exiles, or (b) of the waters which protected Babylon (Jer 50³⁵ 51³⁰). Cyrus in fact, entered Babylon by diverting the Euphrates from its usual channel and marching by the river bed.

28. As the Assyrian was Jehovah's appointed instrument for the chastisement of His people (10⁵⁴), so Cyrus is singled out as His instrument for their restoration. Even saying, etc.] literally fulfilled in the decree of Cyrus (Ezr 1¹⁴ 2 Ch 36^{22,23}).

CHAPTER 45

THE MEANING OF THE CONQUESTS OF CYRUS

1-13. The conquests of Cyrus are ordained by Jehovah for His purposes. Let not Israel criticise the manner of its deliverance. 14-17. Great honour awaits Israel. 18-25. All the world shall recognise Jehovah's righteousness and power.

1. His anointed] as being consecrated to carry out the purposes of Jehovah, i.e. to release Israel from Babylon. This is the only place where a non-Israelite king is so entitled. Somewhat similarly Nebuchadnezzar is called Jehovah's servant (Jer 27⁶ 43¹⁰).

Whose right hand I have holden] cp. 41¹³.

Loose the loins] lit. 'ungird,' i.e. disarm.

The two leaved gates] i.e. of the cities which Cyrus attacks.

2. Crooked . . straight] RV 'rugged . . plain.'

3. Treasures] referring primarily to the vast wealth of Babylon: cp. Jer 51¹³. Cyrus also captured Sardis with the riches of Croesus (Herod. I, 84). 4. Surnamed] i.e. given an honourable title, referring to 'Anointed' (v. 1), or to 'shepherd' (44²⁸). 5. Though thou hast] better, 'when thou didst not know me,' i.e. before thy birth: cp. 49¹. Or it may mean, before thou didst acknowledge me: cp. Ezr 1^{1,2}. 7. Evil] not moral evil, but misfortune or calamity, the opposite of peace.

8. Righteousness] i.e. fidelity to promises: so also v. 13.

9f. A possible objection is now met from Israelites dissatisfied, either with the nationality of the deliverer (a Gentile instead of a prince of the House of David), or with the tardy approach of the deliverance. Let . . potsherd] RV 'a potsherd among the potsherds of the earth!'

11. Ask, etc.] Read as interrogative, 'Will ye ask . . will ye command me?' 13. Him] i.e. Cyrus. Will Israel venture to dictate to Jehovah what He shall ordain for His people?

14. The nations shall come to acknowledge the God of Israel. 15. An exclamation of wonder on the prophet's part at the unsearchable ways of God. Some have understood the words as an expression of the wondering adoration of the nations. Hidest] refers to the period of the exile, when Jehovah seemed not to hear the prayers of His people nor to help them. 19. Not . . in secret] Jehovah had plainly foretold the future, so that men might compare the prophecy with the event. I said not . . Seek ye me in vain] Israel's hopes will not be disappointed.

21. A challenge to the idolaters, Jehovah is the only God who can fulfil His prophecies; therefore shall all the nations acknowledge Him (vv. 22, 23). 23. The religion of Israel is to become the religion of the whole world. This anticipation finds its fulfilment in the Christian dispensation, and thus St. Paul applies the latter part of the v. to Christ in Phil 2^{10,11}. 24. Read, 'Only in the Lord, shall one say unto me, is righteousness and strength.'

25. Be justified] lit. 'be righteous.'

CHAPTER 46

THE CONTRAST BETWEEN JEHOVAH AND THE DEITIES OF BABYLON

1, 2. The idols of Babylon will be borne away by the conquerors amongst the spoil, the gods being powerless to save their images.

1. Bel] the chief Babylonian deity (Jer 50²).

Boweth . . stoopeth] before the conqueror.

Nebo] son of Bel, the Babylonian Mercury. The name means 'revealer.' Your carriages, etc.] RV 'the things that ye carried about in processions are made a load,' of spoil for the conquerors: see on 10²³. 3, 4. So far from being thus ignominiously carried about, Jehovah, on the other hand, carries His people.

5-7. The argument against idolatry renewed (40^{18f.} 44^{9f.}).

8f. These vv. are addressed to those amongst the Jews who were inclined to object to God's manner of deliverance (cp. 45⁹); they are bidden to remember the things He has done for His people in the past (v. 9), and how He has shown by prophecy that He orders events according to His purpose (v. 10); they may accordingly rely on the fulfilment of the prophecies concerning Cyrus (v. 11). 11. A ravenous bird] i.e. Cyrus. The conqueror is compared to a bird of prey as in Jer 49²² Ezk 17³. The image is the more appropriate, because the standard of Cyrus was a golden eagle. 12. Stouthearted] i.e. stubborn.

CHAPTER 47

AN ODE ON THE HUMILIATION OF BABYLON

1-15. The coming calamity. The reason of Babylon's fall. Her helplessness to avert it.

2. Grind] i.e. as a slave (Ex 11⁵).

Uncover, etc.] RV 'remove thy veil, strip off the train, uncover the leg.' The overthrow of the city is set forth under the figure of a maiden carried away into slavery. Pass over] on the way to exile. 3. Will not meet, etc.] RV 'will accept no man,' i.e. none shall be spared.

6. Babylon is to be thus punished because, when the Jewish exiles were in her power, she had treated them cruelly (Zech 1¹⁵), and in her false security she acted as though irresponsible (vv. 7, 8). Polluted] i.e. treated as common, RV 'profaned.' 9. Perfection for] 'full measure in spite of.' Sorceries] Babylon was renowned in the ancient world for astrology, and for the practice of all kinds of magic.

11. From whence it riseth] RM 'how to charm it away.' 12. Stand . . with] i.e. persist in. 13. See on v. 9. 14. There shall not be] 'it shall not be,' i.e. it will not be like a fire on the hearth, but a devouring conflagration.

CHAPTER 48

LET THE EXILES TRUST IN JEHOVAH, AND COME OUT OF BABYLON

1-11. Jehovah's purpose will be executed, but not for Israel's merit. 12-22 Let Israel recognise His leading in the course of history, and learn to obey Him.

1. The prophet here addresses those whose professions of allegiance to Jehovah are hollow (46⁸), and who in the land of exile had in their hearts apostatised: cp. 42¹⁷. Come . . waters] i.e. are descended from Judah (Ps 68²⁶).

3-5. Events of their history had been foretold by Jehovah long before they happened, lest in their perversity they should attribute them to their false gods.

6-8. But now the things Jehovah purposes are declared on the eve of the event, lest in their presumption they should say that they knew them before.

6. I have shewed] RM 'I shew.' 7. Before, etc.] RV 'and before this day thou heardest them not.' 8. Yea, from, etc.] RV 'yea, from of old thine ear,' etc. 10. Read, 'not as silver' (RV). So severe a refining (Ps 12⁶) would have meant the destruction of Israel. Chosen] RM 'tried.' 11. Do it] i.e. execute My purpose.

13. Spanned] RV 'stretched out.' 14. A challenge to the heathen, as in 43⁹. 14, 15. Loved him . . called him] i.e. Cyrus: cp. 44²⁸ 45¹.

16. Jehovah, unlike the idols (v. 14), declared the future unambiguously. And now] i.e. now that the crisis is at hand the LORD has sent His prophet with the message of deliverance.

18, 19. Hadst hearkened . . had been as] This is the literal rendering, but the passage may be a promise for the future, 'O that thou wouldst hearken . . shall be.' 19. Thy seed, etc.] Old promises would have been realised (Gn 22¹⁷).

20. The exiles are bidden to prepare to leave Babylon. 21. The imagery is from the former exodus from Egypt. 22. Those who are unfaithful cannot share the promised peace. The words are repeated almost exactly at 57²¹.

§ 2. CHAPTERS 49-57

This section is not so argumentative in tone as the last. Its distinguishing feature is the development of the prophet's teaching concerning the Servant of Jehovah. The conception seems to arise, as has been noted, with the nation considered collectively as a Servant of God (41^{8,9} 44^{1,2,21} 45¹). So long as the attitude and work of God in relation to the nation are solely in view, there is no limitation of the idea; but when the nation's work and attitude to Him and the fulfilment of His purposes come to be considered, the Servant of God seems to take on a narrower sense. The actual Israel, with its many shortcomings—its blindness to the truth, its deafness to God's message—gives way to those more select souls—a part only of the people—through whom the duties and destiny of the nation will be fulfilled. At the same time, it is clear that the idea passes on to an individual distinct from the nation (49^{5,6}), in whom are concentrated all the attributes of the ideal nation, and who shall realise all that Israel was intended to be. His character and office are thus delineated: (a) He is prepared by Jehovah from the womb for His lifework (49^{1,2}); (b) He is endowed with the Divine Spirit (42¹); (c) He is not ostentatious or unduly severe (42^{2,3}); (d) He is to be the embodiment of a New Covenant between Jehovah and His people (42⁶ 49⁸); (e) and to teach all nations true religion (42^{1,6} 49⁶); (f) but more remarkable of all, and especially characteristic of this division of the book, are the passages which intimate that this great work is only to be accomplished through humiliation, suffering, and death, issuing in a new and glorious life. The first hint that the Servant's work is to be carried on in face of difficulty and discouragement is found in 42⁴. His exposure to insult and contumely in the exercise of His mission is expressly indicated in 50⁶; then follows (52¹³⁻⁵³) a section entirely devoted to the subject, in which the prominent features are the Servant's gentleness and patience under affliction, the vicarious nature of His sufferings, which are not endured on His own account, but for the sins of His people, and the intimation that after pain and death there awaits Him new life full of joy in the contemplation of the success of His work. The correspondence, even in detail, with the Passion of Jesus Christ cannot fail to arrest attention. The way in which the Servant is despised and misunderstood by His contemporaries (53⁸), His patience and silence before His accusers (53⁷), and His association with malefactors in His death (53⁹): these read like a description of what happened in the case of our Lord. How far the prophet understood the meaning of his own words it is difficult to say. No doubt he was thinking at the outset of the faithful core of Israel as being Jehovah's Servant with a great mission to accomplish and the experience of the exile showed him that this great work for the whole world was only to be wrought through contumely and suffering; yet Jehovah sometimes spake 'with a strong hand' (Ezk 3¹⁴), and we can scarcely doubt that the Divine Spirit in these wonderful passages through the prophet foreshadowed the things that should be suffered and accomplished by the perfect Servant of God, the embodiment of Israel's splendid ideal, our Lord Jesus Christ.

CHAPTERS 49, 50

THE SERVANT OF JEHOVAH

C. 49. 1-13. The Servant of Jehovah tells of His call and mission. Jehovah confirms the confidence of His servant. 14-26. Objections arising from little faith answered: (a) it cannot be that Zion is forgotten by Jehovah, as she thought (vv. 14-23); (b) the grasp of the captors is not too strong for Jehovah to release His people (vv. 24-26).

C. 50. 1-11. The people's banishment is not by Jehovah's will, and He is able to deliver them. The Servant of Jehovah declares the conditions of his work. The prophet's comment on the Servant's words.

CHAPTER 49

1. The speaker is the Servant of Jehovah.

From the womb] The thought is that of predestined creation, as in Jer 1⁶ Lk 1¹⁵ Gal 1¹⁵.

2. He is trained and protected by Jehovah.

3. Though here identified with Israel as fulfilling its ideal, the Servant is yet a Person distinct from the nation, or perhaps a personification of the pious core of the nation, who is to be the means of its restoration (v. 6).

4. Though for a moment discouraged, the thought that God will vindicate the right and reward him reassures him. Work] RV 'recompense.' 5. Though... glorious] RV 'and that Israel be gathered unto Him; for I am honourable.' 6. Cp. 42^d. The Servant's mission is not limited to Israel. He is to proclaim a world-wide salvation.

7. A promise to the nation now despised and in bondage that the highest honour is yet in store for it. And he shall choose] RV 'who hath chosen.' 8. To establish, etc.] RV 'to raise up the land, to make them inherit,' fulfilled in the first place in the work of Zerubbabel. Give thee for a covenant, etc.] see 42^d. 9. Cp. 42⁷. High places] RV 'bare heights.' The prisoners] i.e. in Babylon.

10, 11. The journey homeward shall be made easy for them. The language of v. 10 is borrowed in Rev 7^{16,17}. 10. Heat] properly, 'mirage' (35⁷). 12. From all quarters the returning exiles will come. Sinim stands for distant lands generally; in the opinion of most scholars it strictly signifies China.

16. Graven] refers to the custom of tattooing, by which devotees often indicated their consecration to a deity. According to the prophet's bold figure, Jehovah is devoted to Jerusalem, and cannot use His hands without being reminded of her. 17. Children] LXX and Vulgate read, 'builders.'

19. The land of thy destruction] RV 'thy land that hath been destroyed.' 20. The children... other] RV 'the children of thy bereavement,' i.e. the children born in the days (of the exile) when Zion thought herself bereft of all her children.

22. Arms] RV 'bosom.' A particular fulfilment of vv. 22, 23 may be traced in the favour shown by Persian monarchs to Jerusalem after the return from the exile (Ezr 1-4 6¹⁻¹⁵ 7¹¹ Neh 2¹⁻⁹); a higher and spiritual fulfilment in the way in which princes in all lands have shown themselves patrons of the Church.

24. An incredulous question on the part of despised Israelites. Lawful (lit. 'righteous') captive] i.e. captive taken from the righteous, or, adopting a slight emendation, 'captive of the terrible one' (Vulg., Syr., RM). 26. Feed, etc.] a figure expressing the destruction of Zion's enemies by mutual hostility (9²⁰).

CHAPTER 50

1. The children of Zion (49^{20,21}) are addressed. Their servitude is not irrevocable; Jehovah has not formally repudiated Zion (Dt 24¹); nor, though they had to learn by discipline, can any creditors claim His people as slaves (2 K 4¹): cp. Jer 24⁴⁻⁶ Ezk 37.

2, 3. The imagery is from the exodus from Egypt. 2. Wherefore... answer] These clauses emphasise the hopelessness of Israel's case from a human point of view. Only the divine power could effect the deliverance of the exiles.

4. The Servant of Jehovah is here the speaker (as in 49¹). He is taught by Jehovah, receiving the divine message each morning.

To speak, etc.] RV 'to sustain with words him that is weary.' 5, 6. The Servant does not shrink from his mission in spite of the suffering and humiliation involved.

7, 9. Being sustained by the strength of Jehovah, and therefore confident of victory, he is unflinching and challenges his adversaries.

10, 11. Words addressed by the prophet to the Israelites; let the faithful ones amongst the exiles trust in Jehovah (v. 10); as for those who resist Him and arm themselves against His prophets, their weapons shall recoil upon themselves (v. 11). 10. Read, '... servant? he that walketh in darkness and hath no light, let him trust,' etc. (RV).

11. Sparks] RV 'firebrands.'

CHAPTERS 51-52¹²

THE HOPE OF SPEEDY RETURN FOR THE EXILES

C. 51. 1-16. Encouragement from consideration of the past. Jehovah's purpose for His people is sure. Prayer for deliverance (based on the deliverance of the exodus). Jehovah in response reassures His people. 17-23. The divine wrath, which was upon Jerusalem, shall be turned against her oppressors.

C. 52. 1-6. The glorious change in Zion's fortune. 7-12. The deliverance of the exiles imminent.

CHAPTER 51

1, 2. In the past God made Israel a great nation from a single ancestor, and that wonderful growth should be an encouragement to the righteous remnant now to believe in their restoration. 2. Alone] RV 'when he was but one,' i.e. childless.

4. A law, etc.] through Israel, Jehovah purposes to reveal Himself to the nations (42¹). 4, 5. The people] RV 'peoples.'

6. The v. contrasts the certainty of God's purposes for His people with the transitory character of the visible world. 8. My righteousness] i.e. as shown in faithfulness to My promises.

9-11. An appeal from Israel to Jehovah that He will show His power as of old at the exodus, that the exiles may return triumphantly to Zion. 9. Rahab] a symbolic name for Egypt, as in 30⁷ RV. Dragon] standing for Egypt (Ps 74¹³).

12-16. God assures His people of their speedy deliverance. 13. As if... ready] RV 'when he maketh ready.' 14. Read, 'He that is bowed down shall speedily be loosed, and he shall not die in the pit, neither shall his bread fail.'

15. Divided, etc.] RV 'stirreth up the sea, that the waves thereof roar.' Jehovah rules in the world, and therefore has power to perform His promise. 16. While vv. 12f. are spoken to the Jewish exiles, the parallel between this passage and 49² suggests that the ideal Israel—Jehovah's Servant—is here addressed.

17. Hast drunk] The prostrate condition of Jerusalem under the wrath of Jehovah is set forth under the figure of one stupefied and reeling owing to a deep draught. 19. By whom] RV 'how.' 20. A wild bull] RV 'an antelope': the figure denotes helplessness.

21-23. Jehovah's wrath is now to be turned against Jerusalem's oppressors.

CHAPTER 52¹⁻¹²

1, 2. Zion invited to array herself as a queen and sit enthroned, freed from the presence of heathen foes, and with her children restored from captivity. 1. Thy strength] Strength returns to Zion when the Arm of Jehovah works within her (51⁹). 3. Her captors paid no price, and therefore have no claim upon her. 4. The Assyrian oppressed] alluding to the sufferings of God's people at the hands of Sargon and Sennacherib.

5. What have I] RV 'what do I.' The argument is that the Egyptian and Assyrian oppressors were but temporary: is there any reason why the Babylonian exile should be permanent? Make... howl] RV 'do howl.'

Every day] RV 'all the day.' 6. Shall know my name] Owing to the exile men had doubted Jehovah's power (cp. v. 5, 'my name... is blasphemed'), but in the ensuing deliverance He will vindicate Himself, and His people shall know Him in His true character.

7. Cp. 40⁹. This and the following vv. refer to the return from the exile. 8. Watchmen] may refer to prophets (cp. 21^{6,11,12} 56¹⁰), or to heavenly spirits (cp. Dan 4¹³). Eye to eye] i.e. as one looks into the eye of his friend. 10. His holy arm] cp. 51⁹.

11. No unclean thing] cp. v. 1. That bear the vessels, etc.] i.e. the priests and Levites, who are to carry back to Jerusalem for use in the restored Temple the sacred utensils, which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away to Babylon. See the fulfilment of this recorded in Ezr 1⁷⁻¹¹. 12. With haste, etc.] in contrast to the exodus from Egypt (Ex 12³⁹).

Rereward] i.e. rearguard.

CHAPTER 52^{13-53¹²}

THE SUFFERING OF JEHOVAH'S SERVANT: ITS MEANING AND RESULTS

See introductory note to chs. 49-57.

C. 52. 13-15. The contrast between the Servant's humiliation and exaltation: its effect upon the world.

C. 53. 1-12. The import of the Servant's suffering not understood. The vicarious nature and triumphant issue of the Servant's suffering.

CHAPTER 52¹³⁻¹⁵

13. Deal prudently] RV 'wisely.' The word implies success as the result of prudent plan; it is used of David's behaviour (1 S 18^{14,15} 29).

Exalted, etc.] The idea is repeated for emphasis.

14, 15. At the Servant's exaltation, following upon his deep humiliation and suffering, the nations and their rulers are dumb with awe, and learn truth unknown before. This was fulfilled in the effect upon the world of the resurrection and exaltation of Christ following upon His passion.

15. So corresponds to as (v. 14), the words his visage... men being a parenthesis. Sprinkle] i.e. so as to cleanse (Pesh. 'he shall purify'): or, read, 'startle' (RM).

CHAPTER 53

1-3. The tenses are past (prophetic perfect), the future being viewed as already accomplished.

1. The questions are asked by the prophet, and the implied answer is 'No one.' None or few received the divine message, or recognised the working of Jehovah's power in His Servant.

Arm] cp. 51⁹ 52¹⁰.

2. The people here speak. There was nothing in the servant's appearance to attract them. Shall grow] RV 'grew.' Before him] i.e. before God. Tender plant, etc.] not like a stately tree, but like a lowly plant, struggling in arid soil. So the human life of the Messiah was one of obscurity and humility.

3. Sorrows... grief] lit. 'pains... sickness'

He was despised, etc.] literally fulfilled in the attitude of His contemporaries generally towards our Lord: cp. Ju 1^{10,11} 8¹⁸ 9²⁴ 10²⁰

4-6. Though they thought him the object of Jehovah's wrath, he was in truth afflicted that they might be delivered; the penalty of their sin fell on him, instead of recoiling upon the transgressors. A remarkable prophecy of Christ, Himself sinless, suffering that men might be delivered from their sins and the penalty due to them.

5. Chastisement of our peace] i.e. resulting in our peace.

7. The v. expressively sets forth the meekness of the Messiah under persecution. See the literal fulfilment recorded in Mt 26⁴³ 27^{12,14} and parallel passages.

8. Read, 'By oppression and judgment he was taken away; and as for his generation, who among them considered that he was cut off,' etc. (RV); i.e. his persecution ended in death, but his contemporaries did not understand that this was for his people's transgressions, not for his own. The ignorance of those who crucified Christ (Ac 3¹⁷ 13²⁷ 1 Cor 2⁸) is here foreshadowed.

9. He made... because] RV 'they made... although.' Though himself guiltless, he was, in his end, associated with malefactors. Rich is parallel to wicked, and stands for the wrongfully rich (Ps 49⁶ Prov 11¹⁶). The words received their fulfilment in detail in the crucifixion of Christ between two robbers.

10. Yet it pleased] His sufferings were in accordance with the divine purpose (cp. Ac 2²³ 4²⁸). Offering for sin] lit. 'trespass-offering' (Lv 5¹⁴). Sin is an infringement of God's honour and rights, and the life of the Servant is the satisfaction paid for it. This sacrifice of the Servant is the condition (a) of spiritual parentage, (b) of continued life after death, and (c) of the fulfilment of his divine mission (49^{5,6}). The prophet here plainly teaches the atoning efficacy of the death of the Messiah, the accomplishment of His work through His sacrifice and His glorious after-life.

11. His knowledge] i.e. either (a) the knowledge which he possesses (cp. Jn 17²⁵), or (b) knowledge of him (cp. Jn 17³). Justify many] RV 'make many righteous,' by delivering them from the guilt and consequences of their sins.

12. Jehovah gives him victory as a great ruler of mankind because of his willing self-sacrifice.

CHAPTERS 54-56⁸

RENEWED PROMISES OF RESTORATION

C. 54. 1-6. Zion addressed as a woman whose period of barrenness and affliction is over; the desolation and reproach of the exile are to be things of the past. 7-10. From His promise of mercy to Zion Jehovah will not go back. 11-17. The re-establishment of the city. Its security from enemies.

C. 55. 1-7. The prophet invites mankind to those blessings which Jehovah has covenanted; and exhorts to put away obstacles to their enjoyment. 8-13. Jehovah's promise is sure, and great joy and glory await His people.

C. 56. 1, 2. They that do right shall be rewarded. 3-8. In the restored Jerusalem the privileges of God's people shall be for all without distinction.

CHAPTER 51

1. Married wife] referring to the days of Jerusalem's prosperity. 2. The figure is that of a tent which must be enlarged to take in increasing numbers (33²⁰). The ultimate fulfilment is seen in the extension of the religion of Zion so as to embrace the nations in the Christian dispensation. 3. Break forth] RV 'spread abroad.' Make the desolate cities, etc.] (cp. 49⁸ 58¹² 61⁴) i.e. reoccupy cities which had suffered from Babylonian invasions.

4. Shame of thy youth] i.e. desertion of Jehovah for other gods in her earlier history.

Thy widowhood] the period of the exile, when Jehovah seemed to have forsaken her.

5. Thine husband] and therefore faithful, even though Israel may be faithless. 6. Called thee] i.e. back again to take thy place as wife.

When... refused] RV 'when she is cast off.'

7. A small moment] i.e. during the 70 years' exile in Babylon: cp. 26²⁰. 8. In a little wrath] 'in overflowing wrath' (RV), i.e. in transient outburst. 9. Referring to Gn 9¹¹.

10. Covenant... peace] RM 'covenant of peace.'

11. The restoration of Jerusalem. Fair colours] lit. 'antimony,' to set off their brilliancy: mentioned elsewhere as used for painting the eye-lids, to enhance the brilliancy of the eyes (2 K 9³⁰ RV). 12. Windows of agates] RV 'pinnacles of rubies.' See similar symbolism in connexion with the new Jerusalem, Tob 13^{16,17} Rev 21¹⁹, etc. 13. The outward splendour is to be worthy of the citizens (Jer 31³⁴).

15. They shall surely] RV 'they may.' This refers to Zion's enemies. Not by me] i.e. not at Jehovah's bidding, as was the case with Sargon and Sennacherib, who were divinely appointed instruments of chastisement: cp. 10⁵ 37²⁶. For thy sake] RV 'because of thee.' 16. I have created, etc.] and therefore they cannot work against My will. 17. This is the heritage] viz. the discomfiture of their enemies. Righteousness i.e. justification in the eyes of the world through Jehovah's faithfulness to His promises.

CHAPTER 55

1. Waters... wine... milk] These stand figuratively, as the whole context shows, for spiritual blessings. 2. Wherefore, etc.] refers to the assiduous practice of idolatry, which had been Israel's besetting sin.

3. Mercies] loving-kindnesses. The meaning is that Jehovah will, without fail fulfil for His people the promises of loving-kindness made to David (Ps 89³⁵). 4. Read, 'I gave him,' i.e. David. People] RV 'peoples.' David's successes gave him a position which made his religion known in the world, and thus he witnessed for Jehovah. 5. Israel shall similarly so testify that the nations shall turn to Jehovah. 6, 7. The exhortation shows that the promises given are conditional.

8, 9. These vv. are especially addressed to those of the Israelites who were incredulous as to the possibility of restoration to their own land. 10, 11. As certainly as the elements fulfil their purposes, so will Jehovah fulfil His promise.

12. With joy . . . peace] not in haste or flight, as from Egypt. The passage describes the exodus from Babylon. All nature rejoices with God's people. 13. Cp. 35¹ 41¹⁹. And it shall be, etc.] These words form an assurance that the state of things foretold in the clauses preceding shall surely come to pass and shall be permanent.

CHAPTER 56¹⁻⁸

1, 2. Further conditions to be observed that men may share in the approaching deliverance. 1. Keep ye . . . justice] i.e. keep the law, and practise righteousness. 2. Layeth hold on] RV 'holdeth fast by.' Polluting] RV 'profaning.'

3-7. The privileges of the people of God are open to all, even to those who think themselves excluded by race, or by physical disability (Dt 23¹). The sabbath appears to have been more strictly observed in the Babylonian period than it had been under the monarchy (Jer 17^{19f}. Ezk 20^{11f}. Neh 13^{15f}).

5. Place] RV 'memorial.' 7. People] RV 'peoples.' The passage is referred to by our Lord at the cleansing of the Temple (Mt 21¹³).

8. Beside those, etc.] RV 'beside his own that are gathered.'

CHAPTERS 56^{9-57²¹}

THE IDOLATRIES OF ISRAEL

It is difficult to determine the date of this section with certainty. Many scholars assign it, with the rest of chs. 40-66, to the period of the exile, or to a date after the return: but some give it a pre-exilic date, on the following grounds: (a) The picture that is drawn of the self-indulgent and infatuated leaders of the nation (56¹⁰⁻¹²) would, it is thought, apply more accurately to the period preceding the exile, than to the exile. (b) The idolatrous rites alluded to (57⁵⁻⁹) are those practised in the later days of the Jewish monarchy. (c) 57¹ implies persecution of the true servants of Jehovah, such as marked the reign of Manasseh. (d) The natural features in 57^{5,6} are Palestinian. (e) The allusion in 57^{9,10} to seeking foreign alliances suits the days of the monarchy better than the exile period. Those who assign the section to the exile period maintain that the above reasoning is scarcely conclusive, because the writings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel show that heathen rites such as are here described prevailed right up to the exile, and the tendency to practise them no doubt was strong amongst the Jews generally during the exile: cp. 65^{5,11}. Again, there were other and later persecutions than that under Manasseh; and that the Jewish exiles were subject to persecution is shown by the case of Daniel and his friends. The Palestinian setting of the idolatrous sacrifices referred to may be accounted for by supposing that these are described as they had been practised by the nation in Palestine.

Chs. 56^{9-12-57²}. Rebuke of the unworthy leaders of the nation. Israel is exposed to danger because the rulers are infatuated, self-seeking, self-indulgent, and careless of justice.

C. 57. 3-10. Rebuke of those given to idolatry. A picture of the idolatrous rites in which they have indulged. 11-14. Jehovah will not endure this, but will interpose. 15-21. He points the way of restoration through penitence.

CHAPTER 56⁹

9. Israel pictured as a neglected and helpless flock, exposed to the attacks of wild beasts.

CHAPTER 57

2. The peace of the grave is better than the condition of unrest under their rulers (v. 1).

Shall enter . . . shall rest] RV 'entereth . . . rest.'

3, 5. Sons, etc.] i.e. descendants, perpetuating the character of their ancestors. Seed, etc.] i.e. through your idolatry violating the mystical union between Jehovah and His people: cp. Ezk 16⁴⁴.

4. Sport yourselves] implying that they find delight in the misfortune of the servants of Jehovah. 5. Enflaming] The word describes the excitement attending the orgies which accompanied the celebration of heathen rites: cp. 1 K 18^{26,28}. Slaying, etc.] referring to human sacrifices practised under Ahaz and Manasseh (2 Ch 28² 2 K 21⁶).

6. An allusion to stone-worship (Jer 3⁹). Large stones, such as those referred to, were fetiches of the Semitic races in early times, and were thought to be abodes of a deity: cp. the action of Jacob, Gn 28^{11,18}. Thy lot] where as Jehovah was their true portion (Jer 10¹⁶ Ps 16⁵). Should . . . these?] RV 'shall I be appeased for these things?' 7. Thy bed] Idolatry is in OT, commonly figured as adultery (Ex 34¹⁵ Dt 31¹⁶); hence bed is put for the place of idol-worship. 8. Remembrance] RV

'memorial,' i.e. idolatrous inscription, in place of the memorial of God's law (Dt 6⁹).

9. The figure is that of a woman trying to attract admirers. Judah had coquetted with foreign kings, especially with the king of Assyria (2 K 18^{7,10}). Or perhaps for the king we should read 'Moloch'; the reference then is to idolatry, as in the preceding vv.

Messengers] RV 'ambassadors.' Unto hell] i.e. Hades, put for the lowest abasement.

10. In the greatness] RV 'with the length.'

Hast found . . hand] RV 'didst find a quickening of thy strength,' i.e. Judah imagined her power increased by foreign alliances.

Grieved] RV 'faint.' 11. Of whom] i.e. heathen gods. Lied] in outwardly recognising Jehovah, while in heart faithless to Him.

Of old] RV 'of long time.' 12. Ironical.

And thy works, etc.] RV 'and as for thy works, they shall not profit thee.'

13. Companies] RM 'rabble,' alluding to the numerous gods introduced. Vanity, etc.] RV 'a breath shall carry them away.' 14. Let all barriers to the return be removed.

15. Jehovah remembers and will restore the faithful among the exiles. 16. For the spirit should fail] i.e. mankind could not survive God's judgments. 17. God hid His face and was angry, in order to turn His people from their sins. Covetousness] cp. Jer 6¹³ Am 8⁴.

18. His ways] of repentance. 19. I create, etc.] i.e. Jehovah gives men occasion to praise Him. Far off . . near] referring to the dispersed Israelites, those far off from Jerusalem, and those near to it: cp. Dan 9⁷.

§ 3. CHAPTERS 58-66

THE GLORIOUS FUTURE OF THE JEWISH RACE

This concluding group of chapters is chiefly distinguished by glowing pictures of the future of Jerusalem, when the Jews shall be restored to their land again. A glorious restoration is promised (60^{1,2} 61^{4,10,11}), all nations are to be members of the restored city (60³⁻⁵), the glories of which are vividly pictured (60⁶⁻⁸), the crowning glory being the holiness of the citizens (60²¹). The fulfilment of the prophet's utterances may be traced in the spiritual glories of the new Jerusalem above, which is the mother of us all.

C. 58. 1-7. Mere outward service of Jehovah is vain; He desires mercy rather than sacrifice. 8-12. They who thus serve Him in a right spirit shall be wonderfully rewarded, and shall restore Jerusalem; 13, 14. as also shall they who duly observe the sabbath.

C. 59. 1. But why is Jehovah's help so long delayed? 2-8. Because of the depravity of the leaders of Israel, 9-15^a. and because of the sins of the people, which they recognise and confess. 15^b-21. No human aid can suffice to right matters, but Jehovah will interpose to vindicate and deliver His oppressed people.

C. 60. 1-9. Then shall the dispersed Israelites be gloriously restored. 10-13. Jerusalem shall be rebuilt with splendour, and 14-22. her people shall be dominant and prosperous.

C. 61. 1-3. The prophet is commissioned to announce the restoration of exiled Israel. 4-9. The rebuilding of Jerusalem and the coming glory of her people. 10-12. Jerusalem's song of praise.

C. 62. 1-7. The great change that is imminent in the fortunes of Jerusalem, and 8-12. in the lot of her afflicted people.

CHAPTER 58

2. Did righteousness] i.e. kept the law. They are ready enough for the external requirements of religion. 3. The questions express surprise that the fast is without effect.

Find pleasure, etc.] render, 'carry on business and oppress all your labourers.' With all their professions of self-denial they are selfish.

4. For strife] i.e. strife is the result of this formal fasting. Ye shall not, etc.] RV 'ye fast not this day so as to make your voice,' etc.

5-7. Literal fasting is not here excluded, but the prophet declares its uselessness when divorced from the spirit of love. Our Lord in the Sermon on the Mount closely connects fasting and almsgiving (Mt 6^{1,16}). 6. The heavy burdens] RV 'the bands of the yoke.'

8. Health] RV 'healing.' Thy righteousness] i.e. thy inward personal righteousness: cp. 1²⁷; or, perhaps, 'thy justification in the eyes of the world': cp. 54¹⁷. Shall be thy rereward] i.e. shall protect thee. The allusion is to the exodus, when the visible manifestation of Jehovah's presence was a defence to the Israelites from the Egyptians pursuing in the rear (Ex 14¹⁹). Rereward] i.e. rearguard.

9. Yoke] i.e. of enforced or oppressive labour. Putting . . finger] i.e. in scorn. Vanity] RV 'wickedly.' 10. Draw out, etc.] i.e. supply to the hungry such things as thou thyself desirest. 11. Fat] RV 'strong.'

12. Primarily the prophet contemplates the restoration of the ruined buildings of Jerusalem, but the wider spiritual application of his words is obvious. The faithful soul is not only itself fruitful (v. 11), but a means of bringing help and blessing to others. 13. Turn away thy foot from the sabbath] so as not to profane it. 14. Cause thee, etc.] i.e. give thee triumphant possession of the land.

CHAPTER 59

1, 2. An answer to the implied objection that the promises of restoration have not yet been fulfilled. 3. Cp. 1¹⁵. 4. RV 'None sueth in righteousness . . in truth.' [The allusion is to unjust prosecutions. 5. Cockatrice]

RM 'adder.' He that eateth, etc.] i.e. the man who falls in with their plans is ruined thereby, and he who opposes them is confronted with a still greater danger. 6. Their schemes cannot even benefit themselves. 9. The prophet and the people confess their sins. Light] i.e. deliverance.

10. Grope . . wall] seeking guidance: cp. Dt 28²⁹. We are . . dead men] RV 'among them that are lusty we are as dead men.' 11. Mourn] i.e. moan (38¹¹). 12. With us] i.e. present in our thoughts. 14. The street] the open space in the city where business is done, and cases are brought before the judges.

15. Injustice arouses God's indignation.

Faileth] RV 'is lacking.' Judgment] justice.

16f. Cp. 63⁵⁴. 17. The attributes of Jehovah, which come out clearly in His interposition, are figured as His armour. St. Paul's imagery (Eph 6¹⁴⁴) is based on this passage.

18. Islands] put for distant lands generally. The judgment affects the world at large as well as Israel. 19. When . . against him] RV 'for he shall come as a rushing stream, which the breath of the LORD' (i.e. a strong wind) 'driveth.'

20. Redeemer] i.e. Jehovah, who is so called elsewhere: cp. 41¹¹ 43¹. This was fulfilled at Christ's first coming, when He was accepted by the faithful few in Israel. But St. Paul (Ro 11²⁶) applies the promise to the time when Israel, which did not accept the gospel, shall be restored again to God's Church, so that its final fulfilment is yet in the future. Zion] i.e. the faithful remnant of the nation, as the next clause explains. 21. My spirit, etc.] The faithful remnant is to be the inspired organ of Jehovah's revelation.

CHAPTER 60

1. The light of deliverance so long waited for (59⁹) is about to shine. This prophecy received its highest fulfilment at the coming of Christ, the true Light of the world, which was followed by a great ingathering of the nations to the Church of God (vv. 3, etc.).

2. People] RV 'peoples.' 4. Cp. 49¹⁸. All they gather themselves] i.e. the exiles who had been dispersed. Nursed . . side] i.e. carried on the hip, in the Eastern fashion. 5. Flow together] RV 'be enlightened.' Fear] RV 'tremble,' with strong emotion. Abundance of the sea] the rich seafaring people. Forces, etc.] RV 'wealth of the nations.'

6f. The nations are pictured as coming in a long train, to bring their riches for the service of the sanctuary. Ephah] a Midianite tribe (Gn 25⁴). Sheba] Ps 72¹⁰. 7. Kedar] cp. 21¹⁷. Nebaioth] a tribe allied to Kedar, descended from Ishmael (Gn 25¹³). 8. The ships with sails spread speed over the waters, like doves to their nest. 9. Isles] the maritime lands of the west (49¹). Ships of Tarshish] cp. 21¹⁰ 1K 10²² 22⁴⁸. Deep-sea ships suitable for long voyages, such as that to Tarshish across the Mediterranean.

10. In my wrath] cp. 54⁷⁻⁸.

11. The gates are open continually, that the trains of caravans bearing gifts may enter.

And that their kings, etc.] RV 'and their kings led with them,' i.e. as captives. The rebuilding of the Temple is pictured in language recalling its erection in the days of Solomon.

13. Cp. 35². Place of my feet] i.e. the Temple (Ps 99⁵ 132⁷).

15. The figure is that of a forsaken wife (54⁶), but is quickly changed to that of a desolate land. 16. The thought is the same as in 49²³. 17. The language suggests a return to the prosperity which marked Solomon's reign, with the great difference that the officers shall not be agents of oppression (1K 12⁴). Exactors] RM 'taskmasters.' 18. Thy walls, etc.] cp. 26¹. 19. Cp. Rev 21²³ 22⁵. 21. The people shall all fulfil the law, so that there will be no need of the discipline of exile: cp. 59^{18,14}.

22. A little one] RV 'the little one,' i.e. the smallest; he who has no children, or few. In his time] RV 'in its time.'

CHAPTER 61

1. The speaker is the prophet, either in his own person, or in that of the Servant of Jehovah. The mission here spoken of is identical with the mission of the Servant as already indicated: e.g. to bind up, etc. (cp. 42^{3,7}), and, again, proclaim liberty, etc. (cp. 42⁷ 49⁹). This phrase is taken from the law of the year of jubilee (Lv 25⁸⁻¹⁰). Our Lord applies the passage to His own work in Lk 4^{16f}. Anointed] i.e. to prophetic office (1K 19¹⁶). 2. The period of God's favour (acceptable year) is contrasted with the short time that His wrath endures (day of vengeance). 3. Appoint] assign to, provide. Beauty] RV 'a garland.'

4. The outcome of the mission recounted in v. 1 is the same as the issue of the Servant's work (49⁸). 5. Other nations represented as filling menial offices. 6. Israel will attain its original ideal (Ex 19⁶). Riches . . Gentiles] wealth of the nations. In their glory, etc.] RM 'to their glory shall ye succeed.' 7. Double] i.e. by way of compensation or reward (40²).

8. Judgment] i.e. justice. For burnt offering] RV 'with iniquity.' The reference is to the spoliation of which Israel is the victim.

Direct their work] RV 'give them their recompence.' 9. Known] i.e. renowned.

10. Decketh . . ornaments] lit. 'decketh himself with a priestly head-dress.' The allusion is to the custom of the bridegroom wearing a special head-dress on the wedding day (Song 3¹¹). 11. As the earth, etc.] i.e. as surely as the seasons come round. Righteousness] i.e. the justification of his people in the eyes of the world.

CHAPTER 62

1. The speaker is probably Jehovah Himself. Hold my peace] cp. 42¹⁴. The righteousness] i.e. her vindication, the setting of her right in the eyes of the world (cp. 58⁸). Salvation] i.e. deliverance. 2. New name] as befits her new character (1²⁶ Jer 33¹⁶) : see v. 4.

3. In the hand] so held for the admiration of the world.

4. The figure is again that of a bride (54⁶) in whom her husband delights. Hephzi-bah . . Beulah] meaning, 'My delight is in her,' and 'Married.' 5. The same image differently applied, the people being regarded as the bridegroom and their country as the bride.

6. Watchmen] These are angelic beings who report to Jehovah what happens on earth, and intercede for mercy to Zion (Zech 1^{11,13}).

Ye that make, etc.] RV 'ye that are the Lord's remembrancers, take ye no rest.'

8, 9. The foe will no more rob them of their harvests, but the produce of the land shall be used for the service of the Temple. Holiness] RV 'sanctuary.' 10. A command to prepare the way for the returning exiles (40³ 57¹⁵).

For the people] RV 'for the peoples,' that they may escort the Israelites. 11. His reward, etc.] see on 40¹⁰. Work] RV 'recompence.' 12. Holy people] Israel's ideal character realised (Ex 19⁶; cp. Isa 61⁶). Sought out] contrast Jer 30¹⁷. Not forsaken] Cp. v. 4.

CHAPTER 63¹⁻⁶

THE DIVINE WARRIOR

1. The prophet asks who is this warrior coming from Edom? The Warrior replies, He is the Divine Deliverer. 2. The prophet asks why is His raiment red? 3-6. The Warrior explains, He is returning from vengeance upon the enemies of His people.

1. Travelling] lit. 'bending,' denoting movement in marching (RV). In righteousness] i.e. in faithfulness to promises. Speak, etc.] cp. 45¹⁰. 3. The winepress is the symbol of slaughter in battle (Joel 3¹³ Rev 14¹⁸⁻²⁰).

Alone, etc.] i.e. no human agent assisted.

People] RV 'peoples.' I will tread, etc.] RV 'trod . . trampled . . is sprinkled . . have stained.'

4. Is] RV 'was.' Year] see 61². 5. The absence of human aid (v. 3) further emphasised (50² 59¹⁶).

6. Will tread . . make] RV 'trod . . made.'

People] RV 'peoples.' The divine vengeance falls upon the nations in general, but upon Edom in particular (v. 1), the prophet fixing his thoughts upon this nation because of the long-remembered hostility of Edom in the day of Jerusalem's calamity (see prefatory note to

c. 34). Drunk] a figure for stupefying disaster (51¹⁷). Will bring, etc.] RV 'poured out their lifeblood on the earth.' The imagery of Christ's final triumph and judgment is taken from this passage (Rev 19¹³), which is thus shown to be a prophecy that will receive its full fulfilment in the punishment of the enemies of God's Church at the last day. The Warrior, who in v. 3 is represented as treading the winepress alone, thus stands for the Son of God, to whom alone the Father has committed all judgment (Jn 5²²). The prophecy is also sometimes applied by analogy to Christ's victory over the powers of evil in His Passion (Jn 12^{31,32}), wherein He contended alone (Mt 27⁴⁶).

CHAPTERS 63⁷-64¹²

PAST DELIVERANCES AND PRESENT NEEDS

C. 63. 7-14. Commemoration of Jehovah's mercies to Israel in the past. 15.-C. 64. 5^a. Prayer that He will interpose to deliver His people from their present calamities.

C. 64. 5^b-12. Acknowledgment that these are due to their sins. Appeal to Jehovah that He will look upon the pitiable state of His people and sanctuary.

CHAPTER 63⁷⁻¹⁰

8. Lie] RV 'deal falsely.' 9. He was afflicted] so Heb. traditional reading, meaning that He felt His people's pains as His own (Jg 10¹⁶). But Heb. written text 'he was no adversary' (RM), but, on the contrary, their deliverer. The angel] see Ex 23²⁰ 32³⁴ 33²

Bare them] see Dt 1³¹ 32¹¹.

10. Cp. Ps 78⁴⁰. 11. He (Israel) remembered] The thought of past mercies evoked penitence (Ps 78³⁵). Shepherd] RV 'shepherds.' Within him] i.e. Israel, e.g. Ex 35³¹ Nu 11²⁵. 12. RV 'That caused his glorious arm to go at the right hand of Moses.' Arm] see 51⁹ (also in connexion with the exodus).

13. In the wilderness] i.e. in a grassy plain.

14. RV 'As the cattle that go down.' This refers to the settlement in Canaan.

15. Strength] RV 'mighty acts.' Sounding of thy bowels] stands for sympathetic pity (16¹¹). Read, 'the sounding . . and thy mercies toward me are restrained.' 16. The patriarchs might disown their descendants, but Jehovah's love is sure. The thought is similar to 49¹⁶. The passage is remarkable as one of the very few in OT. where God is addressed as Father (64⁸). 17. A bold expostulation. Hardened, etc.] Have their sins caused God to give them up and become their adversary, as in Pharaoh's case? 18. A little while] whereas Jehovah had promised them an everlasting inheritance!

19. RV 'We are become as they over whom thou never barest rule; as they that were not called,' etc.

CHAPTER 64

1-3. The imagery is taken from the account of the divine manifestation at Sinai (Ex 19¹⁸).

2. RV 'As when fire kindleth the brushwood, and the fire causeth,' etc. 4. O God, etc.] RV 'a God beside thee, which worketh for him that waiteth for Him.' St. Paul (1 Cor 2⁹) alludes to this passage to emphasise the fact that human wisdom cannot fathom the working of God. Meetest] i.e. as a friend.

Art] RV 'wast.' In those, etc.] RV 'in them' (i.e. our sins) 'have we been of long time, and shall we be saved?' 6. An unclean thing] RV 'one that is unclean.' Filthy rags] RV 'a polluted garment': such as was ceremonially unclean. 8. Cp. 63¹⁶ Ro 9²⁰. An appeal to God that He will not abandon the work of His own hands.

10, 11. Another motive for Jehovah's interference—the present desolation of the land and sanctuary dedicated to Him. 10. Holy cities] Elsewhere Jerusalem only is so called, but the attribute is here extended to the whole land (Zech 2¹³). 11. Pleasant things] the same word as 'goodly vessels,' 2 Ch 36¹⁹.

12. Refrain thyself] i.e. refuse to give way to natural tenderness (Gn 45¹).

CHAPTERS 65, 66

THE PUNISHMENT OF APOSTATE AND REWARD OF FAITHFUL ISRAEL

C. 65. 1-10. Israel's obduracy to Jehovah's appeals, and persistent idolatry, which He will surely punish; yet a faithful remnant shall be preserved. 11-25. The fate in store for the unfaithful. The glories of the coming age for God's faithful people.

C. 66. 1-4. The danger of trusting in externals; a merely formal worship is an abomination to Jehovah. 5. A message of comfort for the faithful who are persecuted. 6-14^a. The wonderful restoration of Israel. 14^b-18^a. The divine judgment on the nations, and on all idolaters. 18^b-24. The recognition and worship of Jehovah by all nations.

CHAPTER 65

1. Render, 'I have offered answers to those who asked not; I have been at hand to those who sought me not... a nation that hath not called upon my name.' The v. refers to the Israelites who neglected Jehovah's appeals so often made. St. Paul (Ro 10²⁰) applies the passage by inference to the heathen world.

3. Gardens] the scenes of idolatrous rites in the pre-exile period (1²⁹ 57⁵). Upon altars, etc.] RV 'upon bricks,' i.e. perhaps the tiled roofs of houses (2 K 23¹²). 4. Monuments] RV 'secret places.' The v. alludes to the custom of sleeping in sepulchres or vaults of idol temples to learn the future through dreams. Eat swine's flesh] i.e. in sacrificial meals (66¹⁷); it was forbidden by the Law as unclean (Lv 11⁷ Dt 14⁸). Broth, etc.] referring to a sacrificial feast of unclean food.

5. Which say, etc.] The words are uttered by those initiated into heathen mysteries, and who therefore considered themselves peculiarly sacred. 6. It (i.e. their sin) is written] cp. Jer 17¹. 7. Upon the mountains] cp. 57⁷ Hos 4¹³.

Therefore... work] RV 'there will I first measure their work.' Jehovah must first of all punish these deeds.

8. The meaning is that as a few good grapes often save a cluster from being destroyed, so Israel shall be preserved through the faithful remnant. 10. Sharon] the maritime plain on the W. of Palestine and the valley of Achor near Jericho on the E., are put for the whole land. 11. Ye are they that] RV 'ye that.'

Prepare a table] alluding to rites such as are described in Jer 7¹⁸. That troop] Heb. tiud, i.e. 'Fortune' (RV); cp. Josh 11¹⁷. Furnish, etc.] 'fill up mingled wine unto Meni' (i.e. 'destiny'). 'Meni' and 'Gad' in the clause preceding are names of heathen deities.

12. Number you] RV 'destiny you.' 15. Ye shall leave, etc.] So fearful will their fate be that their name will be used in imprecation. Jer 29²² exactly illustrates what is meant.

16. The meaning is that men will recognise the faithfulness of Jehovah. 17. The same language is in NT. applied to God's final interposition and restoration of all things (2 Pet 3¹³ Rev 21¹). Nature itself will be transformed to be in harmony with regenerate Israel: cp. 11⁶⁻⁹. 20. The future, in the prophet's view, will be marked by a return to patriarchal longevity (Gn 5), the power of death being not altogether removed, but limited. Those who die at 100 will be reckoned as but children, or as prematurely cut off for their sins. 21, 22. Reversal of the curse (Dt 28⁸⁰). 25. Together with the coming golden age for humanity the prophet anticipates a transformation of the lower creation, as in 11⁶⁻⁹: cp. Ro 8^{19f}. Dust, etc.] the serpent will be content with the food God assigned to it (Gn 3¹⁴).

CHAPTER 66

1. Where, etc.] RV 'what manner of house... what place shall be my rest.' The v. is a strong rebuke of such as, without a really religious spirit, idly trusted in the inviolability of Zion, and the protection they thought the sanctuary would afford. A like fault is rebuked in Jer 7¹⁻¹⁶. This passage is quoted by St. Stephen (Ac 7^{49, 50}). 2. Those things] i.e. the universe. All... have been] RV 'so all these things came to be.' 3. They who offer the due sacrifices, yet without a proper spirit, are no better than they who perform unclean or idolatrous acts. 4. Their delusions] i.e. things to delude them. 5. Your brethren, etc.] These are the apostate Israelites (also referred to 65⁶) who despise the true worshippers of Jehovah. Let the LORD, etc.] R.V. 'Let the LORD be glorified, that we may see your joy; but they' (who so speak) 'shall be ashamed.' The apostate taunt the faithful with worshipping a God who does not help them.

6. The prophet seems to hear a sound as of one stirring in the Temple and preparing for vengeance.

7-9. The mother is Zion, the child regenerate Israel, and in v. 8 the normally slow processes of birth and growth are contrasted with the astonishing development of God's people. 8. Shall the earth . . . bring forth] R.V. 'Shall a land be born.' 9. God will not delay, or leave unfinished, the work of restoration.

11. The figure of Zion as a mother is still continued. 12. Flowing] R.V. 'overflowing.'

14. An herb] R.V. 'the tender grass'; their youth will be renewed.

16. Plead] i.e. hold judgment. 17. Sanctify themselves] referring (as in 65⁶) to the apostates who are initiated into some form of heathen mysteries. Behind one] i.e. (a) 'behind one Asherah,' i.e. idol tree-trunk (RM, cp. 17⁸); or, (b) 'behind one man,' as priest and leader of their worship. LXX omits the words. Eating, etc.] cp. 65⁴. The mcuse] unclean by the Law (Lv 11²⁰). 18. It shall come] R.V. 'the time cometh.'

19. Those that escape the divine judgment on the nations opposed to Israel are represented as going as missionaries to the more distant peoples. Tarshish] in Spain; put for the far West. Pul (i.e. Phut) and Lud] probably African peoples; they are mentioned together as serving in the Egyptian army (Ezk 30⁵). Tubal] Scythian tribes near the Black Sea (Ezk 38^{2,3}). Javan] Ionians, i.e. Greeks settled in Asia Minor. 20. The remoter nations bring back the Israelites dispersed among them. 21. Take of them] i.e. (a) of the nations who bring back the Jews; or, (b) of the Jews themselves thus brought back; all Israel shall be eligible for the priesthood. 61⁶ favours this latter interpretation. 22. Cp. 65¹⁷.

24. The picture of restoration is completed with the thought of the judgment upon the wicked (similarly 48²² 57²¹), who are here thought of as having been slain in battle by Jehovah (vv. 15, 16). Their worm, etc.] These words may be intended to refer only to the literal destruction of their corpses, or may also include the torment of the spirits of the ungodly. Jewish interpretation adopted the latter view (Ecclus 7¹⁷ Judith 16¹⁷), and it appears also to have the sanction of our Lord's teaching (Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁸).

JEREMIAH

INTRODUCTION

1. Life and Times of Jeremiah. Jeremiah (the name probably meaning 'appointed by God') belonged to a priestly family living at a small town named Anathoth (now 'Anâta, consisting of about a dozen houses and the remains of a church) some two miles to the NE. of Jerusalem. The high priest Abiathar, of the line of Ithamar, had settled there in the days of David (1 K 2²⁰). The prophet's family had apparently been owners of land in that region ever since Abiathar's time, and their social status is further indicated by the fact that Jeremiah had for his scribe Baruch, whose brother was chief chamberlain to Zedekiah (51⁶⁰: see also on 45¹). We may add that Hilkiyah, the father of Jeremiah, is not to be identified with the reforming high priest of Josiah's day (2 K 22⁸), as the latter belonged to the line not of Ithamar but of Eleazar.

At an early period in Jeremiah's life (though the expression 'child' in 1⁶ may partly at least refer to his sense of unfitness for such a task) he was moved to realise—probably in gradually increasing measure—the working of the divine spirit within him. In the thirteenth year of Josiah, 626 B.C., he received his call to be a prophet, and his prophetic life was continued under that king's four successors, viz. Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. Eventually the danger which had long threatened the southern kingdom culminated in the overthrow of the Jewish monarchy by the Babylonian power, which had lately risen on the ruins of that of Assyria. Zedekiah and a large number of his subjects were carried captive to Babylon. The prophet, with unselfish patriotism, rejecting the conqueror's offer of honourable treatment in exile, remained in Judæa, carrying on his prophetic office during the turbulent times which ensued, until a body of his countrymen forced him to accompany them to Egypt (13¹⁴). There, according to a Christian tradition, he met a martyr's death at Talpauhes, being stoned by the Jews who resented his faithful reproofs.

Thus Jeremiah has fitly been called 'the prophet of the decline and fall of the Jewish monarchy,' and the manner of his end seems to have been in close accord with the character of his life-work and sufferings. For, like Cassandra, it was his fate through life to gain but little credence for his warnings.

Jeremiah is one who reveals with frankness the workings of his mind. Hence his prophecies are charged with a large element of human interest. His countrymen as a whole—alike those who had, and those who had not, sympathised with Josiah's reforms (2 Ch 34)—refused to see that nothing short of a thorough amendment of life and morals would satisfy God's law and avert national disaster. The prophet's office then was to utter and reiterate a needed warning, emphasising it by fervour of language and variety of illustration, though sensible all the time that his appeals were probably in vain. The end was approaching, and at last, when princes and people alike proved faithless, he centred his hopes upon the few in whose case adversity and exile had had their chastening uses.

Belonging to the orders both of priest and prophet, and living at the very time when each had sunk to its lowest degree of degradation, he was compelled to submit to the buffeting which they each bestowed upon one who by his every word and deed was passing sentence upon them. Hostility, abuse, powerlessness to avert the coming ills, a solitary life and prohibition of marriage (16²)—these were the conditions of life allotted to a man of shy and timid disposition and naturally despondent mind. No miracle was wrought for his benefit. His predictions were scorned. He failed to induce his compatriots to recognise the solidity of his claims to a hearing. At times he despaired even, as it seems, of life (20¹⁴⁻¹⁵). And yet he could not be silent. The divine message must find its utterance (20^{8,9}), and in fact the promise made to him at the time of his call (1¹⁸), and renewed later (15²⁰), did not fail.

Reign of Josiah. During the reign of this king, commencing 639 B.C., the dangers arising to Judæa from its geographical position became painfully evident. It was the natural battleground between the rival powers of Assyria and Egypt. So small a kingdom could not cope with either of these dangerous neighbours without the support of the other, and therefore the problem which pressed for solution was with which of the two it was most prudent to throw in their lot. There was still, as earlier, in Isaiah's time (Isa 30¹⁻⁶ 31¹⁻³), a strong party in the state favouring either alternative. The extension of Josiah's work of reformation (to which we are about to refer), beyond the borders of his own kingdom northwards (to Geba, 2 K 23⁸), showed that the power of Assyria, which just a hundred years earlier had overthrown the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, was on the wane. On the other hand, it by no means followed that Egypt was to be depended on, even though the 'Chaldean (Babylonian) power, soon to take the place of Assyria, was scarcely yet above Judæa's political horizon.

Notwithstanding this precarious position with regard to external politics, the inner life of the state did not lack certain hopeful features. The new king, unlike his idolatrous predecessors, Manasseh and Amon, was one whose ardour on the side of Jehovah, seconded as it was by wise counsellors, took the form of a vigorous campaign against the idol-worship and immorality which had polluted those two reigns. The altars erected to Baal, the worship of 'the host of heaven' (2 K 17¹⁶), the images of the horses and chariots of the sun within the very precincts of the Temple, the offering of human sacrifices in the valley of Hinnom (on the S. and W. of Jerusalem), the gross immoralities of Canaanitish worship—these were wide-spread indications of the religious corruptions which Josiah assailed. The great principle underlying his reforms was that Jehovah alone should be the object of worship, and that that worship should be centralised at Jerusalem. So far as this principle took effect, it had very important consequences on the religious life of the nation. This centralisation was a standing protest against the worship of a plurality of gods. Moreover, the limitation of sacrifice to the central sanctuary tended to throw into greater relief worship in its more spiritual aspect independent of any particular locality.

But, as Jeremiah clearly saw, the abuses were too deeply rooted for these reformers to penetrate much below the surface, and the mass of the people were supported in their adherence to the old ways by the priests of the local shrines ('high places') throughout the land, who naturally resisted a change that deposited them from their office and cut away an important source of subsistence (2 K 23²⁴). Accordingly, the picture which the prophet draws of the condition of society is a startling one. On every side among high and low there was dishonesty, false swearing, murder, and open licentiousness. (For an account of the local Baal-worship see Intro. to Hosea.)

Many, doubtless, were the influences which culminated in what we term Jeremiah's call. The sight of abounding immorality and idolatry, the tradition of his house, and the hostility to reforms on the part of many of the natural guardians of religion, both priests and prophets, moved him to painful self-communing, and urged him to lift up his voice against the sins of the nation. A strong impetus no doubt was given to his prophetic ardour when, five years after his call, the Book of the Law came to light in the Temple (2K22⁸). That book contained at least a considerable portion of our book of Deuteronomy. Such graphic pictures of punishment for unfaithfulness to Jehovah, as are to be found in Dt28, cannot but have served as an antidote to the shyness of his nature, and nerved him afresh for the task appointed him. He had to face, on the one hand, the immoral and idol worshippers, on the other, persons who maintained that, to secure the abiding favour of Jehovah, it was only necessary to offer more numerous and costly sacrifices and to increase the splendour of the Temple ritual. According to them, the Temple was in itself a charm which must render Jerusalem and its inhabitants secure (7⁴).

Shortly before the newly risen Chaldean power, by the capture of Nineveh, made good its claim as the successor to Assyria (607 B.C.), Josiah openly espoused its side (2K23²⁹), confronted Necho, king of Egypt, on his march against Chaldea, and was slain in battle at Megiddo (608 B.C.).

Reign of Jehoahaz (the Shallum of 22¹¹), 608 B.C. After a brief reign of three months this king was carried captive to Egypt by Necho, and the land made tributary (2K23³³). The prophet evidently felt that in Jehoahaz the nation had lost one who would have used his power for good (22¹⁰⁻¹²).

Reign of Jehoiakim, elder brother of Jehoahaz (2Ch36^{2,5}). The king of Egypt placed him on the throne, and his reign lasted for eleven years (608-597 B.C.). His policy, the reverse of that of his father Josiah, was a disastrous one (2K24¹⁻⁴). Under him the hope of averting the ruin of the country soon faded away. In the worship of 'the high places' and in the bloodstained rites, either encouraged or at least connived at by him, men sought deliverance from the troubles of servitude to a foreign oppressor. The king was cruel, frivolous, eager for his own glorification, and regardless of the national religion (Jer22¹³⁻¹⁷). Under his rule the faithful few were refined by adversity, and it was seen, as in the time of Manasseh, that faithfulness to God might easily lead to martyrdom. The priests and false prophets, exasperated by Jeremiah's rebukes and warnings, and encouraged by the king's murder of Urijah, even demanded that Jeremiah too should die, but were foiled in their purpose (26¹⁰).

Real and not pretended service is the great lesson which Jeremiah at this time enforced, and in so doing he excited the animosity of his foes by the very truth of the charges that he brought against them. In opposition to those who still advocated alliance with Egypt against Babylon, he declared that the latter would assuredly prevail, and illustrated his words by the symbol of the potter's clay and the breaking of the earthen vessel (chs.18,19).

The fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign (605 B.C.) gave noteworthy proof of Jeremiah's prescience. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, defeated the army of Necho at Carchemish on the Euphrates, and, advancing into Palestine, drove many, including the Rechabites (c.35), to seek shelter within the walls of Jerusalem. The conqueror advanced to the capital and bore away both captives and sacred vessels to Babylon (2Ch36^{6,7}). The complete overthrow was deferred, only because of Nebuchadnezzar's hasty return home on the report of his father's illness, in order to secure his succession to the throne. From this time forth Jeremiah's forecasts assume an air of greater definiteness. He speaks no longer, as in 1¹⁴ 6¹, of an enemy from 'the north,' but declares plainly that the king of Babylon, as God's instrument of punishment, is destined to prevail, urges submission, and promises that those who abide by his counsel shall be left undisturbed in their land. The rest, though captivity for seventy years is to be their lot, shall in the end be restored. Probably it was soon after the battle of Carchemish that there occurred the scene of the king's burning of the prophet's roll and repudiation of his warnings (c.36). From this time till the end of Jehoiakim's reign Jeremiah seems to have been absent from Jerusalem. The king received no more warnings. After three years' payment as vassal of the tribute which he yearned to spend upon self-indulgence, he rebelled, was attacked by bands of Chaldeans and others, and probably in an engagement with some of them, came to a violent end and a dishonoured burial (22^{18,19}).

Reign of Jehoiachin (the Jeconiah of 24¹, and the Coniah of 22^{24,25}), 597 B.C. He was the son of Jehoiakim, was set up by Nebuchadnezzar, and, like his uncle Jehoahaz, reigned but three months, when he and the flower of the community with him (the 'good figs' of c.24) were deported to Babylon. After thirty-six years' imprisonment he was released by Nebuchadnezzar's son and successor, Evil-merodach (52³¹). To this period belongs c.13, with its acted symbol of the linen girdle.

Reign of Zedekiah, 597-586 B.C. He was the youngest son of Josiah, well disposed, but utterly weak. He showed more disposition than his predecessors had done to consult with Jeremiah (37¹⁷⁻²¹ 38¹⁴⁻²⁸), and under his advice to submit to Babylon. On the other hand, he was devoid of any real zeal for religion, and yielded, now to the suggestions of the prophet, now to those of the princes, who advocated resistance, either single-handed or in alliance with Egypt. Thus he was virtually powerless against the strong wills and more vigorous leaders opposed to him (38^{5,23}). To the worthiest part of the nation, who were in captivity, Jeremiah writes a letter of comfort (c. 29), advising submission, and promising restoration in due time.

At the beginning of the ninth year of Zedekiah a Chaldean army laid siege to Jerusalem. Jeremiah had already from time to time worn a yoke upon his neck, symbolical of the coming servitude (Jer 27²), and when the false prophet, Hananiah, who promised deliverance, had broken the yoke (28¹⁰), he received the sentence of speedy death at the mouth of Jeremiah (28¹⁶) because he had 'spoken rebellion against the Lord.' It was natural for self-reliant, irreligious men to be highly displeased with such acts and words as these, and much persecution, including imprisonment, fell to the prophet's lot in consequence, the king being too weak to give him any permanent support (Jer 37¹¹⁻²¹). In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, 586 B.C., the city was sacked and the Temple burnt. Zedekiah's eyes were put out, and he was brought to Babylon, and immured in a dungeon, apparently till his death.

Jeremiah was permitted to remain under Gedaliah, Nebuchadnezzar's new governor, who was of a family friendly to the prophet. But in two months' time Gedaliah was murdered by the irreconcilables among the remnant in the land. In the turbulent period that followed, the prophet, viewed by the people as a traitor, foretold the want and misery that would ensue, if, through fear of the vengeance of Nebuchadnezzar (42^{7f.}), they went down to Egypt. They only replied by compelling him to accompany them thither. From Tahpanhes, a town near the eastern border of Lower Egypt, we draw the last certain notice of him that we possess. He declares that the fate which had befallen Judæa shall also be that of Egypt, and that Nebuchadnezzar's throne shall be set up at the entrance to Pharaoh's house (43¹⁰). He also makes a dying protest against the idolatrous worship practised by his countrymen (c. 44). We have no notice in the Bible of his death.

2. Jeremiah's Attitude towards the Ceremonial Law and the Sabbath. Jeremiah's unvarying theme is that in God's sight the moral always takes precedence of the ceremonial Law (although laxity in sabbath observance is sharply rebuked in 17¹⁹⁻²⁷). This principle he applies to the people's reverence for the ark (31⁶) and the tables of the Law (31^{31f.}, cp. 32⁴⁰), to circumcision (44 6 10 9²⁶), to the Temple (74, 10^{f.} 11¹⁵ 17⁸ 26^{6,9,12} 27¹⁶), to sacrifices (6²⁰ 7^{21f.} 11¹⁵ 14¹²). We may further note that in many of the passages where the 'Law' is mentioned, the prophet is describing the 'oral' teaching given by priests (Dt 17¹¹) and prophets to those who consulted them on points of ritual or practice: see 2⁸ 9¹³ 18¹⁸ 26^{4,5}.

3. The Messianic Passages and the Nature of the Prophet's Hope for the Future. A characteristic of Jeremiah's style is to insert a bright thought among gloomy ones, so that at the most terrible period of his country's fortunes his Messianic hopes are clearest in their expression. These hopes are gathered round (a) the Davidic house, (b) Jerusalem.

The chief Messianic passages (17^{23,26} 23⁵⁻⁵ 30^{9,21} 33¹⁴⁻¹⁸) are deserving of close study, as indicating the gradually increasing clearness of the hope. The worthless rulers of the prophet's days should be succeeded by a king of David's line, who should reign in righteousness; out of the ruins of Jerusalem should arise a new city, which should bear the name, 'The Lord is our righteousness'; and the old covenant, which had proved itself unable either to cleanse from sin or to enforce obedience, should give place to a new covenant of grace, written not on tables of stone, but on fleshy tables of the heart. Then 'they shall all know me from the least of them even unto the greatest of them' (31³⁴). Such was the dim forecast, as revealed to Jeremiah, of the New Order which, in the fulness of time, was to arise out of the Jewish dispensation through the coming of the Saviour of the world. 'The New Covenant has been established in the spiritual dispensation of the gospel, in a law written by the Spirit in the hearts of men, and in the new revelation the means of pardon and of purification have been provided and made known to man' (Kirkpatrick, 'The Doctrine of the Prophets,' p. 324). Christ, both Priest and King, and heir of David's line, has come to dwell among men in a higher sense than it was given to Jeremiah to realise.

4. Arrangement of the Contents of the Book. The book of Jeremiah gives us interesting indications of what we may call the literary history of a prophetic collection. More than twenty years had elapsed since Jeremiah's call when Baruch was bidden, apparently for the first time, to take down prophecies from his dictation. And when the roll which thus came into existence was burnt, that which succeeded it contained the same, and, in addition, 'many like words' (36³²). From the nature of the case there must have been a certain amount of condensation, as the ipsissima verba of the prophet's utterances would not remain in his mind during so long a period, and much of what he said must have been from time to time substantially repeated in the course of the twenty years. We also find that while the arrangement of the prophecies preceding c. 36 is in the main the order of delivery, that order is occasionally broken, the prophet grouping with some particular deliverance other prophecies of kindred subject-matter. Moreover, the roll, we may perceive, can only have been in general agreement with the section of the book down to c. 36, for portions of that section are clearly later than the fifth year of Jehoiakim; while the prophecies against foreign nations, some of which were contained in the roll (c. 36²), are now all at the end of the book according to the Hebrew arrangement (see next section, 'The Septuagint Version of Jeremiah'). We can trace signs of a distinction between the methods in which the earlier and later parts of the book (those directly dictated to Baruch, and those which Baruch himself arranged, as editor) assumed their present shape. For such a formula as 'the word of the Lord came unto me' in the earlier part, we find later 'The word of the Lord came to Jeremiah.' In the same way the expression 'Jeremiah the prophet,' more likely to be used by Baruch when acting as editor than as amanuensis, is characteristic of the later chapters. In this way the earlier seem to give us the voice of the prophet himself, while in the later we have the scribe collecting the utterances of his master, arranging them as he deems best, and editing the records of his life. It follows from what we have said that the order of the groups of prophecies is not always that of time. Moreover, while it is in some cases clear, it is also often uncertain when they were delivered. The convulsions through which the nation was passing during the latter part of the period were far from favourable to any formal arrangement of the contents. But the very lack of order here and there observable serves a valuable end, in showing that we may consider ourselves to possess the words of Jeremiah put together in those same troublous times at which they were spoken, and not as they might afterwards have been remodelled and fitted to the notions of men of a later generation.

The following can only claim to be a rough approximation to a chronological arrangement.

5. The Septuagint Version of Jeremiah. The LXX, as a whole, adheres with tolerable fidelity to the Hebrew as we now possess it. But the book of Jeremiah in the Greek presents in various places so startling an exception to this rule, that it has been questioned whether the Greek is not in this case at least the more correct text.

The two main points of difference in the two texts are (a) that the Greek version omits, at different points, words amounting in the whole to about one-eighth of the text as it stands in the Hebrew; (b) that in the Greek the prophecies against foreign nations, instead of coming near the end of the book (chs. 46-51), stand after 25¹³, their logical place, where in the Hebrew text there is merely a reference to them. Also their order of sequence among themselves varies from that of the Hebrew.

Space does not allow further treatment of the question here; but it may be said that while there seems good reason for thinking that the form of the book on which the Greek translators' work was based preserves purer readings in many passages, and that the Hebrew has in some passages glossed or expanded the text, 'on the whole the Massoretic text deserves the preference' (Driver).

6. Jeremiah's Relations to his Predecessors. The prophet to whom Jeremiah is most closely related in thought and teaching is Hosca. Just as Hosea found idolatry and licentiousness in the kingdom of Israel in the years before its fall, so Jeremiah found them in Judah in similar political circumstances. It is probable that Jeremiah was acquainted with the prophecies of his large-hearted predecessor. Both were men of the same type of mind; both were deeply religious and jealous for Jehovah's service; and certain passages in the book of Jeremiah suggest the influence of the prophet of the North: cp. Jer 21⁶ with Hos 21⁵, Jer 31² with Hos 31, Jer 32² with Hos 14⁴, Jer 51¹ with Hos 4⁹, etc.

As already mentioned, in the early part of the prophet's career the 'book of the Law' (Deuteronomy) was found in the Temple. Its teaching supported him in his appeals to the people, and as the results of its discovery the reformation of worship was made by Josiah,

That Jeremiah was influenced by this book is seen, negatively, in the fact that we have no prophecies belonging to the latter part of Josiah's reign, the teaching of Deuteronomy and the adoption of its precepts having rendered his work unnecessary for the time; and positively in the frequent references to it which occur in his prophecies: cp. 2⁶ with Dt 32¹⁰, 5¹⁵ with Dt 28⁴⁹, 7³³ with Dt 28²⁶, 11⁸ with Dt 27²⁶, 11⁵ with Dt 7^{12,13}, 24⁹ with 28²⁵, etc.

Jeremiah is concerned with the sin of the people as exhibited in their unfaithfulness to God. It was not enough that they should have a reform of worship; the true reform was that of the human heart (1⁴); what they needed was a change of heart (24⁷ 31³¹). The importance of the individual in the sight of God is a prominent thought with our prophet. Men were to be punished for their own sins, he taught, not for those of their forefathers (31²⁹). Individual responsibility was to be the foundation of character and spiritual life. And consequently the new law was to be a spiritual bond between God and man, a law written in men's hearts, and obeyed in love and loyalty (31³¹). This teaching of the importance of the individual was the first step towards that faith in personal (as distinguished from racial) immortality, which from this time begins to be dimly sought after by Jewish thinkers.

CHAPTER 1

THE CALL OF JEREMIAH (13th year of Josiah). FIRST PROPHECY

1-3. See Introduction.

3. The fifth month] i.e. when Jerusalem was destroyed (2K 25^{3,5}).

4-10. Jeremiah's call and first prophecy.

4. The word of the LORD came unto me] see art. 'Introduction to Hebrew Prophecy.' We cannot doubt that Jeremiah had long mourned over his people's sins, and yet perhaps hesitated to undertake the burden of witnessing against them. At length he became conscious of a divine call to the prophetic office, which was not to be restricted: cp. 20⁷.

5. I knew thee] approved, selected thee: cp. Gn 18¹⁹ Ps 1⁶ Nah 1⁷. Sanctified] consecrated: cp. John Baptist (Lk 1¹⁵⁻¹⁷) and St. Paul (Gal 1^{15,16}). Unto the nations] This points out a distinction between the work of Jeremiah as a prophet and that of many of his predecessors, e.g. Elijah and Elisha. Their predictions were concerned with the Jews only. Those of Jeremiah, on the other hand, had to do with the heathen world as well, and also with the nations of subsequent ages, as he foretold the blessings that were to come on the earth through the Messiah. See Intro.

6. A child] not probably in years, but in fitness. 'Who is sufficient for these things?'

9. Touched my mouth] symbolic of divine grace and inspiration: cp. Isa 56 Ezk 2²⁻³.

10. Jeremiah's work was to be radical and destructive in denouncing the sins of his people and predicting their chastening, but also one of restoration and rebuilding through leading them to repentance.

11-19. Words of encouragement. Jeremiah is vouchsafed two visions. The first (11, 12) was the branch of an almond tree, which is extremely early in blossoming. This indicated that God would very soon execute His purposes and judgments. 12. Since the days of Manasseh the Lord had not visited upon the people their sins. That period of rest was like the winter. The Lord is now rousing Himself; yet not only to punish, but to save as well. Through Josiah's reforms and Jeremiah's ministry religion is to be kept alive in a remnant, viz. those carried to Babylon, and so the return shall at last be brought about.

13. The second vision was that of a scething pot with its mouth 'towards the south' (lit. 'from the face of the north'), and about to boil over. The meaning was as hinted in v. 14, that the great Babylonian power to the N. of Palestine, which had long been at strife with Elam and Media, would soon be directed against Judæa, the danger to which always depended upon the fact that it lay on the direct route of an army proceeding from the E. against Egypt.

15. Shall set every one his throne, etc.] This prediction was literally fulfilled (see 39³). The function of administering justice was exercised by the king in person, and the neighbourhood of the city gate was the ordinary place at which trials were held. Here then the rulers of the invader's army will sit in judgment on the conquered people.

17. Gird up thy loins] The shortening of the robe by drawing it up through the girdle was preparatory to active exertion: cp. Elijah 1K 18⁴⁶. 18. I have made thee . . a defenced city, etc.] God would endue Jeremiah with firmness and resolution to carry out his mission in spite of all opposition.

CHAPTERS 2-6

THE PROPHET SETS FORTH THE SIN OF THE NATION AND POINTS OUT THE INEVITABLE RESULT (Reign of Josiah, and probably before the reforms of that king: cp. 3⁶)

This section furnishes us with the gist of the prophet's testimony during the early years of his ministry, and doubtless represents the commencement of the roll written by Baruch at Jeremiah's dictation. In these five chs. he lays before his hearers the grossness of their conduct in deserting Jehovah, and urges repentance and amendment while yet the impending judgment is delayed. For the idolatrous and 'high place' worship of the period see Intro., and cp. Intro. to Hosea.

CHAPTER 2

JEREMIAH'S SECOND PROPHECY (2¹⁻³⁵)

The prophet expostulates with Israel because of their unfaithfulness to Jehovah.

1-13. Under the figure of the marriage relation Jehovah reminds the people of His past favours, and charges them with faithlessness to their first love, as shown by their idolatry.

2. The kindness of thy youth, etc.] Israel's earliest devotion to Jehovah at Sinai (Ex 24⁸).

3. Firstfruits of . . . increase] i.e. the consecrated part. All that devour, etc.] The priest and his family alone were to eat of the first fruits (Lv 22^{10,16}). If any unhallowed person took of them, he trespassed or 'offended.' In like manner if heathen nations meddle with Israel (the consecrated people), they will be guilty as those who eat the fruits.

5. Vanity] i.e. idols: cp. 10¹⁵. 6. The shadow of death] RV 'deep darkness,' as referring to a region where the supply of the necessities of life was so precarious that the fear of death was always present.

8. The priests, the pastors (i.e. rulers) and the prophets were all alike in sympathy with the degraded worship of Jehovah at the high places, mingled as it was with the worship of the Baalim. The priests were more concerned with gain than with purity of worship; and the prophetic guilds had also become corrupted by the general idolatry and immorality. It was the most degraded period of both these orders.

9. Plead] 'argue,' or 'contend.' 10. Chittim] probably Citium in Cyprus. Kedar] As Chittim represented the parts to the westward of Palestine, so did Kedar (the NW. of Arabia) those to the east. 11. None of the nations have forsaken their ancestral worship, false though it be. Israel has forsaken her ancient religion, though true.

13. God's blessing, under the figure of fresh water as supplied by a spring or rivulet, is contrasted with the vanity of serving idols, which is as devoid of profit as is a cracked reservoir (dug to collect rain water) for that which it is intended to supply.

14-35. Not only by her idolatry, but by her quests for alliance, now with Egypt and now with Assyria, has Judah shown her faithlessness. For both these sins she will be punished.

14. Is Israel, etc.] The meaning here probably is, How is it that Israel, the people of God, has become a slave to neighbouring powers? V. 17 gives the answer. 15. The young lions, etc.] the enemies of Israel. 16. Noph] probably Memphis, the capital of northern (lower) Egypt. Tahapanes] the classic Daphnæ, an Egyptian fortress on the E. frontier of Lower Egypt. It is again mentioned (43⁷⁻¹⁰) as the future scene of the acknowledgment of Nebuchadnezzar's supremacy over Egypt. The sense of the v. is, Egypt is God's instrument for punishing Judah. Have broken] RM 'fed on,' so as to make it bald; a disgrace.

18. Egypt] Some of Judah's politicians desired an alliance with Egypt; others with Assyria, or rather with Babylonia, Assyria's successor in the command of the East. Sihor] here the Nile; so in Isa 23⁸. Assyria] The Assyrian power had passed to Babylonia, but the name had been familiar for generations and was still in use for the great Eastern power. The river] Euphrates.

20. See Intro. respecting worship in 'high places,' simultaneously with that of Jehovah, which they thought a lawful combination. I have broken . . . and burst, etc.] RM 'thou hast broken,' etc., i.e. thou hast cast off allegiance to Me, thy Maker. Transgress] RV 'serve.'

When] RV 'for.' Wanderest] RV 'didst bow thyself,' in idolatry, thus dishonouring thy rightful spouse. 21. A noble vine] a 'Sorek' vine, the word probably indicating the dark-purple colour of the fruit. Strange vine] cp. Isa 5^{2,4}. 22. Nitre] RV 'lye,' i.e. natron, or carbonate of soda.

23. Baalim] the Heb. plural of 'Baal': cp. 'cherubim,' 'seraphim.' The Baalim were the images of the local Baals under the form of a bull at the various shrines. The valley] Most likely Hinnom (S. of Jerusalem), which was defiled by Josiah in order that the impure rites (viz. the worship of Moloch = Baal) here referred to might cease. Traversing] running quickly hither and thither in the eagerness of her passion. Vv. 23-25 are figurative of Israel's shameless love of idolatry. 24. Ather pleasure] RV 'in her desire.' 25. Withhold, etc.] pursue not thy reckless wanton quest with parched throat and worn-out sandal.

30. Your prophets] Such as Isaiah (said to have been sawn asunder) and Zechariah son of Jehoiada (2 Ch 24²⁰), and those whom Jezebel (1 K 18¹³) or Manasseh (2 K 21¹⁰) slew: cp. Mt 23²⁹⁻³⁰. 31. A wilderness] i.e. fruitless, useless. We are lords] RV 'we are broken loose'; we are our own masters. 33. Why art thou so careful in thy devotion to strange gods? In so doing thou hast made wicked ways to be a second nature to thee (or, thou hast taught the wicked women thy ways).

34. Poor innocents] RV 'the innocent poor.' By secret search] RV 'at the place of breaking in.' The allusion is to the law (Ex 22²) by which it was permissible to slay a thief caught in the act of breaking into a house. But those 'innocent poor' had committed no such crime, yet their blood had been wantonly shed: cp. the cruelties of Manasseh 2 K 21¹⁶.

Upon all these] RM 'upon every oak,' or, perhaps, 'because of this,' i.e. your lust for idolatry.

35. Plead] RV 'enter into judgement.'

36. Ashamed of Egypt] literally fulfilled when the Egyptians in the reign of Zedekiah were expected to raise the siege of Jerusalem, but failed to do so: cp. 37^b. Ashamed of Assyria] A conspicuous instance was in the reign of Ahaz (2Ch 28²¹). 37. Thine hands upon thine head] clasped in disgrace.

C. 3. 1. That land] an allusion to the law (Dt 24¹⁻⁴) that under such circumstances the reunion of husband and wife would pollute the land. Yet return again, etc.] RM 'and think-est thou to return again.'

2. The Arabian] the Bedouin freebooters. As they are eager to despoil a passing caravan, so is Israel eager for the worship of false gods. 5. Behold, thou hast spoken, etc.] RM 'Thou hast spoken thus, but hast done evil things.' As thou couldst] RV 'and hast had thy way.'

CHAPTERS 36-44

JEREMIAH'S THIRD PROPHECY. THE FATE OF THE TEN TRIBES A WARNING TO JUDAH

In this prophecy, as in the last, idolatry is denounced under the figure of unfaithfulness to the marriage vow. But as a marked distinction, God here invites to repentance, and on this there hinges pardon.

6-20. Israel and Judah have both forsaken their Divine Spouse, but forgiveness will follow repentance.

7-11. Samaria, the capital of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, after a stubborn resistance had been captured by Sargon, king of Assyria, 722 B.C., and more than 27,000 of its inhabitants deported. The isolation and comparative poverty of Judah helped her to survive her northern sister for well over a hundred years. But failure to take advantage of the warning thus afforded her brought its inevitable results. Moreover, in spite of greater privileges, she had added to apostasy treachery, by hypocritically feigning still to pay homage to Jehovah under cover of idolatrous rites. She had rejected Josiah's reforms, and this rejection sealed her fate. 'It is not by the act of its government that a nation stands or falls; Ahaz and Manasseh lent the weight of their influence to the cause of idolatry; Hezekiah and Josiah to the cause of truth: but the nation had to determine which should prevail' (Speaker's Commentary).

8. I saw] some read, 'she saw.' Bill of divorce] i.e. exile.

11. Justified herself more] for Judah had even more warning than Israel.

12. Toward the north] to Assyria, the place of Israel's captivity.

14. One of...two of, etc.] A 'city' might be a mere village. A 'family,' i.e. descendants of a common ancestor, suggested a larger number. There were, e.g., only four or five families in the whole tribe of Judah. The reference here is to the return from the exile to Palestine.

16. The blessings of repentance and obedience. Even the ark with the mercy seat on which the brightness which marked Jehovah's presence rested shall be forgotten, for Jehovah shall no longer be confined to one place or one people. All nations shall serve Him; His dominion centred in Jerusalem shall extend to the ends of the earth. 17. Imagination] RV 'stubbornness.' 19. The Lord tells of His affection for Israel. But] rather, 'and.' How] i.e. In what honourable position? The children] the nations of the earth, all of them God's children, as created by Him.

22-25. An acceptable prayer of repentance.

23. The multitude of mountains] RV 'the tumult' (RM 'the noisy throng') 'on the mountains': the orgies and clamorous supplications of idolatrous crowds at the high places.

24. Shame] RV 'the shameful thing,' i.e. the god Baal: cp. 11¹³. Hath devoured] hath consumed in the form of sacrifices the fruits of our toil.

C. 4. 1-4. The assurance of forgiveness.

1. Then shalt, etc.] RM 'and wilt not wander.'

3. Break up, etc.] As the farmer is careful to clear the soil of weeds before sowing his seed, so with Israel. The sowing of repentance must be serious and real.

4. Circumcise] Circumcision was a dedication of self to God's service, and a removal of imperfections.

CHAPTERS 45-630

JEREMIAH'S FOURTH PROPHECY (OR GROUP OF PROPHECIES). GOD'S JUDGMENT UPON THE UNREPENTANT

When the check which Josiah's personal character and influence put upon idolatry was removed, Jeremiah foresaw that the condition of the nation would become well-nigh desperate.

CHAPTER 45-31

5-10. Destruction approaches Jerusalem.

6. Set up the standard] to mark out the safest route to those who were seeking the shelter of the walls of Jerusalem. Evil from the north] The enemy (see v. 13) used chariots, and were therefore probably the Chaldeans, not (as some have supposed) Scythians. 7. The lion] i.e. the enemy. Of the Gentiles] RV 'of nations.'

10. Jeremiah here struggles against the fate announced for the nation. After all its glorious history and the many promises of coming glory that prophets like Isaiah had made to it, was this to be the end? The prophet was 'in a strait betwixt two,' sorrowing for the doom of the nation and anxious to avert it, and yet desirous to vindicate Jehovah's ways to them. Hence this exceeding bitter cry. Some, however, regard the v. as a reference to the mischief done by the false prophets, who had promised peace in the name of the Lord.

11-18. Description of the attack.

11. A dry wind] the Chaldean army coming like a sirocco from the E. 15. Dan was on the northern border of Palestine. Mount Ephraim was the range immediately N. of Judah, only about 10 m. from Jerusalem itself. Thus the enemy's approach is rapid.

16. The nations summoned to witness the vengeance on the chosen people. The watchers are the Chaldean besiegers. 17. The besiegers' tents compared to the booths of shepherds or husbandmen.

19-31. The prophet expresses horror at the approaching calamity.

19. My bowels] supposed to be the seat of emotions. 21. See v. 6. 22. God's answer to the implied appeal to know why the invasion was permitted. It is not without cause, for, etc. 24. Lightly] RV 'to and fro.'

27. Yet will I not make a full end] The destruction will not be complete: a remnant shall return: cp. Am 9⁸. 30. And when thou art spoiled] better, 'and thou, spoiled one,' i.e. Jerusalem. Rentest thy face with painting] RV 'enlargest thine eyes with paint.' The Eastern custom was to paint black the border of the eyes, so as to give the effect of size and brilliancy. So Jezebel in 2 K 9³⁰.

CHAPTER 5

1-9. The universal corruption of the city prevents forgiveness.

2. Though they say, The LORD liveth] i.e. though they take the most solemn form of oath, as opposed to those held by the Jews to be of less obligation: cp. Mt 5^{34, 35}. 3. The truth] RM 'faithfulness.' It is this that God looks for. 4. These are poor, etc.] i.e. the ignorant ones who know no better. 5. Yoke . . bonds] i.e. restraints of God's law. 6. Lion] i.e. the invader: cp. 47. Evenings] RM 'deserts.'

7, 8. All idolatry was unfaithfulness to God, to whom Israel was espoused, but gross licentiousness was literally the common accompaniment of the worship of the reproductive powers of nature, such as was practised by the Canaanites.

8. In the morning] RM 'roaming at large.'

10-31. In spite of fancied security desolation is at hand in requital for rebellion and faithlessness.

10. Jerusalem is likened to a walled-in vineyard, and the Chaldean host is bidden to batter and trample it. Yet the overthrow shall not be complete, for Israel is, after all, a chosen nation. Battlements] RV 'branches,' so as to keep up the figure of the vine. Though the tendrils be cut away yet the stock shall be left.

12. It is not he] It is not God who sends these messages of woe. 13. The prophets, etc.] These are still the words of the scoffing Jews. 15. A nation] the Assyrian. 16. Is as an open sepulchre] for it is filled with missiles dealing death.

19. Note the distinct prophecy of the captivity of Judah. 24. Jeremiah reminds them of the providence of God, who sends the winter and spring rains, so needful for the crops, and maintains a dry season between Passover and Pentecost for harvesting.

25-28. A strong testimony to the deception, avarice, and oppression of the time. 28. Yet they prosper] RV 'that they' (the orphans) 'should prosper.'

31. Prophets, priests, and people alike connived at and took part in these crimes. By their means] RM 'at their hands.' Formerly the prophetic guilds had borne witness for righteousness and withstood the priests: now they are become false prophets, abetting the priests in their idolatry and wickedness.

CHAPTER 6

1-8. The hostile army approaches.

1. Benjamin] Jerusalem was within the territory assigned to this tribe. Tekoa] 11 m. S. of Jerusalem, and in the line of flight for its inhabitants seeking to escape an enemy from the N. A sign of fire] a warning signal. Beth-haccerem] probably a hill between Jerusalem and Tekoa, and thus suitable for a beacon station. 2. RV 'The comely and delicate one, the daughter of Zion will I cut off,' a tenderly worded lament over the ill-fated city. Daughter] is used for the inhabitants collectively. 3. A figure of the devastating enemy. Flocks eating the herbage on every side are a figure to express devastation.

4, 5. The invaders propose a determined and continuous attack. 4. Prepare] RM 'Heb. sanctify.' Entering on a war was accompanied by religious ceremonies: cp. Dt 20²⁴. 6. Hew ye down trees] to clear the approaches to the city. Cast a mount] earth was carried in baskets and poured in a heap until it was on a level with the walls: cp. this method of assault in 2 K 19³² Isa 29³.

To be visited] with punishment. 7. Grief] RV 'sickness.'

9-21. Retribution awaiting the guilty people. 9. Into the baskets] RM 'upon the shoots.' As the grape-gatherer goes back over the tendrils, lest he should have missed any of the fruit, so the people shall be subject to successive gleanings at the hand of their conquerors, who are here addressed. 10. Uncircumcised] in the sense of 'imperfect': cp. Ex 6¹². 11. Abroad] RV 'in the street.'

14. They] the leaders, prophets, and priests. The hurt] the sins and shortcomings. They are like physicians who for their own ease assure their patients that all is well.

16. God's appeal. 'A national calamity is at hand. As prudent men ye will desire to avoid it. Make enquiries what paths led your ancestors to prosperity. Were they those of idolatry or of true religion and purity?'

17. Watchmen] the prophets sounding the alarm. The trumpet] warning of approaching danger. 18. What is among them] i.e. what is the punishment impending over Judah.

20. Sheba] in the S. of Arabia. The general sense of the v. is, 'To obey is better than sacrifice' (1S 15²²). Cane] i.e. calamus, a sweet-scented reed, used in making the anointing oil. 21. Stumblingblocks, etc.] the enemy's invasion, which would, as it were, trip them up in their easy-going ways.

22-24. The approaching invader. These vv. are repeated with necessary changes in 50⁴¹⁻⁴³, where Babylon is the object of the threat.

22. The sides of the earth] an expression for the far distance.

23. The Assyrian monuments show us rows of impaled victims hanging round the walls of besieged towns, also men collecting in heaps hands cut off from the vanquished enemy.

25. Fear is on every side] a favourite expression with Jeremiah (20) 3^{me. 10} 46⁵ 49²⁹).

27-30. The nation incapable of reform. Jehovah reassures Jeremiah of his divino commission. The prophet appears under the figure of one testing metal by smelting. The result of the process is that no precious metal is found. All is dross.

27. A tower] RM 'trier,' or tester. A fortress] He shall have God's protection in his task. 28. They are brass and iron] They have none of the precious metal in them.

29. All the prophet's fervour is without effect. Nothing of value rewards the long assay. Are burned] RV 'blow fiercely.'

Plucked away] i.e. eliminated from the good.

30. Reprobate] RV 'refuse.'

CHAPTERS 7-10²⁵

JEREMIAH'S FIFTH PROPHECY (OR GROUP OF PROPHECIES). ADDRESS AT THE TEMPLE GATE (Reign of Josiah or beginning of that of Jehoiakim)

The prophet takes advantage of a solemn gathering of the people at Jerusalem to stand at one of the Temple gates as they pass in, and warns them against their superstitions confidence that the possession of the Temple was itself a charm against danger from without. As immorality had already brought about the overthrow of an older sanctuary (Shiloh) as well as of the Ten Tribes, so shall it be with them. Punishment for the wickedness of leaders and people can only be averted by a speedy amendment of life.

It is possible that these chapters may be an expanded account of the prophecy closely resembling them, which is recorded in c. 26 as spoken at the commencement of Jehoiakim's reign. But it is more likely that the two occasions are distinct.

CHAPTER 7

1-20. Ceremonies and sacred places shall be no defence.

4. God, said the false prophets, will never allow His Temple to be overthrown: cp. Mic 3¹¹.

The temple, etc.] This threefold repetition suggests 'the energy of iteration that only belongs to Eastern fanatics' (Stanley, 'Jewish Church,' ii, 438).

5-7. Their tenure of the Temple is conditional on obedience to the covenant made by God with their fathers. 10. We are delivered] By the discharge of this formality we are set free for a return to wickedness. 11. Den of robbers] a place of retreat in the intervals between acts of violence: see Mt 21¹³ and parallel passages.

12. Shiloh] a town of Ephraim, in a central position, chosen by Joshua as the resting-place of the ark and for the Tabernacle. It was a considerable place in the time of the Judges (Jg 21^{19, 21}). Its fall into idolatry was followed by loss of the ark (1S 4) and subsequent capture and cruel treatment (Ps 78^{58, 67}). Thenceforward it became insignificant, so that Jeroboam, when setting up calves for his rival worship, passed it by. 15. Ephraim] meaning, as often (e.g. Isa 7²), the ten northern tribes in captivity for nearly a century.

16. So in 147, when Jeremiah does intercede for them, the prayer is rejected. 18. Queen of heaven] identified either with the moon or with the Assyrian Ishtar, the planet Venus. The Jewish women were specially given to that worship, offering incense and cakes stamped with a representation of the goddess: cp. 44¹⁷.

19. Do they provoke me] Their sin does not provoke God to a mere helpless anger, but to a wrath that is quick to punish and destroy them.

21-28. The moral law has always taken precedence of the ceremonial.

21. Put your burnt offerings, etc.] Multiply your victims ad libitum. It will avail you nought.

22, 23. This need not be more than a forcible oratorical expression, not meaning that no ceremonial laws were given to Israel when brought out of Egypt, but that in the promulgation of the Ten Commandments on Sinai there was no direction concerning sacrifice. These were the only precepts which had the honour of being treasured up in the ark. Thus from the first they were shown to hold the chief place: cp. Isa 1¹¹⁻¹⁴. 'The law of obedience was the earliest law of all (Gn 2^{16f}), and the most important; that of sacrifice was of secondary importance' (Deane). 24. Imagination] see on 3¹⁷. 27. Jeremiah need not therefore expect that his words will be heeded.

29-34. Where they sinned there shall they be punished.

29. Cut off thine hair] in token of mourning, or as a Nazirite shaved his head after immediate contact with a dead body (Nu 6⁹) to mark defilement. The hair was the mark of consecration of the High Priest (Ex 29⁶) and of the Nazirite (Nu 6⁵). Here it is the mark of Jerusalem as chief city of a consecrated people.

31. Valley of Hinnom] on the W. and S. sides of the city, Tophet being near the E. extremity of the S. reach. The valley had an evil name, (a) as the place of human sacrifices; (b) as defiled by Josiah; (c) as the receptacle of the offal and filth of the city. Hence it afterwards became with the Jewish Rabbis the visible emblem of the place of future punishment, Gehenna: cp. Mt 5²². To burn, etc.] in honour of Moloch, often identified with Baal, the sun-god (see on Gn 22 2K 16³). 32. Till there be no place] rather, 'for want of room' (elsewhere). The carnage of war shall extend far beyond the valley.

Some think that the immediate result of this discourse was the trial of the prophet, as recorded in 26⁷⁻²⁴, when the mob rose against him and he was saved with difficulty.

CHAPTER 8

1-3. The dead shall share in the universal punishment.

1. Shall bring out the bones] either from pure wantonness, or in the hope of finding treasure or ornaments of value. 2. Before the sun] the heavenly bodies will not be prevented by all the offerings and devotions that they have received from using their influence to hasten the rotting of the carcases of their sometime worshippers.

3. Family] the whole nation: see on 3¹⁴.

4-17. The people are hardened in sin.

4. They] RV 'men.' If a man stumble, he will naturally regain his footing: if he lose his way he will return to it. Not so with this people. 6. As the horse, etc.] meaning, an eager plunge into wrongdoing.

7. The turtle and the crane and the swallow] rather, 'The turtle dove and the swift and the crane': cp. Isa 1³.

8. Lo, certainly in vain . . . in vain] RV 'But, behold, the false pen of the scribes hath wrought falsely,' i.e. they have used their knowledge of the Law to deceive others, persuading them that they may transgress with impunity. The scribes (frequently mentioned in NT.) were a class of persons who devoted themselves to the study and exposition of the Law. That they were a leading class as early as the time of Josiah (and Jeremiah's whole argument depends on this fact) is a strong argument in favour of the belief that the Book of the Law even at that time had well-grounded claims to antiquity.

10. Shall inherit them] shall take possession of them. The idea is forcible seizure by the invader. 11. See on 6¹⁴. 13. And the things . . . from them] RM 'I have appointed them those that shall pass over them': viz. the Assyrians invading them as a flood.

14 f. The people address one another, while suffering under the troubles thus described.

Enter into the defenced cities] i.e. out of villages for protection. Water of gall] bitterness is our portion. 16. His horses] i.e. those of the Babylonian invader. Strong ones] war-horses. So in 47⁸ 50¹¹. 17. Cockatrices] RV 'basilisks,' RM 'adders': Jeremiah may have chosen the word because of its resemblance in sound in the Hebrew to the word northern, the invaders coming from that quarter. Charmed] so as to be harmless.

18-22. Jeremiah speaks. 18. When I would] RV 'O that I could.' 19 f. Jeremiah is in thought anticipating the captivity and the distressful cries of the exiles in the direction of their home. 20. When the harvest was bad there was still hope of the yield from grapes, etc. But the people had lost one chance of deliverance after another, and might now despair. Summer] RM 'ingathering of summer fruits.' 21. Black] RM 'mourning.' 22. 'Is there no way of saving this people?' Gilead was a mountainous part of Palestine E. of the Jordan. Balm (balsam) was found there, and naturally in the same place would be found those skilled in its use.

CHAPTER 9

1-22. The prophet continues his lament. The impending doom.

2. A lodging place, etc.] a caravanserai (khan), supplying a bare shelter, even the most desolate spot, if he may thereby escape the crimes of Jerusalem.

7. Melt . . . try] i.e. remove the dross, and test whether the metal is now pure. 8. His wait] RV 'wait for him.' 10. Habitations] RV 'pastures.' 11. Dragons] RV 'jackals'; so in 49³³. 12. For what, etc.] rather (with RV), a new question, 'Wherefore is?' etc. Why this heavy chastisement?

17. Mourning women] professionals, who with dishevelled locks and bared breasts led the loud weeping. Cuning] skilful.

23, 24. The people have been trusting in worldly wisdom, power, and riches; but the only sure trust is in knowing the will of God, who Himself acts righteously, and desires that men should do the same.

25. Them which are circumcised with the uncircumcised] RV 'Them which are circumcised in their uncircumcision.' They are circumcised in the flesh, but uncircumcised in spirit: cp. Dt 10¹⁶ Ro 2^{28, 29}. Judah is become as the other nations which observe the outward rite, but have not the spirit of which it is the symbol. 26. That are in the utmost corners] RV 'that have the corners of their hair polled': cp. Lv 19²⁷. The reference is to the tribes of Kedar: see 49^{23, 32}.

CHAPTER 10

1-16. The folly of idolatry.

This section of the prophecy is of doubtful authorship. For (a) it introduces a break in the sense; (b) there is less smoothness between the parts than we generally find in Jeremiah's writings; (c) its language differs considerably from his use elsewhere, and closely resembles that of Isaiah 40-44; (d) the writer emphasises the fact that false gods are incapable of hurting, while Jeremiah elsewhere speaks rather of them as powerless to aid; (e) vv. 2, 4 read as though addressed to men who were contemplating the idolatry around them, rather than guilty of it themselves. For these reasons it is held by some to be a discourse addressed by an unknown author during the captivity to the exiles at Babylon: cp. the spurious letter ascribed to Jeremiah, which forms c. 6 of the (apocryphal) book of Baruch.

It should, however, be said, on the other hand, that the Septuagint version of this book, though omitting much that is found in the Hebrew (see Intro.), yet contains this chapter.

2. Signs of heaven] portents in the sky, such as comets and meteors. 3. People] nations.

5. Upright as the palm tree] RV 'like a palm tree, of turned work.' These idols are as stiff and lifeless. 7. To thee doth it appertain] Thine is the supreme kingship. 8. The stock, etc.] RV 'the instruction of idols, it is but a stock': an idol is wood, and can never get beyond it. 9. Tarshish] probably Tarsus in Spain, or perhaps Tarsus in Cilicia.

Uphaz] perhaps the same as Ophir, which was probably either in India or on the E. coast of Arabia. Founder] RV 'goldsmith': so in v. 14.

11. This v. is in the later Hebrew or Aramaic. It may therefore have been originally a note on the margin of the manuscript, afterwards copied into the text. 13. The ascent of the vapours in clouds is spoken of poetically, as though it were the consequence of the thunder (his voice), because it is seen to follow it. 14. In his knowledge] RV 'and is without knowledge.' 16. The portion of Jacob] i.e. the true God, upon whom Israel has a claim. Former] Maker, Fashioner. The rod] RV 'tribe.' 17-25. The coming troubles. This section seems to be closely connected with, and should probably be read after, 97-22.

17. Gather up, etc.] i.e. collect articles for a hasty flight, O thou who art in a besieged city'; i.e. prepare for exile. 18. Find it so] RV 'feel it'. 19f. The lament of Jerusalem.

20. The spoiling and exile represented in figurative language. Tabernacle] RV 'tent.'

21. The condemnation of the rulers.

22. The bruit] RV 'a rumour.' The north country] see on 1¹⁸. Dragons] see on 9¹¹.

23. Jeremiah's prayer: the helplessness of man, and his dependence on God.

CHAPTERS 11, 12

JEREMIAH'S SIXTH PROPHECY (Reign of Josiah). THE BROKEN COVENANT ENTAILS A CURSE

These chs. form a connected prophecy. They probably belong to Josiah's time, for (a) 'the words of this covenant' (11³) seem to refer to the reading of the newly discovered law mentioned in 2K 23³; (b) Jeremiah has not yet removed from Anathoth to Jerusalem (11²¹), and (c) the apparent allusion (12¹) to a drought accords with similar references in prophecies belonging to Josiah's reign (3³ 5²⁴).

CHAPTER 11

1-14. Punishment must follow faithlessness.

3. Cursed, etc.] cp. the language of the warnings in Deuteronomy (27¹⁵⁻²⁶), a book with which this passage has other features in common. 4. The iron furnace] the brick-kilns of the bondage in Egypt (Ex 1¹⁴) may have given rise to the figure as expressive of affliction. 6. The cities of Judah] Jeremiah may have accompanied Josiah in the journey which he made to Bethel and to the cities of Samaria for the overthrow of idolatry (2K 23^{13, 19}). 7. Rising early] a frequent phrase with Jeremiah to denote earnestness, but not occurring in that sense elsewhere. 8. Imagination] RV 'stubbornness.'

9. A conspiracy] The words seem to point to an actual secret combination against Josiah on account of his reforms. 10. The iniquities of their forefathers] referring to the idolatry in the wilderness days. They went after] RV 'they are gone after,' viz. the Jews of the prophet's own day. The reformation had not taken hold of the hearts of the people, they had returned to their heathenism.

13. The worship of Baal was practised secretly or openly in all parts of the country and city. Shameful thing] i.e. Baal.

15-20. The people resent rebuke.

15. Faithless Judah's presence in the Temple is only an intrusion. And the holy flesh is passed from thee] better, perhaps, 'shall vows and holy flesh (i.e. sacrifices) take away thy wickedness?'

16. The fair promise and the punishment which apostasy brought about.

18. The prophet passes from the general to the particular, and charges his fellow-townsmen of Anathoth with conspiring to silence and even to kill him. The Lord had shown him their intentions.

19. Like a lamb or an ox] RV 'like a gentle lamb.' The tree with the fruit thereof] apparently a proverb. Not only is the tree to perish but there is to be no chance of reproduction by the sowing of its seed.

21-23. Anathoth shall be punished.

23. There shall be no remnant of them] viz. of the actual conspirators. Among those who return from exile are mentioned 'men of Anathoth' (Ezr 2²³).

CHAPTER 12

1-4. The prosperity of the wicked perplexes Jeremiah.

1. Wherefore, etc.] The question was one which much exercised men of pre-Christian times who had no clear view of any but temporal rewards and punishments. See Pss 37, 39, 49, 73, and Job (specially 21⁷⁻¹¹). The plots of his fellow-townsmen at Anathoth (see c. 11) were probably the occasion of this outburst of Jeremiah's. 2. Near in their mouth, etc.] They honour God with their lips but their heart is far from Him. 4. A drought has been sent in punishment. He shall not see, etc.] Jeremiah's denunciations are derided by his enemies.

5, 6. God's answer to the prophet's appeal. By two proverbial expressions He shows him that he must prepare to endure worse things than any he has yet been called upon to face. He has been in danger at Anathoth, but greater dangers await him at Jerusalem. Let him therefore be strong and play the man.

5. Swelling] RV 'pride,' referring to the luxuriant vegetation on the banks, which formed a source of danger, as a covert for wild beasts.

7-13. A lament over the desolate land. Some scholars think that this passage belongs to the time after the first siege and capture of Jerusalem, where Jehoiachin was led into captivity.

8. The v. indicates the hostile attitude of the people to God. 9. The figures to represent the coming desolation are, first, that of birds assembling round one of their own kind and maltreating it, because its plumage attracts their attention as unusual, and then that of hungry beasts of prey. 10. Pastors] leaders of the invading armies: cp. 6³, where they are called 'shepherds.'

12. High places through] RV 'the bare heights in': no spot shall escape.

13. And they shall be ashamed] RV 'And ye shall,' etc. Revenues] RV 'fruits.'

14. Mine evil neighbours] Syrians, Edomites, Moabites and others who would feel that Judah's difficulty formed their opportunity. Both they and Judah shall be punished by exile; but God will restore them in His mercy. If the heathen will but seek to serve God, they shall share in the blessings He has in store for Judah after they have suffered and repented.

CHAPTER 13

JEREMIAH'S SEVENTH PROPHECY (Reign of Jehoiachin). THE LINEN GIRDLE

The date of this prophecy is shown pretty clearly by the word 'queen' (v. 18), which means queen-mother, namely, Nebushta, mother of Jehoiachin. The queen-mother had always a high position, and in Jehoiachin's case this would be specially so, owing to his tender years.

1-11. The symbol of the linen girdle.

1. Go, etc.] It is doubtful whether this and the subsequent acts of the prophet were real or done only in symbol. As, however, Jeremiah appears to have been absent from Jerusalem during the most of the latter years of Jehoiachin, he may well be supposed during part of that time to have been in or near Babylon: cp. v. 4. This would account for the kindly feeling shown towards him afterwards by Nebuchadnezzar (39¹¹), which seems to point to an earlier acquaintance.

The girdle represents the people of Judah (vv. 9, 10). Jehovah chose them for His service and glory, but they turned away and served other gods. Therefore as the girdle lost its beauty, so will they lose their beauty and come to ruin beside the Euphrates.

10. Imagination] RV 'stubbornness.'

12-14. The symbol of the bottles. Under the figure of intoxication, through which the people shall be helpless to resist the enemy's attack, the prophet intimates God's punishment for headstrong continuance in sin: cp. 25¹⁵; and for Israel under the figure of a bottle or jar, cp. 18¹⁻⁶. Bottle] RM 'jar' (of earthenware; not the skin bottles of NT.). The bottle represents the people, and the wine the wrath of God. But the people failed to see the significance of the message.

15-27. Vain appeal to Judah.

16. Give glory] a Hebrew idiom, meaning, confess your sins : cp. Josh 7¹⁰ Jn 9²¹. Danger, difficulty, and gloom are near. 17. In secret places] The prophet will mourn apart, as he did in Jehoiakim's reign. 18. See note at head of c. The kings practised polygamy; hence the high position taken by the queen-mother : cp. 1K 15¹³ 2K 10¹⁸. Principalities] RV 'headtires,' diadems.

19. Cities of the south] i.e. of Judah.

Shall be] RV 'are.' Shut up] i.e. besieged, blockaded, by the Chaldeans.

20. The north] see on 1¹⁸. Where is the flock?] Where are the towns that once lay, like a fair flock of sheep, grouped around thee?

21. RV 'What wilt thou say when he shall set thy friends over thee as head, seeing thou thyself hast instructed them against thee?' The reference is to Egypt and Babylon, the friendship and guidance of which countries Judah had alternatively courted, and thus was but preparing the way for subjection to them. He is Jehovah. 22. Made bare] and thus subject to the roughness of the road as thou art led captive. 23. They are incapable of repentance. 24. The wind of the wilderness] see on 4¹¹. 25. Of thy measures] RV 'measured unto thee.' Falsehood] i.e. idolatry: cp. 10¹⁴ 16¹⁹. 27. Made clean] i.e. from infidelity and idolatry. When shall it once be? RV 'How long shall it yet be?'

CHAPTERS 14, 15

JEREMIAH'S EIGHTH PROPHECY (Reign of Jehoiakim?). THE IMPENDING DROUGHT AND OTHER WOES

Dialogue between the prophet and God. He intercedes; but in vain, for the nation persists in sin. In this section we probably see the state of matters in the early part of Jehoiakim's reign. There is no historical allusion to the drought which formed the occasion of the prophecy.

CHAPTER 14

1-6. Description of the drought.

2. The gates thereof languish] Figurative of the people who collect there. They are black unto] RV 'They sit in black (mourning) upon.' 3. Covered their heads] as a sign of grief or confusion: cp. David (2S 19⁴) and Haman (Esth 6¹²). 6. They snuffed up the wind] RV 'They pant for air.' Dragons] RV 'jackals.'

7-22. Jeremiah's pleadings and God's replies.

7. Do thou it] RV 'work thou.' 8. As a stranger, etc.] one who has no interest in the people. Turneth aside] RM 'spreadeth his tent.' 9. Astonied] hesitating, inactive.

13. Jeremiah pleads that the false prophets have misled the people. 17. The virgin daughter of my people] i.e. Judah, whom God had hitherto protected. 19. The prophet again intercedes. 21. The throne of thy glory] Jerusalem, or, more particularly, the Temple.

22. A reference to the drought (v 1). God alone can remove it.

CHAPTER 15

1-9. The coming woes described.

1. Moses (Ex 17¹¹ 32¹¹ Nu 14¹³⁻²⁰) and Samuel (1S 7⁹ 12²⁸) were successful pleaders with God in time past: cp. Ps 99⁶. 2. To death] meaning, by pestilence. 4. To be removed into] RV 'to be tossed to and fro among.' For Manasseh's wickedness see 2K 21³⁴. 7. They shall be dispersed and driven forth from the land by every way of exit. 8. Even the mothers of warriors in the prime of youth shall have none to protect them. At noonday] taking them by surprise: see 6⁴. I have caused him, etc.] RV 'I have caused anguish and terrors to fall upon her' (the mother) 'suddenly.'

10-21. Jeremiah's lament and appeal. God's reply.

10. I have neither lent, etc.] The Jews were forbidden to take interest from one another (Dt 23²⁰), and the money-lender accordingly was held in extreme disfavour. Jeremiah laments that his mission is constantly one of strife with his people. 11. It shall be well with thy remnant] RV 'I will strengthen thee for good.' His enemies shall not only spare Jeremiah, but invoke his aid. This took place more than once: see 21¹⁴ 37⁸ 42².

12. Judea is not tough enough to withstand the Chaldean power. For northern, cp. 6¹. 14. I will make thee to pass with] Some authorities read, 'I will make thee to serve.' So it runs in the parallel passage, 17⁴.

16. He describes the joyful acceptance with which he first received the divine commission.

17. The mockers] RV 'them that make merry.' There is no suggestion of wrong doing in the original word. Because of thy hand] meaning God's guidance. His inspiration. For this sense of 'hand' cp. Isa 8¹¹ and Ezk 1³ 37¹. 18. Liar] RV 'deceitful brook.' As waters that fail] The figure is that of a watercourse, which being dried up belies the anticipations of the thirsty traveller. cp. Job 6¹⁵. Jeremiah laments that his message seems to have no effect.

19. Return] i.e. repent of his murmuring.

Stand before me] as my servant: cp. for the phrase, 1K 18¹⁵ 2K 3¹⁴. Take forth the precious from the vile] i.e. purge himself of his distrust. Let them return, etc.] Deliver your message, regardless of the people's favour. They must turn to God. 20. See 1^{18,19}.

CHAPTERS 16, 17¹⁻¹⁸

JEREMIAH'S NINTH PROPHECY (Reign of Jehoiakim?). PUNISHMENT OF JUDAH BY PESTILENCE AND EXILE

It is clear from 17¹⁵, in which the people challenge the prophet to point to a fulfilment of his prophecies of woe, that it is at any rate earlier than the capture of Jerusalem at the end of Jehoiachin's reign.

CHAPTER 16

1-13. Self-denial and an ascetic life are to be the prophet's lot.

6. Nor cut themselves] in token of mourning: cp. 47⁵. 7. Tear themselves for them] RV 'break bread for them.' The reference here and in the rest of the v. is to the custom that the friends should urge the mourners to eat and drink: cp. 2S3⁸⁵ 12^{16f}. Prov31⁶.

12. Imagination] cp. 31⁷. 13. There shall ye serve other gods] if you please. Spoken ironically.

14-21. The deliverance will be in proportion to the severity of the punishment.

14, 15. Yet the coming deliverance shall be one in comparison with which even the exodus from Egypt shall pale. For Jeremiah's custom of throwing in a bright thought among gloomy ones see 31⁴ 4²⁷ 5¹⁰, 18 27²² 30³ 32³⁷.

15. The land of the north] i.e. Babylon: a promise of restoration after the exile.

16. Many fishers] Judah's enemies. The people shall be hunted down with energy wherever they may be found.

19-21. God's power thus shown in the care of His people for evil and then for good, and witnessed by other nations, shall lead even the most distant of them to acknowledge Him.

CHAPTER 17¹⁻¹⁸

1-4. The sin of Judah is indelible. Hence the severity of the punishment.

2. Groves] RV 'Asherim,' wooden pillars, or monuments, set up in honour of Astoreth (Astarte), generally near altars (e.g. Jg6²³). The Law ordered them to be pulled down (Ex34¹³). 3. O my mountain in the field] The hill on which Jerusalem is built rises high above the plain. On the other hand, it is lower than the surrounding mountains, hence can be spoken of as a 'valley' in 21¹³. For sin] i.e. because of sin.

5-8. God alone is worthy of trust.

6. The heath] RM 'a tamarisk.' The figure is that of a barren, profitless life. 7, 8. Note the parallels to Ps 1. But which has been influenced by the other is a question more difficult than important. 8. See] RV 'fear.' Careful] i.e. anxious.

9-11. God searches out and punishes evil.

11. RV 'As the partridge that gathereth young which she hath not brought forth,' and which will soon fly away—a popular belief of which Jeremiah avails himself to illustrate the truth that riches unlawfully gotten are a precarious possession.

12-18. God is the Saviour of the faithful.

12, 13. Connected with the preceding v. The covetous man will be disappointed; and all they who forsake Jehovah and His sanctuary shall not endure. 12. Place of our sanctuary] i.e. Zion, where Jehovah's glory abode. 13. Shall be written in the earth] i.e. shall disappear—a natural simile, a board covered with sand being used for writing lessons in Eastern schools to this day, owing to the scarcity of writing materials. 15. See intro. to c. 16. 16. I have not hastened, etc.] I have not sought to resign the office of assistant shepherd for Thy people. The woeful day] when his predictions would be fulfilled.

CHAPTER 17¹⁹⁻²⁷

JEREMIAH'S TENTH PROPHECY (Reign of Jehoiakim, or even Josiah, for it speaks of the possibility of the continuance of the Monarchy). THE SABBATH OBLIGATION

19. The children of the people] perhaps meaning the lay folk as opposed to the priests.

25. A promise of the continuance of the lineage of David. 26. The plain] from the hill-country westward to the Mediterranean.

The mountains] the central portion of the land running from N. to S. Meat offerings] RV 'oblations.' RM 'meal offerings.' They were made of flour and oil, with frankincense strewn on the top (Lv21¹).

CHAPTERS 18¹⁻²⁰ 18

JEREMIAH'S ELEVENTH PROPHECY (Reign of Jehoiakim). PROPHECIES ILLUSTRATED FROM THE WORK OF THE POTTER

C. 18 gives and explains the figure of the potter's clay, and tells of the effect upon the people. C. 19 gives and applies the figure of the potter's broken vessel, while c. 20 describes the consequent sufferings of Jeremiah and his complaints.

The outrage on the prophet committed by Pashur (20²) would certainly not have been permitted in Josiah's time. On the other hand, there seems from the language used to be still a chance for the people, and the calamity threatened had not yet arrived. Therefore we may date the symbolical actions early in Jehoiakim's reign.

CHAPTER 18

1-17. Figure of the potter's clay.

3. The potter's house] Clay from which pottery was made was found S. of Jerusalem: cp. Zech11¹³ Mt27¹⁰. The potter teaches Jeremiah important lessons concerning the providential rule of the world. 'As I watched him shaping the pliant clay, remodelling the imperfect vessels until they conformed to his ideal, God revealed to me the manner in which He is able to mould at His will the nations. At the same time I realised that man may render God's work imperfect' (Sanders and Kent, 'Messages of the Earlier Prophets').

7-10. Predictions of good or evil were conditional on the moral state of those addressed.

11. Frame] the Hebrew word is the same as that for 'potter.'

14. Will a man leave, etc.] RV 'Shall the snow of Lebanon fail from,' etc. Understand the answer, 'No, it is perpetual.' Shall the cold, etc.] RV 'Shall the cold waters that flow down from afar' (mg. 'of strange land that flow down') 'be dried up?' Nature is constant in her operations, but God, the Rock of Israel, is forsaken by those who used to trust in Him.

15. Vanity] i.e. idols.

16. Hissing] not in contempt, but amazement.

17. I will shew them the back] God's countenance will be turned away.

18-23. Invocation of evil on the prophet's enemies.

18. The people's appeal against Jeremiah's words to the three classes of persons whom they thought to be in undoubted possession of the truth.

21-23. The stern spirit of the OT. dispensation, as shown in these imprecations, was connected with the comparative darkness in which a future existence was then shrouded. This would make righteous men more eager that God's glory should be vindicated and His people avenged in this life.

CHAPTER 19

In c. 18 the special lesson was the power of God to alter at any moment the destinies of a people. Here, on the other hand, it is taught that the time may come when the only alteration must take the form of a breaking or overthrow.

1-13. Figure of the broken vessel.

1. Ancients] RV 'elders.' 2. Valley of the son of Hinnom] see on 7³¹. East gate] Hebrew is obscure. RM 'gate of potsherd,' perhaps because refuse of this sort was thrown there. 3. Kings] the whole dynasty with their accumulated transgressions. 4. Estranged this place] i.e. alienated it from the worship of God. 6. Tophet] see on 7³¹. 8. An hissing] see on 18¹⁰. 9. This was fulfilled in the Chaldean siege of Jerusalem: see Lam 2²⁰ 4¹⁰. 11. Till there be no place to bury] see on 7⁸². 12. The flat roofs were easily used as gathering places: see e.g. Jg 16²⁷ Neh 8¹⁶ Zeph 1⁵.

14. This v. as introducing another address should commence a new paragraph ending with 20⁶.

CHAPTER 20

1-6. Pashur's act and Jeremiah's reply.

2. Pashur] In c. 38¹ two Pashurs are mentioned. This one is perhaps the father of Gedaliah there spoken of, while Pashur the son of Malchiah of that v. is probably identical with the Pashur of 21¹. The houses represented by both men were strong in numbers amongst the few priestly courses that returned from Babylon (Ezr 2³⁶⁻³⁹).

3. Magor-missabib] i.e. 'fear is on every side': see on 6²⁵. The name is symbolic of his coming fate, consisting in part, at least, of remorse at the ruin which he had brought upon his country by opposing the warnings of Jeremiah and perhaps claiming prophetic powers. For other cases of names given to symbolise and sum up a prophetic message, cp. Shear-jashub, 'a remnant' (only) 'shall return' (Isa 7³), and Maher-shalal-hash-baz, 'speedy spoliation' (Isa 8⁸⁴).

7-13. The prophet's cry to God.

7. Deceived] RM 'enticed,' to undertake his mission. 8. For since I spake, I cried out] RV 'for as often as I speak I cry out' (complain loudly). 9. The prophet cannot refrain from delivering his message, though it entailed derision and mockery. 10. Report say they, etc.] the words of two groups of his foes, the first arguing that his language should be brought under the notice of those in power, the second undertaking to do so.

14-18. For the vehemence of the imprecations cp. Job 3³ 10¹⁸, and David's address to Gilboa (2 S 1²¹). It is interesting to note that in later time, when the prophet had still more afflictions to endure, we no longer read of his trembling or bewailing the sufferings connected with his calling. 16. The cry . . the shouting] of war and trouble.

CHAPTER 21-10

JEREMIAH'S TWELFTH PROPHECY (Reign of Zedekiah during the siege). ZEDEKIAH'S ROLL

This c. commences a new division of the book extending to the end of c. 24. We pass from the time of Jehoiakim to that of the last king of Judah, when Jerusalem was attacked by the Chaldeans. The city must be taken, but surrender may still ensure safety.

1-10. The king's appeal to the prophet, and the reply.

1. Pashur] see on 20². Zephaniah] mentioned again 29²⁵ 37⁸ 52²⁴. In c. 52 he is spoken of as 'the second priest,' meaning next in rank to the high priest. Both men were for resisting Nebuchadnezzar. 2. Nebuchadnezzar] meaning, 'O Nebo, defend the land-mark.' It is a more correct spelling than 'Nebuchadnezzar' in 34¹. 4. The defenders will be driven back into the city. 9. He that goeth out, etc.] Many acted upon this suggestion: see 39⁹ 52¹⁵. His life shall be unto him for a prey] i.e. he shall snatch it from destruction. 10. He shall burn it with fire] see 52¹³.

CHAPTERS 21¹¹—24¹⁰

JEREMIAH'S THIRTEENTH PROPHECY

A collection of short prophecies here forming one group, delivered, however, at various dates, and perhaps reissued with modifications from time to time to suit the needs of successive occasions.

Chs. 21¹¹—22³⁰ deal with the sins of successive kings, 23¹⁻⁸ give expression to Messianic hopes. 24¹⁻¹⁰ show by the figure of baskets of worthless figs the rottenness to which the state had been reduced under Zedekiah.

CHAPTER 21¹¹⁻¹⁴

11-14. Exhortation and warning to the royal house.

12. Execute judgment] An important part of the king's duties was to adjudicate cases of dispute in the open space at the gate of the city: cp. 2 S 15^{2f}. 13. Valley] see on 17³.

14. The forest] referring to the houses of Jerusalem clustered together, or perhaps to the house of the forest of Lebanon (1 K 7²).

CHAPTER 22

1-9. Call to amendment of life.

1. Go down] The king's house was on lower ground than the Temple: cp. 36¹². 3. The reference is to the special crimes of Jehoiakim more fully stated in vv. 13f.: cp. 2 K 23³³. He oppressed his people in order that though paying tribute to Necho he might yet build himself sumptuous palaces. Neither shed innocent blood] For his sins in this respect cp. 26^{20f}. 4. Cp. 17²⁵. 6. Gilead, with its balm (8²²) and its flocks of goats (Song 4¹ 6²), and the forests crowning the highest parts of Lebanon, represent things that are most precious. 7. Prepare] see on 6⁴. Thy choice cedars] either the house of the forest of Lebanon (see on v. 6), or figuratively for the chief men of the state.

10-12. Lament for the fate of Jehohaz.

10. Weep ye not for the dead] viz. Josiah. The sense is that even his fate (as slain at Megiddo) is preferable to that of his son and successor Jehohaz (Shallum) carried into hopeless captivity in Egypt: see 2 K 23²⁹⁻³⁴. Lamentations for Josiah came to be a fixed custom (2 Ch 35²⁵).

13-23. Jehoiakim's evil deeds and fate.

15. Closest thyself] RV 'strivest to excel,' rivalling Solomon with his cedar palaces instead of aiming at just rule. Thy father] Josiah. 18. Ah my brother! or, Ah sister] The reference may be to a chorus of mourners male and female addressing themselves antiphonally. 18, 19. The capture and death of Jehoiakim are mentioned in 2 Ch 36⁶ 2 K 24⁶.

20. The passages] RV 'Abarim,' a range of mountains in the SE. Thy lovers] Egypt and the other nations whose aid Judah hoped for: see 27⁸. 23. Inhabitant of Lebanon] referring to the king and his nobles as dwelling in cedar houses. How gracious] RV 'how greatly to be pitied.'

24-30. Punishment of Jehoiachin.

24. Coniah] so in 37¹: called Jeconiah in 24¹, etc. The change of his name to Jehoiachin, as in the case of his uncle Jehoahaz (the Shallum of v. 11), was probably made on his accession to the throne. All three names mean, 'The LORD will establish.' Signet] emblem of royal authority. 26. See 52^{31f}.

28. A lament over Jehoiachin's fate. Idol] RV 'vessel,' a piece of earthenware cast out as useless. 29. For the emphasis by three-fold repetition cp. 7⁴.

30. Write ye, etc.] addressed to those who kept his family registers. They are bidden to enter the fact now instead of waiting for his death. Even though he had children (1 Ch 34⁷⁻⁸) they were not to succeed to the throne. 'Whether childless or not Jehoiachin was the last king of David's line. His uncle, indeed, actually reigned after him, but perished with his sons long before Jehoiachin's death (52¹⁰).'

CHAPTER 23

1-4. A remnant shall return.

1. The pastors] i.e. the rulers of Judah.

4. Shepherds] e.g. Ezra, Nehemiah, etc.

5-8. Promise of the Messiah.

5. Branch] rather, 'sprout,' 'shoot,' that which is immediately connected with the root, and contains, as it were, the springs of life. So in 33¹⁵, and in later time Zech 3⁸ 6¹². On the other hand, the word in Isa 11¹ denotes 'branch,' properly so called. The v. predicts the coming of an ideal descendant of David, a king who shall reign in righteousness over the people. We see the fulfilment of the prophecy in the spiritual conquests of Christ. And prosper] RV 'and deal wisely,' as David did (1 S 18⁵⁻¹¹). 6. THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS] RV 'The LORD is our righteousness.' The coming king shall be a righteous ruler, whose reign shall be marked by absolute justice; He shall be called Jehovah-Tsidkenu ('The Lord is our righteousness'); and His name shall be the sign that God will make His people righteous: cp. 33¹⁶. Cp. also 'Immanuel' ('God with us'), Isa 7¹⁴ 8¹⁰.

7, 8. See on 16^{11f}. The deliverance after the captivity will be even more wonderful than that from Egypt.

9-40. Rebuke of false prophets and priests. Their disgrace is foretold.

10. Swearing] RM 'the curse' (of God).

Pleasant places] RV 'pastures.' Course] manner of life. Force] exercise of power.

13. Samaria] the northern kingdom. In Baal] i.e. the name of Baal. 14. The representatives of God encourage evil doers by their own misdeeds. 17. These false prophets promised deliverance from Babylon. 18. For who hath stood, etc.] meaning that at any rate these false prophets had not done so.

20. Consider] RV 'understand.' 21. Yet they ran] as if appointed. 23. Think you that My knowledge is subject to human limitations? These men do not deceive Me as they do the people. 25. I have dreamed] By repeating this formula they caught the ear of the crowd.

28. The contrast between true and false prophecy. God's word contains nourishment and life. Other words are but as chaff, or, rather, straw. 29. Fire] which consumes the dross. 30, 31. The false prophets steal the phrases of the true, e.g. 'He saith.' 32. Lightness] RV 'vain boasting.'

33. They ask jestingly of Jeremiah, What is thy latest message for us? what is the burdensome oracle of the LORD? 'Burden' was often used in this sense: cp. Nah¹¹ Hab¹¹ Zech⁹¹. What... burden] LXX 'ye are the burden.'

34, 35. The misused phrase 'the burden of the LORD' is to be used no more. Some other expression is to take its place. 36. Every man's burden shall be his use of the word. For he who has jokingly enquired after the 'burden of the LORD' shall find that those lightly spoken words of his are in very deed a load upon him. Perverted] used jestingly.

CHAPTER 24

THE TWO BASKETS OF FIGS

The evil figs were such of the people as had not been carried away with Jehoiachin to Babylon after the first siege of Jerusalem, 597 B.C., but had failed to draw any warning from the fate that had overtaken their brethren. Those who had been made captives, on the other hand, should yet be the subjects of God's love and grace. The ripening time for both baskets was over, but here the likeness between them ceased.

1. Carpenters] RV 'craftsmen,' the most valuable captives. 2. First ripe] In the case of trees bearing twice in the year, the first crop, ripening in June, was considered a special delicacy. Naughty] RV 'bad.'

5. Acknowledge] RV 'regard.' 8. Egypt]

cp. 22^{10, 11}. 9. To be removed into] RV 'to be tossed to and fro among.'

CHAPTER 25

JEREMIAH'S FOURTEENTH PROPHECY (Reign of Jehoiakim). THE WINE CUP OF GOD'S FURY

We have here the first closely dated prophecy, taking us back from Zedekiah's reign to the fourth year of Jehoiakim, between the news of the victory of Nebuchadnezzar over Pharaoh-Necho and the Egyptians at (Archemish (605 B.C.) and the arrival of the Chaldean army under the walls of Jerusalem. The prophet advises submission to Babylon as God's agent, but promises its overthrow at the end of the seventy years' captivity which impends. He announces the judgment that shall descend on the nations.

1-7. The people's prolonged waywardness.

3. The three and twentieth year] of Jeremiah's prophetic ministry. 7. The works of your hands] i.e. your idols.

8-14. Babylon's victory and subsequent overthrow.

9. Families of the north] the races near the Tigris and Euphrates. My servant] (God's agent in carrying out His purposes of chastisement.

11. Seventy years] for the definite number cp. 29¹⁰. The Jewish love for round numbers would lead them to consider the number seventy used in such a connexion as standing for any approximation to that amount. The captivity seems to have been, in fact, for somewhat less than seventy years.

Immediately upon v. 13 there come in the Septuagint (Greek) version of this book the prophecies against foreign nations, which in the English (following the Hebrew) stand at the end (chs. 46-51).

14. Of them] viz. of the Chaldeans. As they have done to the people of God, so shall it be done to them.

15-29. The wine cup of God's fury to be drunk by the nations.

15. Wine cup] representing disaster, so often in OT.: cp. 49¹² 51⁷. 16. Be moved] RV 'reel to and fro.' 17. Then took I the cup] not, however, in a literal sense, the cup being itself only figurative. 18. As it is this day] a later insertion by Jeremiah or another as comment on the fulfilment. 20. The mingled people] those who had attached themselves to a nation without being connected with it by blood. Uz] Job's country near Idumea (Lam 4²¹). Ashkelon, etc.] the chief cities of Philistia. Azzah] RV 'Gaza.' 22. Isles] RV 'isle,' RM 'coastland,' a phrase denoting generally the region W. of Palestine, with special reference to the Grecian Archipelago.

23. For Dedan see on 49⁸. Tema and Buz

(to which Elihu belonged, Job 32²) were neighbouring Arabian tribes. Utmost corners] see on 9²⁶. 25. Zimri] quite unknown.

26. Sheshach] Sheshach stands in all probability for Babel (or Babylon). The Jews had a species of cypher writing, the form of which consisted in substituting the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet for the first, the last but one for the second, and so on. Omitting vowels, we find that thus Sh, Sh, Ch will represent B, B, L: cp. 51⁴¹, where Sheshach and Babylon stand in parallel clauses. Another instance of the cypher is in 51¹, where the Heb. for 'in the midst of them that rise up against me' becomes, when thus transmuted, 'Casdim,' i.e. Chaldeans.

30-38. Judgment shall come upon all the peoples of the earth.

30. Upon his habitation] RV 'against His fold,' i.e. His people. 31. Plead] in a legal sense, judge. 32. Coasts] RV 'uttermost parts.' 34. Shepherds] i.e. rulers. Like a pleasant vessel] fair but fragile. 37. Habitations are cut down] RV 'folds are brought to silence.'

38. As the lion] The LORD is gone forth in wrath to lay waste.

CHAPTER 26

JEREMIAH'S FIFTEENTH PROPHECY (Early in the reign of Jehoiakim)

For vv. 1-8 see intro. to chs. 7-10. This c. gives us a sketch of the difficulties and dangers under which Jeremiah had spoken the preceding prophecies.

1-6. The prophet warns the people.

6. Like Shiloh] see on 7¹². A curse] i.e. a subject of their cursing, as being contemptible.

8. A prophet speaking without God's command was to be put to death (Dt 18²⁰). This was the charge against Jeremiah, and the alleged proof was that God could not permit such a calamity to fall on Jerusalem.

7-15. The charge against Jeremiah, and his defence. 10. The princes] apparently heads of prominent houses, who had taken up their quarters in Jerusalem.

16-24. The princes and people, not being prejudiced against Jeremiah, as were the prophets and priests, gave a fair decision.

17. The elders] for their action in criminal procedure cp. Dt 21²²; in civil, Ruth 4².

18. Micah] the minor prophet: see Mic 3¹². The king and the people listened to his warnings. 20-23. An instance of the ill-treatment of a prophet. This part of the narrative was probably introduced later. It would have been dangerous for any of those present to have made such an attack upon the reigning king.

24. Ahikam] father of Gedaliah, who, when appointed governor by Nebuchadnezzar, stood the prophet's friend (39¹⁴ 40⁵).

CHAPTERS 27-29

JEREMIAH'S SIXTEENTH PROPHECY (Reign of Zedekiah, earlier part). THE BABYLONIAN YOKE

Babylon had already shown its power. Jehoiakim and the chief of the people had been carried captive. Zedekiah was king only on sufferance. The neighbouring nations were under those circumstances willing to make common cause with the Jews against Nebuchadnezzar, many of whom, however, refused to realise the gravity of the danger. In these chs., therefore, Jeremiah sets himself to show that the power of Babylon would be permanent and irresistible. He addresses on this subject (27¹⁻¹¹) the neighbouring nations, (vv. 12-15) Zedekiah, (vv. 16-22) the priests and prophets, (c. 28) the false prophets, (c. 29) the exiles in Babylon.

CHAPTER 27

1-29. Judah is warned to submit to Babylon.

1. For Jehoiakim read 'Zedekiah': see vv. 3, 12, 20. The former word may be a copyist's accidental repetition of 26¹. 2. It is plain from 28¹⁰ that Jeremiah actually wore a yoke in public. 3. Messengers] These ambassadors had come to Jerusalem probably with the view of forming an alliance against Babylon. This, however, was not accomplished, as Zedekiah was compelled to go to Babylon and swear allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar (51⁵⁹).

6. My servant] see on 25⁹. 7. Him, and his son, and his son's son] meaning simply that there was to be no speedy riddance. In point of fact, Nebuchadnezzar had three successors, Evil-Merodach, Neriglissar, and Nabonidus, in whose seventeenth year Babylon was taken by Cyrus. The very time] the appointed end.

Great kings] Persia and Media became masters of Babylon.

9-11. Rebellion will entail exile. Therefore let them submit.

16. The vessels, etc.] Some had been taken in Jehoiachin's reign (2 K 24¹³). The rest were destined to follow (2 K 25¹³). They were given back by Cyrus (Ezr 1⁷). 19. The sea] in which the priests washed their hands and feet before sacrificing (1 K 7^{23f}). The bases] the supports of the ten lavers (1 K 7^{27f}).

CHAPTER 28

1-11. Opposition of Hananiah and the false prophets.

2. Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel] a formula of Jeremiah's, and hence, perhaps, assumed by Hananiah as implying an equal claim to inspiration.

6. Amen: the LORD do so] i.e. would that it might be so.

7-9. Hananiah's forecasts of peace being in opposition to those of his predecessors, the presumption is against him, and can only be removed by the fulfilment of his predictions (the test laid down in Dt 18²²), which assuredly is not to take place. 10. See on 27².

12-17. Hananiah rebuked and punished.

13. Hananiah's act by inciting Zedekiah and his people to resistance only makes the servitude which they will have to undergo harsher.

17. The seventh month] cp. v. 1.

CHAPTER 29

1-14. Jeremiah's letter to the exiles. Release after seventy years.

1. Prophets] The exiles in Babylon had also false prophets, e.g. Ahab and Zedekiah (v. 21), and Shemaiah (of v. 24) among them. But they were on the whole of a better class (see 24⁶⁻⁷), and the prophet might hope that his words would have more effect. 2. Carpenters] RV 'craftsmen.' 4-7. They are not to sit loose to the land of their exile, but to make homes for themselves there. Else they will soon dwindle away. 10. At Babylon] RV 'for Babylon,' referring to the duration of its power: cp. 25¹¹. 11. An expected end] RV 'hope in your latter end.'

15-23. The exiles reply:—The prophets here tell us that we shall be delivered speedily. Jeremiah answers that their teaching shall soon be disproved by the overthrow of Jerusalem, and they shall themselves die miserable deaths.

17. Vile figs] cp. 24²¹. The exiles would probably already know that prophecy.

24-32. On the arrival of Jeremiah's letter at Babylon, Shemaiah had written to Zephaniah, the acting high priest (52²⁴) at Jerusalem, to have the prophet silenced as a madman. Jeremiah, having seen the letter, writes again to denounce the writer, and foretell his punishment. 26. In prison, and in the stocks] RV 'in the stocks and in shackles.'

CHAPTERS 30-33

JEREMIAH'S SEVENTEENTH PROPHECY (Reign of Zedekiah during the siege). ISRAEL'S HOPE

Hitherto the general character of Jeremiah's prophecies has been gloomy. The whole tone of this section, on the other hand, is one of hopefulness, which is the more remarkable inasmuch as it was delivered at a time when the prophet was subject to imprisonment, and famine and pestilence held possession of the city, and the prospects of the nation were at their lowest. It was under such circumstances then that it was announced through Jeremiah that the chosen people should not perish, that through them the Gentile nations should be led to a knowledge of the true God, that the Righteous Branch should yet arise from the house of David, and Zion 'shall be called, The LORD our righteousness': see on 33¹⁶.

CHAPTER 30

1-9. When the gloom is deepest, deliverance shall come. 2. In a book] Thus his words would bring abiding comfort in the approaching time of exile. 3. Bring] RV 'turn.'

4. Concerning Israel . . Judah] Both divisions of the kingdom of David are the subject of c. 31: see above. 5. Of fear, and not of peace] RM 'There is fear and no peace,' and the present circumstances are evil. There is nothing but fear and terror in the hearts and on the faces of men. 7. That day] the day of Babylon's overthrow. 8. Serve themselves of him] see on 25¹⁴. 9. David their king] the ideal king who, as coming of David's line, here receives his name. So in Ezk 34²³, 37²⁴. For David, meaning the line of kings of his house, see 1K 12¹⁶.

10-17. God will remember Israel in her affliction. 11. In measure, etc.] RV 'with judgment, and will in no wise leave thee.'

12-15. These vv. describe the present condition from which the nation shall be delivered.

13. Thy cause, that thou . . medicines] rather, join 'that thou,' etc., with what follows. 'For the closing up of thy wound there is no healing, no plaster.' 14. Thy lovers] the nations that sought to ally themselves with thee: see 27³.

18-24. Jerusalem shall be restored to favour.

18. Bring] see on v. 3. Tents] a name for dwellings generally, which was retained from nomadic times: cp. 4²⁰. Remain] RM 'be inhabited.' After the manner thereof] occupied by a king, and kept up suitably as aforetime.

21. Nobles] RV 'prince,' a reference to the ideal king. Of themselves] no longer foreigners. Engaged his heart] RV 'hath had boldness.' The new king will have close access to Jehovah. He will do His will, and rule in righteousness. And is not this to know the Lord? (22¹⁶). 23, 24. These vv. are nearly identical with 23¹⁹. 24. Consider] RV 'understand.'

CHAPTER 31

1-22. Jeremiah speaks of the restoration first of Israel (Ephraim, vv. 2-22), then of Judah (vv. 23f.). Those who survive the sufferings of the captivity are promised a safe journey home. The words, 'found grace in the wilderness' (v. 2) are probably an allusion to the journey from Egypt under Moses, which was thus a prophecy to the captive Israelites of the return from Assyria.

3. In this v. the people are the speakers.

4. Tabrets] tambourines. 5. Shall eat them as common things] RV 'shall enjoy the fruit thereof.'

6. Watchmen] posted on heights to announce seasons of prayer and, according to Jewish tradition, the appearance of the new moon as determining the dates of festivals. In the present case they are posted on the hills of Ephraim that members of the northern kingdom may go up to keep the feasts in Jerusalem, thus betokening the reunion of the Twelve Tribes in worship. 8. The blind, etc.] None, even the feeblest, shall be left behind. Thither] RV 'hither' to Palestine. 9. With weeping] tears at once of contrition and joy. Ephraim is my firstborn] see 1 Ch 5¹. God will not forget the house of Joseph, the head of northern Israel.

10. The isles] see on 25²². 12. To the goodness of the LORD] to receive from Him the blessings of a fruitful land. For wheat, etc.] RV 'to the corn, and to the wine.' Sorrow] rather, 'droop,' 'fade,' keeping up the image of a garden. 13. Both young men] RV 'and the young men' (shall rejoice with the old). 14. The sacrifices shall be so numerous that the priests and their families shall have abundance for their share : see Lv 7^{31f}.

15. The mourning which took place at Ramah, whether on account of some unrecorded butchery there on the part of the Chaldean conquerors, or in reference to their general cruelty to the exiles there assembled for deportation to Babylon (see 40¹), is referred to by St. Matthew (21^{7f}) as a forecast of the wailing at the slaughter of the Innocents by Herod. Rahel] the appropriateness of calling upon Rachel to weep in Ramah consists in this, that she, the one of Jacob's wives who had so ardently longed for children and the mother of Joseph and so of Ephraim and of Manasseh (whose lot was with Judah), should lament the overthrow of her offspring in a conspicuous border town of the two kingdoms, with both of which she was thus immediately connected.

16. Thy work shall be rewarded] Rachel by the death of her descendants had, as it were, been deprived of the reward for which she had laboured in bearing and bringing up children. Now by their restoration she shall at last receive her recompense. 17. In thine end] RV 'for thy latter end.'

18. Ephraim] i.e. the northern kingdom, which for over 100 years had been devastated by the Assyrians, and its people exiled. 19. Instructed] by punishment. I smote, etc.] in contrition. The reproach of my youth] the shame incurred through the sins of his youth.

20. God is represented as addressing Himself even as a father might do, when dwelling upon the ingratitude and rebellion of a son, whom, nevertheless, he cannot but continue to love.

Pleasant] i.e. beloved. Bowels] the supposed seat of the emotions. 21. High heaps] RV 'guide-posts' for the returning exiles.

22. Compass] i.e. as protector. In the peaceful future the women will be a sufficient guard against danger from without, while the men perform their daily tasks.

23-26. The LORD now turns from Israel (Ephraim) to Judah and promises her like blessings.

23. As yet] RV 'yet again.' Habitation of justice] the same expression is used of the LORD in 50⁷. Mountain of holiness] Jerusalem, or in particular the Temple mount.

26. The words of the prophet at the conclusion of his pleasant vision.

27. I will sow, etc.] a figure to express prosperity and rapid increase.

28. See on 1¹⁰.

29-34. The new covenant between Jehovah and His people.

29, 30. The proverb here quoted, which was common among the Jews, induced them to throw upon their predecessors the responsibility for their own misdeeds. Accordingly the prophet restates in an amended form the truth which it embodies. It was true that their fathers had sinned, but the children had repeated their sins and they were suffering the consequences of their own acts. The prophet emphasises individual responsibility for sin.

31-34. The new covenant is to be of a spiritual, personal character, rather than external and national. It shall supersede that of the exodus, and shall differ from the older Law both in permanence and in the spring of action. Under it the sense of forgiveness (v. 34) ensures a willing service based on love, not on fear. 'God comes to man as giving and not as requiring': so Bp. Westcott on Heb 8⁸⁻¹², which reproduces this passage, applying it to the Christian dispensation.

34. The sense is not that there shall be no longer any need of instruction in religion, but that for both Jews and Gentiles there shall be directness of access to God. It was left for later times to reveal clearly Christ as the means of this approach.

35. Which divideth the sea when] RV 'which stirreth up the sea, that.' 36. Israel's national existence is as assured as the unchangeableness of the laws imposed by God on the universe, or as its limitless character.

38-40. See on 7³¹. Jerusalem in her future extension is to enclose spaces hitherto considered unclean. Tower of Hananeel] at the NE. corner. The gate of the corner] at the NW. (see on 2 K 14¹⁸). Gareb . . Goath] not mentioned elsewhere. Gareb means 'leper's hill.'

CHAPTER 32

This c. forms the introduction to the most continuously historical part of the book, which describes incidents in the two years preceding the final destruction of Jerusalem, viz. chs.

34-43. The first of these incidents is here given, viz. Jeremiah's purchase with all legal formality of a field of which he had the right of redemption, in order to encourage the people while the Chaldeans were investing the city by showing thus his faith in the return which he foretells in these chs.

1-5. The general position.

2. Of the prison] RV 'of the guard,' i.e. of the palace sentries. For Jeremiah's imprisonment see chs. 37, 38.

6-15. Jeremiah's purchase at Anathoth.

6. An interesting example of legal proceedings in connexion with Hebrew land-customs: cp. Ruth 4¹⁻⁸. 7. If land was to be sold it was the duty of the nearest of kin to buy it, so that it should not pass from one family to another: see Lv 25²⁴, Ruth 4⁹.

8. Jeremiah bought the estate as next heir by the right of preëmption. 10. The evidence] RV 'the deed,' and so in vv. 11, 12, 14, 44. Jeremiah made out two copies of the deed, one to be sealed, the other left open, the former to be referred to in case at any time it were suspected that the latter had been tampered with. 11. According to the law and custom] RM 'containing the terms and conditions.' 15. Possessed] RV 'bought.'

16-25. Jeremiah cannot reconcile the obvious sense of the transaction which he had just carried out at the LORD's command, with the overthrow which he had been so often bidden to announce to the guilty city. 24. Mounts] see on 6⁶.

26-35. The first part of God's reply, viz. judgment.

36-44. The second part of God's reply, viz. mercy. 36. The words resume the thought of v. 27, 'Is there anything too hard for me?'

44. The mountains . . the valley . . the south] The several parts of the land are specified, viz. the central (hilly) portion, the plains westward from it to the sea, and the thinly inhabited S. of Judah. Cause their captivity to return] i.e. restore them from captivity.

CHAPTER 33

1-13. Restoration and honour again promised.

1. See on 32². 2. The maker thereof] RV 'that doeth it' (viz. that which He hath purposed). 4. By the mounts, and by the sword] RV 'to make a defence against the mounts, and against the sword,' to make room for the besieged to erect defensive works. For 'mounts' see 6⁶. 5. They] the besieged. The only result of their fighting is that they fill these houses with the slain. 11. Praise the LORD, etc.] Jeremiah quotes from the Temple liturgical forms: cp. 2 Ch 5¹³ Ps 106¹.

13. Mountains, etc.] see on 32⁴⁴. Telleth] counteth.

14-18. Permanence of the kingly and priestly line.

15, 16. See on 23⁵¹. 16. The LORD our righteousness] RV 'The LORD is our righteousness.' The name is here given to the city, as it was given in 23⁶ to the king.

17, 18. In these vv. the prophet declares the permanence of the office of king in the Davidic line, and of the priesthood among the Levites. The prophecy is sometimes mystically interpreted of Christ. 18. Meat offerings] see on 17²⁶.

19-26. God's covenant is as sure as the ordinances of nature.

19f. See on 31³⁶ for the argument. 21. For the covenant with David's line see 2 S 7^{12, 14}, and for that with the Levites (in the person of Phinchas) Nu 25¹³. 24. The people, seeing that both Israel and Judah (the two families) are being apparently cast off, despise their own nation, despair of any better days, and consider their national existence to be a thing of the past.

CHAPTER 34

JEREMIAH'S EIGHTEENTH PROPHECY (Reign of Zedekiah). THE FATE OF ZEDEKIAH. THE TREATMENT OF HEBREW SLAVES.

Early in the campaign of Nebuchadnezzar, whose scheme of conquest included all the region as far as Egypt inclusive, the policy urged by Jeremiah was that Zedekiah should make the best terms he could. In this c. we seem to have a sort of abbreviated memorandum of the conditional promise, which in that case the prophet was commissioned to announce to Zedekiah, viz. peace followed by kingly obsequies. The condition, here omitted, is expressed in 38¹⁷.

The laws as to the limitation of the length of servitude in the case of Hebrew slaves (Ex 21² Lv 25³⁹⁻⁵⁵) had apparently fallen out of use with many Jews, especially in the country parts. Very possibly the arrival of many of the wealthier Jews at Jerusalem from the country to escape the invading army made the laxity on their part more conspicuous by contrast. The agreement here spoken of seems to have been brought about in view of the impending danger of invasion, in resisting which the slaves, if enfranchised, might be more willing to co-operate. But when the Babylonian army withdrew for a short time (37⁵) to meet the Egyptian forces, which they believed to be threatening them, the masters basely cancelled their agreement.

1-7. Capture and burning of Jerusalem foretold.

3. Thine eyes shall behold . . the king, etc.] i.e. at Riblah, before being blinded and carried to Babylon: see 39⁷ 52⁹, and cp. 32⁴ Ezk 12¹³.

5. Shall they burn odours] RV 'Shall they make a burning': see details in 2Ch16¹⁴.

7. Against Lachish, and against Azekah] in SW. of Judah near the border of Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar would not venture to advance into that country on his career of conquest, leaving these fortresses untaken.

8-22. The masters of Hebrew slaves to be punished for their cruel treatment of them.

13. Out of the house of bondmen] The point is that Israel's position at the time when the covenant was made, as having themselves been delivered from Egyptian slavery, should have taught them better. 17. The people shall no longer as hitherto be under God's protection as His servants, but be thrown by Him on their own resources, and so exposed to their perils. 18. Cut the calf in twain] For such mode of ratifying a covenant see on Gn15⁸.

21. Which are gone up from you] i.e. which have raised the siege for the time.

CHAPTER 35

JEREMIAH'S NINETEENTH PROPHECY (Reign of Jehoiakim). THE OBEDIENCE OF THE RECHABITES

This and c. 36 form a break in the narrative, bringing us back from the tenth year of Zedekiah to the insecurity which followed upon Nebuchadnezzar's victory of Carchemish (fourth year of Jehoiakim), when predatory bands of Chaldeans and others had compelled many of the inhabitants of Palestine to take refuge within Jerusalem. Among these were the Rechabites, a nomadic tribe of Kenite descent. The prophet contrasts their obedience to the precepts of their leader Jonadab (who lived about two centuries and a half before this time, 2K10^{15,16}) with the disobedience of Judah. Each shall receive its merited recompense.

1-11. The Rechabites' rule of life.

2. The Rechabites were descended from Hobab, brother-in-law of Moses, of the Kenite tribe. They migrated with the Israelites from the wilderness to Palestine: cp. Nu10²⁹⁻³² Jg1¹⁶. 5. Pots] RV 'bowls.' 6. Commanded us, etc.] perhaps owing to the excess which he saw to be fostered by city life. For Jonadab see 2K10¹⁵.

12-17. Application of the lesson to the Jews.

18, 19. The Rechabites' reward.

CHAPTER 36

EVENTS CONNECTED WITH THE COLLECTION OF JEREMIAH'S PROPHECIES INTO A VOLUME (4th and 5th years of Jehoiakim)

The prophecies concerning Israel and Judah are now ended, and we have here the record of the embodying in a permanent form by Jeremiah of the substance of these prophecies. For further remarks see Intro.

2. A roll of a book] Several skins were stitched together and attached to a roller of wood. The writing was arranged in columns parallel to the roller, so that as the parchment was gradually unfolded the successive columns could be read. 4. Baruch] the prophet's companion and assistant already mentioned (32^{12,14}). 5. Shut up] not meaning imprisoned (with which v. 19 would be inconsistent), but hindered perhaps by the extreme unpopularity of his recent utterances.

9. In the ninth month] our December. It was thus a specially appointed fast, not that of the seventh month which alone was prescribed by the Law (Lv16²⁹ 23²⁷). 10. Gemariah] he was brother of Ahikam (see 26²⁴), who was friendly to Jeremiah and distinct from Gemariah of 29³.

11. When Michaiah . . had heard] As it was in the chamber of Michaiah's father that Baruch had been allowed to read the roll, Gemariah, who was engaged at a council of the leading men in another room, would naturally be desirous to learn as soon as might be what had occurred. 12. Went down] see on 22¹. Elnathan] mentioned in 26²².

15. Sit down] Baruch was invited to take the position ordinarily assumed by an Eastern teacher. This together with v. 19 shows that the princes were favourably disposed towards Jeremiah. 17. How didst thou write, etc.] They desired to know how much was Baruch's own that they might be able to state to the king the amount of responsibility that rested upon each.

22. The winter-house] a separate portion of the palace, as appears from Am3¹⁵. On the hearth] RV 'in the brasier': so in v. 23. Braziers containing charcoal were placed in a depression in the middle of a room for warming purposes. 23. Leaves] RM 'columns': see on v. 2. He] i.e. the king. 24. They were not afraid . . neither the king, etc.] Contrast with this the conduct of the king's father Josiah when the newly discovered Book of the Law was read to him (2K22¹¹).

29. Shall certainly come, etc.] fulfilled in the time of Jehoiakim's son, Jehoiachin, and finally when Zedekiah was carried captive.

30. He shall have none to sit, etc.] for his son was carried captive in three months from his accession: cp. 22³⁰. His dead body, etc.] see on 22¹⁹. 32. The substance of the second roll is doubtless to a large extent preserved to us in this book.

CHAPTERS 37, 38

EVENTS DURING THE SIEGE OF JERUSALEM (Reign of Zedekiah)

Here after two parenthetical chapters (35, 36) concerning the time of Jehoiakim, we revert to the narrative (beginning in c. 32) of the last two years of Zedekiah.

CHAPTER 37

1-5. The general position.

1. Coniah] see on 22²⁴. Whom] referring to Zedekiah. 3. Zephaniah] see on 21¹.

5. This refers to the temporary raising of the siege of Jerusalem by the Babylonians on the approach of an Egyptian army under Pharaoh-Hophra. He either retired or was defeated, for the siege was soon renewed.

6-10. The return of the Chaldeans foretold.

11-15. Jeremiah imprisoned.

12. To separate himself thence] RV 'to receive his portion there,' probably referring to an allotment of communal land at Anathoth.

In the midst of the people] there was naturally a rush to get out of the city on account of the confinement as well as the scarcity of provisions.

16-21. The king takes compassion on Jeremiah.

16. Cabins] RV 'cells.' 17. Secretly] dreading in his weakness the interference of the princes. 21. See on 32².

CHAPTER 38

1-3. The removal of Jeremiah from the prison was favourable to the publication of his message. Hence the alarm of the princes.

1. Pashur] see on 20².

2. He that goeth forth] i.e. submits: so v. 17.

6. Dungeon] RM 'pit,' or eistern. It is conjectured that Ps69 may have been composed by Jeremiah on this occasion.

7-13. Jeremiah is rescued by Ebed-melech.

10. Thirty] possibly a copyist's error for 'three.' The two words resemble each other much more closely in Hebrew than in English.

14-28. The king again asks the prophet's advice. Result.

14. The third entry] Probably referring to some passage between the Temple and the palace.

15. Wilt thou not hearken unto me?] RV 'Thou wilt not hearken unto me.' 18. The king of Babylon's princes] Nebuchadnezzar was probably himself at Riblah: see 39².

19. And they moek me] for not surrendering sooner as they had done.

22. The women of the harem shall join in the reproaches, saying, Thy friends have persuaded thee against thy better judgment, and then deserted thee.

24-26. Zedekiah's weakness is again conspicuous. 28. And he was, etc.] RV 'And it came to pass when Jerusalem was taken'; the words thus belonging not to what precedes, but to e. 30.

CHAPTERS 39-43

JEREMIAH'S HISTORY FROM THE FALL OF JERUSALEM TILL HE GOES DOWN TO EGYPT. See Introduction

CHAPTER 39

THE CAPTURE OF JERUSALEM (11th year of Zedekiah)

The narrative in this c., with some varieties in detail, coincides with that of e. 52 and with 2K 25.

1-7. The city taken. Zedekiah's fate.

3. From the Eng. it would appear that there are six persons named. But Rab-saris (chief of the eunuchs) and Rab-mag (chief of the sorcerers) are only the titles of those whose names they follow. 4. The way of the plain] so as to escape to the eastern bank of Jordan. 5. Riblah] on the high road between Palestine and Babylon. 7. See on 34². Putting out the eyes was a common punishment in the East.

8-10. Fate of the city. If we had only this narrative we should suppose that Nebuzar-adan was present in person, but 52¹² shows that he did not arrive till a month after the taking of the city.

11-14. Nebuchadnezzar and the prophet.

12. Look well to him] for Jeremiah had always counselled submission to Babylon: cp. 40¹. 14. Gedaliah] see on 26²⁴.

15-18. Message to Ebed-melech.

CHAPTER 40

GEDALIAH AS GOVERNOR (586 B.C.)

Chs. 40⁷-43⁶ are briefly summarised in 2K 25²²⁻²⁶. The account in the book of Kings mentions merely the accomplished results; while here the process by which these results were brought about are fully detailed. We learn here in particular that Ishmael ben-Nethaniah was prompted to assassinate Gedaliah by the Ammonite king, Baalis, and that Gedaliah was warned of the plot by Johanan, but that he refused to believe that Ishmael would do such a thing. Full details of the slaughter of the people at Mizpah are also given here, as well as an account of the pursuit of Ishmael by Johanan and the recovery of the captives. We are told here also what is omitted in Kings that when Johanan desired to go to Egypt for safety, Jeremiah sought to dissuade him, promising safety if the people remained in Judah, but destruction if they went to Egypt. Johanan, however, was incredulous, and took the remnant of Judah down to Tahpanhes in Egypt, and with them Jeremiah and Baruch.

1. The word that came] including the history which follows. No prophetic utterance comes till 42⁹. To the Jews history and prophecy were intimately connected; e.g. they included most of the historical books of the Bible under the title of Prophets

5. Reward] RV 'present.'

6. Mizpah] a city of Benjamin, NW. of Jerusalem, and the chief scene of the events now to be described. 7. Forces which were in the fields] keeping out of the way until the Babylonian army departed, and they should have learned the nature of the new government: cp. v. 13.

8. The Netophathite] Netophah was a village near Bethlehem (Neh 7²⁶).

10. Gather ye wine, etc.] Make provision for the winter.

12. Returned] reassured by the fact that the new governor was their own countryman.

14. Ishmael felt aggrieved that he, though of royal birth (see 41¹), had been set aside in favour of Gedaliah. The instigation by Baalis may have arisen through designs of conquest.

CHAPTER 41

PLOT AGAINST GEDALIAH AND ITS RESULTS (586 B.C.)

1-10. Ishmael murders Gedaliah and others, and carries off captives.

1. And the princes] RV 'and one of the chief officers'; a further description of Ishmael himself, not an addition to his band. Even] RV 'and.' 5. Having their beards shaven, etc.] in mourning for the destruction of the Temple: see on 16⁶. 6. Weeping all along] feigning equal concern with them, so as to put them off their guard. 7. Pit] RV 'cistern.' 8. Treasures] RV 'stores hidden.' Dry cisterns, covered with a deep layer of earth, are commonly used for this purpose in the East. 9. Because of] RV 'by the side of,' i.e. their bodies placed by his. Asa . . . Baasha] see 1 K 15²².

11-18. Johanan rescues the captives and they start for Egypt.

12. Gibeon] the modern El-jib, a city of the priests (Josh 18²⁵ 21¹⁷), in the tribe of Benjamin. 14. Cast about] turned round.

15. These acts of treachery may well have been connected with woes predicted for Ammon in 49¹⁴. 17. The habitation of Chimham] RM 'the lodging place' (i.e. inn or khan) of Chimham: see 2 S 19³⁷. It was natural that David as a mark of gratitude to the son of Barzillai should have given Chimham a piece of his patrimony.

CHAPTER 42

JEREMIAH'S MESSAGE FROM GOD TO JOHANAN

1. Jezaniah] the Azariah of 43² (and probably not the Jezaniah of 40⁸).

7-22. The people are forbidden to go down to Egypt. Jeremiah had always denounced connexion with Egypt (2³⁰ 37⁷).

15. And now] RV 'now.' 20. Ye dissembled in your hearts] RV 'ye have dealt deceitfully against your own souls,' i.e. while persuading yourselves that you are prepared to accept God's decision, all the while nothing but your own way would content you.

CHAPTER 43

THE FATE OF EGYPT

1-7. They disobey and go to Egypt.

7. Tahpanhes] see on 2¹⁰.

Here ends the historical portion of the book, the remainder consisting of prophecies directed mainly against foreign nations.

8-13. Prophecy of the overthrow of Egypt.

9. In the clay in the brick-kiln] RV 'in mortar in the brickwork.' 11. Death] by famine or pestilence. 12. Nebuchadnezzar shall have no more difficulty in spoiling Egypt than has the shepherd in wrapping his outer garment about him after his labour.

13. Images] RV 'pillars,' RM 'obelisks.' Beth-shemesh (Gk. 'Heliopolis,' Egyptian 'On') was a city of obelisks, two of which stood before the Temple of the Sun. Its site is about 10 m. NE. of Cairo.

CHAPTER 44

JEREMIAH'S LATEST PROPHECY (after 586 B.C.). (The prophecies against the Gentile nations (chs. 46-51) were mostly uttered after the battle of Carchemish, 605 B.C.)

He denounces the unabated idolatry which still characterised the people now that they dwelt in Egypt. Their experience of suffering had taught them nothing.

1-10. Jeremiah's countrymen rebuked.

1. Migdol] on the northern boundary of Egypt. For Noph and Tahpanhes see on 2¹⁶.

8. The works of your hands] i.e. your idols. Might cut yourselves off] RV 'may be cut off.'

11-14. Their punishment foretold.

15-19. They persist in their idolatry.

15. All the women that stood by] Probably the occasion was an idolatrous festival in which the women were taking a leading part. All the people, etc.] not, of course, to be taken literally, but meaning that they were very numerous and represented the whole.

17. Whatsoever thing goeth forth] RV 'every word that is gone forth.' They refer to their religious vows: cp. Nu 30² Dt 23²⁸.

Queen of heaven] see on 7¹⁸. Then had we plenty of victuals] They perversely attribute the misfortunes which had befallen their country from the battle of Megiddo and death of Josiah onwards to the attack made upon idolatry (2 K 23) by that king, and not to the gradual degradation of the people through the medium of that idolatry during the reigns of Manasseh and Amon and the earlier part of that of Josiah. 19. Worship] RM 'pourtray,' referring to the full moon, as represented either by the shape of the cake itself or by a figure upon it. Men] RV 'husbands.' A wife's vow was not binding unless with the consent of the husband : see Nu 30^{6f}.

20-23. Jeremiah answers. It was, he says, owing to the idolatry, which had been so long rampant and which Josiah's reforms had scotched, not killed, that the overthrow at last came.

25. With your hand] RV 'with your hands,' pointing, perhaps, to the cakes which they were carrying. Ye will surely, etc.] RV 'Establish then . . . and perform.' If ye persist, then be it so. 26. As being faithless to their covenant with God, they shall lose the right of calling upon His name as such. 29. The sign referred to, viz. Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Egypt, did not take place till 586 B.C. For other instances of a sign not to take effect for a considerable time after its announcement cp. Ex 3¹² 2 K 19²⁹.

It is not improbable that it was on this occasion that Jeremiah met with a martyr's death at the hands of his apostate countrymen, as tradition recounts.

CHAPTER 45

BARUCH'S APPENDIX TO THE ROLL OF C. 36

Baruch, a man of social position (see Intro.), seems to have expected either important office in the state or more probably the gift of prophecy. On the occasion of his writing of the roll at Jeremiah's dictation, the prophet warns him that his ambition is not to be gratified.

3. Sorrow] RV 'pain' at the sins of his countrymen. The added 'grief' was caused by the predictions of punishment. 5. But thy life, etc.] Baruch's life should be preserved amidst all perils.

CHAPTERS 46-51

PROPHECIES CONCERNING THE NATIONS

The custom of placing in a group, as here, prophecies against heathen nations is illustrated by Isaiah (chs. 13-33), Ezekiel (chs. 25-32), and Amos (chs. 1. 2). For the position of the prophecies at the end of the book as compared with that which they hold in the LXX. see Intro. and on 25¹¹. We may divide them thus :—

(a) Chs. 46-49 (mostly of the fourth year of Jehoiakim). This section contains prophecies concerning Egypt and five other nations doubtless included in the roll of c. 36, with the exception of the second concerning Egypt (vv. 14-28 : see note on v. 13) and of the last against Elam (49³¹⁻³⁹ : first year of Zedekiah). These prophecies follow a natural order. Egypt is at the head as the nation whose overthrow by Nebuchadnezzar would be the signal to those others of a similar fate. We go thence to Philistia (including Tyre and Sidon); then (passing round to the E. of Palestine) to Moab, Ammon, and Edom; then to Danaseus, as representing the kingdoms of the North; to Kedar and Hazor, as indicating the kings mentioned in the summary of 25²¹; while, lastly, the nations of the East are included under Elam.

(b) Chs. 50, 51 (of doubtful authorship) This prophecy concerning Babylon forms an appropriate conclusion to the series. The nations immediately bordering upon Palestine have had their fate foretold, and then the more remote. Now the empire which was to execute God's vengeance upon them is itself declared to be destined in its turn to fall. See further, in intro. to c. 50.

CHAPTER 46

AGAINST EGYPT

1. Against the Gentiles] RV 'concerning the nations' around.

2. Carchemish] see Intro. and 2 Ch 35²⁰⁻²⁴; also on 47¹.

3-6. A lively description of the preparation and advance, followed by the defeat at Carchemish. 4. Brigandines] RV 'coats of mail.'

5. Seen them dismayed] RV 'seen it? They are dismayed.'

7. A flood] RV 'the Nile,' their own sacred river in its annual overflow. So in v. 8.

9. The Ethiopians, etc.] mercenary troops forming the chief part of the Egyptian armies.

10. A day of vengeance] on the Egyptians. They are to be the sacrifice, because of their treachery to Judah. 11. The medical science of Egypt was in high repute. 12. The land] RV 'the earth.'

13. The second part of the prophecy concerning Egypt suggests by its tone a more intimate acquaintance, and is probably to be ascribed to the time of the prophet's residence in that country.

14. See on 44¹ and 21⁶. 16. They said] the mercenaries : see on v. 9. 17. The time appointed] the period of grace is over.

18. Omit the second is. The v. means that Nebuchadnezzar shall resemble Tabor and Carmel, standing out conspicuous as compared with neighbouring rulers.

20. Is like] RV 'is.' This probably is an allusion to the sacred bull Apis, worshipped at Memphis. Destruction] RM 'the gadfly.' The north] i.e. Chaldea. 22. Like a serpent] rustling as it escapes through the thick underwood. Such shall be the sound of Egypt as it flees away. 23. Her forest] her beauty : cp. 21¹¹.

Grasshoppers] RV 'locusts.' 25. The multitude of No] RV 'Amon of No,' i.e. the god worshipped there. No] i.e. Thebes in Upper Egypt.

CHAPTER 47

AGAINST PHILISTIA

The Chaldean armed men with horses and chariots shall carry terror and desolation into Philistia and its cities.

1. Before that Pharaoh smote Gaza] The main views as to the date of this prophecy are (a) that the 'Pharaoh' is Necho, and that he captured Gaza about the time of his defeat of Josiah's army at Megiddo (608 B.C.); (b) that the reference is to the same king, as having taken Gaza on his way back from his defeat at Carchemish (605 B.C.); (c) that the 'Pharaoh' is Hophra (588-570 B.C.), and that he captured Gaza in the course of an expedition against Tyre and Sidon.

2. Waters . . out of the north] i.e. the Chaldean army. 4. Caphtor] the place of origin of the Philistines (see Dt 2²³ Am 9⁷), probably to be identified with Crete. 5. Baldness] in token of mourning: cp. 48³⁷. Cut thyself] see on 16⁶.

6. The prayer of the Philistines. 7. Jeremiah's reply.

CHAPTER 48 AGAINST MOAB

Moab, in recompense for its pride and security, and for its triumphing over Israel in the day of her calamity, shall itself be laid waste and taken captive: cp. the 'burden of Moab' in Isa 15, 16.

1. Nebo] not the mountain, but the Reubenite town (Nu 32³⁸), which had been annexed by Mesha, king of Moab (about 895 B.C.), according to the 'Moabite Stone' records. Several places mentioned in this c. have not been certainly identified. 2. Heshbon] an Ammonite town on the border of Moab, where the Chaldean invaders would lay their final plans. Madmen] a place unknown. 5. RV 'For by the ascent of Luhith with continual weeping shall they go up.' 6. The heath] see on 17⁶. 7. Chemosh] the god of Moab's national worship. 8. The valley] of Jordan, bounding part of Moab on the W. 10. Deceitfully] RV 'negligently.' Moab's foe must not be slack in executing God's command.

11. Settled on his lees] i.e. like wine which has remained undisturbed and not lost its flavour. Lees means sediment. Moab had retained its strength, but it was not to last.

12. Wanderers, that shall cause him to wander] RV 'them that pour off, and they shall pour him off.' The figure of jars of wine is continued. They are emptied by being tilted on one side, an operation that was performed slowly and carefully, that the jars might be safe and the wine run off clear, while the sediment was left. This work, however, in the case of Moab, shall be done roughly. 13. Bethel] the southern seat of the idolatrous worship introduced by Jeroboam (1 K 12²⁰).

15. And gone up out of her cities] RM 'and her cities are gone up in smoke.' 18. Come down] Dibon stands on two hills. 25. Horn] symbol of strength and pride. 27. Was he found among thieves] that he merited such treatment. Since] RV 'as often as.' 30. But, etc.] RV 'that it is nought; his boastings have wrought nothing.'

32. Cp. Isa 16^{8,9}. With] RV 'with more than.' Plants] RV 'branches.' Sibmah seems to have been famous for its vineyards. Over the sea] as far as the W. shore of the Dead Sea. Jazer] N. of Heshbon. Near its ruins are two large ponds. 33. Their shouting, etc.] The vintage shout shall be changed to the cry of panic.

36. Pipes] They were used at funerals, so that the word is appropriate to express mourning. 37. All shall have the usual emblems of mourning: cp. 47³.

38. Vessel] see on 22²⁸.

40. He shall fly] i.e. the Chaldean power.

45. They that fled . . force] RV 'They that fled stand without strength under the shadow of Heshbon.' While the fugitives of Moab wait in hope of aid under the walls of the Ammonite city, there bursts forth from it a flame kindled by the Chaldean foe like that which in old days was kindled at the same place by Sihon, the Amorite conqueror (Nu 21²⁸).

Tumultuous ones] the fugitives.

47. For the note of comfort at the end of the prophecy cp. 46²⁶ 49^{6,30}.

CHAPTER 49 AGAINST AMMON, EDMON, AND OTHER NATIONS

1-6. The territory of Ammon was N. of Moab, and the two peoples were connected by descent. The carrying away of the tribes on the E. of Jordan by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (2 K 15²⁰), strengthened the hands of Ammon, and it is their occupation of the portion of Gad upon that occasion that forms the crime which is dwelt on in this prophecy, and which shall bring on them judgment.

1. Their king] RV 'Malcam,' or Moloch, the god of the Ammonites, and so in v. 3. So in 48⁷ Chemosh is used for 'Moab.' 2, 3. Rabbah . . Heshbon . . Ai] Ammonite towns.

Hedges] fences, inclosures of vineyards.

4. Thy flowing valley] Ammon was full of valleys and streams running into Jordan.

7-22. Concerning Edom] The bitterness of the tone in which Edom is addressed in this prophecy is doubtless to be ascribed to the affinity between them and the Jews, which made the unnatural exultation of Edom over the fallen fortunes of their kinsmen the more offensive.

Much of the earlier part of this prophecy is almost verbally the same as Obad vv. 1-8, while in Obadiah the vv. come in more natural sequence. Obadiah seems to have written (see his v. 11) after the destruction of Jerusalem, whereas the prophecy in Jeremiah is connected by its greuping with the 4th year of Jehoiakim (see intro. to chs. 46-49). To meet this difficulty it has been suggested either (a) that the earlier part of Obadiah's prophecy was written before Nebuchadnezzar's overthrow of Jerusalem, and only the latter part after that event; or, (b) that both prophets embodied in their writings an earlier prediction. Another suggested solution is that Obadiah is referring to an earlier overthrow, viz. in the time of Jehoram (2 Ch 21¹⁷).

7. Is wisdom no more in Teman? Wisdom seems to have been a special characteristic of Edom: see v. 20, Obad v. 8, and cp. (apocryphal) book of Baruch 3^{22f}. 8. Dedan] a tribe descended from Abraham by his wife Keturah (Gn 25⁸), and dwelling SE. of Edom. They are bidden to keep well out of the way lest they should be involved in the overthrow of their neighbours: cp. v. 30. Esau] i.e. Edom.

9. Would they not leave some? RM 'they will leave no,' etc. In Obad v. 6 the words are interrogative, but probably not so here. The enemy, under the simile of grape-gatherers and of thieves, will bring about complete desolation. 10. Secret places] retreats and fastnesses. 11. The widows and orphans of the slain may, however, look to God's protection.

12. Whose judgment was not? RV 'to whom it pertained not.' If Israel itself has not escaped the cup of woe, how should Edom? 16. Thy stern mountain fastnesses have persuaded thee thou art impregnable.

Rock] Heb. Selah, is probably an allusion to the precipice-protected town of that name (identical with Petra), the capital of Edom: see 2 K 14⁷. 17. A desolation] RV 'an astonishment.'

19. He] the enemy of Edom. Like a lion from the swelling of Jordan] see on 12⁵. Against the habitation of the strong] RM 'unto the permanent pastures,' as the spot where a lion would be most likely to find his prey. But I will suddenly, etc.] RM 'for I will suddenly drive them away,' i.e. the Edomites. And who is a chosen man, that I may, etc.] RV 'and whoso is chosen' (viz. my servant Nebuchadnezzar) 'him will I,' etc. The time] RV 'a time.' God identifies Himself with His human agent for punishment. The reference is to the right of the plaintiff in a suit to appoint the time of trial. Who shall dare to claim such a right here? cp. Job 9¹⁹. Who is that shepherd?] What ruler will attempt to defend his flock against Me? 20. The least, etc.] RV 'They shall drag them away, even the little ones of the flock.' Edom shall be as helpless before the foe as sheep. 21. Red sea] probably the Gulf of Akaba, to the S. of Edom, not the Gulf of Suez.

23-27. Concerning Damascus] The prophecy relates to Syria generally, of which this was the most important city.

23. On the sea] If with some Heb. MSS we read 'as' for 'on' it will refer to the hearts trouble-tossed by conquest. 25. How is . . . not left? i.e. how sad it is that the inhabitants, paralysed with fear, have not saved themselves by fleeing in time! 27. Ben-hadad] Three kings of Damascus bore this name (1 K 15^{18f}, 20^{1f}, 2 K 13²⁵).

28-33. Concerning Kedar. Kedar] see on 2¹⁰. Hazor] perhaps in Arabia.

30. Dwell deep] see on v. 8. 31. Addressed to the invaders. Wealthy] RV 'that is at ease,' feeling secure against invasion. 32. Corners] see on 9²⁶. 33. Dragons] RV 'jackals.'

34-39. Against Elam] RV 'concerning Elam,' a country to the E. of Chaldea. For the date, as compared with the other prophecies, see intro. to chs. 46-49.

35. The bow] their chief weapon: cp. Isa 22⁶. 36. The four winds] i.e. invasion from all sides. 39. See on 48⁴⁷.

CHAPTER 50

THE FALL OF BABYLON AND THE RESTORATION OF ISRAEL

The prophecy concerning Babylon is ascribed to Jeremiah in 51⁶⁰. This, however, need not mean more than that it represents the tone of Jeremiah's utterances as expanded by a follower, e.g. Baruch, at a later date. The reasons for doubting Jeremiah's authorship are: (a) he elsewhere speaks in friendly terms of the Chaldeans; here their overthrow is predicted; (b) the style and words betray another writer; (c) the knowledge displayed of Babylonian matters is greater than could be expected of the prophet; (d) the Jews are in exile far away from Jerusalem (50^{4, 6, 17, 33}). The prophecy was fulfilled when Babylon was taken by Cyrus or his general Gobryas (perhaps the Darius of Daniel) in 539 B.C., nearly 50 years after the fall of Jerusalem.

2. A standard] as the speediest way of calling attention to the news. Merodach] another name for Bel (Baal), the tutelary God of Babylon. 3. Out of the north] referring to the Medo-Persian power. Media was NW. of Babylon.

4. The overthrow of their captors shall free the Jews. 5. Thitherward] RM 'Heb. thitherward.'

8-16. The triumph of Babylon over Israel shall be avenged.

8. As the he goats] in joyful alacrity.

9. An assembly of great nations] see for some of them 51²⁷. Herodotus (vii. 61^f) says there were twenty-two. 11. It is for exulting over Israel that Chaldea suffers. At grass] RV 'that treadeth out the corn.' The command in Dt 25⁴ would have this effect. 12. The hindermost, etc.] RV 'She (Babylon) shall be the hindermost,' etc. 15. Given her hand] RV 'submitted herself,' surrendered. Foundations] RV 'bulwarks.' Her walls are thrown down] not done by Cyrus, but (according to Herod. iii. 159) at the later capture by Darius.

16. They shall turn, etc.] The captives of other nations as well as of the Jews shall be released.

17-32. Babylon and her empire are doomed, while Israel shall be forgiven.

17. The lions] The sculptured winged lions (Assyrian and Babylonian) give the image a special point. Assyria had devoured the Ten Tribes, and now Babylon was crushing the feeble remnant of the people. Assyria had paid the penalty; so too shall Babylon. 20. Reserve] RV 'leave as a remnant.'

21. Merathaim . . Pekod] Proper names bearing the significant senses of 'double-rebellion' and 'visitation,' alluding to Babylon.

23. Hammer] Babylon: cp. 51²⁰. Individuals at other times have borne this title; Judas Maccabæus for his victories over Syria; Charles Martel, grandfather of Charles the Great (Charlemagne), who conquered the Saracens in a decisive battle at Tours, 732 A.D., and Edward I of England, on whose tomb at Westminster Abbey are the words, 'Scotorum Malleus,' or 'hammer of the Scots.'

27. Bullocks] i.e. her choice young warriors: cp. 48¹⁵. 28. The vengeance of his temple] the requital for having burnt it: cp. 51¹¹.

29. The Holy One of Israel] cp. 51⁵, not elsewhere in this book, but characteristic of Isaiah.

33-40. Babylon shall be utterly laid waste.

34. Redeemer] Heb. Goel, the near kinsman, to whom belonged the duty of avenging a murder. So the LORD is about to avenge His people. 36. Liars] rather, 'boasters.'

37. Mingled people] see on 25²⁰. 38. Her waters] the many canals which drained and irrigated the country around Babylon: cp. 51¹⁸.

Idols] Heb. 'terrors,' meaning their grotesque forms, such as winged bulls and human-headed lions. 39. The wild beasts of the islands] RV 'the wolves,' Heb. 'howling creatures.' Owls] RV 'ostriches.'

41-46. The enemy approaches and fulfils God's behests.

41-43. See on 6^{22f}.

44-46. Adapted from 49¹⁹⁻²¹.

CHAPTER 51

1-14. The end of Babylon arrives.

1. See on 25²⁰. 1, 2. The imagery is of the wind scattering the chaff on the threshing-floor. The wind and the fanners are the Medes (v. 11). 3. Him that bendeth] i.e. his bow in defence of Babylon. Brigandine] coat of mail. 5. See on 50²⁰. 7. Babylon has been God's instrument in His vengeance on the nations. 10. Hath brought forth our righteousness] has judged that the Jews' idolatry has been sufficiently punished, and that they are again to be treated as righteous.

11. The kings of the Medes] the leaders of the various tribes which together formed the nation: cp. v. 28. His temple] see on 50²⁸.

12. Upon] RV 'against.' 13. Many waters] see on 50²⁸. Covetousness] RM 'dishonest gain.' 14. Caterpillars] RV 'the cankerworm.'

15-19. The Creator of all things is the only true God. See on 10^{13f}.

20-58. The fate appointed for Babylon.

20. My battle ax] Many commentators think that Babylon is meant, but as Babylon is in this passage not the instrument but the object of God's vengeance (vv. 24-26), it seems more natural to regard Cyrus as indicated here. Will I break] rather, 'I break.'

25. O destroying mountain] The same phrase is used of the Mount of Olives (AV 'mount of corruption') in 2K23¹⁸, as the scene of pernicious idolatry. Babylon here receives the title, as at once hurtful and conspicuous. Burnt] i.e. probably, burnt out, extinct.

27. Ararat, Minni, are districts of Armenia, and so probably was Ashchenaz. Minni is frequently mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions, the kings of Assyria having had to quell frequent revolts against their overlordship among its people. 28. Prepare] lit. 'sanctify': so in 6⁴ 22⁷. His dominion] referring to the king of Media, who is to gather to the attack his tribes with their leaders: cp. v. 11.

31. Post] running messenger. At one end] RV 'on every quarter.' 32. Passages] with fords, or ferries. Reeds] RM 'marshes,' Heb. 'pools.' The reservoirs and pools around Babylon which prevented inundations shall disappear as completely as what is inflammable does by the action of fire. 33. It is time to thresh her] RV 'at the time when it is trodden.'

34f. Oppressed Israel speaks.

34. Dragon] here, 'sea-monster.' Delicates] dainties; here only used as a substantive in the Bible. 36. Sea] a great lake, or reservoir, made by the Babylonish queen Nitocris.

Springs] RV 'fountain,' referring to the net-work of canals dug for commerce and irrigation. 37. Dragons] RV 'jackals.' 39. While they are exulting and carousing, I will destroy them unawares. In their heat] when hot with wine.

41. Sheshach] see on 25²⁰. 42. The sea] a figure for the invaders: cp. v. 55, 46^{7f}.

44. Be] see on 50². That which he hath swallowed up] the riches of the subjugated nations.

46. Lest] RV 'let not.' Rumour] the state of unrest preceding the final catastrophe : cp. Mt 24^{6,7}.

48. Shall sing for] RV 'shall sing for joy over.'

50. Ye that have escaped the sword] by being already in exile at Babylon. Afar off] RV 'from afar,' viz. Babylon.

51. The exiles have been scoffed at for worshipping a God who has not defended His Temple from sacrilege.

53. Allusion to the height of the walls or of the tower of Bel.

55. The great voice] the hum of the city's life. When her waves] RV 'and their waves,' the surging hosts that encompass the city : cp. v. 42.

58. Broad walls] They were 30 or 40 ft. wide : see Herod. i. 178.

And the people . . shall be weary] The labour expended on these splendid edifices will have been in vain.

59. Seraiah] brother of Baruch : see 32¹². Went with Zedekiah] Zedekiah's visit was probably an act of homage to Nebuchadnezzar, perhaps to allay suspicions caused by the communications between the former and neighbouring peoples : see on 27⁸. Possibly, however, we should read 'from,' instead of 'with.'

A quiet prince] RV 'chief chamberlain,' mg. 'quarter-master,' who prepared for the king's reception at each halting-place on the journey.

61. And shalt see, and shalt read] RV 'then see that thou read,' so that the Jewish witnesses who heard could testify in after time to the prediction.

64. And they shall be weary] the last word (in Heb. but one) of the prophecy (see v. 58) with which the symbolic act is thus coupled.

Thus far, etc.] showing that c. 52 is by another hand.

CHAPTER 52

HISTORICAL APPENDIX (probably by the compiler of the book)

This c. is substantially the same as c. 39 (see notes there), but adds particulars relating to the Temple vessels (vv. 17 f.), while omitting Nebuchadnezzar's charge as to Jeremiah's safety (39¹¹). Both accounts are probably based on that of 2 K 24¹⁸⁻²⁵ 30.

1-11. Capture of the city. 12-27. Subsequent severities. 28-30. Nebuchadnezzar's deportations. 31-34. Concluding notice of Jehoiachin. 4. Nebuchadnezzar] see on 21:

6. Famine] described in detail in the 'Lamentations.' 7. Then the city was broken up] RV 'Then a breach was made in the city.'

9. Riblah] see on 39⁵. 11. He put out the eyes] see on 39⁷. 17 f. See prefatory remarks.

18. Caldrons] RV 'pots,' for carrying away ashes after sacrificing. 22. A chapter] a capital. 24. Zephaniah] see on 21¹.

25. The principal scribe of the host] RV 'the scribe of the captain of the host.'

28-30. This passage seems to have been taken by the compiler from a separate document. For seventh we should probably read 'seventeenth,' corresponding to Zedekiah's tenth year, while the siege was going on. Thus this captivity would consist chiefly of people from the country parts. The next, i.e. Nebuchadnezzar's eighteenth year, was that with which this chapter deals. Of the deportation of his three and twentieth year we have no other mention.

31. The seven and thirtieth year] 561 B.C. Evil-merodach] son of Nebuchadnezzar.

Lifted up the head] released : cp. (in 40) 13, 30.

32. The kings] captives kept at his court to commemorate his conquests.

33. He was admitted to the king's table.

THE LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH

INTRODUCTION

1. Name, Place in Canon, and Subject. To the Hebrews this book is known by its initial word, Ekkah, 'How'; by the ancient Jews of Alexandria it was called Threnoi, 'Dirges'; by St. Jerome, Lamentationes, whence our English title. Its position in the English and other versions is due to the influence of the Greek or LXX version, which placed it immediately after the prophecies of Jeremiah; but in the Hebrew canon it is usually found among the Hagiographa, or 'Writings,' constituting, along with Canticles, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, a small collection known as the Meqilloth, or 'Rolls.' The great theme of the book is the siege, capture, and destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Josephus, on the basis of 2 Ch 35²⁵, erroneously supposed that it was written as an elegy over the death of king Josiah. For vividness and pathos the book is unsurpassed in all literature.

2. Analysis.

C. 1. Zion's desolation and sorrow.

C. 2. Zion's sorrows due to Jehovah's anger.

C. 3. Zion's hope in God's mercy.

C. 4. Zion's former glory contrasted with her present humiliation.

C. 5. Zion's earnest petition for deliverance.

3. Structure. Of the five lyric poems of which the book consists, the first four, in Hebrew, are acrostics; each poem consisting of 22 portions or verses, corresponding to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, except the third, in which each letter is used thrice, and in which, consequently, there are 3 times 22, or 66 verses. The fifth poem, though not an acrostic, has 22 verses. The metre is known as Kinah rhythm or elegiac, sometimes spoken of as 'limping verse,' because the second line is usually considerably shorter than the first. No book shows greater art or more technical skill in composition. Isa 14⁴⁻²¹ is written in the same metre.

4. Author. In the original these poems are anonymous, but tradition has long since ascribed them to Jeremiah. The LXX prefaces the book with these words: 'And it came to pass, after Israel had been carried into captivity and Jerusalem had been laid waste that Jeremiah sat weeping and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem and said'; and this ancient tradition is confirmed by the Syriac, the Latin Vulgate, the Targum of Jonathan, the Talmud, and by modern Jews and Christians, who point to the very cave or grotto, near the Damascus gate on the N. side of the Holy City, in which Jeremiah is supposed to have written them. Various allusions in the poems themselves look in the same direction; especially the vivid descriptions of Jerusalem in chs. 2 and 4, which are evidently the pen-pictures of an eye-witness; likewise the strongly sympathetic temper and prophetic spirit of the poems throughout, as well as their style, phraseology, and thought, which are all so characteristic of Jeremiah.

On the other hand, it is possible, of course, that they were written by a contemporary of Jeremiah, perhaps Baruch; for, as has been suggested by Professor McFadyen, being anonymous, it is easier to think that the traditional title has been added by the Greek version than that a genuine one has been lost from the Hebrew. Besides, the allusion to the prophets in 2⁹, bearing the iniquities of the fathers in 5⁷, and the expectation of help from Egypt in 4¹⁷, are unlike Jeremiah. But notwithstanding all the objections to the contrary, the balance of evidence, both internal and external, is probably in favour of Jeremiah.

5. Unity and Date. As may be seen from the outline given above, the unity of the book is not logical, but emotional; hence the question of its literary unity is largely dependent upon one's attitude toward its authorship and date. As to its date, it is very generally agreed that it was composed soon after the downfall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. How soon, it is difficult to state: the author's vivid language points to a time immediately subsequent, whereas the highly artificial and acrostic character of the composition would indicate that the bitterness of the siege had passed, and that the poet had had time for calm reflection.

6. Permanent Religious Value. The richest portion of the book is doubtless the section contained in 3¹⁹⁻³⁹, in which vv. 22-27 are particularly precious. But the entire book is of value to teach not only patriotism, and patience, and prayer, and confession of sin, but the divine character of chastisement, the disciplinary value of yoke-bearing, how God pities those whom He is compelled to afflict; and, what is deepest and most important of all, how ideal Zion, in suffering for the sins of the nation, is typical of the Messiah who 'bore our sins and carried our sorrows.' The book is also of liturgical value, being read by pious Israelites every Friday afternoon at the Jews' wailing place, within the city of Jerusalem, but just outside the Temple area, and in Jewish synagogues the world over on the 9th of Ab (August), the day on which the Temple was burned.

CHAPTER 1

ZION'S DESOLATION AND SORROW

Though the five poems contained in the book have practically the same theme—the downfall of Jerusalem—yet each poem dwells on a different phase of the subject as intimated in the opening words of each c. This first one emphasises the desolation and misery of the city, describing it as 'solitary,' as 'a widow,' and as 'tributary,' i.e. Judah has lost her independence; and there is 'no comforter,' vv. 2, 9, 17, 21. It falls naturally into three sub-divisions, as seen below. In structure it is strictly alphabetical: each v. being of triple construction.

1-11. The poet laments Zion's utter desolation.

1. How] a characteristic word for the commencement of an elegy: cp. 2¹ 4^{1,2} Isa 14⁴.

Sit solitary] in the sense of empty houses and deserted streets. Provinces] the neighbouring countries, such as Edom and Moab.

2. Lovers] synonymous with friends, viz. her allies Edom and Egypt (4²²).

3. Because of affliction and . . . great servitude] i.e. Judah chose exile to escape the sufferings to which she was exposed in her own land (Jer 40¹¹). Between the straits] RV 'within the straits.' 4. The ways of Zion do mourn] The roads by which pilgrims came up to the feasts are now deserted (Jer 14²).

Her virgins] those who took part in the festal occasions (Ps 68²⁵). 5. Are the chief] RV 'are become the head': i.e. Judah has lost her leadership. Before the enemy] driven as slaves. 6. Her princes are become like harts] referring to Zedekiah's flight with his sons (Jer 39⁴⁻⁷).

7. Remembered] RV 'remembereth.'

Sabbaths] RV 'desolations,' in the sense probably of ceasings: cp. the enforced sabbaths of Lv 26^{34,35}. The Heb. word employed here is not found elsewhere in OT. 8. Is removed] RV 'is become as an unclean thing.' Her nakedness] her sin and its punishment (4²¹).

9. Her filthiness] moral pollution, expressed by a bold but common Oriental figure (Jer 13²²).

She remembereth not] RV 'she remembered not.' 10. Pleasant things] primarily the vessels of the sanctuary (2 Ch 36^{10,19}), but including all of Jerusalem's precious possessions.

12-19. Zion's comfortless condition due to Jehovah's righteousness.

12. Zion yearns for sympathy. 13. From above] RV 'From on high.' 14. Is bound] a bucolic figure, God being represented as binding Judah's sins upon his neck as a ploughman binds the yoke upon oxen (Jer 27²). He hath made my strength to fall] rather, 'it (the yoke) hath caused my strength to stumble.' The LORD] in Heb. Adonai, used 14 times in Lamentations to express lordship; the name Jehovah conveys the covenant idea of redemption. 15. He hath called an assembly] lit. 'an appointed time': i.e. a religious festival (Lev 23⁴); not for Israel, however, but for the enemy, to celebrate the defeat of Zion's soldiers. 16. Mine eye, mine eye] The emphatic repetition reminding one of Jeremiah's style (Jer 4¹⁹ 6¹⁴). 17. That his adversaries should be round about him] i.e. that his nearest neighbours should be his most hateful foes. In this v. the poet speaks. 19. Lovers] see on v. 2. My priests and mine elders] Even the most honoured chiefs of the city died of starvation.

20-22. In distress Zion appeals to Jehovah for redress.

21. The day] i.e. the day of vengeance on Zion, long before announced (Jer 25¹⁷⁻²⁰).

22. Let all their wickedness come before thee] a not infrequent prayer of OT. saints for righteous retribution upon the enemy: cp. Ps 69. 109, 137 Jer 18²⁰⁻²³; not altogether unjustifiable, for the Hebrew was conscious that wickedness must be punished, but far below the plane of the Sermon on the Mount.

CHAPTER 2

ZION'S SORROWS DUE TO JEHOVAH'S ANGER

In this second dirge, the cause of Zion's woe is dwelt upon. Jehovah has become angry with His people, therefore He has cast them off. Zion's miseries are the judgments of God, which have been sent because of Judah's sins. In structure the poem is an acrostic, each v. being of triple character, as in c. 1. The prophet speaks.

1-10. The agonies caused by Adonai's anger.

1. The beauty of Israel] the Temple (Isa 64¹¹), or possibly the heroes of Jerusalem (281¹⁹). His footstool] the ark of the covenant (1 Ch 28²), or possibly the sanctuary (Ps 99⁵ 132⁷ Isa 60¹⁸). 2. Swallowed up] i.e. destroyed by earthquake. Habitations] open villages of the shepherds. Strong holds] fortified towns. 3. All the horn] better, 'every horn,' in the sense of self-protection or of resistance, the horn being a symbol of strength. 4. In the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion] The division of the v. in AV is faulty. The colon after Zion should stand after eye, as in RV. 6. As if it were of a garden] i.e. God has destroyed His Temple as easily as a man removes a vintage booth, which has served its purpose, from a garden (Isa 11¹⁴).

8. He hath stretched out a line] Jehovah surveys, but to destroy: cp. Isa 34¹¹ Am 7⁷.

9. Her gates are sunk into the ground] a metaphor expressing their total destruction, not a vestige being left above ground. The law is no more] including the national ritual and government. Her prophets also find no vision] because so hardened by sin.

10. The elders . . sit upon the ground] i.e. in banishment.

11-19. Zion's bitter sorrow and lamentation.

11. The scene of Jerusalem's woes is to the poet heartrending. My liver] a phrase not found elsewhere in OT., but expressive of strong emotion: cp. our English use of 'spleen' and 'humorous.' 12. The picture of helpless, innocent children crying in vain for food is touching. 13. What thing shall I take to witness for thee?] RV 'What shall I testify unto thee?' in the sense of attempting to comfort Jerusalem. 14. False burdens] RM 'oracles of vanity' (Jer 23³³). Causes of banishment] The Heb. word employed here is not found elsewhere, but probably means things which draw aside and drive out (Jer 27^{10,15}). 17. The LORD hath done] The poet points to Jehovah as Zion's Destroyer, only later to show that He may become her Saviour. 18. O wall] apostrophised as a human mourner (Isa 14³¹). No rest] RV 'no respite.' Apple of thine eye] lit. 'daughter,' i.e. pupil of the eye: cp. Ps 17⁸.

20-22. In bewilderment Zion appeals to Jehovah.

20. To whom thou hast done this] viz to His own chosen people. Children of a span long] RV 'the children that are dandled in the hands': cp. v. 22, Jer 19⁹. 22. My terrors round about] as in Jer 6²⁵ 20^{3,10}. Jehovah has now summoned His terrors (Magor-missabib), as at other times He had summoned His people to the festivals (a solemn day).

CHAPTER 3

ZION'S HOPE IN GOD'S MERCY

This third poem is the most elaborate in structure and the most sublime in thought of all. The poet speaks not only for himself, but for the nation. The order of thought is sorrow, confession, repentance, prayer. Though consisting of 66 vv. the poem is but a little longer than the others. Three consecutive vv. are built upon each letter of the Heb. alphabet: each triplet is usually closely associated in thought, and consequently grouped together as in the RV.

1-18. Zion bewails her calamities.

1-3. I am the man] The author is a representative sufferer, an eye-witness, and typical of Christ. 4-6. Gall] bitterest sorrow (Jer 8¹⁴). Travel] RV 'travail,' which is the more modern spelling, in the sense here intended, of painful labour (Nu 20¹⁴). He hath set me] RV 'He hath made me to dwell' (Ps 143³). Be dead of old] RV 'have been long dead.' 7-9. He hath made my paths crooked] in the sense that every avenue of advance is blocked. 10-12. He was] RV 'He is.' As a bear... as a lion] God is even lying in wait to oppose him (Jer 4⁷ 5⁹).

Danger follows distress. 13-15. Arrows of his quiver] RM 'sons of his quiver,' a poetical expression for the enemies' taunts (Jer 20⁵).

My reins] The English equivalent is heart, denoting the seat of the affections (Jer 12²).

To all my people] better, 'to all peoples,' as in many Heb. MSS and the Peshitto.

16-18. Broken my teeth with gravel stones] i.e. God has forced him to eat bread full of grit (Prov 20¹⁷). He hath covered me with ashes] or, 'He made me cower in the ashes.' Such dreadful thoughts about God are almost without a parallel in the OT.

19-39. Hope of relief through God's mercy.

In this section we reach the highest point of trust to which the mourner attains.

19-21. Remembering] RV 'remember,' in the imperative sense (17). This I recall] viz. what just precedes, his affliction. 25-27. The LORD is good] 'good' is the initial word of each v. in this group. Goodness to the poet is an essential attribute of Jehovah and the basis of his hope. He is too good to keep them always in despair. Should both hope and quietly wait] lit. 'should wait and in silence'; quiet waiting being the pre-requisite of perceiving that God is good. Yoke] discipline, or work that is irksome, compulsory and painful. These vv. have the ring of autobiography. 28-30. The leading verbs in this triplet are to be taken hortatively, as RV 'Let him sit,' 'put,' 'give,' the argument being that yoke-bearing in order to be beneficial must be submitted to willingly. Hath borne] RV 'hath laid.' Giveth his cheek] the climax of patience is reached when suffering that comes through human agency is borne without murmuring.

31-33. Three grounds are given for resignation: (1) because chastisement is only temporary (Ps 77⁷ Jer 3^{3,12}); (2) because by nature God is merciful, and therefore the distress sent will not exceed what is absolutely necessary (Isa 54⁸); (3) because all affliction is against His will, hence God cannot commit an injustice. 34-36. In this triplet the order of thought is transposed to accommodate the alphabetic structure. The teaching is, the Lord approveth not, (1) of cruelty to prisoners in war, as Nebuchadnezzar to the inhabitants of Jerusalem; (2) of perverting justice in court (Ex 23⁶); (3) of dishonesty in private business (Ex 22^{8,9}). 37-39. This group rounds out the thought of the section: each v. contains a separate interrogation: (1) Who can command and bring to pass except Adonai? (Ps 33⁹). (2) Do not evil (i.e. suffering) and good alike proceed from God? (Am 3⁶ Isa 45⁷). (3) Why should a man who still lives complain when he is only being punished for his sins? (Jer 45⁵). A living man] The word 'living' is emphatic. Life in itself is more than the sinner merits. Instead of having been overpaid, he is not even paid in full: for 'the wages of sin is death' (Rom 6²³). The poet is here championing the divine cause.

40-54. Exhortations to repent and confess.

40-42. Our heart with our hands] strictly, our heart to our palms, in the sense that the heart should actually follow in the direction in which our hands point (Jer 4⁸¹).

43-45. Zion's condition is dire because Jehovah will not hear the prayers of His miserable victims. People] RV 'peoples,' i.e. the foreign nations round about. 52-54. These vv. are thought to point to Jeremiah as the author of the poems: cp. Jer 38. Cast a stone upon me] i.e. covered with a stone the pit into which they cast him. Waters flowed over mine head] There was no water, but mire, in Jeremiah's dungeon (Jer 38⁶). I am cut off] the sufferer is a type of Christ (Ps 88⁵ Isa 53⁸).

55-66. In despair Zion prays for vengeance upon the enemy.

55-57. I called upon thy name] i.e. upon the attributes of God; referring possibly to Ps 69, supposed by some to have been composed by Jeremiah while in the dungeon.

Fear not] God's answer was brief, consisting of but two words, but enough since they came from him. 58-60. Plead] as an advocate (Jer 50³⁴). All their imaginations] RV 'all their devices' (Jer 11¹⁹ 18¹⁸). 63. Musick] RV 'song.' 64-66. AV by translating the imperfect tenses of the verbs in this triplet as imperatives, makes the language appear harsher than it really is; still it must be allowed that the poet prays for retribution upon the enemy (Jer 18²³ 2 Tim 4¹⁴). Sorrow of heart] RV 'hardness of heart.'

CHAPTER 4

ZION'S FORMER GLORY CONTRASTED WITH HER PRESENT HUMILIATION

In this fourth dirge the poet describes the miseries of the various classes in the sack of Jerusalem, concluding with a warning to Edom. In structure, each alphabetic v. is composed of two rather than of three subdivisions, the ideas and phrases balancing as in ordinary Hebrew poetry. This is considered the finest poetry of the book. The mourner speaks throughout.

1-10. The terrible distress of the people and nobles.

1. How is the gold become dim] The three words used for gold, pure gold, and fine gold, in vv. 1, 2, all stand metaphorically for Jerusalem's most precious possessions, particularly her inhabitants. The stones of the sanctuary] the choicest portion of Zion's citizens (2¹⁹ Zech 9¹⁶). 2. Earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter] The contrast is not merely one of the materials, gold and clay, but of workmanship (Jer 18¹⁻⁶ 19¹⁻¹⁰). 3. The sea monsters] RV 'the jackals' (Jer 9¹¹). The thought is that even wild beasts suckle their young, but the women of Jerusalem are become cruel and take no heed of their children's pitiful cries. Like the ostriches] here taken as the type of cruelty and heartlessness, because they forsake their young at the least alarm (Job 39¹³⁻¹⁷). 5. Delicately] daintily (Prov 29²¹). Brought up in scarlet] lit. 'carried upon scarlet,' as infants. Embrace dunghills] lie upon dust heaps. The contrast is most vivid. From the highest luxury, the upper classes in Jerusalem have been reduced to the extremest poverty.

6. For the punishment of the iniquity] RV 'For the iniquity.' As in a moment] Sodom was overthrown suddenly; Jerusalem's sufferings were prolonged. Hence it is inferred that Jerusalem's sin was greater than Sodom's. Our Lord modified this ancient view of sin and punishment (Lk 13¹⁻⁵). And no hands stayed on her] RV 'and no hands were laid upon her,' i.e. Sodom's punishment was direct from God. 7. Nazarites] RV 'nobles,' probably alluding to the Rechabites, famous at that time for their purity and temperance (Jer 35).

9. Better] i.e. better off. Death by the sword, prior to the siege, is pronounced preferable to being gradually wasted by famine.

For want of the fruits of the field] lit. 'from the produce of the field,' famine being more cruel than the enemy (Ps 109²⁴). 10. This v. describes a gruesome scene, alluded to in 2⁵⁰, and predicted in Jer 19⁹. Pitiful women] the daughters of an effete civilisation, who had been nursed in the lap of luxury.

11-16. The ignominious fate of the prophets and priests.

This section begins and ends with an account of the wrath of Jehovah. 11. Kindled a fire in Zion] poetic for the glowing of Jehovah's anger (2 Ch 36¹⁹). 13. For the sins of] RV 'It is because of the sins of.' Zion's prophets were really murderers (2 Ch 24²¹ Jer 26-).

14. They have wandered] reeled and staggered, reckless of their responsibilities as leaders. 15. They cried unto them] the people applied to them what lepers were required to declare of themselves, viz. 'Unclean! Unclean!' (Lv 13⁴⁵). Theirs was spiritual leprosy. They said among the heathen] When ostracised, people abroad said. They shall tarry here no longer. They were unwelcome every where; fugitives and vagabonds, with the mark of Cain upon them.

16. The anger of the LORD hath divided them] lit. 'the face of Jehovah hath scattered them.'

17-20. The vain hope of escape; even the king being captured. This short section is in the first person plural.

17. RV 'Our eyes do yet fail in looking for our vain help.' Egypt or some other expected ally disappoints (Jer 37⁷ Isa 36⁶). 19. Our persecutors] RV 'our pursuers.' 20. The breath of our nostrils] a rather strong expression to use of Zedekiah, yet he was Jerusalem's king, and though weak, 'the anointed of Jehovah.' Under his shadow] even as captives, they hoped to be allowed some sort of national organisation with Zedekiah as their head. The hope expressed is pathetic.

21, 22. The doom of Edom.

21. Rejoice and be glad] i.e. enjoy the malicious but fleeting satisfaction (Jer 49⁷⁻²²). Edom is typical of the church's foes to-day.

Uz] the territory lying SE. of Palestine, extending probably into Arabia (Jer 25²⁰).

The cup] the symbol of divine wrath (Jer 25¹⁷). 22. The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished] lit. 'ended.' For one brief moment the curtain of gloom is lifted, and a hope—in a sense a Messianic hope—is held out to Zion (Isa 40²). He will discover thy sins] i.e. he will punish thy sins; for, if to cover is to forgive, to discover must be to punish (Pss 32¹ 85²). Thus the poem closes with a contrast. Zion's sins shall be covered. Edom's discovered. Zion's captivity is past, Edom's yet to come. The Hebrews' debt is paid, the Edomites' is yet to be exacted.

CHAPTER 5

ZION'S EARNEST PETITION FOR DELIVERANCE

This final poem is not so much an elegy as a prayer or meditation. The tone is more calm and spiritual than the others, with no trace of vindictiveness. The poet, speaking for the people, 'will have God know everything.' Though divided into 22 vv., it is not an acrostic. Rhyme takes the place of the alphabetical structure, the poem having not less than 45 words ending in the sound u: cp. Ps124. Like c. 4, each v. is composed of two members which are balanced with the greatest care, both as to form and thought. In the Vulgate this c. is given a separate title, 'Oratio Jeremiae prophetae.'

1-18. A pathetic review of Zion's condition.

1. Remember, O LORD] Like the initial sentences of the other poems, the opening words strike the key of what follows. The poet is about to pray, so he secures first of all God's attention. 2. Our inheritance] Canaan (Lv20²⁴). 3. Our mothers are as widows] i.e. without protection and support. 5. Our necks are under persecution] RV 'our pursuers are upon our necks.' 6. To the Assyrians] Babylonians of course are meant (Jer2¹⁸ 2K23²⁹).

7. And we have borne their iniquities] not in contradiction to Jer31²⁹ Ezk18², nor that they were not themselves great sinners, for v. 16 shows that they acknowledged they were, but that the nation's guilt extended back into the past. Ideal Zion, like Christ, was to 'be made perfect through sufferings' (Heb2¹⁰). 8. Servants have ruled over us] Babylonian satraps were often simply household favourites, promoted by the king to posts of honour, such as the headship of the wretched remnant of Judah (Jer39³). 9. We gat] RV 'We got,' lit. 'we bring in.' Because of the sword of the wilderness] alluding to the raids of the Bedouins, who may have fallen upon the remnant in their attempts to snatch a little food.

10. Black] RM 'hot.' Terrible famine] RV 'burning heat of famine.' 12. Hanged up by their hand] The Assyrian custom was to impale bodies after death in order to expose them to the most utter contempt possible (Dt21²³ 1S31¹⁰⁻¹²). 13. They took the young men to grind] RV 'The young men bare the mill,' work usually done by women and slaves (Isa47²).

14. From the gate] corresponding to our public square or park (Jer14²).

16. The crown is fallen from our head] a figurative expression conveying the thought that Zion has lost her dignity of statehood.

Woe unto us, that we have sinned] a distinct confession on the part of the people, and the effect desired has been obtained. 17. For this... for these things] loss of nationality and present distress respectively.

19-22. A final appeal to Jehovah to remove Zion's reproach.

The book closes with a majestic apostrophe to Jehovah. 19. Remainest] RV 'sittest,' as king. Jehovah had not abdicated, though Zedekiah had (Ps45⁶ 102¹²). 20. Wherefore... so long time] a hint may be contained in these last words as to the time of composition, at least of c. 5. 21. Turn thou us unto thee] The poet realises that they cannot turn themselves. The doctrine clearly is that repentance is of grace. It is useless simply to resolve to turn (Jer31¹⁸).

22. But] RV 'unless,' which is better; for that Jehovah has utterly rejected Zion is to the poet unthinkable. The tone of the v., however, is so melancholy that in some MSS v. 21 is repeated; so that, in reading the roll in the synagogue, the book might end more hopefully. The Jews delighted in cheerful conclusions. Similar repetitions occur at the close of Ecclesiastes, Isaiah, and Malachi.

EZEKIEL

INTRODUCTION

1. History of Ezekiel's Times. Ezekiel was preëminently a prophet of the Captivity of Judah, but the allusions in his book go back over the last half-century of the existence of the Jewish kingdom.

Assyria, Babylon, and Egypt. The kings of Judah had long been vassals of Assyria, but in the latter half of the 7th cent. B.C. the power of that empire was declining. Soon after 630 B.C. Western Asia was invaded by the Scythians—hordes of northern barbarians who penetrated to the borders of Egypt. Their irruption is not directly mentioned in Scripture, but it made a strong and terrifying impression, of which traces are found in both Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and the possibility of its recurrence was long present to men's minds. About 625 B.C. Babylon, hitherto a tributary of Assyria, became independent under Nabopolassar, and about 607 B.C. Nineveh, the Assyrian capital, fell before Nabopolassar and his allies. The supremacy of the E. was thus transferred to Babylon. When Nineveh fell, Pharaoh-Necho of Egypt made himself temporarily master of Palestine, but in 605 B.C. he was defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadrezzar, the son of Nabopolassar, who immediately succeeded his father as king of Babylon and ruler of all Western Asia.

The last kings of Judah. The reign of Josiah (639–608 B.C.) was signalised by the discovery of the Book of the Law in the Temple (621 B.C.), and by the great reformation that followed it. Josiah was slain in battle at Megiddo, when attempting to oppose the northward march of Pharaoh-Necho (608 B.C.). The people of Judah placed Shallum (generally known as Jehoahaz), Josiah's youngest son, on the throne, but their choice did not satisfy Pharaoh-Necho, who deposed Shallum, and carried him captive to Egypt, putting Jehoikim, another son of Josiah, in his place. Jehoikim reigned as a vassal of Egypt for four years, but Nebuchadrezzar's victory at Carchemish made him a subject of Babylon. For three years longer he was loyal to Nebuchadrezzar, but at last he began to intrigue again with Egypt. He died in 597 B.C. before Nebuchadrezzar could punish his unfaithfulness, but the blow fell on his son and successor, Jehoiachin, who was deposed after a reign of three months, and carried captive to Babylon, along with the flower of the nobility and the best of the craftsmen of the land.

This was the first captivity (597 B.C.). Nebuchadrezzar, however, spared the kingdom of Judah a little longer, and set Zedekiah, a third son of Josiah, on the throne. But Zedekiah proved a weak ruler, unable to resist the anti-Babylonian party in Judah. He too was led into intrigue with Egypt, and revolt against Babylon. Nebuchadrezzar sent an army against Jerusalem. The siege began on the tenth day of the tenth month of Zedekiah's ninth year; and after being temporarily raised owing to the approach of an Egyptian army, was resumed, and ended on the ninth day of the fourth month of Zedekiah's eleventh year. The king fled, but was captured, had his eyes put out, and was taken to Babylon. A month later Jerusalem was burnt, and the bulk of the people of Judah carried into exile. This was the second captivity (586 B.C.).

After the Second Captivity. Gedaliah, a Jewish noble, was made Babylonian Governor of Palestine, but after three months he was murdered, at the instigation of the king of Ammon, by a noble of the anti-Babylonian faction. The Jewish leaders of Gedaliah's party fled with their followers into Egypt. It was probably to avenge the murder of Gedaliah that a further deportation of Jews to Babylon took place five years later (Jer 52³⁰). This was the third captivity (581 B.C.).

Babylon, Tyre, and Egypt. Tyre as well as Judah revolted against Nebuchadrezzar, and was besieged by him for thirteen years from the seventh year of his reign (597–584 B.C.). In his thirty-seventh year (567 B.C.) Nebuchadrezzar was engaged in a campaign against Egypt.

2. Ezekiel's personal history. Ezekiel ('God strengthens,' or 'God is strong'), the son of Buzi, was a priest who was carried to Babylon at the first captivity (597 B.C.). This is the point from which the dates in his book are reckoned. Nothing is known of his age at the time of his transportation, or of his previous history. In the fifth year of his captivity (592 B.C.) he was called and consecrated to the work of a prophet by a remarkable vision with which the book opens, and he carried on his ministry at intervals for twenty-two years, the latest date in the book being the twenty-seventh year of the captivity (570 B.C.). Our knowledge of his personal career is very meagre. He lived in a house of his own, among a colony of his fellow exiles, who were settled at a place called Tel-abib. He was married, and his wife died suddenly on the very day when the siege of Jerusalem began.

3. Ezekiel's Audience. This consisted outwardly of the exiles at Tel-abib, who were an organised community with 'elders' at their head. They were at first opposed to Ezekiel, and were inclined to believe the false prophets who held out hopes of a speedy return to their own land (Jer 29^{8,9}). This antagonism prevented him from speaking in public, but the elders visited him from time to time in his house. After the fulfilment of his earlier prophecies in the fall of Jerusalem, the attitude of the exiles to the prophet became more favourable. Though living in Babylonia Ezekiel's chief concern was with the fate of Jerusalem, and he took the deepest interest in all that was happening in Palestine. The prophecies spoken to the elders and other exiles at Tel-abib were really addressed to the whole people of Israel whom they represented. At times Ezekiel makes a distinction between the exiles and their brethren in Palestine, and in these cases his verdict is in favour of the former.

4. The Book of Ezekiel falls into three well-marked divisions. The first (chs. 1-24) predicts the fall of Jerusalem as the necessary consequence of Israel's sin. The second (chs. 25-32) deals with God's judgments on the surrounding nations. The third (chs. 33-48) describes the restoration of Israel and the establishment of the perfect kingdom of God. There is no doubt as to the unity and authenticity of the book, though a few passages here and there have been thought to be duplicates of the same prophecy. The Hebrew text, however, has become obscure in some places through the mistakes of transcribers, and the true sense has to be sought either in ancient translations like the LXX, which frequently give a better meaning, or in simple and obvious corrections. The prophecies of Ezekiel have a peculiar style and character, due to the prophet's special mental qualities. The most marked of these qualities was his powerful imagination, which not only displayed itself in strange and weird conceptions, but wrought these out with great minuteness of detail, akin to what we find in Dante. Three forms of prophecy are specially characteristic of Ezekiel. We have symbolic actions, in which the truths to be taught are practically illustrated; allegories, which present the subjects in hand under elaborate figures; and visions, in which material emblems stand out spontaneously before the prophet's mind. It is possible that some of the symbolic actions described were not actually performed. In 24⁸ we see that the symbolic action and the allegory cannot be sharply distinguished. The visions, too, have been supposed by some to be merely allegories thrown into a peculiar literary form, but there is no reason to doubt that they were real experiences, though some of the details may have been worked out more fully when the visions were committed to writing.

5. Ezekiel and Jeremiah were contemporary prophets, though the latter was much the older of the two. Neither prophet mentions the other, but the book of Ezekiel contains many traces of Jeremiah's influence. During the eleven years of Zedekiah's reign both were engaged, the one in Jerusalem, and the other in Babylonia, in proclaiming practically the same truths—the guilt and coming punishment of Judah, the sin and folly of opposing Babylon and seeking help from Egypt, the certainty of the destruction of Jerusalem. After the captivity both foretold the ultimate restoration of the exiles. Jeremiah's prophecy of the New Covenant is closely paralleled in different parts of Ezekiel, but the latter left a larger place for ritual and external law than the former in his conception of the perfect kingdom of God.

6. Ezekiel's Leading Doctrines. The glory and holiness of God are very prominent in the book of Ezekiel. He is the God of Israel, and has chosen Israel as His people. His holiness has been outraged by Israel's sin, and the display of His glory is the great motive of all His dealings with them both in judgment and mercy. What He does is 'for His Name's sake.' The sin cannot be unpunished, and yet the choice of Israel cannot be finally revoked. God will restore and purify His people and dwell among them for ever. The result will be the manifestation of His true character to men. 'They shall know that I am the LORD' is the most frequent phrase in the book.

7. Ezekiel's Messianic Prophecies. The whole of the last part of the book pictures an ideal kingdom of God, and an ideal future king. The latter is symbolised by the twig taken from the top of the cedar (17^{22,23}), is further hinted at in 21²⁷, and is clearly represented by the Davidic king of 34^{23,24} 37²⁴, and the 'prince' of the concluding chs.

8. Fulfilment of Ezekiel's Prophecies. Those in the first part were accomplished in a general sense when Jerusalem fell. Those in the last part were partially realised in the return of the Jews from captivity and the rebuilding of the Temple; and in their essence, though not in their literal form, they have been or are being fulfilled in the Church of Jesus Christ. Ezekiel conceived of the future kingdom of God as a national and Jewish one, and allowance must be made for this limitation of his view in dealing with the prophecies of the second part as well as with those of the third.

The future of the foreign nations is foretold with reference to their influence on God's kingdom, and as the latter did not preserve the national form which Ezekiel contemplated, the literal fulfilment of the prophecies about the former was not to be looked for either. These prophecies embody general truths about the overthrow of the powers of evil rather than precise anticipations of actual history.

9. Ezekiel and the Law. The last nine chapters of Ezekiel have an important bearing on the questions connected with the dates of the different parts of the Pentateuch. The ritual and legal details they contain show that such regulations were the subject of much thought during the exile, and their differences from the Pentateuch show that on particular points the Law was not absolutely fixed from the first, but allowed a certain elasticity in practice. The most important question is that connected with the relationship between the priests and the Levites. In Deuteronomy, which guided Josiah's reformation, the two classes are regarded as identical, while in the parts of the Pentateuch known as the Priests' Code they are distinct. Ezekiel (44¹⁰⁻¹⁶) indicates that up to his time the priesthood had been common to all the tribe of Levi, but that in future it would be confined to the family of Zadok, and that the other Levites would be reduced to the rank of Temple servants. Ezekiel thus marks a transition from the arrangement of Deuteronomy to that of the Priests' Code, and the inference is that the latter took its present form during or after the exile. With the part of the Priests' Code, however, known as the Law of Holiness (Lv 16-26), the book of Ezekiel has many points of correspondence. This portion of the Pentateuch, therefore, must have been in substance as early as his day.

10. Ezekiel and the New Testament. The language and thought of Ezekiel have had a considerable influence on the writers of the New Testament. His allegory of the Good Shepherd evidently suggested some part of our Lord's parables of the Lost Sheep and the Good Shepherd. The promise of the new heart of flesh is referred to in 2 Cor 3³. The idea of judgment beginning at the house of God reappears in 1 Pet 4¹⁷. The influence of Ezekiel is specially evident in Revelation, which reproduces the eating of the roll (Rev 10^{9,10}), the invasion of Gog and Magog (20⁷), the measuring of the Temple (11^{1,2}), the life giving river (22^{1,2}), and the four-square city with its twelve gates (21¹²⁻¹⁶). Many of the judgments on 'Babylon' in Rev 18 are taken from Ezekiel's chapters on Tyre.

11. The Permanent Message of Ezekiel. This book has an abiding value to the Christian because of its promise of the new heart, its doctrine of the individual's relation to God, and its assurance that God has no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but desires that all should turn to Him and live.

PART I

SIN AND JUDGMENT. THE OLD ISRAEL AND ITS OVERTHROW (Chs. 1-24)

§ 1. EZEKIEL'S CALL AND CONSECRATION AS A PROPHET (chs. 1-3).

Date. June-July, 592 B.C.

Ezekiel's call and consecration to his prophetic work took place by means of a vision of God's glory (c. 1), and of a divine commission, or rather series of commissions, conveyed partly in speech and partly in symbol (chs. 2, 3).

CHAPTER 1

THE VISION OF GOD'S GLORY

This vision, unlike the inaugural visions of Isaiah and Jeremiah, came to Ezekiel not only at the beginning of his prophetic ministry, but also several times during the course of it. It was early repeated in connexion with his call and commission (3²³), and it appeared on two other occasions (chs. 8-11, 43¹⁻⁶). In c. 10 in particular the account in c. 1 is closely reproduced, with some additional details.

In a state of trance, or ecstasy, Ezekiel saw approaching from the north a glowing storm-cloud, which resolved itself into a remarkable group of four living creatures, arranged symmetrically in a square. Their general appearance was human, and every one had four faces, a human face looking outwards, the face of a lion on the right, the face of an ox on the left, and the face of an eagle looking inwards to the centre of the square. Every one had also four wings, two of which were stretched out to meet those of the living creatures on either side, the points where the tips of the wings touched each other being the corners of the square. The other pairs of wings covered the bodies of the living creatures, and under these wings were human hands. The living creatures had straight, jointless limbs, and feet like the hoofs of a calf. The whole group was pervaded with glowing lambent fire, from which lightnings shot forth. It moved to and fro with lightning speed, and did so without turning, as its four sides were exactly alike and any one of them could be the front for the time. Beside the living creatures were four vast wheels, the rims of which were full of eyes. These wheels also were so arranged that they could move in any direction without changing front. Though apparently unconnected with the living creatures they moved in perfect harmony with them, ascending and descending, going backwards and forwards, or from side to side, exactly as they did. The motion of this living chariot was accompanied by a majestic rushing sound. Above the heads of the living creatures there was a solid crystalline platform, supporting an enthroned human Figure, who was clothed in a fiery iridescent radiance. Overawed by the sight, Ezekiel fell upon his face, and as he lay he heard a divine voice addressing him.

The whole vision brought before Ezekiel's consciousness the presence and glory of God, but the part of it in which God Himself was more directly manifested is described with a reverent reserve. Ezekiel is careful not to identify the divine essence with the material emblems which he beheld. What he saw was 'the likeness of a throne,' and upon it 'a likeness as the appearance of a man.' The whole was 'the appearance of the likeness of the glory of Jehovah.' The details of the vision are concerned rather with the subordinate appearances by which the divine glory was accompanied and upborne.

We are not, of course, to understand that the living creatures and the wheels which Ezekiel saw were actually existing realities. They were only the forms in which certain aspects of God's glory were bodied forth before his mind's eye. And while the visionary combination of the symbols, and the impression which it produced, were the results of divine inspiration acting through a peculiar mental condition, it is permissible to seek the origin of the symbols themselves among objects which were familiar to Ezekiel's ordinary sight, and conceptions which were familiar to his ordinary thought. Composite animal figures, such as winged bulls and lions with human heads, and winged and eagle-headed men, were very common objects in the temples of Babylonia. There has even been found on an ancient Babylonian seal a representation of a god in a four-wheeled chariot drawn by a winged monster. Then Ezekiel tells us himself (10²⁰) that the living creatures were cherubim, like those which formed part of the furniture (Ex 25¹⁸⁻²⁰) and decoration (Ex 26³¹) of the tabernacle, and of the Temple of Jerusalem (1 K 6²³⁻²⁹). In Hebrew poetry, too, the cherubim were personifications of the storm-cloud on which Jehovah rode (Ps 18¹⁰, also Ps 80¹⁹⁹ RV). In the winged attendants, the glowing fire, and the throne, Ezekiel's vision has points of resemblance to that of Isaiah (Isa 6), but while the imagery of Isaiah's vision was evidently that of the Temple at Jerusalem expanded and glorified, the scene of Ezekiel's was rather the great temple of nature, where Jehovah's throne is above the blue sky, and His chariot is the thunder-cloud, with lightnings flashing from its heart of fire.

The details of the vision are all suggestive of the attributes of God. The Figure on the throne is an emblem of His sovereign rule. The general human form and the various faces of the living creatures symbolise different aspects of divine majesty and strength. The imposing height of the wheels, and the sublime sound with which the whole living chariot moved, convey the same impression. The symmetrical arrangement of the living creatures and the wheels, and their swift movements in every direction, indicate the omnipresence of God. The eyes on the wheels denote His omniscient intelligence. The spontaneous and united motion of wheels and cherubim suggest the pervasive presence and universal working of God's Spirit, controlling things that seem to be independent. The fire is a symbol of divine purity and holiness. The rainbow colours add a touch of sublime beauty to the conception of the glory of God.

1. The thirtieth year] The reference of the number is uncertain. Suggested explanations are, (1) that Ezekiel's age is meant; (2) that the reckoning is from some recent era, such as Josiah's reformation (621 B.C.), or the independence of Babylon under Nabopolassar (625 B.C., taking thirty as a round number), or the accession of Nebuchadnezzar (604 B.C., reading 'thirteenth' for 'thirtieth'), or some Babylonian epoch otherwise unknown to us; (3) that 'the thirtieth year' is an insertion made with the object of harmonising the different periods assigned for the duration of the exile by Jeremiah (70 years, Jer 25¹¹ 29¹⁰) and Ezekiel (40 years, E⁴⁶) respectively. Of these explanations (1) is improbable, and if (3) be not accepted we are shut up to some of the forms of (2). Among these 625 B.C. (Nabopolassar) seems a more likely starting-point for an epoch than 621 B.C. (Josiah's reformation), but, on the other hand, the latter date agrees more exactly with the number given. The fourth month] the month Tammuz = June-July: see on 8¹⁴. The river of Chebar] the nār Kabari (Great River, or 'Grand Canal') of the inscriptions. It was a large navigable canal branching off from the Euphrates, and passing near Nippur, SE. of Babylon. It is probably represented by the modern Shatt-en-Nil, a canal 120 ft. wide, which divides the ruins of Nippur in two. 2. King Jehoiachin's captivity] the first captivity, 597 B.C.: see Intro. The fifth year] 592 B.C. 3. The word of the LORD came] the usual formula for prophetic inspiration. Chaldeans] Babylonians. The hand of the LORD was . . upon him] producing the trance in which he saw the vision.

4. Amber] RM 'electrum,' an alloy of gold and silver. 7. Feet] rather, 'limbs.' Straight] kneeless, unjointed. The living creatures did not move by walking. Like . . a calf's foot] not projecting in one direction as a human foot does. 11. Stretched upward] RV 'separate above.' 15. One wheel . . with his four faces] RV 'one wheel . . for each of the four faces thereof,' four wheels in all.

16. A wheel in the middle of (RV 'within') a wheel] an obscure expression. One explanation is that every wheel had another joined to it at right angles, so that the compound wheel would appear thus  from above, and could revolve backwards and forwards on one rim, and from side to side on the other. Another theory places the four wheels symmetrically thus , in which arrangement, taking any side as the front, the back wheel would overlap the front one and could be seen through the spokes of the latter. A third suggestion is that every wheel was made up of two concentric circles, the outer rim having a smaller wheel within it, surrounding the axle, thus .

17. They turned not when they went] as in vv. 9, 12. The wheels of course revolved, but, like the living creatures, they could move in different directions without changing front.

18. Rings] RM 'felloes.' 20, 21. Living creature] The group of four is spoken of as one. 24. The voice of the Almighty] the voice of Jehovah is a common OT. expression for thunder. Voice of speech] RV 'noise of tumult.' The articulate voice, as distinguished from the sound of the wheels, is not mentioned till afterwards. 26. A sapphire stone] see the very similar vision of God's glory in Ex 24¹⁰.

CHAPTERS 2, 3

EZEKIEL'S COMMISSION TO BE A PROPHET

Ezekiel's commission came to him by three stages, and on three distinct occasions. The first and principal occasion was the immediate sequel of the vision described in c. 1. The account of it occupies the whole of c. 2, and the first 13 vv. of c. 3. The second was seven days later, among the exiles at Tel-abib (3¹⁴⁻²¹). The third was connected with a repetition of the vision, apparently in the neighbourhood of Tel-abib (3²²⁻²⁷).

THE FIRST COMMISSION (2¹⁻³)

This consisted of two series of instructions (2¹⁻⁷ and 3¹⁻¹¹) separated by a visionary symbol of prophetic inspiration (2⁸⁻³³), and was followed by the withdrawal of the vision for a time (3^{12, 13}). As Ezekiel's opening vision recalls that of Isaiah, so his first commission has much in common with that of Jeremiah, and indeed the contents of the two are closely parallel in order as well as in substance.

(a) First Instructions (2¹⁻⁷)

The voice which addresses Ezekiel bids him stand on his feet, and when he has been raised from the ground by an unseen force he is told that God has given him a mission as a prophet to the children of Israel. He is warned of their rebelliousness and hardness of heart, and encouraged to deliver his message fearlessly no matter how they receive it. This exhortation corresponds to that in Jer 1⁷.

1. Son of man] a term reminding Ezekiel of his human weakness, like the word 'mortal'. It occurs nearly 100 times in the book.

Stand, etc.] God's call does not suppress human powers, but reinforces them and makes use of them at their best. 3. Nation] RV 'nations,' the whole Hebrew people, both Judah and Israel. Rebellious] a frequently recurring description of Israel's character found very often in the phrase a 'rebellious house,' as in v. 5.

5. Hear, or . . forbear] The latter is chiefly expected. They . . yet shall know, etc.] the result which will keep the prophet's work from being in vain. His warnings may be fruitless at the time, but they will be fulfilled, and he will be recognised in the end as God's messenger. This will be very far from utter failure. The result thus indicated is the first of an ascending series which runs through the whole book. They are all introduced by the phrase 'they shall know,' and they describe the production in Israel's mind of convictions which increase in depth, and solemnity, and blessedness. The final conviction, which itself has various stages of growing significance is 'they shall know that I am the Lord.' 6. Briers . . thorns . . scorpions] figures for the opposition of the Israelites to Ezekiel and his divine message.

(b) A Symbol of Inspiration (2⁸⁻³³)

In Jeremiah's commission God says to him, 'Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth' (Jer 1⁹), and Jeremiah himself says afterwards, 'Thy words were found, and I did eat them, and thy words were unto me a joy and the rejoicing of mine heart' (Jer 15¹⁶ RV). The experience thus described metaphorically came to Ezekiel in his trance in a concrete, material way. God's words seemed to be set before him in the form of a book, which he ate at God's command, and found to be as sweet as honey. The truth underlying this visionary symbol was that Ezekiel was divinely inspired, in other words, that God had communicated to him a message which he was called to proclaim to men. This passage is the basis of Rev 10^{9, 10}.

9. A hand] This hand is not said to be that of the Figure on the throne. The vague expression is another instance of Ezekiel's reverent reserve. A roll] the usual form of Eastern books: see Jer 36². 10. Spread it before me] Ezekiel had a view from the first of the whole nature of his message. Within and without] indicating the abundance of calamity which Ezekiel had to proclaim. Book rolls were usually written on the inner side alone: see Rev 5¹. Lamentations, etc.] the character of Ezekiel's message.

C. 3. 3. As honey for sweetness] The privilege of being God's messenger brought a great joy, though the message itself was of the saddest.

(c) Further Instructions (3⁴⁻¹¹)

Having thus received his message Ezekiel is again told to speak it to his countrymen. He is warned in fresh terms of their indifference and obstinacy, and encouraged further by the assurance that he will be strengthened to withstand their utmost opposition. These vv. should be compared with Jer 1¹⁷⁻¹⁹.

4. With my words] an advance upon the general instruction of 2⁷, following the symbolical act just described. 6. People] RV 'peoples.' Israel will be less responsive to Ezekiel's words than a foreign nation to whom his speech would be unintelligible. 7. Impudent] RV 'of a stiff forehead.' This rendering gives greater point to 'thy forehead' in vv. 8, 9.

9. Adamant] diamond: see Jer 17¹.

11. Them of the captivity] a closer definition than in 2³ of Ezekiel's immediate audience: see Intro.

(d) The Vision withdrawn (3^{12,13})

The voice that has been speaking to Ezekiel has proceeded from the Figure enthroned above the living chariot of c. 1, which has therefore been present during all these instructions. Ezekiel now hears the sound of its movement as it departs.

12. Behind me] Ezekiel's face is now turned away from the visionary chariot. As it appeared from the N. he is probably looking S., and Tel-abib may have lain in the latter direction from the Chebar. Blessed be the glory, etc.] A change of one letter in the Hebrew gives the much better sense, 'When the glory of the Lord went up from its place,' i.e. when the vision was withdrawn. 13. Noise of the wheels] in addition to the noise of the wings of the living creatures. The latter sound alone is mentioned in 1²⁴.

THE SECOND COMMISSION (3¹⁴⁻²¹)

Ezekiel, still under a strong, divinely produced excitement, came to the community of exiles at Tel-abib, near the Chebar, and after seven days of stupefaction he received a further commission from God. It was unaccompanied by any vision, and the manner in which he received it is undescribed, as is so often the case with the prophets. The new element in this second commission was the thought of Ezekiel's responsibility for the fate of his people, and it was set forth in the title of 'watchman,' now given to him for the first time. This responsibility was exhausted when he had warned them of their danger and duty. Only if he failed to do so would he be held accountable for their sin and doom.

14. The spirit lifted me] to be taken along with I went. Ezekiel was not miraculously transported to Tel-abib, but in his movement thither he was under the influence of God's Spirit, like Elijah in 1 K 18⁴⁶. 15. Tel-abib] a place near the Chebar, where a colony of Jewish exiles lived. The exact site is unknown. The name is usually explained to mean 'Hill of corn-ears' or 'Corn-hill,' but some recent editors suggest that it is rather the same as tīl-abūbi, 'Hill of the deluge,' the Assyrian name for the numerous heaps of sand and débriš formed by floods in Babylonia. Astonished] RV 'astounded,' in a stupor of reaction after the vision.

18. Die . . . 21. Live] not to be understood in the highest NT. sense. To die was to be cut off from the restored kingdom of God, foretold in the latter part of this book. To live was to survive and enjoy its blessedness.

20. I lay a stumblingblock before him] This difficult phrase does not mean that God seeks to make the righteous fall, but that the temptations of the righteous are under God's providential control. Where there is a temptation He also sends a warning, and the two constitute a discipline by which the righteous man is tested, and under which he has an opportunity of moral growth. The case of a righteous man sinning and perishing in spite of warning is not contemplated at all.

THE THIRD COMMISSION (3²²⁻²⁷)

In a plain or valley near Tel-abib the great vision of God's glory formerly seen by the Chebar again appeared to Ezekiel. The divine voice further explained the nature of his commission. His prophetic activity would be subject to a double limitation. He would be restrained from public speech by the opposition of the people, and God would impose silence upon him except when a divine message should be given him from time to time. This intermittent silence became permanent from 24²⁷ (January, 587 B.C.) onward, till the restraint on his speech was removed altogether three years later (33^{21,22}).

22. Plain] RM 'valley.' 25. They] Ezekiel's fellow exiles. Bands] not literal but figurative. 26. Dumb] as far as prophetic speech is concerned, as the following words not . . . a reprover show.

§ 2. THE OVERTHROW OF THE JEWISH KINGDOM FORETOLD (chs. 4-7)

The great theme of the first part of Ezekiel's prophetic ministry was the certainty of the complete downfall of the Jewish state. Though Zedekiah had been set on the throne by Nebuchadnezzar after the first captivity, there was no hope for the kingdom. Zedekiah's reign was viewed by Ezekiel, as well as by Jeremiah, only as a temporary respite, to be followed by a second captivity which would bring the state to an end. Chs. 4-7 contain the first group of Ezekiel's prophecies to this effect. They are to be placed between the date of his prophetic call (June-July, 592 B.C.) and that of the next group of prophecies (August-September, 591 B.C.). The present group includes a series of symbolic prophecies of the siege and captivity of Jerusalem (chs. 4, 5), a prophecy against the mountains of Israel (c. 6), and a description, partly in the form of a poetic lament or dirge, of the final desolation of the land (c. 7).

CHAPTERS 4, 5

SYMBOLIC ACTIONS REPRESENTING JERUSALEM'S SIEGE AND CAPTIVITY

Ezekiel is commanded to perform four remarkable actions setting forth the coming siege with its hardships, and the approaching captivity with its evils. It is uncertain whether these actions were literally performed or not. Symbolic methods of this kind were certainly used by various prophets, but some of those in c. 4 are so extraordinary that many suppose that they were not actually carried out, but only imagined and described. The explanation of the second and third symbols is given along with the account of the symbols themselves. The first and fourth are explained more fully in 5⁵⁻¹⁷.

(a) A Symbol of the Siege (4¹⁻⁸)

Ezekiel was told to draw a representation of a city on a slab of clay, and to conduct a mimic siege of it. In this action the prophet played the part of the enemies of Jerusalem, and especially of God, who was now the great Adversary of the city.

1. A tile] or 'brick,' a slab of clay, such as the Babylonians used for inscriptions and sculptures in relief. 2. A mount] an embankment raised in ancient warfare by besiegers to enable them to approach the top of a city wall.

3. Pan] RM 'flat plate,' such as was used for baking (Lv 6²¹ 7⁹). This may be taken as a symbol either of the stubbornness of the defence or of the rigour of the siege. Or it may represent the hopeless barrier which now separated God from His people. A sign to the house of Israel] The symbol was intended to teach those who witnessed or heard of it that the stern reality which it represented was close at hand.

(b) Symbols of the duration of Siege and Captivity (4⁴⁻⁸)

for a fixed number of days (390), and then on his right side for another fixed number (40). The whole time was supposed to represent the length of the siege of Jerusalem, and the two numbers of days were supposed to correspond to the years of the respective captivities of Israel and Judah. The constrained posture of the prophet was a symbol of the loss of freedom awaiting the people.

4. The house of Israel] used here and in v. 5 in the limited sense of the northern kingdom of the Ten Tribes.

5. Three hundred and ninety days] This is a difficult number. Ezekiel expected the captivities of Israel and Judah to end together (37^{15,16}). As Israel's captivity was to be 350 years longer than Judah's, it must have begun 350 years sooner. The captivity of Judah may be dated (a) from the first captivity (597 B.C.) or (b) from the second captivity (586 B.C.). The latter was still in the future at the time of this prophecy, and would not be a fixed date for Ezekiel, who would therefore probably reckon from 597 B.C., which he elsewhere calls 'our captivity' (40¹). The captivity of Israel is most naturally reckoned (a¹) from the fall of Samaria (721 B.C., 2 K 17⁶); but it may possibly be calculated (b¹) from the first ravages of Tiglath-pileser (734 B.C., 2 K 15²⁹). From (a¹) to (a) gives 124 years, and from (b¹) to (a) 137 years. Taking (b) instead of (a) for the captivity of Judah, these numbers become respectively 135 and 148. The LXX has 190 instead of 390, which would give 150 instead of 350 for the difference between the two captivities, and this would agree approximately with the actual dates, especially with (b¹) to (b). The only way to reach anything like 350 years is to count Israel's captivity from the revolt of the Ten Tribes (939 B.C.). This was 342 years before (a) and 353 years before (b), but it is unlikely that Ezekiel should have given the time of Israel's sin and only the time of Judah's punishment. Another explanation is that since 390 + 40 = 430, Ezekiel represented the united captivities of the two kingdoms as equal in length to the bondage in Egypt (Ex 12⁴⁰), and that of Judah as equal to the period of wandering in the wilderness (Nu 14³⁴). The latter is certainly closely parallel to this passage, and possibly we have here an ideal and artificial scheme of numbers with no relation to actual historic dates. If a historic explanation be preferred, 350 (or 150) must be taken not as an exact, but as a round number.

6. Forty days] the years of Judah's captivity and of Babylon's supremacy (29¹¹⁻¹⁴). The return of the exiles took place about 538 B.C., fifty-nine years after the first and forty-eight years after the second captivity. If the number 40 is not taken from Nu 14³⁴ (see the note above), it is a round number, meaning 'more than a generation.' 7. The siege of Jerusalem] the minie siege described in vv. 1-3. The first and second symbolic actions were to be carried on together. Thine arm . . . uncovered] a threatening gesture.

8. Bands] By some divine restraint Ezekiel would be prevented from turning. The days of thy siege] The number 430 represented the days of the siege of Jerusalem as well as the sum of the years of the two captivities. The actual siege lasted almost exactly a year and a half (2 K 25¹⁻³ Jer 39^{1,2}).

(c) Symbols of Scarcity during the Siege and of Defilement in Captivity (4⁹⁻¹⁷)

Ezekiel was commanded to prepare bread from a mixture of various kinds of grain, and to live on scanty rations of meat and drink while he lay upon his side. This was in token of the scarcity which the inhabitants of Jerusalem would suffer during the siege. The bread was to be baked with loathsome fuel, as a sign of the banishment of Israel to an unclean foreign land.

9. Wheat, etc.] a mixture of all sorts of grain, fine and coarse, symbolising the poor fare which would be used in Jerusalem during the siege.

10. Twenty shekels] eight or nine ounces.

11. The sixth part of an hin] less than a quart. 12. Bread thus baked would be unclean (Lv 5³ 7²¹).

13. Eat their defiled bread] RV 'eat their bread unclean.' Foreign lands were regarded as unclean in themselves (Am 7¹⁵), and, besides, all food eaten in them would be unclean, because it could not be consecrated by offering a portion to God in the Temple: see Hos 9^{3,4}.

14. Ezekiel, as a priest, was peculiarly sensitive about ceremonial defilement. 15. A partial mitigation of the symbol for the prophet's sake. The dung of domestic animals was often used as fuel, and does not seem to have defiled the food cooked upon it. Though the symbol was modified, it was not implied that the defilement of captivity, signified by the fuel first proscribed, would be any the less.

(d) Symbols of Three Calamities awaiting Jerusalem (5¹⁻⁴)

In the previous symbols Ezekiel himself personated both the besiegers and the besieged. Now the hair of his head and beard is made to represent the people of Jerusalem. He is bidden to shave it off and divide it into three parts. One of these he is to burn, as an emblem of those who will die of pestilence and famine; another he is to smite around with a sword, as a symbol of those who will be slain; while the third part he is to scatter to the wind, as representing those who will go into captivity. A few hairs are to be reserved as an emblem of the pious remnant; but even these are partly to be burned, in token of the trials the remnant will endure.

1. A sharp knife . . . a barber's razor] RV 'a sharp sword, as a barber's razor.' 4. For thereof] RV 'therefrom.' The clause thus introduced is obscure. The meaning seems to be that the punishment of Jerusalem will extend to the whole nation.

(e) Explanation of the First and Fourth Symbols (5⁵⁻¹⁷)

The pictured city is Jerusalem, and God is her great Adversary (vv. 5-8). Her unparalleled sins deserve an unparalleled punishment. Famine and pestilence, the sword, and captivity await her people. Only thus can God's righteous wrath be appeased (vv. 9-17).

5. This] the city depicted on the tile (4¹⁻³). In the midst of the nations] God gave Jerusalem a great opportunity of displaying His righteousness and truth to the world. Her position, near the highway between Asia and Africa, was peculiarly central and conspicuous.

7. Multiplied] RV 'are turbulent.' Neither . . . my judgments . . . the judgments (RV 'ordinances') of the nations] Israel had been worse than the heathen, who had at least been faithful to their own gods: see Jer 2^{10,11}. 8. In the sight of the nations] Punishment must be as conspicuous as the lost opportunity.

11. Defiled my sanctuary] This charge is substantiated at length in c. 8. 13. Cause my fury to rest] RV 'satisfy my fury.'

CHAPTER 6

A PROPHECY AGAINST THE MOUNTAIN LAND OF ISRAEL

The coming judgment is here announced to the land of Israel, which is identified with the people. Vv. 8, 9, following up the hint in 5^{3,4}, speak of a remnant of the nation which will be led to repentance in exile.

2, 3. The physical features of the land are described, not only because their variety was in strong contrast to the monotony of the Babylonian plains where Ezekiel lived, but also, and chiefly, because they were associated with different forms of idolatrous and impure worship. The mountains and hills were the sites of the 'high places'—shrines of Canaanite origin (Dt 12²). The ravines and valleys were the scenes of Baal-worship (Jer 2²³) and of child-sacrifice (Isa 57⁵): see also v. 13.

4, 6. Images] RV 'sun-images,' probably obelisks representing the sun-god.

7. Ye shall know that I am the LORD] Ezekiel's favourite expression for the result of God's dealings with men in prophecy and in history. It means the recognition now of one, now of another, aspect of the character of the true God. Here it is the conviction that His warnings are not empty threats: see vv. 10, 14.

8. A remnant] already hinted at in 5³.

9. Because I am broken with, etc.] RM 'how that' (better, 'when') 'I have broken their . . heart . . and their eyes.' The metaphor of breaking is extended to 'eyes,' though it strictly applies only to 'heart.' Idolatry was accompanied by licentiousness, and this is one reason why the prophets so often described it under the figure of a breach of the marriage vow: see especially chs. 16 and 23.

11. Smite (i.e. 'clap') . . and stamp] emphatic gestures of satisfaction in the calamities that are announced. Ezekiel was called to be in complete sympathy with God's attitude towards Israel: see 21^{14, 17} 25⁶. Alas!] rather, 'Aha!': see 25³. 12. He that is far off, etc.] The judgment would fall on idolatrous Israelites not only in Jerusalem, but wherever they might be. 14. More desolate than] RV 'waste, from.' The wilderness toward Diblath] RV 'Diblah.' Diblah, or Diblathaim, was in Moab, beyond the Dead Sea (Nu 33⁴⁶ Jer 48²²). The phrase in AV would mean the wilderness of Judaea, which lay in that direction (eastwards) from Jerusalem. Another and more probable reading is 'Riblah' instead of 'Diblah.' Riblah was a city of Hamath in the far north (2K 25²¹). 'From the wilderness to Riblah' would mean 'from one end of the land to the other.'

CHAPTER 7

THE DESOLATION OF THE LAND OF ISRAEL

This is a final message of doom upon the whole land (v. 2). God's wrath against Israel's sin is relentless, and the judgment is inevitable and close at hand. Social relations will be broken up (v. 12); preparations for defence will be unavailing (v. 14); wealth, which has been an occasion of sin and an instrument of idolatry, will not avert calamity, but will become the spoil of the heathen (vv. 19-21); priests and prophets, king and nobles, will be helpless to deliver (vv. 26, 17); the Temple will be profaned (v. 22); the remnant will be overwhelmed with sorrow (v. 16). Vv. 5-7, 10-12 are in the poetic metre commonly used for laments or dirges.

7, 10. The morning is come] RV 'Thy doom is come.'

7. Not the sounding again of the mountains] RV 'not of joyful shouting upon the mountains.' The shouting of harvest or vintage is meant: see Isa 16^{9, 10} Jer 48³³.

9. Ye shall know, etc.] another aspect of the result of God's judgment. He would be recognised as the God who punishes sin.

10, 11. The meaning here is rather obscure. If the rod in v. 10 is that of chastisement, pride will mean the same thing. Babylon is called 'Pride' in Jer 50⁸¹ (RM). But the violence in v. 11 seems to be that of Israel, and the rod of wickedness to be a figure for its developed form. Possibly 'the rod' and 'pride' in v. 10 may also refer to Israel's sin.

12. The same kind of social confusion as in Isa 24². 13. The seller, etc.] This may mean either that those of Ezekiel's fellow-exiles of the first captivity who had sold their possessions before leaving Jerusalem would not return to regain them, or that land which ought to have come back to its seller at the year of Jubilee would not do so, since the destruction of the city would obliterate this and all other social institutions. The vision is touching, etc.] A more probable reading is, 'wrath is upon,' etc., as in vv. 12, 14.

15. No safety either in Jerusalem or out of it: see 6¹².

18. Baldness] a sign of mourning.

19. Removed] RV 'as an unclean thing. Similarly in v. 20.

20, 21. The rendering in AV and RV means that the Temple, profaned already by Israel's idolatry, would be further polluted by the heathen conquerors. Most scholars, however, take the beauty of his (the people's) ornament to refer to the silver and gold of v. 19, and render as in RM, 'they turned it to pride and they made the images . . thereof.' The wealth which had been turned to idolatrous uses would be defiled by passing into heathen hands.

22. Secret place] RM 'secret treasure.' Not the Holy of Holies specially, but Jerusalem and the Temple viewed as God's precious possession.

23. A chain] a figure for captivity. Violence must be punished by forcible restraint.

26. Prophets] were consulted for oracles as to God's will, priests for authoritative decisions as to the law, elders or ancients for general advice: see Jer 18¹⁸.

§ 3. A VISION OF JERUSALEM'S SIN AND DOOM (chs. 8-11)

Date, August-September, 591 B.C.

A year and two months after his call to be a prophet, Ezekiel was visited in his house by the elders of the Jewish colony at Tel abib, and in their presence he fell into a trance, during which he was transported in spirit to Jerusalem, and witnessed, as in a dream, a remarkable drama being enacted there. The glory of God was present during this vision in the same symbolic form, and accompanied by the same living chariot, as in c. 1, but with this difference, that it sometimes left the chariot and took up its position elsewhere. Ezekiel witnessed first the idolatries practised in the Temple (c. 8), then the slaughter of all the idolaters in Jerusalem (c. 9), and next the destruction of the city by the fire of God's holiness (c. 10). He then heard a parable of judgment pronounced against the leaders of Jerusalem's wicked policy, and a message of comfort addressed to the exiles who were despised by their countrymen at home. Finally he saw the glory of God departing from the Temple, and having come back in spirit to Babylonia he awoke from his trance and recounted his vision to the exiles there (c. 11). There is no reason to doubt that Ezekiel here describes an actual experience. He was not, of course, literally transported to Jerusalem, but only seemed to be taken thither, as one might in a dream. The idolatries he saw were those which he knew to be carried on in Jerusalem, and the persons mentioned in the vision were doubtless also known to him as prominent leaders in the sin of the city. Yet in his trance these persons and practices, and the whole scene, stood out before his mind's eye with a vividness and reality which enabled him to describe them as actually seen. The truths presented in the symbols, and expressed in the messages, of judgment were really communicated to him by God.

CHAPTER 8

THE IDOLATRY OF JERUSALEM

Various forms of idolatry, increasing in heinousness and rising to a climax, were seen practised in the precincts of the Temple. First there was the 'image of jealousy' (vv. 3-6), next a species of secret animal-worship (vv. 7-12), then the lamentation of the women for Tammuz (vv. 13-15), and lastly the worship of the sun (vv. 16-18).

1. The sixth year. . . the sixth month] August-September, 591 B.C. Mine house] to which Ezekiel's prophetic activity was confined (3²⁴). The elders of Judah] the leading men of the exiled community at Tel-abib. The hand of the Lord GOD fell] as in 1⁸. The vision, with all its meaning, was the result of divine inspiration.

2. The same appearance as the enthroned Figure in c. 1. The living chariot is not mentioned here, but, as it appears afterwards without any special explanation, it was probably present in the vision from the first.

3. The form of an hand] the same reverent reserve as in 2⁹. In the visions of God] Though Ezekiel's transference is described in physical terms he was not taken to Jerusalem in body, but only in spirit. Inner gate] RV 'gate of the inner court.' Solomon's Temple had two courts: the great or outer court (2 Ch 4⁹), and the inner court or court of the priests (1 K 6³⁸ 2 Ch 4⁹). We know very little about the arrangement of the gates, but in Ezekiel's time the inner court had probably three, one on every side except the W., and the outer court at least two, one on the N. and one on the E. The gate in this v. is the inner northern gate. We must distinguish between the gate or gateway, which was a block of buildings, and the doors by which the gateway was entered at either end. The image of jealousy] An idol figure, so called from the divine jealousy which it aroused. The reference is probably to the image set up by Manasseh (2 K 21⁷) and removed by Josiah (2 K 23⁶). The seat means the place where it had stood.

4. The glory. . . was there] perhaps over the main Temple building, S. of the gate where Ezekiel was. In the next v. he turns and looks N. All the idolatries were thus enacted in God's very presence.

5. Northward at] RV 'northward of.' Gate of the altar] apparently still the northern inner gate. It is uncertain why it was so called. This image of jealousy] Ezekiel saw the image, which had not been there when he left Jerusalem, now restored to its old place. It was in the outer court, and Ezekiel, standing within the gateway, saw it through the entrance.

7. The door of the court] the opening of the gateway next the outer court. 8. A door] leading into one of the chambers of the gateway. 10. This animal-worship may have been borrowed from Egypt, where beetles, crocodiles, snakes, cats, jackals, and other animals were worshipped; or it may have been a survival and revival of ancient superstitions native to Palestine. Some think that Babylon is as likely as Egypt to have been the source of the practices.

11. Jaazaniah the son of Shaphan] Shaphan was a famous scribe who took part in Josiah's reformation (2 K 22³⁴). Two of his sons, Ahikam (Jer 26²⁴) and Gemariah (Jer 36^{10, 25}), were friendly to Jeremiah. If Jaazaniah was the son of this Shaphan he was of a different character from his father and brothers.

12. In the dark] Secrecy was a marked feature of this animal-worship. The LORD seeth us not, etc.] This was the excuse and perhaps the belief of these idolaters, though God's glorious presence was even then manifest to Ezekiel's eyes.

14. The door. . . toward the north] probably the outer doorway of the outer northern gate. The women would thus be outside the Temple precincts altogether. Tammuz] a deity worshipped both in Babylonia and in Phœnicia—the same as the Greek Adonis. He appears to have been a god of the spring, and the myth regarding him told of his early death and of the descent of Istar his bride into the underworld in search of him. The death of Tammuz symbolised the destruction of the spring vegetation by the heat of summer, and it was celebrated annually by seven days of women's mourning in the 4th month (June-July), which was called Tammuz. This superstition had been introduced into Jerusalem.

16. Between the porch and the altar] The altar of burnt offering was probably in the centre of the inner court, and the main Temple building faced it on the W. The sun-worship now described was just in front of the sacred building: cp. Mt 23³⁵ Lk 11²¹. With their backs, etc.] This followed from their turning towards the rising sun. Their position implied the greatest contempt for the God of Israel, whose glory was at that moment visible to the prophet close to them. The worship of the sun and other heavenly bodies was introduced by the kings of Judah before Josiah's day, and abolished during his reformation (2K 23^{5,11}). Sun-images are mentioned as early as the days of Asa (2Ch 14⁵ RV). Jeremiah describes the worship of the Queen of Heaven (probably the moon or the planet Venus) as prevalent in Jerusalem before the second captivity (Jer 44¹⁷). 17. The branch to their nose] usually explained as a ceremony connected with sun-worship. Persian sun-worshippers held bunches of the twigs of certain trees before their mouths, that they might not contaminate the sun with their breath. Many scholars think we should read, 'they send a stench to my nostrils.'

CHAPTER 9

THE SLAUGHTER OF THE IDOLATERS IN JERUSALEM

The voice which has been speaking to Ezekiel now summons six supernatural beings armed with weapons of slaughter. They are attended by a seventh robed like a priest and equipped as a scribe. They come from the north, and take their stand by the brason altar in the inner court. The 'glory of God' leaves the living chariot and stands at the threshold of the main Temple building. The man who acts as scribe is instructed to go through the city and set a mark on the foreheads of all those who mourn for the prevailing idolatries. The other six are instructed to follow him, to slay all those who are not thus marked, without respect to sex or age, and to begin at the Temple itself. The command is obeyed, and the sun-worshippers in the Temple are the first victims. Ezekiel, appalled at the fate of the citizens, falls on his face to plead that the whole nation may not be destroyed, but he is told that punishment must be sternly executed on those who have so fully deserved it. The scribe-angel reports that his work is done, and we are left to imagine that the work of slaughter was carried out too. This c. teaches that while God visits sin with doom. He is perfectly just, and will not suffer the righteous to perish with the wicked.

2. The higher (RV 'upper') gate . . toward the north] the northern gate of the inner court, as in 8^{3,5,7}. The brason altar] made by Solomon (2Ch 4¹), and probably placed in the middle of the inner court. Ahaz made a new altar of stone, and removed Solomon's brason altar to the N. side of it (2K 16¹¹).

3. The cherub] mentioned without explanation. Throughout this vision 'cherub' is used for 'living creature' for the reason given in 10²⁰. The singular number is used here, as in 1^{20,21}, for the group of four. The house] the chief Temple building, which was on the W. side of the inner court, with its front facing E. 4. A mark] lit. 'a Tav,' the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Its early form was like a cross, thus \dagger . Rev 7³ is based on this passage.

6. The ancient men] the sun-worshippers in 8¹⁶. The thought of this v. is taken up in 1Pet 4¹⁷. 7. Defile] The presence of corpses would pollute the sanctuary. 8. One of the few instances in which Ezekiel's love of his nation struggles with his approval of God's judgments upon them. He fears that all Israel may share Jerusalem's fate.

CHAPTER 10

THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM BY FIRE

In this c. the living chariot accompanying the vision of God's glory is the most prominent object. The living creatures are now recognised by Ezekiel as cherubim, and called so. Otherwise the description is largely a repetition of c. 1. The man with the inkhorn is directed to take coals of fire from the glowing interior of the chariot and to scatter them over the city. This part of the vision points forward to the burning of Jerusalem as the final stage of her punishment.

1. As the 'cherub' was mentioned without any introduction in 9³, the living chariot with all its parts now appears in the same way. It is not directly stated that the glorious Figure is on the throne. The 'glory' had left the chariot for the threshold of the Temple in 9³, and is in the same position in 10⁴. It may or may not have returned to the chariot in the interval.

2. Wheels] RV 'whirling wheels,' and so in vv. 6, 13. The word is not the ordinary one for 'wheels.' Cherub] the singular denoting the group, as in 9³.

3. The right side] the S. side. The Hebrews described the points of the compass as for a spectator facing E. The S. side of the Temple building was the part of the precincts nearest to the city.

4. The house was filled with the cloud] a comparison with 1K8^{10,11} shows that the 'glory' which Ezekiel saw in his visions was the same as that by which God's presence had been hitherto manifested in the Holy of Holies.

5. As the voice, etc.] like thunder.

6. Beside the wheels] RV 'beside a wheel.'

7. One cherub] RV 'the cherub,' the cherub next the particular wheel just mentioned. The scribe-angel did not actually go between the wheels himself, but stood beside the chariot and received the fire from one of the cherubim.

12. The cherubim, as well as the wheels, are now said to be full of eyes.

13. It was cried unto them... O wheel] RV 'they were called... the whirling wheels.'

14. The face of a (RV 'the') cherub here takes the place of the ox-face of 1¹⁰. This seems at first sight to indicate that the cherubim already known to Ezekiel were ox-faced. But the cherubim in the decoration of Ezekiel's visionary temple (44^{18,19}) had only the faces of a man and a lion. The substitution of 'cherub' for 'ox,' and the change in the order of the faces, may be explained by supposing that Ezekiel, still standing near the N. gate of the inner court, looked S. towards the chariot, which was about to move E. (v. 19). The cherub on the E. side of the chariot would be the leading one, and so might be called 'the cherub.' Ezekiel would see the left, or ox-, face of this cherub, the front, or human, face of the cherub on the N. side of the chariot, the right, or lion-, face of the cherub on the W. side, and the back, or eagle-, face of the cherub on the S. side, thus:

18. The 'glory' now returns to its place above the chariot. 19. Every one] RV 'they.' The east gate] the eastern gate of the outer court. The presence of God moves to the very verge of the Temple precincts, which it is about to leave altogether.

20. I knew that they were the cherubim] RV 'I knew that they were cherubim.' Ezekiel now recognised for the first time that the 'living creatures' were identical with the 'cherubim' of Hebrew poetry and sacred symbolism. He thus gives a clue to the source of the ideas which had unconsciously moulded his visionary conceptions from the beginning.

CHAPTER 11

THE DOOM OF THE LEADERS OF JERUSALEM'S WICKEDNESS. COMFORT FOR THE EXILES

The slaughter in c. 9 was only the visionary rehearsal of a judgment still in the future. The vision now takes another turn, and shows the wicked inhabitants still alive. Ezekiel is brought to the outer eastern gate of the Temple where he finds a group of the leaders of Jerusalem's sinful policy, two of whom are mentioned by name (vv. 1-2). A proverb by which they express their light-hearted security is turned into a parable of the doom that awaits them (vv. 3-12). The warning is ratified by the sudden death of one of the leaders (v. 13), after which a comforting message is spoken to the exiles whom the people of Jerusalem despised (vv. 14-21). The glorious symbol of God's presence then forsakes Jerusalem (vv. 22, 23). The vision ends, and Ezekiel finds himself again in Babylonia, where he describes to the exiles all that he has seen (vv. 24, 25).

1. The east gate] the outer eastern gate, to which the chariot with the 'glory' upon it had already moved. At the door of the gate] just outside the Temple precincts. Jaazaniah... and Pelatiah] men of whom nothing further is known. Jaazaniah is not the same as the Jaazaniah of 8¹¹.

3. It is not near; let us build, etc.] or, as in RM, 'Is not the time near to build?' etc.: an expression of security. This city is the caldron, etc.] The 'wicked counsel' of v. 2 is usually understood to mean proposals of revolt from Babylon, which would involve the prospect of war and siege. In that case the proverb about the caldron and the flesh would express the plotters' trust in the strong fortifications of Jerusalem, which they hoped would save them from the 'fire' of Nebuchadnezzar's armies. This would be a grimly humorous way of describing the desperate course they were meditating. They expected, as we might say, to be in the frying-pan, but thought that it would at least save them from the fire. Another explanation is that the saying is a boast over the exiles, who had been taken away from Jerusalem, as the useless 'broth' is poured out of a pot when the cooking is over, leaving the valuable 'flesh' behind. This is more in line with the latter part of the chapter.

6. The wicked counsellors, whatever their policy may have been, had already put many of their fellow citizens unjustly to death. 7. The proverb would prove true in quite a different sense from that in which it was first used. The only flesh in the caldron would be that of the wicked leaders' victims. Those who thought they were the flesh would be taken out of the caldron and slain by strangers elsewhere. 10, 11. In the border of Israel] Instead of being safe in Jerusalem they would meet their fate far away from it, on the very outskirts of the land. Over seventy of those taken at the second captivity, including twelve prominent officials, were put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, in the extreme N. of Palestine (2 K 25¹⁸⁻²¹ Jer 52²¹⁻²⁷).

13. The sudden death of Pelatiah may have been an actual occurrence, of which Ezekiel had heard, and which was reproduced in the vision. It may, however, have been an imaginary incident, symbolising the certainty and suddenness with which the prophecy of judgment on the wicked counsellors would be fulfilled. Then fell I down, etc.] As in 9⁸ Ezekiel was dismayed at the speedy execution of God's threatening, and besought God that the whole nation might not be destroyed. This time he received a comforting assurance that the exiles should be spared and restored, while the people of Jerusalem who despised them should perish.

15. Thy brethren . . . all the house of Israel] The exiles of the first captivity are identified with the true Israel. Get you far from the LORD, etc.] The people of Jerusalem claimed that God was only among them, and that the exiles were banished from His presence. This was a different sentiment from that expressed in 8¹². Unprincipled men can change their theology to suit their circumstances. 16. As a little sanctuary] RV 'a sanctuary for a little while.' God's presence and the privileges of the Temple were not confined to Jerusalem.

17. People] RV 'peoples.' 19. A promise of an inward change, which Ezekiel afterwards repeats and expands (18³¹ 36²⁵⁻²⁷).

22, 23. The emblem of God's presence now leaves the holy city, which is abandoned to its fate. What the idolaters had said in unbelief (8¹²) became a terrible truth. 23. The mountain . . . on the east] the Mount of Olives. We cannot but think of Christ's words of doom, spoken from the same mountain, to the Jerusalem of His day (Lk 19^{37, 41-44}).

§ 4. FURTHER PROPHECIES OF ISRAEL'S GUILT AND APPROACHING PUNISHMENT (chs. 12-19)

This is a somewhat miscellaneous group of prophecies intermediate in date between the preceding (August-September, 591 B.C.) and succeeding (July-August, 590 B.C.) sections. It includes fresh symbols of exile, flight, and famine (12¹⁻²⁰), a doctrine of prophecy, true and false (12²¹⁻¹⁴), an explanation of God's exceptional treatment of Jerusalem in sparing a remnant (14¹²⁻²³), Ezekiel's parable of the Vine (c. 15), the parable of the Foundling Child (c. 16), a parable of Zedekiah's perfidy and its punishment (c. 17), a vindication of God's equity (c. 18), and a lament over the royal house of Judah (c. 19).

CHAPTER 12¹⁻²⁰

SYMBOLS OF EXILE, FLIGHT, AND FAMINE

Ezekiel's audience being blind to the meaning of the vision he has just described, he is commanded to give them, in new symbolic actions, a further representation of the coming fate of Jerusalem and its king and people. He is told to gather together such things as one leaving home would take with him, and to carry these out of his house by day. At night he is to dig a hole in a wall, and pass through it with his face covered and his baggage on his shoulder. When the people ask him next morning what these proceedings mean he is directed to tell them that the action of the day-time is a symbol of the captivity awaiting Jerusalem, and that the action of the evening foreshadows the secret flight which Zedekiah will attempt, and the punishment of blindness which will prevent him from seeing the land of his exile (vv. 1-16). Another symbolic action, resembling that of 4^{9c}, is also commanded. Ezekiel is to eat and drink sparingly and with trembling, in token of the famine which the coming siege will cause in Jerusalem (vv. 17-20).

2. The story of the vision seems to have produced no impression. 5. The wall] Some understand the town-wall of Tel-abih, or the wall of the courtyard of Ezekiel's house, but we cannot be sure that these walls existed. The house-wall itself may be meant, but in that case Ezekiel would have to carry his luggage indoors again. 6. Twilight] RV 'dark,' and so in vv. 7, 12. Cover thy face] A natural emblem for disguise and secrecy, but with a special reference, as v. 13 shows, to Zedekiah's blindness. 7. Captivity] RV 'removing,' as in v. 4.

10. The prince] Zedekiah, the last king of Judah: see Intro. That are among them] Changing one letter we may render, 'that are in it.' The prince . . . shall go forth] Zedekiah attempted to escape from Jerusalem towards the end of the siege, but was captured and brought to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. There his eyes were put out, and he was then taken to Babylon (2 K 25⁴⁻⁷ Jer 39⁴⁻⁷ 52⁷⁻¹¹). 12. That he see not] RV 'because he shall not see.'

16. I will leave a few] This is really an explanation of the symbol in 5⁸.

CHAPTERS 12²¹⁻¹⁴

ON PROPHECY, TRUE AND FALSE

After rebuking certain prevalent forms of contempt for prophecy (12²¹⁻²⁸), Ezekiel reproves the false prophets (13¹⁻¹⁶) and false prophetesses (13¹⁷⁻²⁸) of Israel. A visit from the elders next supplies the occasion for an announcement of the principles on which God deals both with false enquirers and with the prophets who answer them (14¹⁻¹¹).

(a) Contempt of Prophecy Rebuked
(12²¹⁻²⁸)

This contempt took two forms. On the one hand it had become a common saying that prophecy was no longer fulfilled at all (v. 22), and on the other hand it was supposed by many that Ezekiel's prophecies, though true, referred to a very distant future (v. 27). In answer to both of these false views God said that His word would be fulfilled, and that without delay.

22. Ezekiel's message frequently takes the shape of a criticism of current proverbs, as in 11³ 12²³ 18² 20³². 24. Vain vision . . . flatter[ing divination] Forms of false prophecy, more fully exposed in c. 13. These had been unfulfilled, and this had led to contempt for all prophecy. But God's true word would no longer be confounded with such things.

25. Prolonged] RV 'deferred,' and so in v. 28.

(b) False Prophets Reproved (13¹⁻¹⁶)

False prophecy accompanied true prophecy in Israel like its shadow. While the true prophets spoke in God's name a message which they had really received from Him, the false prophets used God's name to sanction messages which He had not given them (vv. 6-7), which were merely the product of their own heart and spirit, and not the result of inspired insight (vv. 2, 3). These messages were smooth and agreeable (vv. 10, 17), but they were also vain, false, and seductive (vv. 6-10). They did not deserve the name of prophecy, but were on the same level as heathen divination (vv. 6, 7, 9). Ezekiel compares the false prophets first to foxes that burrow in ruins and make them more ruinous (vv. 4, 5), and next to men who daub with untempered mortar (or whitewash) a slim and tottering wall; the wall symbolising the vain attempts of the people to defend Jerusalem, and the mortar or whitewash the futile encouragement which the false prophets lent to these efforts. Such prophets would be blotted out of Israel (v. 9). The wall would be destroyed by the storm of God's wrath, and the daubers would perish along with it (vv. 11-15).

4. Deserts] RV 'waste places,' ruins.

5. Gaps] RM 'breaches.' Hedge] RV 'fence.' The false prophets did nothing to repair or strengthen Israel's defences. 6. That they would confirm the word] RV 'that the word should be confirmed.' 9. The false prophets would have no share in the restoration of Israel which Ezekiel foretold.

10. A wall] RM 'a slight wall,' the vain defences of Jerusalem. And one built, etc.] RV 'and when one' (the people) 'buildeth up a wall, behold they' (the false prophets) 'daub it,' etc. Untempered mortar] or whitewash. The false prophets could only give the wall a specious appearance of strength.

(c) False Prophetesses Denounced
(13¹⁷⁻²³)

True prophecy was represented by women like Deborah, Huldah, and Noadiah, as well as by men, and false prophecy was also practised by women in Ezekiel's day. In their hands it was accompanied by various superstitious rites and ceremonies (v. 18), and seems to have been a species of fortune-telling. As such it might be popular and seem harmless, but it was mercenary, ensnaring, and fatal to souls (vv. 18, 19). It discouraged the righteous and encouraged the wicked (v. 22). These women would find their occupation gone (vv. 20, 21, 23).

18. Pillows] probably 'amulets,' supposed to have magical virtues. They were worn by the false prophetesses themselves (v. 20).

Armholes] RV 'elbows,' RM 'joints of the hands.' The amulets were worn in some way on the arms or wrists. Kerchiefs] or 'fillets.' These were apparently veils put over the heads of those consulting the false prophetesses, and were of different sizes to suit persons of different stature. 19. Will ye pollute] RV 'ye have profaned.' Handfuls of barley, etc.] The fees received by the false prophetesses. Die and live] see on 3¹⁸. This whole passage should be read in the light of the description of the true prophet's duty in 3¹⁶⁻²¹. 20. To make them fly] RM 'as birds.' 22. The truth of prophecy may be judged by its moral tendency. Whatever encourages sin betrays itself as false: see Jer 23²². By promising him life] RV 'and be saved alive.'

(d) On Insincere Enquirers and those who answer them (14¹⁻¹¹)

The Jewish elders of Tel-abib again came to consult Ezekiel, evidently with idolatrous leanings in their hearts. God commanded him to speak a warning to all such enquirers, calling them to forsake idolatry, and threatening that God Himself would answer them by destroying them if they persisted in their sin. The prophet who should answer such people according to their desire would share their fate.

3. The stumblingblock, etc.] idolatry: see 7¹⁹. Should I be enquired of?] Such enquiry was a mockery of God. 4. That I may take, etc.] Sin hardens the heart and so leads on to destruction. This is a self-acting law of divine retribution, and so in a sense the result is God's doing. But God does not seek to ensnare men. On the contrary, He pleads with them to forsake their evil way (v. 6).

9. When he hath spoken a thing] RV 'and speaketh a word.' A true prophet will not answer insincere enquirers at all, but will leave it to God to answer them by destruction (vv. 7, 8). To give any answer is to be a false prophet, deceived if not consciously deceiving. I . . have deceived that prophet] the same idea as that of the 'lying spirit' from the LORD by which Ahab's false prophets were inspired (1 K 22¹⁹⁻²³ 2 Ch 18¹⁸⁻²²). The meaning can only be that the deception is the penalty of previous disloyalty to truth. No man becomes a false prophet without blame on his own part. To lend oneself to the purposes of insincere enquirers reveals a certain share of their spirit, which leads naturally to increasing blindness. As this law is of God's appointment the deception is in a certain sense His work. The OT. writers emphasised God's supreme control of all events, and were not troubled by the questions which may be raised as to the bearing of the events on the moral character of God. Hence they were not careful to avoid expressions which appear startling to us. 10. The punishment of their iniquity] RV 'their iniquity.' Punishment . . punishment] RV 'iniquity . . iniquity.'

CHAPTER 14¹²⁻²³

A DIVINE PRINCIPLE AND AN APPARENT EXCEPTION

As a rule when God punishes a land for its wickedness by such judgments as famine, wild beasts, sword, or pestilence, the presence in it of the most eminently righteous men will not save the wicked, not even the members of their own families. They will only escape themselves. Jerusalem will be a seeming exception to this principle, since a remnant of its wicked sons and daughters will be spared when the city is taken, and will escape into exile. But this is in order that the earlier exiles, seeing the abandoned conduct of the later, may realise how thoroughly Jerusalem has deserved its punishment, and may cease to regret its fate.

13. The land] RV 'a land.' Vv. 13-21 suppose a series of general cases. Then will I stretch, etc.] RV 'and I stretch . . and break . . and send . . and cut off.' All this is part of the supposition. 14, 20. Noah, Daniel, and Job] Typical righteous men, like Moses and Samuel in Jer 15¹.

21, 22. It might be expected that none of the wicked in Jerusalem would be spared, yet, in apparent violation of the law just described, some of them would escape and go into exile. 22. Ye shall see . . and be comforted] The exiles of the first captivity would be distressed at the fate of Jerusalem, but the conduct of the survivors would convince them that it had been well deserved, and was not to be regretted.

CHAPTER 15

EZEKIEL'S PARABLE OF THE VINE

Jerusalem and Israel are compared elsewhere in Scripture to a cultivated vine, bearing or expected to bear fruit. Ezekiel's similitude, however, is that of the wild vine (v. 2. RV), regarded simply as a tree. It is the most worthless of trees. Its wood is of no use for any purpose, being too weak even to make a peg of. A vine branch that happens to be half-burnt is even more worthless than it was before. Jerusalem is such a half-burnt vine, already charred by the first captivity. It is only fit for fuel, and will be wholly consumed.

2. Or than a branch] RV 'the vine branch.'

7. From one fire, and another fire] RV 'from the fire, but the fire.' Jerusalem has survived one captivity, but will be overtaken by a second and final disaster.

CHAPTER 16

THE FOUNDLING CHILD WHO BECAME AN UNFAITHFUL WIFE

From Hosea onwards the prophets spoke of idolatry under the figure of unchastity. God was the husband of Israel, but she proved unfaithful to Him. This thought has already been expressed by Ezekiel in 6⁹, and it is now expanded into an elaborate historical allegory. The subject is nominally the city of Jerusalem, but really the whole nation of Israel. Jerusalem was a girl-child of heathen extraction, who was exposed in infancy to die (vv. 1-5). God saw her and saved her life, and she grew to maturity, though still in a poor and mean condition (vv. 6, 7). Then He took her to be His wife, loading her with every honour (vv. 8-14). But she was disloyal to Him, admitting idols as her lovers at the high places, and lavishing on them the gifts God had bestowed upon her (vv. 15-19). She even sacrificed to them her own children whom she had borne to God (vv. 20, 21). By borrowing the idolatries of the surrounding nations, Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia, she made them all her paramours, with every aggravation of guilt (vv. 23-34). Her sin had already brought reproach upon her from hostile neighbours like the Philistines (v. 27), but she had proved incorrigible and must now suffer utter humiliation and destruction (vv. 35-43). Men would speak of her as the true daughter of her parents, the true sister of Samaria and Sodom, whose guilt had been less than hers, though she had despised them in her pride (vv. 44-52). Her humiliation would be completed by her being put on a level with them, and sharing the mercy extended to them (vv. 53-59). Nevertheless God would not forget His love for her, but would pity and restore her, giving her Samaria and Sodom for daughters instead of sisters. Humbled, ashamed, and forgiven, she would know at last the true character of God (vv. 60-63).

3. Thy birth, etc.] Though the allegory deals with the history of Israel as a nation it begins by tracing the origin of Jerusalem. It was a Canaanite city, inhabited by Jebusites, long before it became the capital of God's kingdom. Josh 15⁶³ Jg 1²¹ 19¹¹ 2S 5⁶⁻⁸.

Amorite] a general name for some of the tribes originally inhabiting Canaan: cp. Gn 15¹⁶ Dt 20¹⁷. Hittite] The Hittites, or children of Heth, were another portion of the original inhabitants of Canaan: cp. Gn 10¹⁵ Nu 13²⁹. Another branch of the Hittites had a powerful empire to the N. of Palestine (Josh 1⁴ Jg 1²⁰).

7. Thou hast increased, etc.] RV 'thou didst increase,' etc. The past tense should be read throughout the verse. Whereas] RV 'yet.'

8. A covenant] a marriage covenant, probably with reference to the covenant at Sinai.

10. Badgers' skin] RV 'sealskin,' probably the skin of the dugong, an herbivorous cetacean found in the Red Sea. 12. A jewel on thy forehead] RV 'a ring upon thy nose': see Isa 3²¹.

16. High places] the seats of ancient Canaanite worship, retained by the Israelites for the worship of the true God, but perverted to their old uses: see 6^{3, 6, 13}. 20, 21. Human sacrifice was not unknown in early Israel: see on Gn 22¹⁻¹⁴ Jg 11³⁰⁻⁴⁰, and was introduced in later times by Ahaz (2K 16³ 2Ch 28³) and Manasseh (2K 21⁶ 2Ch 33⁶). It was also practised in the northern kingdom (2K 17¹⁷).

24, 25. Besides the high places throughout the land, idolatrous shrines were established in the streets of Jerusalem. 27. Israel suffered from the Philistines both in the days of the Judges and the early kings, and in later times (2Ch 28¹⁸).

29. In the land of Canaan, etc.] RM 'unto the land of traffic,' etc. See 17⁴.

38. As women... are judged] see Lv 20¹⁰ Dt 22²² Jn 8⁵. 41. Many women] the neighbouring nations. 45. Your mother... your father] The plural pronoun refers to the three sisters. 46. Samaria] the capital of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, standing for the whole of that kingdom. Left hand... right hand mean north and south respectively: see 10³.

Elder... younger] refer not to historical antiquity but to importance. 57. Syria] Heb. 'Aram.' We may change one letter and read 'Edom.' The Edomites exulted over the fall of Jerusalem (Obad vv. 10-14 Ps 137⁷). The Philistines seem to have done the same. Both nations are denounced in similar terms in 25¹²⁻¹⁷.

61. Not by thy covenant] The new relation of Jerusalem to Samaria and Sodom would not depend on anything in the past, but would be a fresh arrangement of God's grace.

CHAPTER 17

ZEDEKIAH'S PERFDY AND ITS PUNISHMENT

Zedekiah had been placed on the throne of Judah as a vassal of Babylon, but was led by his nobles to intrigue with Egypt and to throw off the Babylonian yoke. The revolt actually took place in 588 B.C., but it had been contemplated much earlier: see Jer 27¹⁻¹¹, where 'Zedekiah' should be read for 'Jehoiakim' in v. 1. V. 15 of this c. refers to an embassy to Egypt, of which Ezekiel had heard in Babylonia. The prophet exposes this rebellious policy in an allegory, condemns it, and predicts its failure and punishment. The royal house of Judah is a cedar of Lebanon. Babylon (or Nebuchadnezzar) is an eagle, which crops off the highest twig of the cedar (Jehoiachin) and carries it to a land and city of commerce (Babylon). The eagle takes of the seed of the land (Zedekiah) and plants it so that it becomes a dwarf vine bending towards the eagle (subordinate to Babylon). There is another eagle (Egypt, or Pharaoh-Hophra) towards which the vine (Zedekiah) turns (seeking Egyptian instead of Babylonian overlordship). God will not allow such treachery to prosper. The vine will be uprooted. Egyptian help will fail. Zedekiah will be taken captive and will die in Babylon (vv. 1-21).

But God Himself will take another twig of the cedar, and will plant it on a high mountain of Israel, where it will become a great, spreading, and fruitful tree. All the trees (nations) will learn that God directs the destinies of every one of them (vv. 22-24). This is a prophecy of the restoration of the Jewish kingdom which was never literally fulfilled, but which contains a promise of the Messiah—the ideal future king.

5, 6. A willow... a vine of low stature] indicating the dependent position of Zedekiah's kingdom: see v. 14. 12, 13. These vv. describe the captivity of Jehoiachin (597 B.C.) and the appointment of Zedekiah as king under a solemn oath of allegiance to Babylon.

17. The Egyptians succeeded in raising the siege of Jerusalem (Jer 37¹¹), but the relief was only temporary, as Jeremiah foretold that it would be (37⁶⁻¹⁰). 19. Zedekiah had sworn allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar in God's name. His revolt against Babylon, therefore, did dishonour to God. For another example of Zedekiah's perfidy see Jer 34⁸⁻¹¹. 20, 21. A repetition of 12^{13, 14}.

22-24. Ezekiel expected that the restored kingdom of God would have a prince (45^{7, 8} 46¹⁻¹⁸ 47^{21, 22}). This was only fulfilled in a Messianic sense.

CHAPTER 18

God's EQUITY VINDICATED

The popular view of Israel's calamities, as expressed in a current proverb, was that they were the punishment of the sins of former generations. Though there was a measure of truth in this, the proverb was used in a false and mischievous sense. It led the present generation to ignore their own sin, to doubt the justice of God's providence, to despair of escape from the working of a blind fate. Ezekiel, consequently, emphasised in the strongest way the truths of individual responsibility, and of God's impartiality in dealing with every man according to his own character (vv. 1-4). If a man is righteous he shall live (vv. 5-9). If a righteous man has a wicked son, the son will not be saved by his father's righteousness, but will die (vv. 10-13). If this wicked man, in turn, has a righteous son, the latter will not die for his father's sin, but will live (vv. 14-18). Further, a wicked man who repents and becomes righteous will live (vv. 21, 22, 27, 28), and a righteous man who becomes wicked will die (vv. 24, 26). All this is unquestionably just, and God does not wish any to die, but appeals to all to forsake sin and live (vv. 19, 20, 23, 25, 29-32). This c. recalls 31⁷⁻²¹, and the teaching of both passages is repeated in 33¹⁻²⁰.

2. The fathers, etc.] The same proverb is quoted and refuted in Jer 31^{29, 30}. 4. All souls are mine] God deals directly with every one, and not with the son through the father.

It shall die] 'Die' and 'live' are used in the sense explained under 3¹⁸. 6. Eaten upon the mountains] shared in an idolatrous meal at a high place. 7. Restored... his pledge] see Ex 22⁶ Dt 24¹². 22. Mentioned unto] RV 'remembered against': so in v. 24.

24. Ezekiel does not raise the question whether a truly righteous man could thus fall away. He assumes that a man's final conduct expresses his real and final character.

CHAPTER 19

A LAMENT FOR THE ROYAL HOUSE OF JUDAH

This c. is a poem in which the measure used for a dirge or elegy is more or less traceable throughout. It describes first a lioness, two of whose whelps are successively caught and taken away from her (vv. 1-9), and next a vine with lofty branches, which is ruined by a fire proceeding from one of them (vv. 10-14). There is no doubt that the branch from which destruction spreads to the vine is Zedekiah. The vine itself may be the nation of Israel, or the royal house, or the mother of Zedekiah. There are two interpretations of the first allegory. The lioness is usually understood to be the nation or the royal family in general, and the two whelps to be Shallum and Jehoiachin. But some take the lioness to be Hamutal, one of the wives of Josiah, and the whelps to be her two sons, Shallum and Zedekiah.

2. Thy mother] Hamutal, whom some suppose to be meant here, was one of the wives of Josiah, and the mother of Shallum (or Jehoahaz) and Zedekiah (2 K 23³¹ 24¹⁸). Jehoiaquin, the other son of Josiah who became king, had a different mother (2 K 23³⁰).

3, 4. One of her whelps, etc.] Jehoahaz, or Shallum, the youngest son of Josiah (1 Ch 3¹⁵), was set on the throne by the people after his father's death, but after reigning three months he was deposed and carried away captive to Egypt by Pharaoh-Necho (2 K 23³⁰⁻³¹ 2 Ch 36¹⁻⁴). His fate is lamented in Jer 22¹⁰⁻¹².

5-9. Another of her whelps, etc.] Either Jehoiachin or Zedekiah. Jehoiachin was a grandson of Josiah, who came to the throne as a youth and was carried captive to Babylon in 597 B.C. after a reign of three months (2 K 24⁸⁻¹⁶ 2 Ch 36^{9, 10}). Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, was a son of Josiah and Hamutal. He succeeded his nephew Jehoiachin, and was carried captive to Babylon in 586 B.C.: see Intro. The high terms in which the second whelp is spoken of do not agree well with Ezekiel's estimate of Zedekiah in c. 17.

9. In ward in chains] RV 'in a cage with hoops.' Lion cages are represented on the monuments. 10. Thy mother] The language in this allegory is much more applicable to the nation than to Hamutal. In thy blood] a meaningless phrase. Perhaps we should read with RM 'in thy likeness.' 11. Strong rods for the sceptres] a double figure. The rods represent both the kings and their sceptres.

12, 13. These vv. describe the final destruction and captivity of Judah. 14. Out of a rod, etc.] Zedekiah's rebellion was the cause of the ruin of the nation.

§ 5. A FINAL SERIES OF PROPHECIES ON THE NECESSITY OF ISRAEL'S PUNISHMENT AND THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM (chs. 20-24)
Date, Aug.-Sept. 590 B.C. to Jan.-Feb. 587 B.C.

This group includes a warning to the exiles against idolatry (20¹⁻⁴⁴), a description of the sword of the Lord directed against Jerusalem (20⁴⁵-21²⁷), a short prophecy against the Ammonites, connected with the foregoing (21²⁸⁻³²), an indictment of Jerusalem (c. 22), an allegorical history of the sins of Samaria and Jerusalem (c. 23), a fresh parable of the coming siege and destruction of Jerusalem (24¹⁻¹⁴), and an account of the death of Ezekiel's wife, and of his significant conduct in his bereavement (24¹⁵⁻²⁷).

CHAPTER 20 1-44

HISTORY REPEATING ITSELF

Some four years before the fall of Jerusalem the elders of Tel-abib again came to consult Ezekiel, who declared that God had no answer to give them. The reason was that their enquiry was insincere, and this passage is consequently an illustration of the principle of 14³. The exiles were beginning to avow idolatrous tendencies (v. 32), with which the elders were in secret sympathy. Ezekiel recounted how God had dealt with Israel's idolatrous spirit in the past, and announced that He would deal in the same way with those who still cherished it.

Israel had been idolatrous in Egypt and yet had been brought forth (vv. 5-12). Successive generations had been idolatrous in the wilderness, and of these the first had been shut out of the Promised Land, while the second had been brought into it under a warning of exile and dispersion should they continue unfaithful (vv. 13-26). They had not heeded the warning, but had adopted the worship of the Canaanites, and God's threat had now been fulfilled (vv. 27-29). In all this course of mercy and judgment God had 'wrought for His name's sake,' that His character might be truly known to Israel and to the world.

The present exiles were no better than their fathers. They too were resolving to be like the heathen (vv. 30-32). But God would frustrate their purpose. He would bring them also into a wilderness, and would deal with them there as He had dealt with those who came out of Egypt (vv. 33-36). The persistent sinners among them would not enter the land of Israel, but the others would again be brought into a covenant with God, and restored to their own country, where they would worship God acceptably in humble penitence (vv. 37-43). In all this God would act from the same great motive as before (v. 44).

1. The seventh year..the fifth month] July-August, 590 B.C. 5. Lifted up mine hand] i.e. aware, and so in vv. 6, 15, 23, 42.

8. Ezekiel speaks more definitely than any other O.T. writer about the idolatry of the Israelites in Egypt: see 23⁸. 9. For my name's sake] God's consistent motive was that His character should be known to the world. When He was patient with Israel it was because sudden judgment upon them would have been misunderstood by the heathen: see v. 22.

11. Referring to the Law given at Sinai.

12. My sabbaths, to be a sign] Though Ezekiel attached great importance to the sabbath, he regarded it not as one of the moral ordinances, obedience to which brings life (v. 11), but rather as a special sign of God's covenant which Israel was bound to observe.

15. The first generation in the wilderness was shut out of Canaan (Nu 14²¹⁻³⁰ Ps 95¹¹).

23. The second generation was warned that unfaithfulness would be punished by captivity (Lv 26^{33, 34}).

25. Statutes that were not good] The reference (as v. 26 shows) is to the practice of child sacrifice, which might seem to be justified by such a law as that in Ex 22²⁹. The first-born of men, however, were expressly excepted (Ex 13^{12, 13} Nu 3^{46, 47}), and Jeremiah declared that human sacrifice had never been commanded by God (Jer 7³¹ 19⁵). God did not impose sinful laws, but some of His laws could be perverted by sinful men and made an excuse for their wrongdoing. Both the ambiguity of the Law and the blindness which led to the misunderstanding of it were the penalty for previous sin.

29. A play upon words, 'What (mah)... go (ba)?' Bamah is the Hebrew for 'high place,' and by this punning derivation of the word (not of course the true one) Ezekiel expresses his contempt for the thing itself. 32. God's zeal for His name is stronger even than the purpose of the human will to rebel.

34. People] RV 'peoples': so in vv. 35, 41.

35. Wilderness of the people] the desert between Babylon and Palestine, corresponding to the desert between Egypt and Palestine which had been the scene of Israel's former discipline. 37. The rod] the shepherd's rod, used in counting the flock (Lv 27³²). The bond of the covenant] The old covenant made at Sinai will be renewed. Ezekiel does not contemplate such a difference between the past and the future as is expressed in Jeremiah's prophecy of the New Covenant (Jer 31³²).

38. Obstinate transgressors will perish in the wilderness like the first generation who came out of Egypt. 39. Pollute ye... no more] RV 'My holy name shall ye profane no more.' Those who wished to choose idolatry might do so, but they would no longer have any connexion with God and His cause. 40. In the land, serve me] RV 'serve me in the land,' a promise of restoration.

44. When God does not deal with men as they deserve, it is for the sake of His own glory. This really means that His mercy is the highest aspect of His character, and that which He is most desirous to display to the world.

CHAPTERS 20⁴⁵⁻⁴⁹, 21

THE SWORD OF THE LORD AGAINST JERUSALEM (AND AMMON?)

C. 21 of the Hebrew Bible begins with 20⁴⁵ of the English. It is mainly concerned with Jerusalem (20¹⁵⁻²¹ 27), but has an appendix consisting of a short prophecy about Ammon, which has been interpreted in different ways (21²⁸⁻³²).

(a) Against Jerusalem (20^{45-21²⁷})

An enigmatic parable of a forest fire in the S. (20⁴⁵⁻⁴⁹) is explained as referring to the land of Israel, against which God's sword is drawn (21¹⁻⁴). Ezekiel's distress at the announcement is a sign of the dismay which all will feel when it comes to pass (vv. 6, 7). A 'Song of the Sword' follows (vv. 8-17). Next comes a picture of Nebuchadrezzar halting on his march on Palestine, and consulting his oracles as to whether Jerusalem or Ammon should be attacked first. The omens decide for Jerusalem, which is doomed to capture, though its people make light of the heathen oracles (vv. 18-24). The prophecy ends with a denunciation of Zedekiah, and a hint of the future ideal king (vv. 25-27).

46. 47. Field . . forest of the south] Palestine lay almost due W. of Babylon, but the way between them took a circuit N. owing to the desert, and to one coming from Babylon, Palestine lay directly S. in the last stages of the journey.

CHAPTER 21

3. 4. The righteous and the wicked] corresponding to the green tree and the dry in the parable (20⁴⁷). In spite of his strict theory of retribution in c. 18, Ezekiel recognised the fact that good men as well as bad would perish in the siege of Jerusalem.

10. It contemneth, etc.] RV 'The rod of my son, it contemneth every tree.' These words are almost hopelessly obscure, and the text is probably corrupt. As it stands, the meaning may be (a) that the rod (the sword) with which God chastises His son (the king or people of Israel) is more severe than any mere rod of wood (any previous chastisement), or (b) that the king of Judah (the rod or sceptre of my son) despises all other powers (every other rod or tree).

12. Cry . . howl . . smite] tokens of Ezekiel's excited sympathy with God's justice. Terrors . . upon my people] RV 'they' (the princes) 'are delivered over to the sword with my people.'

13. What if the sword contemn even the rod?] equally obscure with v. 10. RV 'what if even the rod that contemneth shall be no more?' What if Judah in its pride shall be destroyed?

14. Smite, etc.] another gesture of excited sympathy. Doubled the third time] rather, 'doubled and trebled' in its destructive power.

Slain] RV 'deadly wounded.' The great men that are slain] RV 'the great one that is deadly wounded'—Zedekiah. 15. Point] RM 'consternation.' Ruins] RV 'stumbleings.'

Wrapped up] RV 'pointed.' 17. I will also smite] God also exults in His judgment.

His sternest justice is a true expression of Himself.

Cause . . to rest] RV 'satisfy.'

19. Choose thou (RV 'mark out') a place] rather, 'grave a hand,' i.e. a sign-post. Nebuchadrezzar is imagined as halting at some point where the roads to Jerusalem and Rabbah (the capital of Ammon) diverge, and as consulting his oracles as to which way he shall take.

20. In Jerusalem] rather, 'into Jerusalem.'

21. He made his arrows bright] RV 'He shook the arrows to and fro.' Two arrows, inscribed with the names of the two cities, were put into a bag and shaken, and then one was drawn out. With images] RV 'the teraphim,' the portable images of the gods whose advice was sought. Looked in the liver] another ceremony of divination. The liver would be that of the animal sacrificed on the occasion, and an omen would be drawn from its shape or colour.

22. At his right hand] RV 'In his right hand. Nebuchadrezzar drew the arrow marked 'Jerusalem.'

23. The people of Jerusalem would make light of Nebuchadrezzar's omens.

That have sworn oaths] This may refer to the broken oaths of allegiance to Babylon (see 17¹³⁻¹⁶), or perhaps to the covenant to free their slaves which the people of Jerusalem made in Zedekiah's reign (Jer 34⁸⁻¹⁰), and which may have led them into self righteous confidence.

25. Profane wicked] RV 'O deadly wounded wicked one.' Zedekiah is addressed.

27. Until he come] the future ideal king.

(b) Concerning Ammon (vv. 28-32)

The Ammonites were a nation E. of the Jordan, and descended from Lot (Gen 19³¹). They had joined in the league against Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 27³), and had reason to fear his vengeance (v. 20 above). But they seem to have thought they would escape, and to have indulged in reproach, and even hostility, against Judah. Ezekiel foretells their certain punishment. For another prophecy against Ammon see 25¹⁻⁷.

28. The sword . . is drawn] most naturally understood to be the sword of the Lord against Ammon, as against Jerusalem in v. 9. But others take it to be the sword which Ammon drew against Jerusalem: see on v. 30.

29. They see vanity] The Ammonites were misled by false prophets. Them that are slain, of the wicked] RV 'The wicked that are deadly wounded'—the people of Jerusalem (v. 14).

30. Shall I cause it] RV 'cause it.' As it stands this is a command to Ammon to sheathe the sword, and hence the sword in v. 28 is generally understood to be theirs. But the prophecy is so closely parallel otherwise to the preceding one that it is probable that the text in v. 30 is corrupt, and that the sword in

v. 28 is the LORD'S. 31. Brutish men] most naturally understood of the Babylonians, but see 25⁴.

CHAPTER 22

ANOTHER INDICTMENT OF JERUSALEM

The various religious and social evils that prevail in the city are recited (vv. 1-11). Their coming punishment is then predicted, first in direct terms (vv. 13-16), and next under the figure of a smelting furnace (vv. 17-22). Lastly, all classes in Jerusalem, prophets, priests, princes, and people, are included in the general condemnation (vv. 23-31).

2. The bloody city] referring to those unjustly put to death by the wicked rulers of Jerusalem: so in vv. 3, 6, 12, 27; see also 11⁶. 5. Much vexed] RV 'full of tumult.'

6. To their power] RV 'according to his power.'

13. I have smitten mine hand] God's gesture of indignation. 16. Take thine inheritance] RV 'be profaned.' 18. Dross] the baser metals from which silver has to be purified.

19-22. Jerusalem will be heated like a furnace for smelting silver, and all that it contains will be melted in the fire of God's wrath. Though silver is mentioned in vv. 20, 22, it is not suggested that any of the precious metal will be left after the refining process. The whole nation is 'dross.'

24. Not rained upon] not blessed with fertilising showers. 28, 30. The same figures as in 13⁵, 10-15.

CHAPTER 23

THE UNCHASTE SISTERS, OHOLAH AND OHOLIBAH

The idolatries and foreign alliances of Jerusalem and Samaria are here described under the same strong figure which is used in c. 16. Oholah (Samaria) and Oholibah (Jerusalem) were two sisters, both seduced in Egypt in their youth (v. 3), both espoused by God (v. 4), and both unfaithful to Him. Samaria took as her lovers first the Assyrians (vv. 5-7), and then the Egyptians (v. 8), and was at length slain by the former (vv. 9, 10). Jerusalem, not warned by her sister's fate, made first the Assyrians and then the Babylonians her paramours (vv. 11-16). Being alienated from the latter she has turned to her early lovers of Egypt (vv. 17-21), but she will be destroyed, like her sister, by the lovers whom she has just forsaken (vv. 22-35). The sin and judgment of the two sisters are described afresh (vv. 36-49).

3. Another instance of Ezekiel's belief that Israel practised idolatry in Egypt: see 20⁸. Of course the distinction between the two branches of the nation does not really go back so far.

4. Aholah . . Aholibah] RV 'Oholah . . Oholibah.' The words perhaps mean 'her tent' and 'my tent in her,' respectively. It was an Eastern custom to give similar names to members of the same family. Samaria] stands for the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, of which it was the capital. Oholah is called the elder sister, probably because the northern kingdom was the larger and stronger of the two. Were mine] RV 'became mine,' in marriage.

5. The Assyrians] In 2K 15¹⁷⁻²⁰ we read that the northern kingdom became tributary to Assyria in the reign of Menahem. But the Assyrian monuments show that this subjection began as early as the reign of Jehu.

8. Egypt] The northern kingdom wavered for a time between an Assyrian and an Egyptian policy (Hos 7¹¹). Its last king, Hoshea, revolted against Assyria and allied himself with Egypt (2K 17⁴). This was the cause of the destruction of his kingdom.

12. The Assyrians] The southern kingdom made alliance with Assyria in the days of Ahaz, who eagerly introduced foreign idolatries (2K 16¹⁷). Except in the reign of Hezekiah the Assyrian overlordship continued till that of Babylon took its place. These political relations were accompanied by religious defections. 14. Images of the Chaldeans] Such pictures were common on the walls of Babylonian palaces. Ezekiel imagines them as being seen in Jerusalem, and as awakening the nation's desire for these unknown lovers. 17. Her mind (RV 'soul') was alienated] Judah under Jehoiakim (2K 24¹) and Zedekiah (2K 24²⁰) became weary of Babylonian supremacy.

19. Egypt] Like Samaria, Jerusalem went back to her first seducers. Intrigues with Egypt were frequent from the days of Hezekiah onwards (Isa 30⁸¹), and it was trust in Egypt which led to Zedekiah's revolt and the nation's fall: see 17⁷.

23. Pekod . . Shoa . . Koa] Eastern peoples tributary to Babylon. They are all mentioned in the inscriptions. The Assyrians] These now formed part of the Babylonian Empire.

34. Pluck off] RV 'tear.'

39. Human sacrifice was combined with the forms of God's worship. This only aggravated its guilt. 42. Sabeans] RV 'drunkards.'

45. The righteous men] The allegory carries out the forms of justice observed in an Israelite city, but we need not look for a counterpart to the righteous men in the actual history.

CHAPTER 24

THE ALLEGORY OF THE BOILING CALDRON. EZEKIEL'S BEREAVEMENT AND SIGNIFICANT SILENCE

This prophecy is dated on the day on which the siege of Jerusalem began. Ezekiel is commanded by God to note the date, and to speak to the exiles a final parable of the city's coming fate. Jerusalem is a rusty pot filled with water and meat and set upon a fire. The meat is well boiled, and brought out piece by piece at random. The empty pot is then set back on the fire that the rust may be burned away. The rust denotes Jerusalem's impurity and bloodshed. The boiling is the siege, and the emptying of the pot the captivity. The heating of the empty pot symbolises the burning of the city at the end of the siege (vv. 1-14).

Ezekiel spoke this message in the morning, and his wife died on the evening of the same day, but in obedience to a divine command he indulged in no sign of mourning. His silent sorrow was an emblem of the stupor into which the exiles would be cast when they should hear of the fall of Jerusalem. When the survivors of the siege should reach Babylon, however, Ezekiel's silence would be at an end (vv. 15-27).

1. The ninth year.. the tenth month] January-February, 587 B.C. For the date see 2 K 25¹ Jer 39¹ 52⁴.

3. Pot] RV 'caldron': so in v. 6. 5. Burn

.. the bones, etc.] Wo must read either with RV 'pile.. the bones under it' (the flesh), or 'burn.. the wood under it' (the caldron). The bones were in the pot, not below it.

6. Scum] RV 'rust': so in vv. 11, 12. Let no lot fall] The meat was to be taken out indiscriminately. 7. The top of a rock] RV 'the bare rock.' Jerusalem's bloodshed was open and unconcealed. 8. I have set] What was mere shameless wickedness on Jerusalem's part was yet the working out of God's purpose of judgment. 10. Kindle] RV 'make hot.'

Consume] RV 'boil well.' Spice it well] RV 'make thick the broth.' Burned] not in the fire, but singed in the pot by the intense heat of the cooking. 12. With lies, and] RV 'with toil, yet.' 13. Caused.. to rest] RV 'satisfied.'

17. Loosening the head-dress, baring the feet, and covering the lips, were signs of mourning (Lv 10⁶ 2S 15³⁰). 22. The bread of men] probably food offered by sympathising friends. See Jer 16⁷ (RV). 23. Pinc.. mourn (RV 'moan') The sorrow of the exiles for the fate of Jerusalem would be tearless and inarticulate, like Ezekiel's sorrow for his wife. 27. See 33²².

PART 2 (Chs. 25-32)

PROPHECIES AGAINST FOREIGN NATIONS

These chs. come between those which deal with the overthrow of the Old Israel (1-24) and those which describe the establishment of the New Israel (33-48), and they form an introduction to the latter group. Their significance is well explained in 28²⁴⁻²⁶. The fall of Jerusalem seemed to be a victory of heathendom over the people of the true God, and it was needful to show that it was not so. The God of Israel who had visited His people with this punishment would send His judgments on the heathen nations also, and would convince them that He was the living God. The humiliation of these nations would clear the stage for the restoration of Israel, which would no longer be troubled by its formerly hostile neighbours. These prophecies fall into three groups: (1) against the lesser and nearer nations, Ammon, Moab, Edom, and the Philistines (c. 25), (2) against Tyre and Sidon (chs. 26-28), (3) against Egypt (chs. 29-32). With the exception of 29¹⁷⁻²¹, these prophecies are mostly dated in years either just before or just after the capture of Jerusalem.

§ 1. AMMON, MOAB, EDM, AND PHILISTIA

These four nations were the neighbours of Israel on the E., S.E., and S.W. respectively, and are dealt with in their geographical order.

Ammon and Moab are denounced for their exultation at the fall of Jerusalem, Edom and Philistia for their revengeful share in Israel's humiliation. All of them are threatened with destruction from God. The instruments of the judgment are to be the Bedouins of the desert in the case of Ammon and Moab, and Israel in the case of Edom. The destroyers of the Philistines are not indicated.

1-7. Ammon.

For the Ammonites see on 21-3. In addition it may be observed that the king of Ammon was a party to the plot against Gedaliah, the governor whom Nebuchadnezzar left in Palestine after the capture of Jerusalem (Jer 40¹⁴ 41^{10,15}). See Intro. 3. The destruction of Jerusalem has taken place. The Ammonites have rejoiced at Israel's calamity. V. 6 speaks of their gestures of triumph.

4. Men of the east] the Bedouins of the desert: so in v. 10. Palaces] RV 'encampments.' 5. Rabbah] the capital of Ammon.

8-11. Moab.

The Moabites, like the Ammonites, were descended from Lot (Gn 19³⁷). Their country lay E. of the Dead Sea, and S. of Ammon, the Arnon being the boundary. They were at times subject to Israel and at times independent, but always hostile.

8. And Scir] These words should be omitted. Edom (Scir) is dealt with separately below. Behold, etc.] The Moabites denied Israel's claim to be the people of the true God. Heathen] RV 'nations.' 9. Side] RM 'shoulder,' i.e. frontier. Beth-jeshimoth, Baal-meon, Kiriathaim] three frontier cities of Moab: see Nu33¹⁹ Josh12⁸ 13^{17,19,20}. The last two were in the territory of Reuben (Nu32^{87,88}).

12-14. Edom.

The Edomites were descended from Esau (Gn36⁴³). They showed a specially unbrotherly spirit when Jerusalem fell: see Ps137⁷ Lam4^{21,22} Obad vv. 11-16.

13. Teman] a grandson of Esau (Gn36¹¹). Also a town or district of Edom (Jcr49^{7,20} Am1¹¹ Obad v. 9). And they of Dedan] RV 'even unto Dedan.' Dedan was a district of N. Arabia, and is mentioned here as the southern border of Edom, Teman being presumably the northern extremity: see Gn10⁷ 25³ Isa21¹³ Jer25²².

15-17. Philistia.

The Philistines dwelt on the coast, SW. of Palestine. They were oppressors of Israel in early times, but were vanquished by David. They sought every opportunity of annoying Israel afterwards (2Ch21¹⁶ 26⁷ 28¹⁸), and they seem to have joined with Edom in embittering the fate of Jerusalem: see 16³⁷.

15. For the old hatred] RV 'with perpetual enmity.' 16. Cherethims] RV 'Cherethites,' a Philistine tribe (1S30¹⁴ Zeph2⁵) from which David's body-guard was partly drawn (2S8¹⁸ 15¹⁸ 20⁷ 1K1³⁸, etc.).

§ 2. TYRE (AND SIDON) (chs. 26-28)

Tyre was the capital of Phœnicia, the sea-board country on the NW. of Palestine. The Phœnicians were the great mariners of the ancient world, and Tyre was a famous seaport, renowned for its wealth and splendour. It joined in the league against Nebuchadnezzar, and was besieged by him for thirteen years (597-584 B.C.). See Intro. Ezekiel predicts its overthrow in three prophecies, one in general terms (c. 26), one describing Tyre under the figure of a gallant ship (c. 27), and one directed specially against the king of Tyre (28¹⁻¹⁹). Zidon (or Sidon) was another Phœnician sea-port, about 20 m. N. of Tyre, which was its younger rival. It also joined in the league against Babylon (Jer27³), and its downfall too is predicted by Ezekiel (28²⁰⁻²⁶). Part of the language of these chs. is reproduced in Rev18.

CHAPTER 26

THE FALL OF TYRE PREDICTED

The desolation of Tyre is announced (vv. 1-6), its siege by Nebuchadnezzar is vividly described (vv. 7-14), a lamentation for its fall is put into the mouths of the princes of the sea (vv. 15-18), and God's threat of judgment is again repeated (vv. 19-21).

1. The eleventh year] 586 B.C. The month is not given, but the date must have been after the destruction of Jerusalem, in the fifth month of that year (2K25⁸): see v. 2. 2. Tyrus] RV 'Tyre,' and so throughout chs. 26-28. Aha, etc.] Tyre had rejoiced because of the commercial advantage she would reap from the fall of Jerusalem. Gates of the people] RV 'gate of the peoples.' Jerusalem lay near the highway of traffic which led northward to Tyre, and its fall would remove a barrier to Tyrian trade.

4. Like the top of a rock] RV 'a bare rock': so in v. 14. 6. Her daughters] tributary states or cities. 15. Isles] the maritime countries of the Mediterranean. 16. Princes of the sea] the rulers of these sea-board lands. 20. Tyre is personified, and represented as going down into the under-world of the dead: see 31¹⁴⁻¹⁸ 32¹⁸⁻³². And I shall set glory] perhaps we should read, with LXX, 'nor arise.'

CHAPTER 27

THE WRECK OF THE GALLANT SHIP

Under the figure of a ship, splendidly equipped, fully manned, and richly laden, but steered into stormy waters and wrecked, Ezekiel describes the fall of Tyre. In vv. 10-20 the figure is partly dropped.

3. People] RV 'peoples'; and so everywhere. 5. Senir] Mt. Hermon (Dt3⁹). 6. The company of the Ashurites... ivory] RV 'they have made thy benches of ivory inlaid in box-wood.' The 'teasshur' (mistaken in AV for Ashurites or Assyrians) was a species of tree (probably box or cypress) found in Lebanon, and mentioned in Isa41¹⁹ 60¹³. Chittim] Cyprus.

7. Elishah] mentioned in Gn10⁴ along with Javan (Ionia), was some Mediterranean country, perhaps the Peloponnesus (Morea), which was famous for purple dye. 8. Arvad] a Canaanite city (Gn10¹⁸ 1Ch1¹⁰) built on an island (Ruwād) 2 m. off the Syrian coast and nearly 100 m. N. of Tyre.

9. Gebal] a coast town some 50 m. N. of Tyre, the classical Byblos: see Josh13⁵ 1K5¹⁸ (RV).

Occupy] RM 'exchange.' This is the old meaning of the word, which is regularly used in this sense in the Bible: see Lk19¹³.

10. Lud and... Phut] Ludim appears in Gn10¹³ as the eldest son of Mizraim (Egypt), and Phut in Gn10⁶ as a son of Ham and brother of Mizraim. Both nations are mentioned as allies of Egypt in 30⁵ (RV). They were probably N. African peoples. 11. Gammadim] a word of unknown reference. 12. Tarshish] either Tartessus in Spain, or the land of the Tyrsenians (Etruscans) in Italy. 13. Javan, Tubal, and Meshech] these nations are named together in Gn10². Javan is Ionia in Asia Minor. Tubal and Meshech are usually identified with the Tibareni and Moschi, two tribes in the N. of Asia Minor. For the slave trade of Javan see Joel 3⁶. 14. Togarmah] (Gn 10³) probably Armenia. 15. Dedan] see on 25¹³.

17. Minnith] an Ammonite town (Jg 11³⁵). For Ammonite wheat in Judah see 2 Ch 27⁵.

Pannag] a word of unknown meaning. RM says, 'Perhaps a kind of confection.' 18. Helbon] a wine-growing district 13 m. N. of Damascus. 19. Dan also] RV 'Vedan.' Going to and fro] RM 'from Uzal.' Vedan and Uzal are uncertain localities. 21. Kedar] an Arabian district (Gn 25¹³). 22. Sheba and Raamah] countries in S. Arabia (Gn 10⁷).

23. Haran] in Mesopotamia (Gn 11³¹).

Canneh] perhaps Calneh, a Babylonian city (Gn 10¹⁰). Eden] either Beth-Eden, a state in the W. of Mesopotamia, mentioned in the inscriptions and in 2 K 19¹² Isa 37¹² Am 1⁵ (RM), or Aden in Arabia. Asshur] Assyria. Chilmad] an unknown place. Perhaps instead of taking it as a proper name we should read, 'Were as those accustomed to be thy merchants.' 25. Ships of Tarshish] deep-sea vessels in general: see 1 K 22⁴⁵. Did sing of thee in] RV 'were thy caravans for.'

CHAPTER 28 1-19

THE KING OF TYRE

The overweening pride of the prince of Tyre, which has led him to claim to be a god, is rebuked, and his destruction by strangers is foretold (vv. 1-10). He is compared to an inmate of Eden, the garden of God, who is cast out for his sin (vv. 11-19).

2. The prince of Tyrus] the king of Tyre at this time was Ithobalus (Ethbaal) II. 3. Daniel] a type of wisdom here, as of righteousness in 14^{14, 20}. Ezekiel's references to Daniel suggest a sage of ancient times rather than a youthful contemporary in Babylonia. 7. Strangers] the Babylonians. 10. Deaths of the uncircumcised] a phrase for an ignominious end. So in 31¹⁸ 32 19, 21, 23, 32.

12. Thou sealest, etc.] an obscure phrase, alluding in some way to the wisdom of the king of Tyre. 13. Thou hast been (RV 'wast') in Eden, etc.] Ezekiel here evidently refers to a legend similar to the story of the Fall in Gn 3. His use of it seems to indicate that in his day it had not been fixed in the biblical form.

Every precious stone] the stones mentioned are the same as those in the first, second, and fourth rows of stones on the high priest's breastplate (Ex 28¹⁷⁻²⁰). Gold. . . tabrets. . . pipes] rather, 'of gold was the workmanship of thy sockets and grooves,' referring to the setting of the precious stones. 14. Thou art (RV 'wast') the anointed cherub] more probably, 'thou wast with the . . . cherub.' The holy mountain] another phrase for the garden of God.

16. I will destroy (RV 'have destroyed') thee, O covering cherub] more probably, 'the covering cherub hath destroyed thee,' i.e. expelled thee. As it stands the passage describes the fall of a cherub, but the alternative renderings in vv. 14-16 bring it more into line with Gn 3, the cherub being the guardian of the garden, and the prince of Tyre a privileged inmate of it, who is driven out for the sin of pride.

CHAPTER 28 20-26

GOD'S JUDGMENT ON SIDON

Sidon, the partner of Tyre in opposing Nebuchadrezzar, will be its partner in destruction (vv. 20-23). The overthrow of the heathen nations will vindicate the supreme power of the God of Israel, will prepare the way for His people's restoration to their own land, and will ensure their security and peace in the future (vv. 24-26). These last vv. have an important bearing on the significance of all Ezekiel's prophecies against the nations.

§ 3. EGYPT (chs. 29-32)

The most of this series of prophecies against Egypt are connected with dates during the siege of Jerusalem, the time when Ezekiel was silent as a prophet of Israel. They were therefore probably written rather than spoken. C. 32 is dated in the year after the fall of Jerusalem, and 29¹⁷⁻²¹ belongs to a much later time. In chronological order the series includes (1) the destruction of the crocodile (29¹⁻¹⁰), (2) the invasion of Egypt by Nebuchadrezzar (30¹⁻¹¹), (3) the breaking of Pharaoh's arms (30²⁰⁻²¹), (4) the fall of the great cedar (c. 31), (5) two lamentations for Pharaoh and Egypt (c. 32), (6) Egypt substituted for Tyre (29¹⁷⁻²¹).

CHAPTER 29 1-16

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CROCODILE

Pharaoh is compared to the crocodile of the Nile. God will drag him forth with hooks and cast him, with the fish that stick to his scales, into the wilderness, as a punishment for his deception of Israel (vv. 1-7). Egypt will be desolate for forty years (vv. 8-12), after which it will be restored, but not to its former greatness (vv. 13-15). Israel will no longer place a mistaken confidence in it (v. 16).

1. The tenth year . . . the tenth month] January-February, 587 B.C., about seven months before the fall of Jerusalem. 2. Pharaoh] The king of Egypt at this time was Pharaoh-hophra (Apries): see Jer 44³⁰. He reigned from 588-569 B.C. 3. Dragon] the crocodile.

His rivers] the Nile and its branches.

4. Fish] the subjects of Pharaoh. 6, 7. This was the constant character of Egypt in its relations with Israel. It incited Israel by promises of help to rebel against Assyria or Babylon, and failed in the hour of need: see 2 K 18²¹ Isa 30⁷ 31⁸ Jer 37⁷. 10. From the tower of Syene] RM 'from Migdol to Syene,' and so in 30⁶. The places named represent the N. and S. extremities of the country. Migdol was a town in Lower Egypt. Syene is the modern Assouan, in Upper Egypt.

11, 12. Forty years] a round number, standing for a full generation, as in 4⁶. The period represented Ezekiel's forecast of the duration of Babylonian supremacy: see Jer 25^{9-11, 10}.

14. Pathros] Upper Egypt.

For vv. 17-21 see the end of the Section, after c. 32.

CHAPTER 30¹⁻¹⁰

THE INVASION OF EGYPT BY NEBUCHADREZZAR

No special enemy of Egypt has been mentioned in 29¹⁻¹⁰, but the king of Babylon is now pointed out as its conqueror.

5. Libya, and Lydia] RV 'Put and Lud': see on 27¹⁰. Chub] an unknown people. The land that is in league] perhaps we should read, 'the land of the Cherethites' (Philistia). 9. In ships] ascending the Nile to Ethiopia.

13. Noph] Memphis, the capital of Lower Egypt. 14. Zoan] Tanis, an ancient Egyptian city (Nu 13²²). No] No-ammon, or Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt. 15. Sin] Pelusium, a frontier city at the NE. extremity of the Delta of the Nile. 17. Aven] On, or Heliopolis: see Gn 41^{45, 50} 46³⁰. It lay on the E. edge of the Delta. Pi-beseth] Bubastis, a city of Lower Egypt. 18. Tehaphnehes (or Tahpanhes)] Daphne, a city on the E. frontier of Lower Egypt: see Jer 43⁷ 44¹ 46¹⁴.

CHAPTER 30²⁰⁻²⁶

THE BREAKING OF PHARAOH'S ARMS

This prophecy appears to have been occasioned by some reverse sustained by Pharaoh shortly before the fall of Jerusalem. Probably the reference is to the failure of his attempt to raise the siege (Jer 37⁵⁻¹¹). The disaster is metaphorically described as the breaking of one of Pharaoh's arms. Ezekiel predicts that God will break the other arm also, so that Pharaoh will drop his sword. The king of Babylon's arms will be strengthened. God's sword will be put into his hand, that it may be stretched over Egypt. The Egyptians will be scattered in other lands.

20. The eleventh year . . the first month] March-April, 586 B.C., about four months before the fall of Jerusalem. 21. Roller] bandage.

CHAPTER 31

THE FALL OF THE GREAT CEDAR

Egypt was a stately cedar, thick, lofty, and spreading; sheltering all the fowls and beasts (the nations) in its branches and under its shadow (vv. 1-6). It was the envy of all the trees (other great empires) in Eden, the garden of God (vv. 7-9). But because of its pride it is given into the hands of a mighty one (Nebuchadrezzar), who will cut it down. Those whom it sheltered will be scattered or will trample on it when it has fallen (vv. 10-13). This will be a warning to all trees (empires) against pride (v. 14). Egypt will go down to the nether world, and all the great nations already there will be comforted when it arrives.

1. The eleventh year . . the third month] May-June, 586 B.C., about two months before the fall of Jerusalem. 3. The Assyrian] has evidently no connexion with the subject of the prophecy, which is Egypt. It has been supposed that the c. describes the downfall of Assyria, as a type of that of Egypt, but it is much more probable that instead of 'the Assyrian' we should read 'a teasshur' or box-tree, as in 27⁶. 'Behold a box-tree, a cedar,' etc. 4. Waters . . rivers] the waters of the Nile. The allegory is not strictly consistent as to locality. The cedar is in Lebanon and also apparently in Eden. 11. I have therefore delivered] RV 'I will even deliver.'

14. All that drink water] all trees: so in v. 16. Delivered unto death] another instance of Ezekiel's conception of the nations as personified and surviving in the under-world: see Isa 14⁹⁻²⁰. 15. The deep . . the floods (RV 'rivers') . . the waters] those referred to in v. 4. Ezekiel poetically says that the rivers of Egypt would cease to flow, in token of mourning for the nation's fall.

CHAPTER 32

TWO LAMENTATIONS FOR PHARAOH AND EGYPT

This c. consists of two prophecies, both dated more than a year and a half after the capture of Jerusalem, and separated from each other by a fortnight. In the first Pharaoh is likened, no longer to a young lion, but to a foul river monster, which will be caught, cast on the mountains, and devoured by birds and beasts of prey. At the monster's end the lights of heaven will be darkened, and the nations will be dismayed (vv. 1-10). The allegory is explained to mean the desolation of Egypt by the king of Babylon (vv. 11-16).

The second prophecy is a burial song over Pharaoh and his people (vv. 17-32). They go down to the under-world, which is weirdly conceived as a vast land of graves, the occupants of which, however, retain their consciousness and their speech. Two regions are distinguished in it. Sheol or 'hell' (vv. 21, 27) is the abode of the ancient heroes who have received honourable burial, while 'the pit' is a remoter region, reserved for the nations which have filled the earth with violence and terror, and whose people have died ingloriously in battle. Each of these nations has its own portion of 'the pit,' where the graves of its people are grouped around a central grave, occupied by the king or the personified genius of the nation. Pharaoh and his people will have a place among these dishonoured nations, and will be comforted to find that they are not alone in their humiliation.

1. The twelfth year . . the twelfth month] February-March, 584 B.C., almost a year and seven months after the fall of Jerusalem.

2. Thou art like . . and thou art] RV 'thou wast likened . . yet art thou,' a contrast between a noble and a base comparison. Whale] RV 'dragon': probably a crocodile or a hippopotamus is meant. 3. People] RV 'peoples.'

6. With thy blood . . swimmest] probably 'the earth with the outflow of thy blood.'

7. Put . . out] RV 'extinguish.' Pharaoh is represented as a heavenly luminary, at the extinction of which the other heavenly bodies veil their light. Some suppose that there is a special reference to the constellation of the Dragon. 14. Deep] RV 'clear.' Clear and smooth rivers betoken an uninhabited land: see v. 13.

17. The month is not mentioned, but it may be assumed to be the same as in v. 1. 18. Cast them down] i.e. in the burial song. Eren her, etc.] rather, 'thou and the daughters,' etc., following up the thought of v. 16. 19. Uncircumcised] dishonourably buried: see on 28¹⁰. The term is practically equivalent to 'slain by the sword': so in vv. 21, 24, 25, 26, 29, 30, 32. 20. Draw her] RV 'draw her away,' to her burial-place in the under-world. 21. The strong among the mighty] the ancient heroes, referred to also in v. 27. Hell] Sheol, the place of the honoured dead: so in v. 27.

They are gone down, etc.] the taunt uttered by the heroes against the Egyptians and their allies.

22. Asshur] Assyria. His graves are about him] The central grave is that of the king, or of the embodied genius of the nation ('her grave,' v. 23, etc.). 23. Sides] RV 'utmost parts,' a remoter region of the under-world than that assigned to the heroes. 24. Elam] a country E. of the Tigris, formerly a part of the Assyrian empire (Isa 22⁶, where Elamite archers appear in Sennacherib's army). In Jer 49³⁴⁻³⁹ Elam is an independent state, and is threatened with conquest by Nebuchadnezzar.

26. Meshech, Tubal] see on 27¹³. These tribes may have taken part in the Scythian invasion: see Intro. and 38^{2,3}. 27. The mighty of . . the uncircumcised] A very slight change in the original gives the much better sense of the LXX, 'the mighty, the Nephilim of old time.' The violent nations would not be permitted to share the place of the heroes in the under-world. For the Nephilim see Gen 6⁴ Nu 13³³ RV. Their iniquities shall be, rather, 'their shields are.' The heroes were buried honourably with their weapons and armour. 29. Edom] see on 25¹². 30. Princes of the north . . Zidonians] the states of Syria and Phœnicia. 32. I have caused my terror] RV 'I have put his terror.' Pharaoh in his violence had been unconsciously carrying out God's purpose.

CHAPTER 29 17-21

EGYPT AS NEBUCHADREZZAR'S WAGES FOR THE SIEGE OF TYRE

This is the latest of Ezekiel's dated prophecies, and was uttered nearly sixteen years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Tyre was now over, and had not ended so successfully as Ezekiel prophesied in chs. 26-28. Ezekiel now proclaimed that Egypt would be substituted for Tyre as Nebuchadnezzar's reward, and concluded with a promise of revival to Israel.

17. The seven and twentieth year, the first month] March-April, 570 B.C. 20. They wrought for me] Nebuchadnezzar and his army were God's instruments. 21. The humiliation of Egypt would open the way for Israel's restoration, and the prophet would no longer be silenced by the incredulity of his people.

PART 3

THE NEW ISRAEL (Chs. 33-48)

So long as the Jewish kingdom remained in existence Ezekiel's prophecies (those in chs. 1-24) dealt almost exclusively with the nation's sin, and with the certainty of its overthrow. But when these prophecies were fulfilled by the fall of Jerusalem his message assumed a new and hopeful character. God's punishment of Israel's sin was not the end of His dealings with His people. The destruction of the old sinful Israel would be followed by the establishment of a perfect kingdom of God. The humiliation of the foreign nations (described in chs. 25-32) would prepare the way for this, and would be succeeded by the restoration of the exiles. The new kingdom would be set up under new conditions of worship and fellowship with God. This concluding part of the book falls into two sections, the first dealing with the restoration from captivity (chs. 33-39), and the second with the new arrangements and laws of the future kingdom (chs. 40-48).

§ 1. THE RESTORATION (chs. 33-39)

After an introductory passage (33¹⁻²⁰), and two short prophecies against the wicked survivors of Jerusalem and the careless exiles (33²¹⁻³³), this section describes the restoration in connexion with the Ruler, the Land and the People successively. As to the Ruler, God is pictured as the Shepherd of Israel (c. 34). As to the Land, a prophecy against Edom (c. 35) introduces a new address to the mountain land of Israel (c. 36). As to the People, the revival of the dead nation, and the reunion of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah are allegorically set forth (c. 37). Finally, we have a description of the invasion and overthrow of Gog, the last enemy of God's people (chs. 38, 39). The beginning of the section is dated in December-January, 585-4 (or 586-5) B.C. See on 33²¹.

CHAPTER 33¹⁻²⁰

THE PROPHET AND THE INDIVIDUAL

This passage combines an expanded repetition of 31⁷⁻²¹ with a condensed repetition of 18⁵⁻²⁰. The prophet is a watchman, responsible for warning his people of the consequences of sin. God deals with individual souls in strict justice, and desires that all should turn from their evil ways and live. These principles, already announced, became of special importance, and found their real application, after the fall of Jerusalem. As Ezekiel had foretold (24²³), that disaster stunned the exiles by its shock. They were overwhelmed by the judgment that had overtaken the nation for its sin. They pined away under it and felt that recovery was hopeless (v. 10). The nation being thus destroyed there was only a company of individuals left, and the religion of the individual came to have a new significance which has never passed away.

2. The sword] usually a symbol of impending calamity (see 14¹⁷, c. 21), but here it is simply a detail in the figure of the watchman. The destruction of Jerusalem was past, and no further judgment was specially in view. Of their coats] RV 'from among them.' The prophet's position is represented as due to the people's choice as well as to the call of God. This indicates that Ezekiel had now more recognition from the exiles than before.

5. But... deliver] RV 'whereas if he had taken warning he should have delivered.'

10. If our transgressions... be] RV 'our transgressions... are.' 13. For] RV 'in.' For it] RV 'therein.' 16. Mentioned unto] RV 'remembered against.' 18. Thereby] RV 'therein.'

CHAPTER 33²¹⁻³³

THE PROPHET, THE SURVIVORS, AND THE EXILES

In 24²⁷ it was announced to Ezekiel that the silence which began with his wife's death and the siege of Jerusalem would be ended when fugitives from the captured cities should arrive in Babylonia. This took place a year and five months (but see on v. 21) after Jerusalem fell, and Ezekiel began once more to receive and proclaim messages from God. This passage contains two of these. The first was directed against the wicked survivors who remained in the land of Israel and boasted that it would still be theirs. They were destined to perish, and the land to be utterly desolated, in order that God's wrath against their sin might be shown to the uttermost (vv. 23-29). The second describes the changed attitude of the exiles towards Ezekiel. They were now interested in his words, discussing them in their gatherings, and listening eagerly to what he had to say. Yet their interest had more of curiosity than of earnestness. Not till the final punishment of the wicked survivors took place would they recognise Ezekiel as a prophet indeed (vv. 30-33).

21. The twelfth year, the tenth month] December 585-January 584 B.C. The Syriac Bible reads 'the eleventh year.' Five months seem more likely than a year and five months as the time to be allowed for a journey from Palestine to Babylonia.

22. Was] RV 'had been.' Ezekiel had come under the power of divine inspiration the previous evening, when the truths in vv. 1-20 had shaped themselves in his mind. The prophecy against the wicked survivors (vv. 23-29) was probably called forth by information which the fugitives brought as to their attitude.

24. They that inhabit, etc.] the surviving wicked remnant in the land of Israel. Their wickedness is described in vv. 25, 26. For an historical account of the events in Palestine after the fall of Jerusalem see Jer 40-43. The survivors to whom Ezekiel refers are probably the anti-Babylonian party, led by Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, who were responsible for the murder of Gedaliah: see Intro.

Abraham was one, etc.] These survivors reasoned—If Abraham, who was only one man, obtained this land for his descendants, much more may we, who are many, hope to do so in spite of all that has happened.' For a sounder use of the same argument see Isa 51².

28. From Jer 52³⁰ we learn that there was a further deportation of 745 Jews to Babylonia five years after the fall of Jerusalem.

30. The children of thy people] the exiles of the first captivity. Still are talking against thee] RV 'talk of thee.' 32. The exiles listened to Ezekiel's words as they would to music, which was entertaining but had no practical influence on their lives. 33. When this cometh to pass] the utter desolation of Palestine foretold in vv. 27, 28.

CHAPTER 34

THE GOOD SHEPHERD OF ISRAEL

In this c. Israel is described as God's flock. Its former kings were evil shepherds who sought their own selfish ends and were careless what became of the sheep. The flock had become the prey of wild beasts (the heathen nations). God would judge the evil shepherds and deliver the sheep from them. He would Himself be the Shepherd of His people, gathering the scattered and lost, caring for the sick and wounded, feeding the flock in security (vv. 1-16). The flock, too, had been divided against itself. The fat and strong cattle (the upper classes) had tyrannised over the lean and weak (the common people). God would judge the overbearing cattle also. He would unite His flock under David as their shepherd (an ideal king of David's line), who would feed them in a peaceful and fertile land, untroubled by beasts of prey (vv. 17-31). This c. is the basis of our Lord's parables of the Lost Sheep (Mt 18¹², Lk 15³⁻⁶) and the Good Shepherd (Jn 10¹⁻¹⁰).

3. Fat] rather, 'milk.' Them that are fed] RV 'the fatlings.' Flock] RV 'sheep': so in vv. 6, 8, 10, 15, 19, 31. 5. There is] RV 'there was.' 12. In the day . . scattered] better, 'in the day when all his sheep are scattered.' 13. People] RV 'peoples.' 16. With judgment] RV 'in judgment.'

17. Between cattle and cattle, etc.] rather, 'between sheep and sheep, even the rams and the he-goats.' The rams and he-goats are the second class of sheep, the weaker members of the flock being the first class. 18. Deep] RV 'clear.' 23. My servant David] David, the shepherd king, is introduced as a type of the ideal ruler of the future kingdom of God: see 37²⁴ Jer 30⁹ Hos 3³. 24. Prince] instead of king, is Ezekiel's usual designation of the ruler of the future: see chs. 45, 46. 25. A covenant of peace] see 37²⁶. Wilderness] means not 'desert,' but 'pasture-land': see Ps 65¹².

26. Read with LXX 'I will set them round about my hill, and I will send you the rain (in its season), a rain of blessing.' There is a hint here of the place which the Temple is to have in the life of the new Israel: see c. 40.

27. Those that served themselves of them] the evil shepherds. 28. Land] RV 'earth.' The wild beasts denote the heathen. 29. Plant of renown] RV 'plantation for renown.' The reference is not to the Messiah, who is already represented in the allegory by David, but to the fertility of the land. Other readings are, 'a plantation of peace,' or 'a fat plantation.'

30. The result of the restoration will be that Israel will recognise not only the character of their God, but the fact that they are His people. 31. Omit are men, and read, 'and ye are my flock,' etc.

CHAPTERS 35, 36

THE LAND OF ISRAEL IN THE FUTURE

C. 35 is an introduction to c. 36, the connexion being shown by 36². The claim of Edom to the land having been repudiated (c. 35), its reoccupation by Israel is promised (36¹⁻¹⁵), and the reason of the restoration is explained (36¹⁶⁻³⁸).

(a) The Punishment of Edom's Presumption (c. 35)

Edom has already been included by Ezekiel among the nations whose humiliation would prepare the way for the restoration of Israel (25¹²⁻¹⁴), and this new prophecy requires a special explanation, which is easily found. Before the land could be given to its true owners all false claimants had to be disposed of. The claim of the wicked survivors of Jerusalem has already been set aside (33¹⁻²), and the claim of the surrounding heathen has to be dealt with in the same way. Edom is introduced here as their representative (vv. 10, 12). Its former enmity and malice are recalled (v. 5), and the arrogance and blasphemy of its pretensions to possess the land of Israel are specially denounced. Ezekiel foretells that God will repay the Edomites in their own coin, making their land desolate, and compelling them to recognise Him as the true God.

2. Mount Seir] Edom: see on 25¹²⁻¹⁴.

5. Time . . end] RV 'time of the iniquity of the end,' as in 21^{23, 29}. 9. Return] RV 'be inhabited.' 10. These two . . countries] the territories of Israel and Judah. The LORD was there] God might seem to abandon His Temple and forsake His people, but He never gave up His choice of them or His possession of their land. 14. When . . rejoiceth] rather, 'to the rejoicing of the whole earth.'

15. Idumea] RV 'Edom.'

(b) The Mountain Land of Israel re-peopled (36¹⁻¹⁵)

This prophecy is the counterpart of c. 40. The land, made desolate for the people's sin, as was foretold, and presumptuously claimed by Edom and the other surrounding nations, will again become fertile, fruitful, and populous. Israel will inhabit it once more, and will no longer suffer famine, or be oppressed by the heathen.

1. The mountains of Israel] the mountain land of Israel, as in 6^{1, 2}. 2. The ancient high places] the everlasting hills, with no reference to the idolatrous worship associated with them:

see Dt 33¹⁰. 5. [dumea] RV 'Edom.' This v. makes clear the connexion of c. 35 with the present passage. To cast it out] better, perhaps, 'to possess it.' 7. Have lifted up mine hand] have sworn.

8. They are at hand to come] The restoration of Israel is viewed as close at hand.

13. Bereaved thy nations] RV 'been a bereaver of thy nation.' The famines to which the land of Israel had been subject had given rise to the reproach that it bereaved and devoured its inhabitants (Nu 13³²). This would be the case no longer. 14. Nations] RV 'nation': so in v. 15. 15. Cause... to fall] rather, 'bereave,' as in v. 14.

(c) God's Reason for restoring Israel (36¹⁸⁻³⁵)

God had justly sent Israel into exile for their sins (vv. 17-19), but the heathen had misunderstood this event, taking it as a sign of God's inability to save His people (v. 20). In this way the exiles had occasioned the profanation of God's name, and to vindicate His own honour He was compelled to restore them (vv. 21-24). This high argument passes into a promise of the moral renewal, as well as of the outward blessings, which would accompany the restoration (vv. 25-30). Yet the fact is reiterated that all this will be done, not because Israel has deserved it, but because God's glory has required it. It must minister not to pride, but to humility (vv. 31, 32). When the sinful nation has been purified, and the desolate land repopled, the heathen will know that the whole is God's doing (vv. 33-36). The blessing, too, though undeserved, will be sent in response to Israel's prayers (vv. 37, 38).

20. Profaned] not now by actual wickedness, but indirectly, as the v. goes on to explain. When they said to them] RV 'in that men said of them.' 23. Sanctify] the exact opposite of 'profane.'

25-28. These vv. expand the promise in 11^{19, 20}. They include purification from guilt, inward renewal, the spirit of obedience, and the privileges of the people of God. In its essence this passage repeats Jeremiah's promise of the New Covenant (Jer 31³¹⁻³⁴). 26. Heart of flesh] see 2 Cor 3³ (RV). 31, 32. Cp. 16⁵¹ Jer 29¹¹⁻¹⁴. 36. Build... and plant] RV 'have builded... and planted.' 37. I will yet for this] RV 'for this moreover will I.'

38. Holy flock] RV 'flock for sacrifice,' the point of comparison being the great numbers: see 1 Ch 29²¹ 2 Ch 7⁵ 29²³ 35⁷⁻⁹.

Solemn] RV 'appointed.'

CHAPTER 37

THE REVIVAL AND REUNION OF ISRAEL

From the future of the land Ezekiel now turns to that of the nation, long ago divided by the revolt of the Ten Tribes, and now seemingly extinct. The exiles feel themselves to be but its scattered bones (v. 11). In a striking and beautiful vision, suggested no doubt by this current saying, Ezekiel predicts that the dead nation will come to life again (vv. 1-14), and by a symbolic action he represents the coming reunion of the rival kingdoms of Israel and Judah (vv. 15-28).

(a) The Revival (vv. 1-14)

Ezekiel is transported into a valley full of dry bones. As he prophesies to them they come together into complete skeletons, which become covered with sinews, flesh, and skin. Then the wind blows upon the inanimate bodies and they stand up alive. The prophecy does not refer to a literal resurrection of the Israelites actually dead, but to a revival of the dead nation, of which the exiles seemed to be the scattered remains.

1. Ezekiel saw this vision in a prophetic trance, under the influence of God's inspiration. At the same time its details were no doubt due to the peculiar working of his imaginative mind on the thought expressed by the exiles in v. 11. 7. A shaking] RV 'an earthquake.' 8, 9. Wind... breath] The same Hebrew word means wind, breath, or spirit. The wind of the vision represents the Spirit of God in the actual process of the nation's revival: see v. 14.

11. Cut off for our parts] RV 'clean cut off.'

12, 13. Graves] The figure here is somewhat changed. Still the reference is not to the graves of those actually dead, but to the heathen world as the grave of the dead nation of Israel, compared to which their own land was the land of the living. 14. My spirit] see on vv. 8, 9.

(b) The Reunion (vv. 15-28)

Ezekiel is directed to take two pieces of wood, one having 'Judah' and the other 'Joseph' inscribed upon it, and to join them together (vv. 15-17). The explanation of the symbol is that the two divisions of the nation, so long separated, will be reunited in their former land, governed by one king of the house of David, under the same covenant with God, and worshipping at the same sanctuary (vv. 18-28).

16. Judah] the southern kingdom of the Two Tribes. Joseph... Ephraim] the northern kingdom of the Ten Tribes; Ephraim, one of the two tribes descended from Joseph, being the principal one of the ten. Israel] used here and in v. 19, as generally by Ezekiel, in the sense, not of the northern kingdom, but of the whole nation.

19. Him] RV 'it.' Mine hand] probably rather, 'his' (Judah's) 'hand,' to correspond with 'the hand of Ephraim' already mentioned in the v. The united stick is placed in Judah's hand because the king is to belong to Judah's royal house. 23. Dwellingplaces] RM 'back-slidings.' So shall they be my people, etc.] another feature taken from Jeremiah's New Covenant (Jer 31³³): see also vv. 26, 27.

24, 25. My servant David] in the same sense as in 34^{23, 24}.

26. A covenant of peace] as in 34²⁵.

26, 27. Mysanctuary . . my tabernacle] Jeroboam had set up rival sanctuaries to Jerusalem at Dan and Bethel (1K 12²⁸⁻³²), but the reunited nation would have one centre of religious worship. God had forsaken the Temple at Jerusalem (11²³), but He would return, never to leave it again. The latter aspect of the promise is developed in chs. 40-48.

CHAPTERS 38. 39

GOD'S FINAL VICTORY OVER THE HEATHEN

Ezekiel's earlier group of prophecies against the nations (chs. 25-32) was concerned with Israel's nearer neighbours, which had interfered more or less in former times with her prosperity: and their humiliation was regarded as a necessary condition of Israel's peaceful and happy future. Ezekiel, however, contemplated a wider extension of God's glory than these prophecies involved. This is described under the form of an invasion of the restored Israel by hordes of the remotest heathen, who will be destroyed by God without any fighting on Israel's part. His glory will thus be manifested to the very ends of the earth. Ezekiel is alone among the Old Testament prophets in expecting another crisis to arise after the restoration has been accomplished. His conception is reproduced in the New Testament in the book of Revelation (20⁷⁻¹⁰), and the underlying idea in both cases is that what seems the triumph of God's kingdom may be followed by a fresh assault of the forces of evil, which, however, are destined to be overthrown at last. The picture of Gog may have been suggested partly by the memory of the great Scythian invasion (see Intro.), and partly by the ravages of Nebuchadrezzar's armies.

C. 38 describes Gog's allies (vv. 1-7), his nefarious plans (vv. 8-13), his great invasion (vv. 14-17), and God's turning of the forces of nature against him (vv. 18-23). C. 39 foretells that God will lead him on to destruction (vv. 1-7); his weapons will provide Israel with fuel for seven years (vv. 8-10); seven months will be required to bury the corpses of his host, which will fill a whole valley on the E. of the Dead Sea (vv. 11-13); when the seven months are over special officers will still be required to search out and bury the dead bodies that remain (vv. 14-16); birds and beasts of prey will enjoy an enormous banquet (vv. 17-20); all the earth will recognise the power and glory of the true God, the heathen will understand at last the real meaning of Israel's exile, and Israel will learn the lessons of all God's dealings with them in judgment and in mercy (vv. 21-29).

CHAPTER 38

2. Gog, the land of Magog] RV 'Gog, of the land of Magog.' The exact reference of the names is unknown. Magog is the land ruled over by Gog. The conjecture that 'Magog' (Mgg=Ggm=Bbl) is a cryptogram for 'Babel' (Babylon) has no probability. Gog in any case is the representative of remote heathenism, and is located in the far N. (38^{6, 13, 39-1}) while he has allies in the distant S. (38⁵).

Chief prince of Meshech, etc.] RV 'Prince of Rosh, Meshech,' etc., and so in v. 3, 39¹. The land meant by 'Rosh' is unknown, but there can be no allusion to Russia. On Meshech and Tubal see on 27¹⁸.

4. Turn thee back] RV 'turn thee about.' Perhaps we should read, 'lead thee,' and so in 39². God directs the movements even of the enemies of His kingdom. 5. Persia] a doubtful rendering. Ethiopia, and Libya] RV 'Cush and Put': see on 27^{10, 30⁵}. 6. Gomer (Gn 10²), a people in the N. of Asia Minor usually identified with the Cimmerians.

Togarmah] Armenia: see on 27¹¹. The north quarters] RV 'the uttermost parts of the north.' Bands] RV 'hordes,' and so throughout. People] RV 'peoples,' and so throughout, except in v. 12, and 39¹³. 7. Be thou a guard unto them] LXX reads, 'hold thyself in reserve for me.'

8. The latter years] The invasion of Gog is in the distant future. The land that . . . gathered, etc.] The sense requires 'the nation' to be supplied before 'that is gathered': see v. 12. 11. The peaceful state of the restored Israel is here described. 12. Midst of the land] RV 'middle of the earth,' the supposed geographical position of Palestine. 13. Sheba . . Dedan . . Tarshish] see on 25^{13, 27^{13, 29}}.

Young lions] does not give a clear sense. Other suggested readings are, 'Canaanites,' 'Cyprians,' or 'traffickers.' The nations mentioned were spectators of Gog's invasion, and inquired what commercial advantage they might reap from the disposal of the spoil.

15. North parts] RV 'uttermost parts of the north.' 17. Certain older prophecies were understood by Ezekiel to refer, though not by name, to the coming invasion of Gog. Perhaps he had in view Zeph 1¹⁴: 3⁸ Jer 3-6.

18. At the same time] RV 'in that day.'

In my face] RV 'into my nostrils.'

19. Shaking] or, 'earthquake.'

CHAPTER 39

2. Leave but the sixth part of thee] RV 'lead thee on.' 6. Isles] RM 'coast-lands.' God will not only destroy the army of Gog in Palestine, but will extend His judgments into the lands from which Gog and his allies have come. 8. It is come...it is done] RV 'it cometh...it shall be done.' 9. Set on fire] RV 'make fires of.' Burn them with fire] RV 'make fires of them': so in v. 10. 11. There of graves] RV 'for burial.'

Valley of the passengers] RV 'valley of them that pass through.' Others read, 'a valley of Abarim,' Abarim being the region E. of the Dead Sea. The sea] the Dead Sea.

Stop the noses, etc.] RV 'stop them that pass through.' The valley, formerly a road-way, will be blocked by corpses. Hamon-gog] means 'the multitude of Gog.' 14. With the passengers] should probably be omitted, and bury should perhaps be 'search out.' There were to be two classes of officials, the searchers and the buriers, and this v. deals with the former. The duties of both are described in v. 15. Earth] RV 'land.'

15. And the passengers, etc.] RV 'and they that pass through the land shall pass through.' When the searchers found any human remains they were to set up a mark to attract the attention of the buriers, who followed them. 16. And...Hamonah] RV 'and Hamonah shall also be the name of a city.' The reference seems to be to a city to be built near the valley of Hamon-gog, in commemoration of God's victory over Gog and his 'multitude.'

18. Bashan] a district E. of the Jordan, famous for its cattle: see Dt 32¹⁴ Ps 22¹².

24. Have I done] RV 'did I.' 26. After that they have borne] RV 'and they shall bear'; more probably, 'and they shall forget.'

Dwelt safely...made them afraid] RV 'shall dwell securely...shall make them afraid.'

28. Have left] RV 'I will leave.'

§ 2. THE ORDINANCES OF THE NEW ISRAEL (chs. 40-48)

This concluding section of the book is dated in the twenty-fifth year of Ezekiel's captivity, i.e. the fourteenth year after the fall of Jerusalem (572 B.C.). It is therefore thirteen years later than the previous section (chs. 33-39), and, with the exception of 29¹⁷⁻²¹, forms the latest part of the book. It is in the form of a vision, which is the counterpart of that in chs. 8-11. There God forsook the old Temple which had been polluted by idolatry. Here we have a description of the Temple of the restored kingdom, of God's return to it, and of the various religious arrangements and institutions of the future. The vision is marked by great minuteness of detail, and no doubt Ezekiel had brooded long and deeply over the particulars of the Temple and its ritual. Yet, as in former cases, there is no reason to doubt that this vision was an actual experience, in which the subjects of previous reflection stood out vividly before the prophet's mind. While the material details are so minute, some features of the vision are supernatural and miraculous. The whole forms an ideal picture, which was never actually to be realised, but which strikingly embodied the conception of the abiding presence of God with His people, and of their perfect fellowship with Him.

The Plans of Ezekiel's Temple, on p. 518, are by permission of the Cambridge University Press.

CHAPTERS 40-42

THE NEW TEMPLE

Ezekiel, transported in vision to Palestine, is set down on the N. side of the Temple mountain, and sees the Temple buildings extending to the S. like a city. A supernatural figure, like those in c. 9, appears, and measures the various parts of the Temple in Ezekiel's presence (40¹⁻⁴).

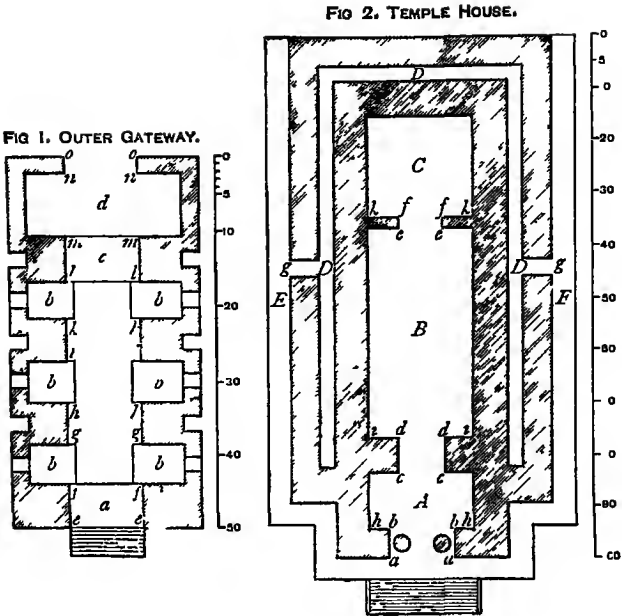

(a) The Outer Court and its Gateways
(40⁵⁻²⁷)

The Outer Eastern Gateway (vv. 5-16), Fig. 3, E. For the following details see Fig. 1. The outer boundary of the Temple was a wall 6 cubits thick and 6 cubits high (v. 5). Steps led up to the E. gateway, which had a threshold (a) 6 cubits broad (v. 6, ef), and 10 cubits wide (v. 11, ee, ff). Within the threshold were three guard-rooms (b) on either side (vv. 7, 10), each 6 cubits square, and separated by wall-spaces (posts) of 5 cubits (gh, ik). The inner threshold (c) had the same dimensions as the outer one (vv. 6, 7). Beyond it was a porch (d) 8 cubits wide (mn), the jambs (posts) of the doorway being 2 cubits broad (no, v. 9). The whole length of the gateway (eo) was 50 cubits (v. 15), and its breadth 25 cubits (v. 13). The guard-rooms and the porch were lit by windows, and there were also windows in the wall-spaces (posts) between the guard-rooms. Those spaces, too, were decorated with palm trees (v. 16).

5. Cubit] Various sizes of cubit, from 18 in. to nearly 24 in. were employed in ancient measurements. Ezekiel's cubit was one of the larger forms—an ordinary cubit and a handbreadth.

6. The other threshold] is that mentioned in v. 7 (e). 7. Within] RV 'toward the house,' or Temple proper. 8. Should be omitted. It contradicts v. 9, and is evidently a copyist's repetition. 9. Inward] RV 'toward the house.'

11. The length of the gate, thirteen cubits] an obscure statement, not reconcilable with the other measurements. If 'breadth' instead of 'length' were meant 13 + 6 + 6 would make 25, but this would allow no space for the outer walls of the guard-rooms. 12. The space] RV 'and a border,' probably a low parapet in front of each guard-room (f, h, k) taking a cubit on either side off the width of the passage.

14. He made . . . threescore cubits] read, with LXX, 'and he measured the porch (d) 20 cubits' (i.e. in length, the breadth being 8 cubits, v. 9). The latter half of the v. is obscure.

16. Arches] should be 'porch,' and so everywhere.

The Outer Court (40¹⁷⁻¹⁹) had a pavement (Fig. 3, B) 50 cubits wide, corresponding to the length of the gateways. On this pavement were 30 chambers (C), the exact arrangement of which is unknown. From the inner opening of the outer gateways to the inner gateways was 100 cubits. The whole outer court including the pavement was therefore 150 cubits wide. 18. Over against] RV 'answerable unto.'

The Outer Northern Gateway (vv. 20-23), Fig. 3, N. This was similar to the E. gateway. 'Porch' should be read for 'arches.' Seven steps led up to this gateway, and the breadth of the outer court was the same on the N. as on the E. side.

The Outer Southern Gateway (vv. 24-27), Fig. 3, S. This was similar to those already described. 'Porch' for 'arches' as before.

(b) The Inner Court and its Gateways (40²⁸⁻⁴⁷)

The Inner Southern Gateway (vv. 28-31), Fig. 3, *S*¹. This was reached from the outer court by 8 steps. It was exactly similar to the outer gateways, except that the porch (Fig. 1, d) was at the outer and not at the inner end. V. 30 should be omitted with LXX.

The Inner Eastern Gateway (vv. 32-34), Fig. 3, *E*¹, and the Inner Northern Gateway (vv. 35-37), Fig. 3, *N*¹, were similar to that on the S.

Arrangements for Preparing the Sacrifices (vv. 38-43). At one of the inner gateways (probably that on the N.) there were a chamber for washing the burnt offerings (v. 38) and a number of tables for slaying and preparing them (vv. 39-43). The exact position of the tables must remain uncertain.

38. The chambers and the entries] RV 'a chamber with the door.'

The Chambers for the Singers (vv. 44-47), Fig. 3, DD. These were two in number. One, by the N. gateway and looking toward the S., was for the priests. The other, by the S. gateway and looking toward the N., was for the Levites.

44. East] should obviously be S. : see RM. Without the inner gate] means not 'in the outer court,' but 'beyond the gateway, in the inner court.'

Dimensions of the Inner Court (v. 47). Excluding the space occupied by the gateways, this court formed a square (Fig. 3, iklm) of 100 cubits each way. The altar (F) was in the centre of the court.

(c) The Temple Proper (40⁴⁸⁻⁴¹ 20)

The main Temple building was on the W. side of the inner court. The details that follow are illustrated in Fig. 2.

The Porch (40^{48, 49}), Fig. 2, A. This was 20 cubits long (h, k) and 12 cubits broad. The posts or jambs (ab) of the doorway were 5 cubits across, and the side-walls (h, b, h, h) were of 3 cubits each. This left 14 cubits for the width of the entrance (aa, bb). Each jamb had a pillar beside it. The porch was approached by 10 steps.

48. Breadth of the gate] should be 'sides of the entrance,' as in 41².

49. Eleven] should be 'twelve,' as the LXX reads, and the other measurements require : see 41¹³. And he brought me . . . whereby] RM 'and by ten steps.'

CHAPTER 41

The Holy Place (41^{1, 2}), Fig. 2, B. This was the 'temple' strictly so called. The posts of its doorway were 6 cubits across (cd). The entrance was 10 cubits wide (cc, dd), and the side-walls (id, di) were of 5 cubits each. The apartment itself was 40 cubits long and 20 cubits broad.

1. Tabernacle] should probably be 'posts.'

The Holy of Holies (41^{3, 4}), Fig. 2, C. Ezekiel did not accompany the measurer into this sacred chamber. The posts of the entrance (ef) were two cubits across. The entrance itself was 6 cubits wide (ee, ff) and the side-walls (hf, fh) were of 7 cubits each. The chamber itself was a square of 20 cubits each way.

The Side Chambers (41⁵⁻⁷). The Temple had a double wall, the inner being 6 cubits thick (v. 5), and the outer 5 cubits thick (v. 9). Between these was a space of 4 cubits (D), which was occupied by 30 chambers arranged in three stories. The chambers in each story were wider than those below, as the supporting beams were not let into the Temple wall, but rested on ledges, which took away successively from the thickness of the wall (Fig. 4).

6. Three] RV 'in three stories.' They entered into] should probably be 'there were rebatements in,' as in 1 K 6⁶, which in any case gives the key to the meaning here.

7. And there was . . . chambers] RV 'and the side chambers were broader as they encompassed the house higher and higher.'

The Raised Platform and Surrounding Space (41⁸⁻¹¹). The Temple building and the side chambers stood on a basement which rose 6 cubits above the level of the inner court. This basement extended 5 cubits (the 'place that was left') beyond the outer wall on either side (Fig. 2, E), and from this space entry was gained to the side chambers on either side (Fig. 2, gg). Round the platform there was a clear space of 20 cubits (the 'separate place') on the N., W., and S. (Fig. 3, IIII).

8. The height of the house] RV 'that the house had a raised basement.'

The Western Building (41¹²), Fig. 3, K. This was on the W. of the Temple beyond the 'separate place' (H), and had walls 5 cubits thick. Its internal measurement was 90 cubits by 70, and its external one 100 cubits by 80.

General Measurements (41^{13-15a}). The Temple was 100 cubits long, and the western space H (20 cubits) with the building K (70 cubits) and its walls (10 cubits) made up another 100 cubits (v. 13) from E. to W. The front of the Temple with the E. ends of the separate places III on either side of it made up 100 cubits (Im) from S. to N. (v. 14). The building K with its 'galleries' (walls) was also 100 cubits (pg. rs) from S. to N. (v. 15).

The Interior Decorations of the Temple (41^{15b-20}). V. 15 should end with 'cubits.' The vv. that follow are somewhat obscure. The windows that lit the interior of the Temple must have been above the third storey of the side chambers. What follows is all that can be clearly made out. The whole interior from the floor to the windows was panelled with wood and ornamented with cherubim and palm trees, placed alternately. Each cherub had two faces, a lion's and a man's. The porch seems to have been decorated with palm trees only (v. 26). Both the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies had two doors, each consisting of two leaves. These had cherubim and palm trees like those on the walls. Before the Holy of Holies (in the Holy Place) there was a wooden altar-shaped table 3 cubits high and 2 cubits long.

15^b, 16. should perhaps read, 'and the Temple, and the inner house, and its outer porch were covered with a roof work, and they three had their closed windows and their galleries round about.' The 'galleries' may have been borders or dados. 21. An obscure verse.

22. The second length should be 'base.'

25. Thick planks stands for a word of unknown meaning.

(d) The Priests' Chambers (42¹⁻¹¹)

This is the most obscure part of Ezekiel's description. The following are the clearest points. On the N. side of the Temple, and separated from it by the space II (Fig. 3) was a group of buildings (omw) 100 cubits long and 50 cubits broad (v. 2). It consisted of a block (G), next the Temple, 100 cubits long, and another (G'), next the outer court, 50 cubits long (v. 8). The remaining 50 cubits next the outer court was occupied by a wall (ew, v. 7), and between the blocks was a walk (O) 10 cubits wide and 100 cubits long (v. 4). This left 20 cubits as the width of each block. The chambers in these buildings were in three storeys, and were over against the space II on the one hand, and the pavement (B) of the outer court on the other (v. 3). The upper storeys were narrower than the lower, their breadth being diminished by galleries (vv. 3, 5) which faced each other across the walk O (Fig. 5). The doors of G were towards the N., opening on the walk O (vv. 2, 4). The entry (P) from the outer court was at the E. end of the whole group (v. 9). There was an exactly similar group of buildings on the S. of the Temple (vv. 10-12). All these chambers were to be used by the priests for eating the sacrificial flesh and for changing their garments (vv. 13, 14).

4. One cubit] RM 'a hundred cubits.'

5. Were higher than] RV 'took away from.' Than the lower] RV 'more than from.'

10. East should obviously be S.

FIG. 5.

(e) Dimensions of the Temple Area (42¹⁵⁻¹⁶)

The whole formed a square of 500 cubits each way. This follows from the measurements already given. 'Reeds' is a mistake for 'cubits,' arising from the fact that the reed was used in the measurement.

CHAPTERS 43, 44¹⁻³

THE RESTORATION OF THE TEMPLE WORSHIP
This c. describes God's return to the Temple

(43¹⁻¹²), and His directions as to the construction (43¹³⁻¹⁷), and dedication (43¹⁸⁻²⁶) of the altar of burnt offering. When these directions were carried out God's sacrificial intercourse with Israel would be resumed (43²⁷). The outer eastern gateway, by which God's glory returned, was to be permanently shut (44¹⁻³).

(a) God's Return to the Temple (43¹⁻¹²)

Ezekiel, standing at the outer E. gate, saw the appearance of God's glory in the same form in which he had beheld it in previous visions. It came from the E., and entered the Temple by the gate on that side, the same by which it had formerly departed (10¹⁹ 11^{22, 23}). Ezekiel was then brought to the inner court, where he saw the glory filling the Temple as in 10⁴. A voice from within the Temple announced that God would now dwell for ever in the midst of His people, and that His sanctuary would no longer be defiled as of old by the people's wickedness, or by the nearness of the royal palace and sepulchres. Ezekiel was further directed to make known the plan and ordinances of the new Temple to the people.

6. The man] RV 'a man,' the divine voice personified. 7. Whoredom] a figure for idolatry: see 6⁹ 16, 23. High places] RM 'death.'

Carcases, etc.] The royal sepulchres were in the vicinity of Solomon's Temple.

8. Solomon's palace and Temple were close together, and formed practically a single group of buildings. In Ezekiel's vision of the future the city stood far away from the Temple: see 48¹⁵⁻¹⁷.

(b) Measurements of the Altar of Burnt Offering (43¹³⁻¹⁵)

The altar (Fig. 3, P) was to have a base (abst, Fig. 6) a cubit high (ab, ts) and a cubit broad (bc, rs). This base was to have a border a span in height (b, s). Above this was to be

FIG. 6.

PLAN OF THE ALTAR OF BURNT OFFERING

the lower settle (cdpr), 2 cubits high (cd, rp) and a cubit broad (de, op). Next was to come the greater settle (efno), 4 cubits high (ef, on) and a cubit broad (fg, mn). Highest of all was to be the upper altar (ghlm), 4 cubits high, and having a square top 12 cubits each way (hl). There were to be horns (hi, li) at the four corners. The upper settle would form a square 14 cubits each way (fn). The whole height of the altar, excluding the horns, would be 11 cubits (nearly 20 ft.), and the top of the altar was to be reached by stairs on the E. side.

13. Higher place] RV 'base.' 15. So the altar] RV 'and the upper altar.' From the altar] RV 'from the altar hearth': so in v. 16.

16. Squares] RV 'sides': so in v. 17.

17. The border about it] is probably not a border about the settle, but a border about the base described in v. 13. The three last clauses of v. 17 refer to the altar as a whole.

(c) The Consecration of the Altar (43¹⁸⁻²⁷)

Seven days would be required for this. Each day a he-goat was to be sacrificed as a sin-offering, and a ram and a young bullock were to be sacrificed as burnt offerings. On the first day a young bullock was to take the place of the he-goat. These vv. may be compared with Ex 29^{36, 37} Lv 8¹¹ 15²⁸. 20. Purge] RV 'make atonement for': so in v. 26.

22. Kid of the goats] RV 'he-goat.'

26. Themselves] RV 'it.'

(d) The Closing of the Outer Eastern Gate (44¹⁻³)

This gateway, by which God's glory had returned to the Temple, was to be permanently shut thereafter. The prince, however, might use it for sacrificial meals, entering it by the porch (Fig. 1, d) from the outer court; and leaving it by the same way.

CHAPTER 44+31

THE PRIESTS AND THE LEVITES

Standing at the inner northern gate Ezekiel again saw the glory of God filling the Temple and was again addressed by the divine voice (vv. 4, 5). The Speaker first rebuked the custom which had prevailed in the old Temple, of having foreigners as servants in the sanctuary (vv. 6-8). He directed that in future their place should be taken by the Levites who were not of the family of Zadok. These had formerly shared the priestly office, but for their encouragement of Israel's idolatry they were to be deprived of this privilege, and to have humbler services assigned to them (vv. 9-14). The Levites of the family of Zadok alone were to exercise the priesthood in future (vv. 15, 16). No mention is made of the high priest. Various regulations follow as to the priests' clothing, marriage, public duties, defilement and purification, and sacrificial perquisites (vv. 17-31). This passage has an important bearing on the date of certain parts of the Pentateuch (see Intro.).

7. Strangers] In 2 K 11 we have an instance of foreign mercenaries ('Carites,' v. 4, RV) being employed as guards in the Temple. The Nethinim (Ezr 8²⁰) were apparently captives employed as Temple slaves: see Zech 14²¹.

They] RM 'ye.' Because of] RV 'to add unto.' 10. Are gone away] RV 'went.' The reference is to the worship at the high places, abolished by Josiah (2 K 23^{8, 9}). 15. Zadok] made priest by Solomon when Abiathar was deposed (1 K 2^{26, 27, 35}). 17, 18. Cp. Ex 28³⁰⁻³² 39²⁷⁻²⁹ Lv 16⁴. 19. The holy chambers] those described in c. 42: see 42^{13, 14}.

20. Cp. Lv 21³. 21. Cp. Lv 10⁹. 22. Cp. Lv 21¹⁴. 23. Cp. Lv 10¹⁰. 24. Cp. Dt 17⁸⁻¹² 19¹⁷ 21⁵, where the priests are associated with secular judges. 25. Cp. Lv 21¹³. 26. Cp. Nu 19¹¹. 28. Cp. Nu 18²⁰. 29. Meat offering] cp. Lv 23⁷⁻¹¹. Sin...and...trespass offering] cp. Lv 6¹⁸ 7^{6, 7} Nu 18^{9, 10}. Dedicated] RV 'devoted': cp. Lv 27²⁸ Nu 18¹⁴. 30. The firstfruits] Cp. Ex 23¹⁹ 34²⁶ Nu 18¹³ Dt 18⁴.

Oblation] RM 'heave offering': cp. Nu 15¹⁰⁻²¹ 18¹⁹. 31. Cp. Ex 22³¹ Lv 22⁵.

CHAPTER 45¹⁻⁸

THE LANDS FOR THE PRIESTS, LEVITES, PRINCE, AND CITY

The division of the whole country is described in ch. 48, which includes the substance of the present passage, and shows the position of these lands in relation to those of the tribes. The holy portion (Fig. 7, abgh) was to be 25,000 cubits long (abgh) and 20,000 cubits broad (ag, bh). The sanctuary (s) was to occupy a square of 500 cubits each way, with a border on every side of 50 cubits more. The holy portion was to be subdivided into a portion (efgh) 25,000 by 10,000 cubits, containing the sanctuary, and allotted to the priests; and a portion (abef) of the same size, allotted to the Levites. Alongside the priests' portion was to be a strip (ghcd) 25,000 by 5,000 cubits, for the city and the people. These three portions would form a square of 25,000 cubits each way, and E. and W. of this the possessions of the prince (P, P) were to extend to the boundaries of the land.

Fig. 7.

1. Ten thousand] RM 'twenty thousand.'

Reeds] should be 'cubits.' 3. And the most holy place] RV 'which is most holy.'

5. The five and twenty... the ten] omit the with RV. For twenty chambers] read with LXX, 'for cities to dwell in.' 6. For details of this portion see 48¹⁸⁻¹⁹. 7. The length... portions] RV 'in length answerable unto one of the portions,' i.e. the tribal portions on the N. and S. See Fig. 8 and 48²².

CHAPTER 45⁹⁻¹⁷

THE PRINCE'S DUES AND OBLIGATIONS

The oppressive exactions of the former rulers were to be unknown in the restored Israel. Weights and measures were to be just and correct. The prince was to receive from the people a sixtieth of their wheat and barley, a hundredth part of their oil, and one in two hundred of their flocks. Out of these supplies the prince was to provide all the regular sacrifices for the Temple.

10. The ephah (dry measure) and the bath (liquid measure) were each the tenth of an homer. 12. Twenty shekels...maneh] read with LXX, 'five (shekels) shall be five, and ten shekels ten, and fifty shekels shall be your maneh.' A shekel was 20 gerahs, and a maneh 50 shekels or 1,000 gerahs. 13. 1 in 60: see v. 10. 14. Cor] equivalent to 'homer.' The proportion is 1 in 100.

CHAPTERS 45^{18-46²¹}

THE OFFERINGS AT THE SACRED SEASONS, etc.

(This whole passage should be compared with Nu 28, 29.)

(a) The Atonement for the Sanctuary (45¹⁸⁻²⁰)

This was to take place twice yearly, on the first days of the first and seventh months. These two days in Ezekiel serve the same purpose as the great Day of Atonement on the tenth day of the seventh month (Lv 16 Nu 29⁷⁻¹¹).

20. The seventh day of the month] LXX 'in the seventh month, on the first day of the month.' Reconcile] RV 'make atonement for.'

(b) The Passover (45²¹⁻²⁴)

With these regulations cp. Ex 12¹⁻¹⁰ Lv 23⁵⁻⁸ Nu 9²⁻³ Dt 16¹⁻⁸.

23. Kid of the goats] RV 'he-goat.'

(c) The Feast of Tabernacles (45²⁵)

This was to hold the same place in the seventh month as the Passover in the first month: cp. Lv 23³⁴⁻³⁶ Nu 29¹²⁻³⁸ Dt 16¹³⁻¹⁵. Ezekiel makes no mention of the Feast of Weeks (Pentecost).

(d) The Sabbaths and New Moons (46¹⁻⁸)

On these occasions the E. gateway of the inner court, which was shut at other times, was opened all day. The prince was allowed to enter the gateway by the porch, which was next the outer court (40³¹), to prepare his offerings, and to worship at the (inner) threshold of the gateway, but not to enter the inner court. The people worshipped in the outer court, at the entrance of the same gateway: cp. with these vv. Nu 28⁹⁻¹⁵.

5, 7. Meat offering] RV 'meal offering.'

7. His hand . . unto] RV 'he is able.'

(e) Various Regulations for Worship
(46⁹⁻¹²)

No one was to leave the outer court by the gate by which he came in. If he entered by the N. gate he must go out by the S. and vice versa (v. 9). The prince and the people were to enter and leave together (v. 10). The meat offering on all sacred occasions was to be the same as that on the new moon (v. 11: cp. v. 7). When the prince wished to make a free-will offering the inner E. gate was to be opened for him as on the sabbaths and new moons (v. 12).

8. The prince in the midst of them . . shall go in] RV 'the prince . . shall go in in the midst of them.'

12. Voluntary] RV 'freewill offering, a.'

Voluntarily] RV 'as a freewill offering.'

(f) The Daily Burnt Offering (46¹³⁻¹⁵)

Cp. with this Ex 29³⁸⁻⁴⁰ Nu 28³⁻⁵. The proportions of Ezekiel's meal offering differ from those in Ex and Nu, and he says nothing about a drink offering or an evening sacrifice.

14. Temper with] RV 'moisten.' Meat offering] RV 'meal offering': so in v. 15.

(g) Gifts of Land by the Prince (46¹⁶⁻¹⁵)

Such gifts could only be made from the Prince's own possessions (Fig. 7, P.P.). If they were given to his sons they were made in perpetuity, but if to his servants, they returned to him in the year of jubilee: see Lv 25¹⁰⁻²⁷.

(h) The Kitchens of the Priests and the People (46¹⁹⁻²⁴)

On the W. of the holy chambers N. of the Temple (Fig. 3, G.G¹) Ezekiel was shown a place (L) where the priests cooked the parts of the sacrifice which they ate in the chambers (42¹³). We may assume that there was a similar place (L) adjoining the holy chambers (G.G¹) on the S. of the Temple (vv. 19, 20). In every corner of the outer court there was a building (L) 40 cubits by 30, where the Temple servants (the Levites) cooked the sacrifices to be eaten by the people (vv. 21-24).

22. Joined of] RV 'inclosed.' 23. Places of them that boil] RV 'boiling houses.'

CHAPTER 47¹⁻¹²

THE LIFE-GIVING STREAM

Ezekiel was now brought in his vision to the door of the Temple proper. Here he saw a stream of water which came from beneath the threshold somewhat to the S. of the entrance, and ran eastwards, crossing the inner court on the S. of the altar, and leaving the outer court on the S. of the outer E. gate. It rapidly deepened till it became an unfordable river, with trees on both its banks. It traversed the barren region between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea, and entering the latter removed its bitterness, so that its waters, hitherto lifeless, were filled with fish. Only the salt marshes bordering the Dead Sea were unaffected by the river, as they were necessary for the supply of salt to the country. The trees on the banks of the river were evergreen and bore fruit every month. Their fruit was nourishing and their leaves medicinal. This picture probably had its origin in the fact that a small stream of water actually arose in the Temple hill, but everything in the account of Ezekiel's river points to the greatest possible change in the physical conditions of the coming age, a change that would involve the miraculous, as no natural stream could increase in volume without tributaries. To Ezekiel this river was not a mere symbol of spiritual refreshment. The perfect kingdom of God still presented itself to him in an earthly form, accompanied by outward fertility and other material blessings. This passage is the basis of Rev 22^{1,2}. For a similar, yet different, picture of physical change in the future age see Zech 14⁸.

1. Right side] i.e. S.: so in v. 2. 2. Ezekiel was led from the inner court through the inner and outer N. gates, round to the outside of the outer E. gate. This was necessary, as both the inner and outer E. gates were shut. 8. East country] the wilderness of Judaea, between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea. Desert] RV 'Arabah,' the great depression of the Jordan valley and Dead Sea. 9. Rivers] should be 'river,' as in LXX. 10. En-gedi . . En-eglaim] places on the shore of the Dead Sea. The situation of the latter is unknown. The great sea] the Mediterranean. 12. Be consumed] RV 'fail.' According to his months] RV 'every month.' Medicine] RV 'healing.'

CHAPTER 47¹³⁻²³

THE BOUNDARIES OF THE LAND

This passage may be compared with Nu 34¹⁻¹². The N. border started from a point on the Mediterranean, and ran eastward by Hamath and other places to Hazar-enon, between Damascus and the Hauran. The E. border ran southward from here, between Gilead and the land of Israel, and followed the Jordan, ending at Tamar, S. of the Dead Sea. From Tamar the S. border ran by Meriboth-kadesh to the brook of Egypt at the SE. corner of the Mediterranean. The W. border is formed by the Mediterranean (vv. 13-21). Strangers born in the land were to share it with the Israelites (vv. 22, 23).

14. Lifted up mine hand] swear.

15, 16. Hethlon . . Zedad . . Berothah, Sibrain] are unknown localities. As men go to Zedad; Hamath] RV 'unto the entering in of Zedad, Hamath.' Hamath and Zedad have probably changed places. 'The entering in of Hamath' was a well-known pass between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon.

17. Hazar-enan, the border, etc.] RV 'Hazarenan at the border.' Hazar-enan and Hazar-hatticon (v. 16) are probably the same.

18. Ye shall measure] should possibly be 'from Hazar-enon' (see v. 19). From Hauran, and from Damascus] must mean 'between Hauran and Damascus,' where Hazar-enon lay (vv. 16, 17). Hauran is a district E. of the Jordan and S. of Damascus. From Gilead, and from the land of Israel] means, 'between Gilead' (E. of the Jordan) 'and the land of Israel' (W. of it). The east sea] the Dead Sea. 19. Tamar] unknown, but probably near the S. end of the Dead Sea.

Strife in Kadesh] RV 'Mcriboth-kadesh,' Kadesh-barnea, in the wilderness on the S. of Palestine (Nu 20¹³). The river] RV 'the brook of Egypt,' the Rhinocolura or Wady-el-Arish, which enters the Mediterranean at its SE.
corner.

CHAPTER 48

THE DIVISION OF THE LAND AND THE PLAN OF THE CITY

(a) The Tribes (vv. 1-7. 23-29)

These were twelve in number, as the two tribes descended from Joseph (47¹³) made up for the exclusion of Levi. From the N. border (v. 1) to the S. border (v. 28) the country was divided into 13 parallel zones, running across it from the E. to the W. boundary.
Starting from the N., seven of these were assigned in order to the tribes of Dan, Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben, and Judah. Passing over the eighth portion, the remaining five were allotted to the tribes of Benjamin, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, and Gad respectively (see Fig. 8).

1. To the coast of] RV 'beside.' As one goeth to] RV 'to the entering in of.' For these are his sides] RV 'and they shall have their sides.' 28. See on 47¹⁹.

(b) The Sacred Territory (vv. 8-22)

This has already been partly described in 45¹⁻⁸. It formed a zone extending from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, between the portion of Judah on the N. and that of Benjamin on the S. (see Fig. 8). Its breadth was 25,000 cubits from N. to S. (v. 8). The central portion formed a square of 25,000 cubits each way, and included the domains of the Levites, priests, and city, as described in 45⁸⁻¹⁶ (see Fig. 7). The strip of 25,000 cubits by 5,000

(Fig. 7, ghcd), assigned to the city, consisted of a central square 5,000 cubits each way (il lm), which contained the city proper, a square of 4,500 cubits each way (v. 16), surrounded on all sides by a border (suburbs) 250 cubits across (v. 17). E. and W. of this square were two rectangles (gic l, khm d), each 10,000 cubits by 5,000, to be cultivated by the citizens for food (vv. 18, 19). On the E. and W. of the great square formed by the lands of the Levites, priests, and city, lay the possessions of the prince (Fig. 7, PP), extending to the Mediterranean on the W. and the Jordan on the E., as described in 45⁷ (vv. 21, 22).

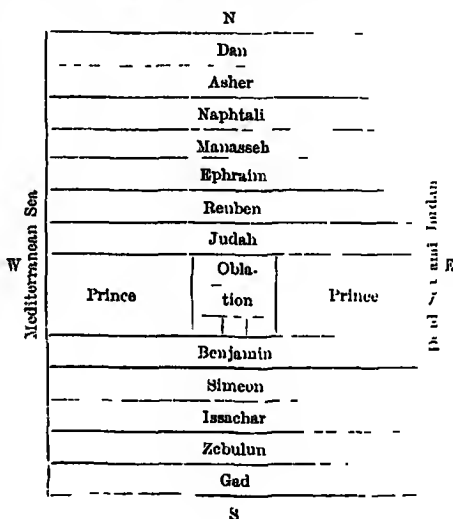

FIG. 8.

8. Offering] RV 'oblation.' See vv. 9, 10, 20, 21. Reeds] should be 'cubits,' and so throughout. 9. Ten thousand] RM 'twenty thousand,' as in 45¹. 13. Over against] RV
'answerable unto': so in vv. 18, 21. 15. A profane place] RV 'for common use.'

18. Serve] RV 'labour in': so in v. 19.

19. Shall serve it] RV 'shall till it.'

21. The portions] The territories of Judah and Benjamin.

(c) The Gates of the City (vv. 30-35)

The city, excluding the suburbs, was a square of 4,500 cubits each way, or 18,000 cubits in circuit. It had twelve gates, three on each side, and called after the twelve tribes.
Joseph being here one tribe. The name of the city, Jehovah-Shammah, expressed the abiding presence of God with His people. This passage is the basis of Rev 22^{12, 13, 16}.

30. Measures] means 'cubits': so in v. 33.
35. In vv. 32, 34 for reeds (RV) read 'cubits.'

DANIEL

INTRODUCTION

THE book of Daniel occupies a place by itself in the OT., owing to the exceptional features which it presents and the peculiar difficulties with which it confronts the reader. It has been the subject of much discussion and controversy, especially in recent times, and most Christian scholars now hold views both of its interpretation and of its literary character, authorship, and date, different from those which were formerly accepted in the church. Before entering on the special questions at issue regarding it, it will be of advantage to take a general survey of its contents.

1. Contents. The book professes to be a history of Daniel, a Jewish exile who was carried away to Babylon before the fall of his native kingdom, lived at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, and survived till the days of Cyrus, the Persian conqueror of Babylon. It falls naturally into two parts: (a) chs. 1-6, containing narratives about Daniel and his companions, written in the third person, and (b) chs. 7-12, containing the visions of Daniel regarding the future, and written in the first person. One of the narratives—that of Nebuchadnezzar's Dream-Image in c. 2—is akin in subject to the latter section. From 24 to the close of c. 7 the book is written in Aramaic (known also as Chaldee, or Syriac, a kindred language to Hebrew), the rest of the book being in Hebrew. The division of language is not clearly connected with any division of subject, and has not yet been satisfactorily explained. The following table shows the contents of the book in outline:

Narratives.

C. 1. The training of Daniel and his companions.

C. 2. The Dream-Image (predictive).

C. 3. The Fiery Furnace.

C. 4. The Madness of Nebuchadnezzar

C. 5. Belshazzar's Feast.

C. 6. The Den of Lions.

Visions.

C. 7. The Four Beasts.

C. 8. The Ram and the He-Goat.

C. 9. The Seventy Weeks.

C. 10-12. The Kings of the N. and S.

2. Historical Survey. While various points in the predictive portions of the book have received different interpretations, there are undoubted allusions to the course of events for several centuries following Daniel's time, and a brief outline of the period is therefore necessary at this stage.

The Babylonian Empire was founded by the father of Nebuchadnezzar, and became supreme in western Asia after Nebuchadnezzar's victory over the king of Egypt at Carchemish in 605 B.C. (Jer 46²). It was under Nebuchadnezzar that the fall of the Jewish kingdom and the final captivity of the Jewish nation took place in 586 B.C. The Babylonian empire lasted through the reigns of several kings who succeeded Nebuchadnezzar, and came to an end in 539 B.C., when Babylon was conquered by Cyrus, king of Persia, who in his first year issued an edict permitting the captive Jews to return to Palestine to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem (Ezr 1¹⁻⁴).

The Persian (or Medo-Persian) Empire lasted from 539 to 333 B.C., when its last king was conquered by Alexander the Great. Its first, fourth, fifth, and sixth kings, Cyrus, Darius Hystaspes, Xerxes (Ahasuerus), and Artaxerxes are mentioned in the OT. It was Xerxes who conducted the great invasion of Greece which was so gloriously repelled, and which has made the names of Thermopylae and Salamis (480 B.C.) immortal in history.

The Greek Empire, founded by Alexander the Great, was of short duration in its undivided state. Alexander died in 322 B.C., and his dominions were broken up. After several years of conflict they were finally divided among four of his generals. Our attention in the book of Daniel is confined to two of these and their successors. Seleucus obtained the Babylonian and Syrian portions of Alexander's empire, and fixed his capital at Antioch. His descendants are known as the Seleucids, or Greek kings of Syria. Ptolemy Lagi got possession of Egypt, and assumed the surname of Soter. He was followed by a line of Lagids or Ptolemies, the Greek kings of Egypt. These two kingdoms of Syria and Egypt had a long history of rivalry, varied by fruitless attempts to establish alliance through royal marriages. Palestine formed a debateable ground between them, and many struggles took place for its possession. Speaking generally, it was at first under the power of Egypt, and afterwards passed into the hands of Syria. The eighth Syrian king, Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.), is especially important in relation to the book of Daniel. He engaged in several wars with Egypt, and persecuted the Jews with great severity on account of their resistance to his attempts to introduce heathen religious observances among them. His profanations and oppressions led to the heroic and successful struggles of Judas Maccabæus and his brothers, which are recorded in the books of Maccabees in the Apocrypha.

3. The Visions of Daniel. The interpretation of the predictive portion of the book is quite distinct from the question of date and authorship, and may be treated separately. There are five outlines of the future which call for consideration—those in chs. 2, 7, 8, 9, and 10-12 respectively. Of these the third and the last are clearly explained in the book itself to refer to the events of which an outline has been given in the last paragraph. The vision of the Ram and the He-Goat (c. 8) describes the Medo-Persian empire (the two-horned Ram), its conquest by Alexander the Great (the He-Goat), the four successors of Alexander (the four horns of the Goat), and the career of Antiochus Epiphanes (who is universally recognised under the figure of the Little Horn). The concluding vision, of which c. 11 is the most important part, similarly describes the first kings of Persia, and alludes to the war of Xerxes against Greece. Then come Alexander's conquest of Persia, and the breaking up of his kingdom into four. The greater part of the vision is occupied with a minute account of the political relations between successive kings of Syria and Egypt, and at the end special prominence is given to the doings of a 'vile person,' in whom again all interpreters recognise Antiochus Epiphanes. With regard to the remaining predictions, the four parts of Nebuchadnezzar's Dream-Image (c. 2), and the Four Beasts of c. 7, have always been rightly regarded as parallel, and the interpretation of the one series therefore decides that of the other. In both of these visions four successive kingdoms are spoken of, which the older expositors identified as the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Greek, and Roman. The chief ground for understanding the fourth kingdom to be the Roman is the statement in 2²⁴, 'In the days of those kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed,' the supposed reference being to the Advent of Christ under the Romans. On this view the Ten Horns of the Fourth Beast in c. 7 have to be connected in some way with the Roman empire, while the Little Horn of the same chapter is identified with the Antichrist foretold in the NT. The Seventy Weeks of c. 9, too, have been supposed to reach down to Christian times, and to include the Crucifixion of Christ, and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in 70 A.D. This interpretation is mainly based on the references to 'Messiah the Prince' (9^{23, 26}), and on our Lord's quotation of the phrase 'the abomination of desolation' (9²⁷) in His discourse on the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world (Mt 24¹⁵ Mk 13¹¹). The more modern view of these visions, however, is that the fourth kingdom of chs. 2 and 7 is not the Roman but the Greek empire, that the Ten Horns of c. 7 are to be found among the successors of Alexander the Great, and that the Little Horn is Antiochus Epiphanes. The Seventy Weeks, too, are regarded as terminating with this king, the last 'week' covering the last seven years of his reign (171-164 B.C.).

The reasons in favour of the latter view may be briefly indicated. They arise mainly from a comparison of the different predictive outlines in the book. The more closely these outlines are studied side by side the more clearly does it appear that they are all parallel to one another, and have all the same termination in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes. Starting for example with c. 8, where the Little Horn (vv. 9-12, 23-25) is undoubtedly Antiochus Epiphanes, we may compare it with c. 7, where another Little Horn and its end are described in very similar terms (vv. 8, 24-26). Further, the period of 1,150 days (2,300 evenings and mornings) in 8¹⁴ is approximately the same as the 'time, times, and dividing of time' (3½ years) in 7²⁵. Or we may compare c. 8 with c. 9. In 8^{14, 12} the abolition of the daily sacrifice by Antiochus Epiphanes is described, and the 1,150 days already referred to represent the period during which the Temple was polluted in his reign. Now in 9²⁷ we read of the cessation of the daily sacrifice for a similar time—the half (3½ years) of the seventieth 'week.' Or again we may start from the undisputed ground of the last vision. Here the abolition of the daily sacrifice and the setting up of the 'abomination of desolation' are ascribed to Antiochus Epiphanes (11³¹), while the same events are in 9²⁷ placed together at the end of the Seventy Weeks. C. 12 is the conclusion of the vision of which c. 11 forms the principal part, and further defines the 'time of the end' to which the outline in the latter chapter reaches. Here again we have the taking away of the daily sacrifice and the setting up of the 'abomination of desolation' (12¹¹). The duration of the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes is described as 'a time, times, and a half' (12⁷), while two other turning points in the history are indicated as happening a little later, at the end of 1,200 and 1,335 days respectively. The phrase the 'time of the end' (8^{17, 19} 11⁴⁰ 12^{4, 9}) defined as the termination of the visions in these chapters, is also the limiting horizon of Daniel's whole outlook upon the ordinary history of the future: see 7²⁶ 9²⁶. These parallelisms are more clearly explained in the subjoined table.

c. 7	c. 8	c. 9	c. 11	c. 12
A little horn (7 ^{8, 24-26})	The little horn. Antiochus Epiphanes (8 ^{9-12, 21-25})
	Daily sacrifice taken away by Antiochus (8 ^{11, 12})	Daily sacrifice taken away (9 ²⁷)	Daily sacrifice abolished by Antiochus (11 ³¹)	From abolition of daily sacrifice (12 ¹¹) and
	'Transgression of desolation' (8 ¹³)	'Abomination of desolation' set up (9 ²⁷) for	'Abomination of desolation' set up by Antiochus (11 ³¹)	Setting up of 'abomination of desolation' (12 ¹¹)
Power of the little horn lasts till 'a time, times, and the dividing of time' (7 ²⁵)	Temple cleansed after 1,150 days (8 ¹⁴)	Half a 'week' (3½ years) (9 ²⁷)	'A time, times, and a half' (12 ⁷)
'the end' (7 ²⁶)	The 'time of the end' (8 ^{17, 19})	'the end' (9 ²⁶)	The 'time of the end' (11 ⁴⁰)	1,290 days 1,335 days to the 'time of the end' (12 ^{4, 9})

It thus appears probable that Antiochus Epiphanes is the Little Horn, not only of c. 8, but also of c. 7; that the fourth kingdom in chs. 2 and 7 is consequently not the Roman but the Greek empire; that the last of the Seventy Weeks falls within the days of Antiochus; that all the references to the taking away of the daily sacrifice and the setting up of the 'abomination of desolation' are connected with his profanations of the Temple; and that the various expressions denoting exactly or approximately 3½ years refer to a part of his reign.

The reasons adduced in support of the older interpretation are easily met. The statement in 2⁴⁴ about the establishment of the kingdom of God 'in the days of those kings' (the Greek kings of Egypt and Syria) is to be explained by the absence of perspective which is characteristic of OT. prophecy, and which is illustrated elsewhere in Daniel. Thus in 12³ the resurrection of the dead seems to be placed immediately after the destruction of Antiochus Epiphanes and the deliverance of the Jews, and here even such a strenuous defender of the older interpretation as Dr. Pusey sees only an instance of 'that same foreshortening which we find throughout Holy Scripture, and in our Lord's own prediction. First of the destruction of Jerusalem, and then of His second coming to judge the world.' This 'foreshortening' is equally applicable to 2⁴⁴. As for the vision of the Seventy Weeks (c. 9), while the phrases 'Messiah the Prince' and 'Messiah' in the AV naturally suggest a direct reference to Christ, the true rendering in each case is much less definite, and can be most consistently explained from the historical events of earlier times (see RV and notes). Our Lord's reference to the 'abomination of desolation' is an instance of the frequent NT.

usage by which OT. words and phrases are quoted with an application different from that which they originally bore. That the 'abomination of desolation' was primarily connected with Antiochus Epiphanes is proved by 11³¹ and by 1 Mac 1⁵⁴, where this very phrase is used of the heathen altar set up by Antiochus at Jerusalem.

Assuming the fourth kingdom to be the Greek empire there is more than one way of identifying the other three: see notes on chs. 2, 7, and table on p. 539. If the Seventy Weeks end with the reign of Antiochus there are various schemes for reckoning the earlier 'weeks,' none of which is quite free from difficulty (see notes). But the difficulties of the older view in calculating the Seventy Weeks and in identifying the Ten Horns of the Fourth Beast, are much greater, and have given rise to the most varied, arbitrary and conjectural explanations. The newer interpretation of the visions is the result of reading the book of Daniel by its own light, and is supported by scholars like the late Bishop Westcott, who have not committed themselves to modern views of its authorship and date.

4. Literary Character, Date, and Authorship of Daniel. It has generally been supposed, and is still maintained by some, that the book of Daniel is the work either of Daniel himself, or of a contemporary who composed the narratives and joined to them Daniel's own account of his visions. On this view the narratives are literal history, and the predictive chapters describe revelations of the future actually made to Daniel during or immediately after the Babylonian exile.

In recent times, however, a different view of the origin of the book has met with increasing acceptance. It is one which, though startling at first sight to the ordinary reader, has very much to be said in its favour, and ought not to be dismissed until the grounds on which it rests, and the possibility of reconciling it with the divine inspiration of the book, have been fairly considered. The modern conception of the book of Daniel is briefly this, that it dates not from the age in which Daniel's career is placed, but from the close of the period to which its visions refer—in other words from the days of Antiochus Epiphanes; that its apparent outlines of the future are really past history thrown by the author into the guise of ancient prediction; that the narratives, though founded more or less on historical tradition, are to be regarded chiefly as stories with a practical moral, and are valuable mainly on this account; that the aim of the writer, both in the narratives and in the view of history presented in the visions, was to encourage the Jews to constancy under the religious persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes; and that the true prophetic element of the book lies in its confident anticipations of the overthrow of God's enemies, the establishment of God's kingdom, the triumph of God's people, the resurrection of the dead, and the final reward of the righteous. The reasons for this view may be summarised as follows:—

(1) The Contrast Between the Predictions in Daniel and other Old Testament Prophecies. Prophecy was not merely, nor chiefly, prediction of the future. The prophets were preachers of righteousness to their own times. Their messages conveyed rebuke, or warning, or encouragement to those among whom they lived. In this work the prophets spoke in God's name, and claimed a special knowledge of His will and purpose. Hence they made use of an element of prediction, foretelling the consequences of evil-doing on the one hand, and the results of penitence and obedience on the other. But in so far as these predictions were definite, they related to the immediate future, dealing with the destinies of men and nations already existing, or with the issues of movements already in progress. Further, such predictions were always provisional. Their fulfilment depended upon certain moral circumstances and conditions. Threatened doom might be averted by repentance. Promised prosperity might be forfeited by disobedience. This principle, clearly stated in Jer 18⁷⁻¹⁰, is of universal application. The prophets undoubtedly spoke of the distant future also, but their predictions regarding this were always of a more or less general nature, consisting not of minute anticipations of particular historic events, but of ideal pictures of the triumph of righteousness, of the universal sway of God's kingdom, and of the advent of a perfect King and Saviour. The last-mentioned features are not wanting in Daniel, but in all the other respects which have been referred to, this book differs widely from those of the prophets properly so-called. Except in the solitary exhortation of 4²⁷, it contains no practical message for the age of the exile, in which Daniel is placed. Its teaching is expressly represented as sealed up for a future age (8²⁶ 10¹⁻¹⁴ 12^{4,9}). The earliest period (as interpreters of all schools agree) in which it was fitted to convey instruction and encouragement, was that of Antiochus Epiphanes, 400 years after the captivity. Again, it appears to predict, not in the conditional manner of the prophets, but with absolute certainty, the leading particulars of the course of history during these intervening centuries, the successive empires which arose after the fall of the Babylonian power (chs. 2, 7), the Persian invasion of Greece (11²), the conquests of Alexander the Great (8^{5-7,21} 11³), and the breaking up of his empire (8^{8,22} 11⁴), the minute details of the relations between the later kings of Syria and Egypt (11⁵⁻²⁰), and finally the character and career of Antiochus Epiphanes (8^{9-12,23-25} 11²¹⁻⁴⁵). The contents of c. 11 in particular are altogether unique in this respect, and have no resemblance to the predictions of OT. prophecy in general. So obvious is the contrast that some recent scholars, while seeking to maintain the earlier authorship of the book as a whole, have been constrained to regard c. 11 as an addition composed after the events which it describes. But the exceptional features which appear so strikingly in this c. are more or less characteristic of all the visions in the book, and point to the same conclusion with regard to them all.

(2) The Resemblance of Daniel to the so-called 'Apocalyptic' Books. At first sight the only alternative to the older view of the book of Daniel appears to be that it is a mere forgery which can have no right to a place in the Scriptures. But a closer acquaintance with the Jewish literature of the centuries before and after the beginning of the Christian era shows that this assumption is by no means necessary. There is a well-defined class of works, known as 'apocalyptic,' which, though unfamiliar in modern and Western literature, was largely represented during the period in question. The most important of them have only come to light during the last hundred years, and the study of them has shown that the very features which distinguish the book of Daniel from ordinary prophecy serve to connect it closely with this other class of writings. The most accessible example of 'apocalyptic' literature is the Second book of Esdras in the Apocrypha. The principal work of the kind, however, is the book of Enoch, and in addition to it there may be mentioned the book of the Secrets of Enoch, the Assumption of Moses, the Ascension of Isaiah, the Apocalypse of Baruch.

the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Psalms of Solomon, and the Sibylline Oracles. Many of these in their present form are composite works, and embody Christian as well as Jewish elements. But in so far as the original groundwork can be separated from the later additions, it may be said in general that these 'apocalyptic' books were written in times when the Jewish religion seemed in danger of being overthrown by heathen oppressors. Their authors preferred (perhaps from prudential motives) to conceal their own personalities and to put their messages to their contemporaries into the mouths of great figures in the past, such as Enoch, Noah, Moses, or Ezra. They based what they had to say about the present and the future upon a view of the world's history as providentially guided and controlled by God, and hence they frequently presented more or less extended surveys of the past under the form of predictions uttered by the great men of earlier times. It was also common for the history, thus disguised as prophecy, to be further wrapped up in symbolic visions. Thus, in the Second book of Esdras, which is to be dated shortly before or after 100 A.D., there is a veiled, yet quite recognisable, description of the Roman emperors of the first Christian century, which is said to have been given in answer to the fastings and prayers of Ezra in Babylon. In the earliest portion of the book of Enoch (dating from the second century B.C.) a prediction of the Deluge is attributed to the patriarch whose name it bears. The Assumption of Moses (written about the beginning of the Christian era) tells how Moses addressed to Joshua a long account of the future history of the Israelites, including the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, the restoration of the Jews from captivity, the oppression of Antiochus Epiphanes, the rule of the descendants of the Maccabees, and that of Herod the Great. Now the predictive portions of Daniel have the closest resemblance to this kind of veiled history, and this analogy of itself suggests that the book may be reasonably regarded as a specimen of the 'apocalyptic' class of literature, that it was written not earlier than the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and that the writer chose Daniel, a great sage whom he placed in the time of the Babylonian captivity, as the mouth-piece of his teaching. This view of the book of Daniel is borne out by its striking resemblance in several other respects to the 'apocalyptic' writings. In common with them it makes a large and peculiar use of vision and symbol. These, indeed, are found to a certain extent in some of the regular prophets, especially in Ezekiel and Zechariah, but it is only in Daniel and the 'apocalyptic' books that they are employed to represent the prolonged course of history. In Second Esdras, and the Apocalypse of Baruch, as well as in Daniel, the visions are granted after fasting and prayer. The 70 'weeks' of Daniel mark out the course of time according to an artificial scheme, which finds parallels in the 10 'weeks' of the book of Enoch, the 250 'times' of the Assumption of Moses, and the 12 epochs of world-history in Second Esdras. Finally, Daniel is the only OT. book in which angels have names given to them (Gabriel, Michael), and special nations assigned to their care (8¹⁶ 9²¹ 10¹³, 21 12¹). This is a feature which is still further developed in the other 'apocalyptic' books, where additional angelic names (Raphael, Phanuel, Uriel, etc.) appear. While these resemblances between Daniel and the 'apocalyptic' writings are undeniable, it has been supposed by the supporters of the older view of the book that Daniel is a work containing genuine predictions of detailed history, and has simply provided the model after which the spurious predictions of later 'apocalypses' were composed. But this leaves the special features of Daniel without any real parallel either in Scripture or outside of it, and it seems to be a more reasonable deduction from the facts that Daniel not only has supplied the pattern of the other 'apocalyptic' writings, but is actually a member, though the earliest and greatest one, of the same class of literature to which they belong.

(3) The Absence of External Evidence for the Earlier Date of Daniel. Along with the foregoing considerations there must be taken the important fact that there is nothing to show that the book of Daniel existed before the age of Antiochus Epiphanes. The mention of Daniel's name in Ezekiel (14¹⁴, 20 28²) has no bearing upon the date of the book, since these prophecies of Ezekiel were uttered, the one before, and the other immediately after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., while the book of Daniel, at the earliest, cannot have been composed before the third year of Cyrus (536 B.C.) to which its narrative comes down (11¹). Then, though in the English Bible Daniel appears among the prophetic books, it is not classed among them in the Hebrew Bible, but belongs to the miscellaneous group of 'Writings,' which forms the third division of the Jewish Canon. Now the Jewish Canon of the Prophets was not closed till after the date of Malachi (about 450 B.C.), and if the book of Daniel was in existence then it is not easy to understand why it should not have been included in this collection. It is probable, indeed, that 'the books' (9²), among which Jeremiah was included, are to be understood of the Canon of the Prophets as already complete when the book of Daniel was written. Again, the book of Ecclesiasticus in the Apocrypha, written about 200 B.C., contains (chs. 44-50) a list of the worthies of Israel, in which Daniel is not found, though Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the Twelve Minor Prophets, Zerubbabel and Joshua (from Ezra), and Nehemiah, are all mentioned. The earliest references to the contents of the book of Daniel are those in the Sibylline Oracles, an 'apocalyptic' work written about 140 B.C., and in 1 Maccabees, a book of the Apocrypha, composed about 100 B.C. This silence about Daniel, previous to the age of Antiochus Epiphanes (176-164 B.C.), is significant. Though the mere absence of allusions to the book before that time does not by itself prove that the book was not then in existence, it nevertheless lends an additional emphasis to the arguments for the 'apocalyptic' character and later date of the work, which have been already given.

(4) Historical Difficulties in Daniel. The book of Daniel seems to contain certain historical inaccuracies regarding the earlier period with which it deals, which present grave objections to the view that it was written by the Daniel of the exile, or by one of his contemporaries. These features, however, present no difficulty on the other view, and in no way diminish the value of the book of Daniel as an 'apocalyptic' work. It is not surprising that an 'apocalyptic' writer, casting into the form of prediction a series of past events, should be more accurate in describing those which are more recent than in his account of those which are more remote. Thus in Second Esdras the author confounds Ezra with Zerubbabel, calling him the son of Salathiel, and placing his vision in the 30th year of the captivity, about a century before Ezra's real time. The Apocalypse of Baruch, again, is dated in 'the twenty-fifth year of Jeconiah, king of Judah,' though Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) only reigned 3 months and 10 days. In the same way while the visions of Daniel describe accurately and minutely the events of the age of Antiochus Epiphanes and his predecessors, the book is rather meagre and vague with regard to the history of Daniel's own time, and in particular its statements about the supposed date of Daniel's captivity, the position of Belshazzar and his relationship to Nebuchadnezzar, and the reign of Darius the Mede, are difficult to reconcile with our knowledge of the period derived from other reliable sources.

(5) Peculiarities in the Language of Daniel. The name of the Babylonian conqueror of Jerusalem is always spelt in Daniel as Nebuchadnezzar, while contemporary writers like Jeremiah and Ezekiel generally give the correct form Nebuchadrezzar (Nabû-kudurri-ûsur), which is found on the monuments. The 'Chaldeans,' who in Jeremiah and Ezekiel are the same as the Babylonians in general, appear in Daniel as a special class of Babylonian wise men. This usage is found elsewhere only in the later classical writers. It points to a time when the Babylonian empire had passed away, and when the name formerly borne by all its people was confined to the sages or magicians who were the only survivors of its lost civilization. Lastly, in addition to the Aramaic section of the book, there are in Daniel certain Persian and Greek words, and the evidence of date furnished by the language has thus been summed up by Professor Driver: 'The Persian words presuppose a period after the Persian empire had been well established: the Greek words demand, the Hebrew supports, and the Aramaic permits a date after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great (B.C. 332).'

All these lines of enquiry lead to the same general conclusion, that the book of Daniel belongs, as to its literary character, to the extensive class of 'apocalyptic' writings, and that its author lived not earlier than the age of Antiochus Epiphanes. The references to the setting up of the 'abomination of desolation' show that it was written after Antiochus had set up his heathen altar in the Temple at Jerusalem in 168 B.C., while on the other hand the general terms in which the death of Antiochus (164 B.C.) is spoken of indicate that the writer was not acquainted with the exact circumstances in which it took place. If the modern view of the character of the book be accepted its composition may be placed with certainty between these two dates.

5. The Narratives of Daniel. On the 'apocalyptic' view of the book it is not necessary to regard these as literal history throughout. They are to be viewed primarily as stories with an instructive moral for the writer's own time. At the same time it is probable that they were, partly at least, founded on fact. The mention of Belshazzar, who is not named elsewhere in O.T., shows that the writer had access to some independent sources of information about Babylonian history, and the picture given of the achievements and the character of Nebuchadnezzar is in perfect keeping with what is known of that monarch from his own inscriptions. As to Daniel himself, there is no doubt that his name was a famous one in Jewish history (Ezk 14^{14,20} 28³), but it is not so clear from these references that he was a fellow-exile of Ezekiel. The name Daniel occurs in the list of exiles who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8²), and it is possible that this person may have come to be identified with the great Daniel of Ezekiel, and may have been placed by tradition in Babylon in the century before Ezra's day. It seems likely that many stories about Daniel had been handed down to the age of Antiochus Epiphanes, and that the writer of our book selected and combined those which were best fitted to stir up his oppressed and persecuted countrymen to courage and faithfulness to God. Examples of other stories about Daniel and his companions are found in the additions to the book contained in the LXX and the English Apocrypha. They include 'The Song of the Three Holy Children,' 'The History of Susanna,' and 'Bel and the Dragon.'

6. The Right of an 'Apocalyptic' Book to a place in Scripture. It is perhaps natural that the modern view of the book of Daniel should at first sight present difficulties to reverent Christian minds. It seems to involve a degree of fiction, if not of fraud, inconsistent with the divine inspiration which we attach to the books of Scripture, and especially inconsistent with the way in which the book has been used by our Lord. But it is coming to be more and more clearly recognised that the inspiration of the Bible, which guarantees the truth of its spiritual teaching, is compatible with the greatest variety of literary form, that God has used many kinds of human writing to convey His revelation to men, and that each kind must be judged and interpreted according to its own ordinary rules—history as history, poetry as poetry, parable as parable, etc. And if we find that the book of Daniel belongs to a class of literature comparatively unfamiliar to us, but quite common at a certain period in the past, we must not assume that inspiration could not attach itself to such a form of composition, or that divine revelation could not be conveyed by it. We must rather seek to interpret it according to its own nature, when this has been understood, and learn to place its real value in the special religious truths in which it stands apart from, and above, other writings of the same kind. The objection of fraud would only have weight if the writer were supposed to have desired to deceive his readers. But when we read in 'Paradise Lost' (Books 11, 12) the long account of the future history of the world which the angel Michael is represented as setting before Adam, we feel that Milton is only using a literary device which is as transparent to his readers as to himself—a device which had been used by poets like Virgil and Dante long before. And there is every reason to believe that the authors of the 'apocalyptic' books meant their writings to be understood in the same way. Reference has already been made to the supposed predictions contained in the book of Enoch and the Assumption of Moses. Now both of these works are quoted in NT. (2Pet 2¹¹ Jude vv. 9, 14, 15), but this does not compel us to take the story of their predictions as literally true. It is but a single step from these cases to the book of Daniel. If 'apocalyptic' writings like those just mentioned can be quoted by NT. writers, there is no reason why a work of the same kind should be unworthy of a place in the OT. itself. The term 'prophet' used by our Lord is not inapplicable to the writer of Daniel, and there is nothing in His reference to the book committing us to any view of its literary character which we are not compelled to adopt with regard to the book of Enoch and the Assumption of Moses.

It is true that the character and claims of the book of Daniel must have been very early misunderstood. The age of Antiochus Epiphanes, in which it appeared, was a time when the real nature of OT. prophecy was largely forgotten, and when there was a growing tendency to confound prophetic revelation with that mere prognostication of the future which formed the heathen conception of inspired oracles. Not only the book of Daniel, but the other 'apocalyptic' writings as well, soon came to be regarded by the Jews as the actual utterances of the men whose names they bore, and the fact that Daniel was included in the OT. Canon caused this view of it to be taken over and long maintained in the Christian church. But the mere length of time during which such a tradition is accepted without question is no guarantee of its correctness. Many errors, more serious than this, survived in the church for centuries before the progress of knowledge dispelled them. And in the new light which has been thrown on the book of Daniel in modern times it is right to acknowledge the guidance of the Holy Spirit, whose progressive work it is to lead the church of Christ into all truth. If the book of Daniel, when interpreted in the same way as other 'apocalyptic' writings, is found 'profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness,' its inspiration is not less real than on the older view which regarded its narratives as contemporary history, and its apparent predictions as unique and miraculous disclosures of the remote future. Tried by this test the book, viewed as an 'apocalyptic' work, appears well worthy of a place in Scripture. While it formed the model on which later books of the same kind were framed, it stands far above them all in simplicity, clearness, dignity, and freedom from tedious digressions and extravagant conceptions. It teaches in an incomparably superior way the truths which they only feebly echo and obscurely reflect. Beneath its artificial literary form we can read the great lessons that God presides over the history of the world; that the Gentile nations as well as the Jews have always been under His control; that the succession of human empires is ordained by Him; that He permits the pride and fury of oppressors for a time, but humbles them in the end, and saves His own; that His kingdom will come at length, and will endure for ever; that faithfulness and constancy to Him lead to a life beyond death, and to an eternal reward of glory.

7. Influence of Daniel on the New Testament Writers. Besides the reference to the 'abomination of desolation,' a few other sayings of our Lord are based on the language of the book of Daniel, as, for example, the description of the great tree in the Parable of the Mustard Seed (Mt 13³² Mk 4³² Lk 13¹⁹), the pictures of the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven (Mt 24³⁰ 26⁶⁴ Mk 13²⁶ 14⁶²), and other expressions in the great discourse on the Last Things (Mt 24 Mk 13 Lk 21). The angel Gabriel appears again in Lk 1^{19, 26}. St. Paul's description of the Man of Sin in 2 Th 2 includes features derived from the portraits of Antiochus Epiphanes in Daniel. But it is in Revelation, itself an 'apocalyptic' book, that the influence of Daniel is most manifest. The coincidences in language and imagery are too numerous to mention. We may notice, however, the description of the appearance of the Son of Man (Rev 1¹³⁻¹⁵); His coming in the clouds to judge the world (Rev 14¹⁴); the composite form, and especially the Ten Horns, of the Dragon (Rev 12³), and the Beast (Rev 17²); the part played by the archangel Michael (Rev 12⁷), and the repeated mention of the period of 3½ years ('a time, times, and half a time,' Rev 12¹⁴; 'forty and two months,' Rev 11² 13⁵; '1,260 days,' Rev 11³ 12⁶). In contrast with Dan 8²⁰ 12⁹ we have the command in Rev 22¹⁰ not to seal up the prophecy, since the time is at hand.

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTORY. THE ABSTINENCE OF DANIEL AND HIS FRIENDS FROM UNCLEAN FOOD

Daniel is introduced as one of a band of Jews taken captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar in the third year of Jehoiakim (vv. 1, 2). Along with three of his youthful countrymen he is chosen to be trained during three years for personal attendance on the king (vv. 3-7). As the food and drink provided for those in this position are ceremonially unclean Daniel resolves not to partake of them. After an unsuccessful appeal to the chief official in charge, he persuades a subordinate official to give himself and his friends vegetable food and water for ten days. The results of the experiment are favourable, and the four Jewish youths continue to live on this fare during the three years of their training (vv. 8-16). At the end of this time they are found superior to their fellow-students both physically and intellectually, and indeed wiser than all the learned men of Babylon. They are accordingly appointed to attend upon the king (vv. 17-20). Special emphasis is laid upon Daniel's understanding of visions and dreams, and the superiority of the Jewish youths is traced, not to their heathen training but to God (v. 17). A biographical note about Daniel is added in v. 21.

Teaching. This c. emphasises the duty of abstaining from food contaminated by idolatry, or otherwise unclean, and teaches that firmness in this respect will bring its own reward from God. These lessons bore very plainly on the position of the Jews in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes (see 1 Mac 1⁶⁵, 62, 63 2 Mac 6¹⁸⁻⁸¹ 7¹⁻⁴¹), and were of practical importance also in the early days of Christianity: see Ro 14 1 Cor 10^{20, 27-29}. The wider moral as to the grandeur of fidelity to principle is one for all time.

x. The third year . . . of Jehoiakim] presents a historical difficulty at the outset. Nebuchadnezzar's supremacy over Palestine dated from the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.). This battle took place in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jer 46²), which is also called the first year of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 25¹). The first question is how Nebuchadnezzar could be king of Babylon in the third year of Jehoiakim. The monumental evidence, however, makes it probable that the first year of Nebuchadnezzar coincided partly with the third and partly with the fourth year of Jehoiakim, so that the statements of v. 1 and Jer 25¹ may both be correct. The second and more serious difficulty is as to a siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in Jehoiakim's third year. The chastisement of Jehoiakim by 'bands of the Chaldeans' (2 K 24^{1, 2}) took place when he revolted after serving Nebuchadnezzar for three years, i.e. not earlier than his seventh year. It is said in 2 Ch 36⁵⁻⁶ that Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim in fetters to carry him to Babylon and also took away the vessels of the house of the Lord, but there is no indication of the date of these events, while it appears from Jer 25⁹ 36^{9, 20}, that in the fourth, and even in the fifth year of Jehoiakim a siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar was still a thing of the future. It has been thought possible that Nebuchadnezzar may have followed up his victory at Carchemish by a rapid excursion southwards, during which Jehoiakim may have averted attack by a timely submission, and a gift of captives and sacred vessels, and that this may be referred to in the words 'Nebuchadnezzar came up' (2 K 24¹). This, however, is very doubtful. It is much more probable that the writer of Daniel mistook the three years of Jehoiakim's submission to Babylon (2 K 24¹) for the first three years of his reign, and placed the invasion of 2 Ch 36^{5, 6} in the last of the three.

Nebuchadnezzar] For the spelling see Intro.

2. His god] The patron deity of Babylon was Marduk (Merodach, Jer 50²). Shinar] the old name of Babylonia (Gen 10¹⁰).

3. Master of his eunuchs] The Heb. is rab sarisim, the same title as 'Rabsaris' in 2K 18¹⁷.

The king's seed . . the princes] It is uncertain whether Israelites or Babylonians are meant. 4. Children] RV 'youths,' and so in vv. 10, 13, 15, 17. Blemish] in a physical sense. Cunning] intelligent. Science] knowledge, so rendered in v. 17. Learning] lit. 'book,' literature: so in v. 17. Chaldeans] not the Babylonians in general, but a special class of learned men. 5. Meat] RM 'dainties.' A Persian word occurring nowhere in OT. save in Daniel. Stand before the king] as court attendants.

6. Children of Judah] Daniel and his friends belonged to the royal tribe. Daniel] The name means 'God is my judge.' Hananiah] 'Jehovah is gracious.' Mishael] 'Who is what God is?' Azariah] 'Jehovah has helped.' All these names are found elsewhere in OT.: see especially Neh 3^{8, 23, 30} 8¹. 7. The changes of name have a parallel in the case of Joseph (Gen 41⁴⁵). The new names had no reference to the God of Israel, and perhaps contained the names of Babylonian deities.

Beltshazzar] Balatsu-uzur. 'Protect his life.' Not to be confounded with Belshazzar.

Shadrach] Perhaps Shudur-Aku, 'the command of Aku,' the Moon-god. Meshach] of uncertain meaning. One suggestion is Misha-Aku, 'Who is what Aku is?' Abed-nego] Probably a corruption of Abed-Nebo, 'Servant of Nebo.'

8. Defile himself] The king's food might consist of the flesh of unclean animals, or might not be freed from blood, or part of it might have been offered in sacrifice to idols. Part of the wine would have been poured out as a libation to the gods. 10. Your sort] RV 'your own age.' 11. Meizar] RV 'the steward': so in v. 16. 12. Pulse] RM 'herbs': so in v. 16.

17. Daniel had understanding, etc.] A special statement by way of introduction to what follows in the book. 20. Magicians] A word used only in Daniel, and of the Egyptian magicians in Gen 41^{8, 24} Ex 7^{11, 22} 8⁷ 9¹¹.

Astrologers] RV 'enchanters.' The Babylonians had an elaborate system of magic, the fame and practice of which survived long after the Babylonian empire had ceased to exist.

21. The first year of king Cyrus] 538 B.C., some 66 years after the third year of Jehoiakim.

dream, which he required the wise men of his court to describe and interpret on pain of death. They said this was beyond their power, but professed their readiness to explain the dream if the king would tell them its nature. Nebuchadnezzar persisted in his first demand, and as the wise men could not satisfy him he gave orders that they should be slain (vv. 1-13). Daniel, however, interposed and asked that the execution of the penalty should be delayed. In answer to his prayers and those of his three companions God revealed the dream and its meaning to Daniel, who gave thanks and praise for this favour (vv. 14-23). Daniel was then brought before Nebuchadnezzar, and after explaining the true source of his knowledge proceeded to describe and interpret the dream (vv. 24-31). What Nebuchadnezzar had seen was a great image with a head of gold, a breast and arms of silver, a belly and thighs of brass, legs of iron, and feet of iron mingled with clay. A stone fell on the feet and broke them in pieces, and the whole image crumbled into fragments, and was carried away by the wind. The stone then became a great mountain, which filled the whole earth (vv. 31-35). The head of gold represented Nebuchadnezzar's empire (vv. 36-38). The parts of the image made of silver, brass, and iron represented three other kingdoms that should arise, with characteristics corresponding to their various materials (vv. 39-43). In the days of the last of these God would set up a universal and everlasting kingdom (vv. 44, 45). On hearing the interpretation of the dream Nebuchadnezzar acknowledged the greatness of the true God, and made Daniel governor of the province of Babylon, and chief of the wise men (vv. 46-48). At Daniel's request his three companions also received posts of honour and authority (v. 49).

Teaching. On any interpretation of this c. its central truth lies in the prophecy of the divine kingdom, which is to supersede all human empires—a prophecy which in NT. times is receiving an ever-increasing fulfilment. The reasons for regarding the fourth kingdom as the Greek empire have been given in the Intro. The first three are usually taken to be the Babylonian, the Median (represented by 'Darius the Mede,' whom the writer of Daniel places before Cyrus), and the Persian. Another interpretation supposes that Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar were the only Babylonian kings known to the author (see on 5⁷), and makes the first two kingdoms to be those of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, followed by the Medo-Persian empire as the third.

1. The second year] seems inconsistent

CHAPTER 2

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S DREAM-IMAGE

Nebuchadnezzar in his second year had a with the statement in 1⁵, that Daniel and his companions were under training during three years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign. But it appears from the monuments that the Babylonian kings counted the year after their accession as their first year. The 'second' year might therefore be really the third, while the 'three' years of 1⁵ might include, by another mode of reckoning, the year of accession, the following year, and part of the next. The 'three' years might, therefore, be over before the end of the 'second' year.

2. Sorcerers] another class of wise men.

Astrologers... Chaldeans] see on 1⁴, 20.

3. Was troubled] RV 'is troubled.' 4. In Syriack] RM 'in Aramaic.' The Aramaic portion of the book begins with the words 'O king.' The phrase 'in Aramaic' should probably be regarded as a parenthesis indicating that at this point a change of language takes place: see Intro. 5. The thing is gone] RM 'the word is gone forth.' Nebuchadnezzar had not actually forgotten the dream, but he was resolved to test the wise men's power by insisting that they should describe as well as interpret it: so in v. 8.

Made a dunghill] cp. Ezr 6¹¹. 8. Gain the time] RV 'gain time.' 9. Till the time be changed] till something should divert the king's purpose. 10. Therefore there is] RV 'forasmuch as.'

14. Arioch] Eri-Aku, 'servant of Aku.' an old Babylonian name (Gn 14¹). 16. Give him time] RV 'appoint him a time.' Daniel's request was very different from the temporising of the wise men in v. 9. 27. Soothsayers] still another class of Babylonian wise men.

28. Maketh known] RV 'he hath made known': so in v. 29. 29. The dream was an answer to Nebuchadnezzar's waking thoughts. 30. For their sakes that shall make known the interpretation] RV 'to the intent that the interpretation may be made known.'

38. Thou art this (RV 'the') head of gold] The golden head may be identified either with the Babylonian empire which Nebuchadnezzar represented, or with Nebuchadnezzar personally. The latter is the more natural interpretation.

39. Another kingdom inferior] either the Median rule of Darius, which the writer of Daniel mistakenly supposed to come before that of Cyrus the Persian (see on 8²⁰), or the kingdom of Belshazzar, who is contrasted with Nebuchadnezzar in c. 5. Another third kingdom] either the Persian empire, beginning with Cyrus, or the Medo-Persian empire, which is represented by a single animal (the ram) in c. 8. 40. The fourth kingdom] is the Greek empire, founded by the conquests of Alexander the Great. 41. The feet and toes] represent Alexander's empire as broken up after his death. Miry clay] RM 'earthenware.' There were elements both of strength and weakness in the rival kingdoms of the Seleucids and Ptolemies. 43. They shall mingle themselves with the seed of men] referring to the royal marriages by which these kingdoms sought to establish alliance: see 11^{6, 17}.

44. The Messianic kingdom of God will overpower and succeed the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt. And the kingdom... other people] RV 'nor shall the sovereignty thereof be left to another people.' The Messianic kingdom will be in the hands, not of foreigners, but of the Jews. Both the national limitation and the foreshortening of view in this v. are characteristic of OT. prophecy, and do not affect the value of the central truth which is taught.

45. The dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure] Note the absoluteness of the prediction, so unlike the conditional utterances of the prophets in general: see Intro.

46. Nebuchadnezzar worshipped Daniel, but it is plain that, though Daniel is not said to have prevented him, the king really meant to give the glory to God. 47. Of a truth, etc.] RV 'of a truth your God is the (God of gods and the Lord of kings.' On the view that this narrative is literal history it is difficult to account for Nebuchadnezzar's conduct in c. 3

48. Chief of the governors] RV 'chief governor.' 49. Sat] RV 'was.' In the gate of the king] RM 'at the king's court': see Esth 2^{19, 21} 3².

CHAPTER 3

THE GOLDEN IMAGE AND THE FIERY FURNACE

Nebuchadnezzar sets up a colossal golden image, and summons to its dedication all the officials of his empire, who are commanded to fall down and worship the image at a given musical signal, on pain of being cast into a furnace (vv. 1-6). They all do so, with the exception of Daniel's three friends, whose refusal is reported to Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 7-12). They are summoned before the king, and persist in their refusal (vv. 13-18). Nebuchadnezzar commands the furnace to be heated seven times hotter than usual, and the three Jewish youths are bound and cast into it, the flames slaying their executioners (vv. 19-22). The king sees them walking in the fire unbound and accompanied by a divine figure (vv. 23-25). He summons them forth, finds them unharmed, magnifies their God, decrees that He be held in universal reverence, and gives them further promotion (vv. 26-30).

Teaching. This story of religious constancy and its reward was specially fitted to instruct and encourage the Jews in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes. There is a similar legend about Abraham and Nimrod.

1. Of gold] not necessarily solid, but perhaps overlaid. Threescore cubits . . six cubits] 90 feet by 9, or rather more. Dura is represented by the mounds of Dura, some 12 m. SSE. of Babylon. 2. Princes . . governors . . captains] RV 'satraps . . deputies . . governors': so in vv. 3, 27. 'Satraps' is a distinctly Persian term. Judges] RM 'chief soothsayers.' Sheriffs] RM 'lawyers.'

4. People] RV 'peoples.' 5. Sackbut] properly trigon, a stringed instrument with a triangular frame: so in vv. 7, 10, 15.

Psaltery] psalterin = Gk. psalterion—a stringed instrument. Dulcimer] RM 'bagpipe': so in vv. 7, 10, 15. 6. Burning fiery furnace] a form of death penalty mentioned in Jer 29²² as inflicted by Nebuchadnezzar.

8. Chaldeans] a special official class, moved by jealousy. 12. See 2⁴⁹. 14. Is it true . . do not ye serve] RV 'Is it of purpose . . that ye serve not.' Nebuchadnezzar is willing to put a favourable construction on their first refusal, and to give them another opportunity of obeying. 16. Are not careful] RV 'have no need.' 17. If it be so, etc.] read, 'If our God . . is able . . he will deliver us.' The words do not really question God's power, but mean rather, 'If our God sees fit,' etc.

18. But if not] The refusal is absolute, come what will.

20. The most mighty men] RV 'certain mighty men.' 21. Coats . . hosen . . hats] RV 'hosen . . tunics' (RM 'turbans') . . 'mantles.'

23. In LXX the 'Song of the Three Holy Children' is inserted after this v.

25. The Son of God] RV 'a son of the gods,' a heavenly being, called an angel in v. 28. Nebuchadnezzar could not have used the expression in the definite ('Christian sense suggested by AV. 29. Made a dunghill] see on 2⁵.

CHAPTER 4

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S DREAM AND ITS FULFILMENT

In the form of a proclamation Nebuchadnezzar records his experience of the power of the Most High God (vv. 1-3). He had a dream which none of his wise men could interpret (vv. 4-7). He then called Daniel, and told him the dream, in which he had seen a lofty and spreading tree, which at the bidding of an angel had been cut down, its stump being bound among the grass for seven 'times' (vv. 8-18). Daniel explained that the tree was Nebuchadnezzar in his greatness, that he would lose his reason and live a beast's life for seven years, after which he would be restored to his throne (vv. 19-27). All this has come to pass (vv. 28-33), and Nebuchadnezzar now magnifies the King of heaven who is able to abase the proud (vv. 34-37).

The picture here given of Nebuchadnezzar's pride is in keeping with the evidence of his own boastful inscriptions. The form of madness attributed to him is not an uncommon one, and is generally known as 'lycanthropy.' No historical record of such an event in his life has come to light. There is, however, a tradition, quoted by the church historian Eusebius from Abydenus, a Greek writer of the 2nd cent. A.D., which, though quite different as a whole from the story in this c., has one or two points of contact with it.

Teaching. The example of pride brought low which this c. contains would afford a significant lesson to the Jews under the tyranny of Antiochus. It is suggestive also that the conduct of Antiochus led some to substitute for the title Epiphanes ('the illustrious') that of Epimanes ('the madman').

1. People] RV 'peoples.' 2. High] RV 'Most High.' 7. Astrologers] RV 'enchanters.' 8. According to the name of my god] This is merely an assonance, not a strict derivation. The chief god of Nebuchadnezzar was Marduk (Merodach). The word Belteshazzar does not contain the name of the god Bel: see on 17. 9. Master 'of the magicians] see on 2⁴⁸. 13. A watcher and an holy one] Both terms refer to the same being. The name 'watcher' is first used for 'angel' in Daniel, and is common in the later apocalyptic books. 16. In this v. the figure of the tree is dropped. Times] years. 17. Matter] RV 'sentence.' The angels are represented as entrusted with the power of deciding the destinies of men. 19. One hour] RV 'a while.'

The dream be] i.e. be fulfilled on. 27. If it may be] RV 'if there may be.'

28-33. In these vv. the narrative, which has hitherto been in the terms of Nebuchadnezzar's proclamation, passes into the third person. The first person is resumed in v. 34.

30. House of the kingdom] RV 'royal dwelling place.'

CHAPTER 5

BELSHAZZAR'S FEAST

Belshazzar, king of Babylon, holds a great feast, at which he profanely uses the sacred vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar from the Temple at Jerusalem (vv. 1-4). He is terrified at seeing part of a human hand writing mysterious words on the wall of the banqueting room, and vainly offers great rewards to the wise men of Babylon if they can read and explain the writing (vv. 5-9). The queen tells him of Daniel, and of his fame for wisdom, acquired in Nebuchadnezzar's days. Daniel is accordingly sent for, and Belshazzar repeats to him his request and his promises (vv. 10-16).

Declining the offered reward Daniel rebukes Belshazzar for neglecting the lessons of humility taught by Nebuchadnezzar's history, and interprets the writing as a message of doom (vv. 17-29). That night Belshazzar is slain and Darius the Median receives the kingdom (vv. 30, 31).

Teaching. The profanations of Belshazzar were very similar to those of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac 1²⁰⁻²¹ 2 Mac 5¹⁵⁻¹⁷), and Belshazzar's fate would encourage the Jews in the time of Antiochus to hope that their oppressor would be similarly cut off.

1. Belshazzar the king] These words raise another historical difficulty. We learn from the inscriptions that Belshazzar was the son of Nabuna'id (Nabonidus), the last king of Babylon, and never occupied the throne himself. As Nabuna'id, however, was much occupied with antiquarian pursuits Belshazzar was practically 'prince-regent.' See on 7¹ 8¹.

2. Vessels] see 1². His father Nebuchadnezzar] another historical difficulty. Nabuna'id was the father of Belshazzar, and was a usurper, who did not belong to the same family as Nebuchadnezzar. It is possible that he may have married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, but of this nothing is known. In that case 'father' would have the general sense of 'forefather' which it often bears in OT. But the emphasis laid on 'father' (vv. 11, 13, 18) and 'son' (v. 19) seems to indicate that the writer had the literal relationship in view, and regarded Belshazzar as the actual son and immediate successor of Nebuchadnezzar.

7. Scarlet] RV 'purple': so in vv. 16, 29.

Be the third ruler] RM 'rule as one of three': so in vv. 16, 29. The meaning is illustrated by the arrangement described in 6².

12. Hard] RV 'dark.' 13. Jewry] RV 'Judah.' 19. People] RV 'peoples.'

25. The words are names of weights. The l' in Upharsin stands for 'and,' and P(h)arsin is the plural of Peres (v. 28). The literal meaning of the writing was 'a mina, a mina, a shekel, and half minas.' 26-28. The interpretation given by Daniel is connected with the derivation of two of the terms. Mene signifies 'numbered': T'kel (= shekel) suggests the process of weighing: and Peres is doubly explained, first by its etymology ('division'), and second by its assonance with 'Persian.'

30. Chaldeans] here used in the national sense, as equivalent to 'Babylonians.'

Was Belshazzar . . slain] The traditions about the capture of Babylon by Cyrus, which classical historians have preserved, are now known from the inscriptions of Cyrus himself to be incorrect. The army of Cyrus occupied Babylon without fighting, and Nabuna'id was captured. Cyrus himself afterwards entered the city in peace. A little later, however, there was a night assault made by Gobryas, the governor under Cyrus, in which 'the king's son' was slain.

31. Darius the Median (RV 'Mede')] presents the greatest historical difficulty in the book. In this v. he receives the kingdom of Babylon upon the death of Belshazzar. In 6^{1,2,25,26} he acts and speaks as a supreme sovereign; in 6²⁸ he appears as a predecessor of Cyrus the Persian; in 9¹ he is called 'Darius the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, who was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans.' No such person, however, is mentioned in any other historical source, and the inscriptions leave no room for an independent king of Babylon between Nabuna'id and Cyrus. Cyrus had conquered Media before invading Babylon, and his army comprised both Medes and Persians. Gobryas, the general of Cyrus, who acted under him as governor of Babylon, was probably a Mede, and the author of Daniel has apparently mistaken his subordinate office for an independent monarchy, and has confounded his name with that of Darius Hystaspes (the Darius of the book of Ezra), who was the father, and not the son, of Ahasuerus (Xerxes).

Took] RV 'received.'

CHAPTER 6

THE DEN OF LIONS

Darius the Mede divides his kingdom into 120 satrapies, the whole being superintended by three higher officials, of whom Daniel was one (vv. 1, 2). Daniel is in special favour, and Darius meditates giving him a still higher office (v. 3). This rouses the jealousy of his colleagues, who plot his ruin (vv. 4, 5). They persuade Darius to make a decree that no one shall ask anything for 30 days from God or man, save from the king, on pain of being cast into the den of lions (vv. 6-9). Daniel, as his enemies expect, disregards this rule, and being accused he is found guilty, and is cast into the den of lions (vv. 10-17). After a sleepless night Darius comes to enquire for Daniel, and finds him alive and unhurt (vv. 18-22). Daniel is taken out of the den, and his accusers, with all their families, are thrown to the lions and instantly slain (vv. 23, 24). Darius then makes a decree to all the world in honour of Daniel's God (vv. 25-27). A biographical note is added in v. 28).

Teaching. Apart from the question about Darius the Mede (see on 5³¹) this c. presents other difficulties if taken as literal history. The decree of Darius seems one which even a heathen king would not be likely to make. If, however, the writer's purpose was to construct a situation for Daniel similar to the circumstances of the pious Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, and to read them an encouraging lesson by this imaginative use of the past, the c. well fulfils this object: see especially 1 Mac 1⁵⁰.

1. Princes] RV 'satraps': so in vv. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7. The division of the Persian empire into 20 satrapies was actually made by Darius Hystaspes. Gobryas, however (see on 5³¹), is said in the inscriptions to have appointed governors in Babylon, and this may have led to the confusion between him and Darius. Cp. the 127 provinces of Esth 1¹ 8⁹.

2. Was first] RV 'was one.' This was the arrangement contemplated by Belshazzar (5⁷, 16, 20).

7. Governors . . captains] RV 'deputies . . governors.' Decree] RV 'interdict': so in vv. 8, 9, 12, 13, 15. God] RV 'god': so in v. 12. 8. Medes and Persians] see on 5³¹.

Which altereth not] cp. Esth 1¹⁰ 8⁸.

10. Toward Jerusalem] cp. 1 K 8³⁵ Ps 57 28². The Talmud says that the Jews in foreign lands turn in prayer towards the land of Israel, those in the land of Israel towards Jerusalem, and those in Jerusalem towards the Temple. The Mohammedans turn in the same way towards Mecca. 11. Praying] RV 'making petition.'

12. Ask a petition of] RV 'make petition unto.' This exact rendering brings Daniel's conduct into sharp opposition against the interdict in v. 7. 14. Displeased with himself] RV 'displeased.' 17. That the purpose might not be changed] RV 'that nothing might be changed.' 18. Instruments of music] RM 'dancing girls.' 23. Believed] RV 'had trusted.' 25. People] RV 'peoples.'

26. Every dominion] RV 'all the dominion.'

CHAPTER 7

THE VISION OF THE FOUR BEASTS

In the first year of Belshazzar Daniel sees in a dream four beasts rising out of the sea (vv. 1-3). The first is like a lion, with eagle's wings (v. 4), the second like a bear (v. 5), the third like a leopard (v. 6), while the fourth is a unique and ferocious monster with ten horns (v. 7). Among the horns of the fourth beast there comes up a little horn with human eyes, which displaces three of the other ten, and carries itself proudly (v. 8). God then appears sitting on His throne of judgment (vv. 9, 10). The fourth beast is slain (v. 11). A human figure appears in the heavens, and receives an everlasting kingdom (vv. 13, 14).

At Daniel's request an angel explains the vision (vv. 15, 16). The four beasts represent four kings (or kingdoms: see on v. 17) which are to appear in succession, and are to be followed by the kingdom of the people of God (v. 18). Daniel's interest centres specially in the fourth beast and the conclusion of the vision (vv. 19-22). The fourth beast is explained as a conquering kingdom (v. 23), the ten horns are ten of its kings, and the little horn is an eleventh king who shall put down three of the former ten (v. 24), and shall blasphemously persecute the saints for 'a time, times, and half a time' (v. 25). In the day of God's judgment the little horn will lose his dominion (v. 26) and the everlasting kingdom of the saints will follow (v. 27).

Interpretation. The four kingdoms in this c. are presumably the same as those in c. 2. The reasons for regarding the fourth as the Greek (rather than the Roman) empire are given in Intro. See also on c. 2.

Teaching. This c. contains a prophecy of the Messianic kingdom of God. It is expected to appear after the overthrow of Antiochus Epiphanes, and to be in the hands of the Jewish people.

1. Belshazzar king of Babylon] For the historical difficulty see on 5¹. Belshazzar is clearly regarded as actual king, since the years of his reign are reckoned by both here and in 8¹.

2. Strove] RV 'broke forth.' The great sea] the Mediterranean. 3. The imagery recalls the figures, so often found on Babylonian bas-reliefs, of winged lions and other monsters. The sea symbolises the confused welter of nations before the Babylonian empire arose.

4. The first] beast is either the Babylonian empire, or more probably Nebuchadnezzar himself (see on 2³⁶), the changing of the beast from the brute to the human condition referring possibly to Nebuchadnezzar's improvement under God's discipline (c. 4). The feet] RV 'two feet.' 5. The second beast may be either the alleged Median empire of Darius (the three ribs in its mouth being perhaps three nations conquered by it before the taking of Babylon), or Belshazzar (the picture of the bear describing his sluggish and sensual nature): see on 2⁸⁰. 6. The third beast is either the Persian empire founded by Cyrus, as distinguished from the Median rule attributed in this book to Darius, or the Medo-Persian empire regarded as one. The four heads are perhaps the four Persian kings who are mentioned in OT.—Cyrus, Darius (Hystaspes), Xerxes (Ahasuerus), and Artaxerxes. 7. A fourth beast] the conquering Greek empire of Alexander the Great. Ten horns] see on v. 24. 8. Another little horn] Antiochus Epiphanes. The description of this horn is continued in vv. 24, 25. Three of the first horns] see on v. 24.

9, 10. The judgment scene is presented in the form of a material spectacle, which is first found in Daniel, though it is common in other apocalyptic books and in the NT. Cast down] RV 'placed.' His wheels] RV 'the wheels thereof' (of the throne). Ancient of days] An expression for God peculiar to Daniel. The book of Enoch has, 'The Head of Days.'

12. The rest of the beasts] the former kingdoms, survived as nations, but without power.

13. One like the Son of man] RV 'one like unto a son of man'—a human figure as opposed to the four brute figures, and coming from heaven as opposed to their coming from the sea. This figure denotes, not the Messiah as an individual, but the kingdom of God as the successor of the kingdoms of this world.

14. People] RV 'peoples.'

17. Four kings] This statement must be taken loosely. The fourth beast is not strictly a king, but a kingdom with various kings (vv. 23, 24). 18. Take] RV 'receive.'

19-22. A recapitulation of vv. 9-14.

23. The fourth kingdom] RV 'a fourth kingdom,' the Greek empire of Alexander the Great.

24. The ten horns] are to be sought among Alexander and his successors. The following table of the Greek kings of Syria and Egypt may be useful here :

SYRIA.	B.C.	EGYPT.	B.C.
Seleucus I (Nicator)	312-280	Ptolemy I (Soter)	305-285
Antiochus I (Soter)	280-261	Ptolemy II (Philadelphus)	285-247
Antiochus II (Theos)	261-246
Seleucus II (Cullinicus)	246-226	Ptolemy III (Euergetes)	247-222
Seleucus III (Ceraunus)	226-223	Ptolemy IV (Philopator)	222-205
Antiochus III (the Great)	223-187	Ptolemy V (Epiphanes)	205-181
Seleucus IV (Philopator)	187-176	Ptolemy VI (Philometor)	181-146
Antiochus IV (Epiphanes)	176-164

Antiochus Epiphanes was the son of Antiochus the Great, and the younger brother of Seleucus IV, whom he succeeded on the throne. Seleucus IV was murdered by a usurper named Heliodorus ; but Antiochus speedily drove out the latter. The real heir to the throne was Demetrius, the son of Seleucus IV, but he only obtained the kingdom after the death of Antiochus. Another rival of Antiochus is said to have been Ptolemy VI, of Egypt, whose mother, Cleopatra, was a daughter of Antiochus the Great. These relationships are shown in the accompanying table :

The ten horns are variously reckoned as including or excluding Alexander the Great, and as comprising only Syrian, or both Syrian and Egyptian kings. Including Alexander, the first seven may be Alexander the Great, Seleucus I, Antiochus I, Antiochus II, Seleucus II, Seleucus III, Antiochus III, and the last three Seleucus IV (whose murder may have been instigated by Antiochus Epiphanes), Heliodorus, and Demetrius. If Alexander be omitted, the first seven will include Seleucus IV ; while the last three may be Heliodorus, Demetrius, and Ptolemy VI. The number ten may be a round one, and the exact interpretation of the ten horns is of less consequence than the recognition of the little horn as Antiochus Epiphanes.

25. The v. exactly describes the conduct of Antiochus (1 Mac 141-50). Laws] RV 'the law.' A time, times, and the dividing of (RV 'half a') time] Three years and a half appears all through the book of Daniel as the period appointed for the tyranny of Antiochus. It is to be regarded as a round period (the half of seven years), denoting a short and incomplete interval of time. 27. Of the kingdom] RV 'of the kingdoms.' People of the saints] Here and in v. 18 these are spoken of as the rulers of the future kingdom of God. The 'Son of man' is not a personal king, but a symbolic figure for God's kingdom in its superiority to the other kingdoms symbolised by the four beasts. 28. Hitherto] RV 'here.'

The table on next page sums up the general interpretation of chs. 2, 7 adopted in the notes.

CHAPTER 8

THE VISION OF THE RAM AND THE HE-GOAT

In the third year of Belshazzar Daniel has a vision in which he seems to stand by the river Ulai, near Susa (vv. 1, 2). He sees a two-horned ram which behaves aggressively for a time (vv. 3, 4), but is attacked and overthrown by a he-goat which comes rapidly from the W. (vv. 5-7). The he-goat has a notable horn (v. 5), which is presently broken, and instead of which four others come up (v. 8). From one of these there springs a little horn, which prosper greatly, and behaves arrogantly and wickedly, especially against the sanctuary and the continual burnt offering (vv. 9-12). An angel proclaims that its oppressions will last for 2,300 evenings and mornings (vv. 13, 14). The angel Gabriel then explains the vision to Daniel (vv. 15, 16). It relates to 'the time of the end' (vv. 17-19). The ram is the Medo-Persian empire (v. 20), and the he-goat the Greek empire (v. 21). The notable horn is the first Greek king (Alexander the Great), and the four horns which succeed it are the rulers of the four divisions of his empire (vv. 20, 21). The little horn is a king of one of these divisions, and the description plainly points to Antiochus Epiphanes. Gabriel foretells his various acts of oppression and blasphemy and his sudden overthrow (vv. 23-25). The last two vv. contain Gabriel's parting message to Daniel, and describe the effect of the vision on the latter (vv. 26, 27).

2. A vision] RV 'the vision.' Shushan... the palace] Susa, the capital of the Persian kings (Neh 1¹ Esth 1²). Elam] a region NW. of Persia proper, frequently mentioned in OT. (Gn 10²² Isa 11¹¹ Jer 49³¹, etc.). Ulai] the Eulens, a large canal in the vicinity of Susa: cp. the 'Chebar' in Ezekiel's vision (Ezk 1³), and the 'Hiddekel' (10⁴). 8. For it] RV 'instead of it.' 9. Pleasant (RV 'glorious') land] Palestine.

10. The host of heaven] the stars, symbolising in Daniel the righteous Israelites (12³), some of whom were slain by Antiochus: see v. 24 1 Mac 1^{24, 30, 37, 43}).

11. The prince of the host] God. And by him, etc.] RV 'And it took away from him' (God) 'the continual burnt offering': see 11³¹ 1 Mac 1^{45, 50}. The place of his sanctuary was cast down] see 1 Mac 1^{21-23, 30 3⁴⁵ 4³⁸. 12. The rendering of this v. is uncertain. RV 'And the host' (of the Israelites) 'was given over to it' (the little horn), 'through transgression' (the apostasy of the heathen party in Jerusalem, 1 Mac 1¹¹⁻¹⁵). Practised] RV 'did its pleasure.' Similarly in v. 24. 13. Saint] RV}

'holy one,' angel: see 4¹³. Transgression of desolation] see 9²⁷ 11³¹ 12¹¹ 1 Mac 1^{54, 59}.

14. Days] RV 'evenings and mornings,' 1,150 days. The period between 1 Mac 1⁵⁴ and 1 Mac 1^{52, 53}, when the Temple was cleansed, was 3 years and 10 days. The 1,150 days may be reckoned from a slightly earlier starting-point in the profane career of Antiochus.

16. Gabriel] the first mention in Scripture of an angelic name. 17. At the time of the end, etc.] RV 'The vision belongeth to the time of the end.' This defines the limit of Daniel's outlook upon the future. The termination of this vision is therefore that of all the visions in the book. 18. Was in] RV 'fell into': see Ezk 2^{1, 2}. 19. Last end] RV 'latter time.' Indignation] the troubles of Israel are tokens of God's displeasure: see 11³⁶ 1 Mac 1⁶⁴. At the time appointed, etc.] RV 'It belongeth to the appointed time of the end.'

20. Kings of Media and Persia] The Medo-Persian empire is symbolised here by one animal, but its two portions are distinguished, and the Persian rule is regarded as succeeding the Median, since the higher of the two horns comes up last (v. 3). 21. The king of Grecia (RV 'Greece')] 'King' is evidently used loosely for 'kingdom' (as in 7¹⁷), since the kings are particularised as horns in what follows. The first king] Alexander the Great.

22. Four kingdoms] those of Alexander's four generals—Macedonia, Thrace, Egypt, and Syria: see Intro. In his power] RV 'with his power.' These kingdoms were severally inferior to Alexander's empire.

23. A king of fierce countenance] Antiochus Epiphanes. Understanding dark sentences] skilled in deceitful intrigues. 24. Not by his own power] This rendering may mean 'by God's permission,' or, 'by craft rather than force.' But RM has, 'not with his' (Alexander's) 'power,' as in v. 22. Mighty] RV 'mighty ones.' 25. By peace] RV 'in their security.' Some of the worst outrages of Antiochus upon the Jews had this treacherous character: see 11^{21, 24} 1 Mac 1^{29, 30}. The Prince of princes] God. Broken without hand] destroyed by God's power: cp. 2^{34,35}.

26. Evening . . morning] RV 'evenings . . mornings.' The reference is to v. 14.

Wherefore] RV 'but.' Shall be for many days] RV 'belongeth to many days to come,' to a future remote from Daniel's time.

CHAPTER 9

THE SEVENTY WEEKS

In the first year of Darius the Mede, Daniel, studying the prophetic books, finds that Jeremiah has predicted that the desolation of Jerusalem will last for seventy years (vv. 1, 2). He prays, confessing the great sin of Israel, and entreating God to have mercy on His people (vv. 3-19). Thereupon the angel Gabriel explains to him (vv. 20-24) that Jeremiah's seventy years are seventy 'weeks,' or 'sevens,' of years (=490 years), which are to be made up of (7+62+1) 'weeks.' The seven 'weeks' begin with 'the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem,' and end with 'the anointed one, the prince,' and the sixty-two 'weeks' include the building of the city in troublous times (v. 25). The events of the last 'week' are more minutely described. An anointed one is cut off, and a hostile prince destroys the city and the sanctuary (v. 26). He makes a covenant with many for the one 'week'; for the half of the 'week' he makes the sacrifice and oblation to cease, an 'abomination of desolation' appears, and finally the desolator comes to a sudden end (v. 27).

Interpretation. The interpretation of this c. is not without difficulty on any view of the book. Its explanation of the 70 years (Jer 25^{11,12} 29¹⁰) is of course an artificial one. Jeremiah meant that the dominion of Babylon over all the nations of Western Asia would last for 70 years from the fourth year of Jehoiakim (605 B.C.) (Jer 25^{1,11}), 70 years being a round number for two generations: cp. the 40 years of Ezk 4⁶ 29^{11,13}. In this c. the meaning is extended so as to refer to the humiliation of Jerusalem under a long succession of heathen powers. There are two main interpretations to be considered. The first places the beginning of the last 'week' in the time of Christ, and starts in its reckoning of the 70 'weeks' from the mission of Ezra (458 B.C.) or that of Nehemiah (444 B.C.). But though the end of the 70 'weeks' is to be placed 490 instead of 70 years after Jeremiah's time, yet the beginning of this period ought to coincide more closely with the beginning of Jeremiah's 70 years. And apart from other difficulties this view fails to give any clear explanation of the different events of the last 'week.' The death of Christ abolished the OT. sacrifices not merely for 'half a week' but for ever, while the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.) was much more than seven years (one 'week') after the crucifixion. The second interpretation finds in the events of the last 'week' another picture of the last seven years of Antiochus Epiphanes, and in the first seven 'weeks' the time (49 years) between the captivity (586 B.C.) and the edict of Cyrus (538 B.C.). That the Jews already reckoned Jeremiah's 70 years from the date of the final captivity is shown by 2 Ch 36^{20,21}. The difficulty of this view relates to the 62 'weeks.' The time from the edict of Cyrus (538 B.C.) to the beginning of the last seven years of Antiochus Epiphanes (171 B.C.) is only 367 years, which is less than 62 'weeks' (434 years) by 67 years. To this it may be replied either that the 62 'weeks' are merely a broken period, not to be reckoned exactly, or that the writer of Daniel was not in a position to know the precise length of this interval. Josephus and other writers make similar errors in the chronology of that time.

1. Darius] see on 5³¹. Chaldeans] Here in the national sense. 2. Books] RV 'the books,' evidently referring to a collection of sacred writings. The Canon of the Prophets was not completed at the time assigned to Daniel.

4-19. The prayer of Daniel contains many expressions found elsewhere in the OT., which may be traced by the aid of a reference Bible. 21. Being caused to fly swiftly] RM 'being sore wearied.' For Gabriel see 8¹⁶.

24. Seventy weeks] or, 'sevens'—490 years.

The expressions that follow certainly form a true description of the results of the sacrifice of Christ, but their terms are general, and they contain nothing that is not included in the pictures of the Messianic salvation which all the prophets connected with the restoration of the Jews to God's favour: see Isa 43 32^{16,17} 45 17 63²¹. To finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins] to bring Israel's time of guilt and punishment to an end. To bring in everlasting righteousness] to introduce a new era of obedience. To seal up the vision and prophecy] read, 'to seal' (ratify) 'vision and prophecy,' to fulfil the anticipations of all the prophetic books. To anoint the most Holy (RV 'holy') to consecrate a most holy thing, an altar or a sanctuary.

25. The going forth of the commandment, etc.] Jeremiah's prophecy of restoration (Jer 29¹⁰⁻¹⁴ 31³⁸⁻⁴⁰), viewed as delivered at the time of the captivity. The Messiah, the Prince] RV 'the anointed one, the prince.' Probably Cyrus, who is called God's anointed in Isa 45¹. Possibly Joshua the high priest, or Zerubbabel (Ezr 3² Hag 2²⁰⁻²³ Zech 3 1-10 6 10-15). Seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks] read, 'seven weeks; and for threescore and two weeks, etc. The 7 'weeks' refer to what precedes, the 62 'weeks' to what follows. The street . . times] RV 'it' (the city) 'shall be built again, with street and moat, even in troublous times' (the days of Ezra and Nehemiah).

26. After threescore, etc.] RV 'after the threescore,' etc. Messiah] RV 'the' (better, 'an') 'anointed one.' A different person from the 'anointed one' of v. 25 is evidently meant. The one appears at the end of 7, and the other at the end of 69 'weeks.' The reference is probably to the high priest Onias III, who was deposed by Antiochus in 175 B.C., and murdered by a rival in 171 B.C. (2 Mac 4⁷⁻⁹, 23-27, 32-33). But not for himself] RV 'and shall have nothing,' an obscure phrase, meaning perhaps, 'shall have no legitimate successor.' The prince that shall come] Antiochus Epiphanes. See on 8¹¹.

The end thereof] RV 'his end.' Unto the end of the war] RV 'Even unto the end' (see 8^{17,19}) 'shall be war.'

27. Confirm the covenant] RV 'make a firm covenant.' There was a party among the Jews which supported the heathenising policy of Antiochus: see 1 Mac 1¹¹⁻¹³. One week] The last seven years of the reign of Antiochus (171-164 B.C.). In the midst (RV 'for the half') of the week] The same period of 3½ years elsewhere assigned to the profanations of Antiochus: see 7²⁵ 8¹⁴ 12⁷. Sacrifice and . . oblation] see on 8¹¹, and cp. 11³¹ 12¹¹. For the overspreading of abominations, etc.] A slight change in the Heb. gives the clearer sense 'and in its place shall be the abomination that maketh desolate': see on 8¹³, and cp. 11³¹ 12¹¹. Desolate] RV 'desolator,' Antiochus.

CHAPTERS 10-12

THE FINAL VISION

These chs. form a connected whole, with three sub-divisions. Chs. 10¹-11¹ are introductory; chs. 11²-12⁴ contain a detailed account of future events down to the 'time of the end.' This time is further defined in the concluding section, c. 12⁵⁻¹³.

(a) Introduction (chs. 10¹-11¹)

In the third year of Cyrus, after three weeks of mourning and fasting, Daniel has a vision by the river Hiddekel of a glorious angelic being (vv. 1-10), who addresses him in encouraging words (vv. 11, 12). This angel has been delayed by a conflict with the guardian angel of Persia, in which he has been helped by Michael, the guardian angel of the Jews. He is about to return to the conflict, and will afterwards have to oppose the guardian angel of Greece (vv. 13-21). Michael has formerly been indebted to the speaker for help (11¹).

This conception of guardian or patron angels of the different nations is not found elsewhere in the OT., but is prominent in the book of Enoch (chs. 6-15).

1. The third year of Cyrus] 536 B.C., the latest date mentioned in Daniel's life. But the time appointed was long] RV 'Even a great warfare.' 4. Hiddekel] the Tigris (Gn 2¹¹): see on 8². 7. Cp. Ac 9⁷. 9. See 8¹⁸. 11. Cp. Ezk 2¹. 12. For thy words] RV 'for thy words' sake.'

13. Prince] guardian angel: cp. vv. 20, 21, 12¹. One and twenty days] the period of Daniel's fasting (v. 2). The conflict with the angel of Persia explains the speaker's delay.

Michael] a second angelic name. In Daniel Michael is the guardian angel of the Jews (v. 21, 12¹). One of the chief princes] a distinction in rank among the angels is here recognised, which other apocalyptic books carry out in great detail. In Jude v. 9 (in a quotation from the Assumption of Moses) Michael is called an 'archangel,' and in Rev 12⁷ he appears as a leader among the angels.

Remained] RM 'was not needed.' The arrival of Michael enabled the speaker to come to Daniel.

20. Grecia] RV 'Greece.' The interests of the Jews would have to be maintained against the Persian and Greek powers in succession. 21. Scripture] RV 'writing,' the book of destiny. In these things] RV 'against these' (the 'princes' of Persia and Greece).

C. 11. 1. Darius the Mede] see on 5³¹.

Him] Michael.

(b) History of Persia, Greece, Syria, and Egypt (chs. 11²-12⁴)

The angel describes the reigns of the first Persian kings up to the Greek wars of Xerxes I (11²). Then he passes to the conquests of Alexander the Great (v. 3) and the subdivision of his empire (v. 4). Next follows a very minute account of various episodes in the history of the Greek kingdoms of Syria and Egypt (the kings of the N. and S. respectively, vv. 5-20). Finally we have a full description of the career and fate of Antiochus Epiphanes (vv. 21-45), and a picture of the troubles which will follow his death and will usher in the resurrection and the reward of the righteous (12¹⁻⁴).

It has been supposed by some that vv. 36-45, on account of their resemblance to 7²⁵ 9^{26,27}, refer not to Antiochus, but to Antichrist, but this view does violence to the plain continuity of the sense. The resemblances only go to prove that the other passages allude not to Antichrist but to Antiochus.

2. Yet three kings] in succession to Cyrus who is already reigning (10¹). The three are Cambyses, Darius I (Hystaspes), and Xerxes I (Ahasuerus). The fourth] including Cyrus I, is Xerxes I, who was a king of vast wealth, and prepared a great army and navy for the invasion of Greece (Herod. vii, 20-29). The expedition was an utter failure, and the battles of Thermopylae and Salamis (480 B.C.) and those of Plataea and Mycale (489 B.C.) are among the most glorious events in Greek history. 3. A mighty king] Alexander the Great (333-322 B.C.). 4. The partition of Alexander's empire is described: see c. 8^{s, 22}.

5-20. Along with the notes on these vv. the table of Syrian and Egyptian kings on p. 538 should be consulted.

5. The king of the south] Ptolemy I (Soter), the first Egyptian king. One of his princes] Seleucus I (Nicator), the first Syrian king, was originally an officer under Ptolemy I. He] Seleucus. Above him] above Ptolemy.

6. The king's daughter of the south] Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy II (Philadelphus) was given in marriage to Antiochus II (Theos), the king of the north, who divorced his former wife Laodice. On the death of Ptolemy II Antiochus divorced Berenice and took Laodice back. Laodice poisoned Antiochus, and their son Seleucus (afterwards Callinicus) murdered Berenice and her child. She shall not retain . . she shall be given up] allusions to the fate of Berenice. Neither shall he stand] referring to the murder of Antiochus by Laodice. He that begat her, and he, etc.] read, 'he that begat her and strengthened her.' Ptolemy II is meant.

7, 8. Ptolemy III (Euergetes), the brother of Berenice, in revenge for his sister's death, invaded Syria (then ruled by Seleucus II, Callinicus), captured Seleucia, and returned to Egypt with much spoil. 7. A branch of her (Berenice's) roots] her brother Ptolemy III.

In his estate (RV 'place') in place of Ptolemy II. The fortress] Seleucia. 8. Continue more years than] RV 'refrain some years from.' 9. Seleucus II (Callinicus) invaded Egypt in 242 B.C., but had to retreat.

So the king of the south, etc.] RV 'And he' (Seleucus II) 'shall come into the realm of the king of the south' (Ptolemy III).

10-12. Seleucus II (Callinicus) was succeeded by his two sons, Seleucus III (Ceraunus) and Antiochus III (the Great). The war described was really conducted by the latter. After some preliminary campaigns, Antiochus III was defeated by Ptolemy IV (Philopator) at Raphia (217 B.C.).

10. But his sons] Seleucus III and Antiochus III, the sons of Seleucus II. And one] RV 'which.' Then shall he] RV 'and they shall.' His (Ptolemy's) fortress] probably Gaza. 11. And he (Antiochus) shall set forth . . into his (Ptolemy's) hand] alluding to the battle of Raphia. 12. Refers to Ptolemy IV.

13, 14. Twelve years later Antiochus joined with Philip, king of Macedon, in an attack on Ptolemy V (Epiphanes), the son of Ptolemy IV.

13. After certain years] The actual interval was 12 years. 14. Many] referring to the Macedonian and other allies of Antiochus III. The robbers, etc.] RV 'the children of the violent among thy people.' The allusion seems to be to some faction among the Jews, which took the side of Syria, and thus helped indirectly to 'fulfil the vision' by establishing the power afterwards abused by Antiochus Epiphanes.

15, 16. Scopas, a general of Ptolemy V, was shut up by Antiochus III in Sidon, and compelled to surrender after a siege (198 B.C.) Antiochus then overran Palestine and entered Egypt.

15. The most fenced cities] RV 'a well fenced city,' Sidon.

16. He that cometh] Antiochus III. Against him] against Ptolemy V. The glorious land] Palestine: see 8^v. So in v. 41. Which . . consumed] RV 'and in his hand shall be destruction.'

17. Antiochus III now gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage to Ptolemy V. And upright ones with him; thus shall he do' read, with LXX, 'but shall make an agreement with him' (Ptolemy V).

Corrupting her] better, 'to destroy it.' Antiochus in this alliance aimed at the ultimate conquest of Egypt.

18, 19. Antiochus III next overran Asia Minor and invaded Greece. This brought him into contact with the Romans, by whose general, Lucius Cornelius Scipio, he was defeated at Magnesia in Asia Minor. Three years later he was slain in Persia (187 B.C.).

18. The isles] RM 'coastlands,' the countries on the shore of the Aegean Sea.

A prince for his own behalf] RM 'a captain,' the Roman general Scipio. Without his own reproach, etc.] RV 'Yea, moreover, he (Scipio) 'shall cause his reproach' (the insults of Antiochus to the Romans) 'to turn upon him.'

19. Fort (RV 'fortresses') of his own land] After his defeat at Magnesia Antiochus withdrew to Syria.

20. Antiochus III was succeeded by Seleucus IV (Philopator), who sent his chief minister Heliodorus to take possession of the Temple treasures at Jerusalem (2 Mac 3). Heliodorus murdered Seleucus IV and attempted to usurp the kingdom, but was dispossessed by Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), the brother of Seleucus.

Estate] RV 'place'—in place of Antiochus III. A raiser of taxes in] RV 'one' (Seleucus IV) 'that shall cause an exactor' (Heliodorus) 'to pass through.' The glory of the (Syrian) kingdom] Palestine: see v. 16.

21-45. Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) (176-161 B.C.).

21-24. A general account of Antiochus, describing his accession, his deceitful policy.

his hostility to the Jewish religion, his prosperity and his ambitious plans.

21. Vile] RV 'contemptible.' Shall not give] RV 'had not given.' Though Antiochus seized the kingdom, the real heir was Demetrius, the son of Seleucus IV: see on 7²¹.

Peaceably] RV 'in time of security'; so in v. 24: cp. 8²⁵. 22. They] the opponents of Antiochus. The prince of the covenant] the high priest Onias III, deposed by Antiochus in 175 B.C.: see on 9²⁶.

25-27. The first campaigns of Antiochus in Egypt. The king of Egypt was now Ptolemy VI (Philometor), the son of Ptolemy V and Cleopatra (see on v. 17), and thus the nephew of Antiochus. In 170 B.C. Ptolemy was preparing to recover Palestine, but was attacked by Antiochus, who defeated and captured him. Physcon, the brother of Ptolemy VI, was proclaimed king by the Egyptians, and Antiochus in 169 B.C. again made war on Egypt, pretending to act in the interest of Ptolemy VI, whose friend he now appeared to be.

26. The defeat of Ptolemy VI in 170 B.C. is traced to the treachery of his subjects.

Overflow] rather, 'be swept away.'

27. Describes the friendship which was afterwards professed between Antiochus and Ptolemy, but which was insincere on both sides.

28. Returning from Egypt after his first campaign Antiochus heard of disturbances at Jerusalem, due to the struggles of two rivals for the office of high priest. He came to the city, slew many of the Jews, entered the Temple, and carried away the greater part of its sacred vessels and other treasures to Antioch (1 Mac 1²⁰⁻²⁸ 2 Mac 5¹¹⁻¹⁶).

29, 30^a. Another Egyptian campaign of Antiochus. This was caused by the news that Ptolemy VI and his brother Physcon had been reconciled. The Romans, however, interfered. Their legate Q. Popilius Lænas met Antiochus four miles from Alexandria and demanded the recall of his forces. When Antiochus said that he would take time to consider, the Roman legate drew a circle round him in the sand with his staff, and insisted on his replying before he should leave the spot. Antiochus then yielded and withdrew (168 B.C.).

29. As the former, etc.] RV 'in the latter time as it was in the former.' 30. Ships of Chittim] the Roman fleet. Chittim is Cyprus.

30^b-35. The persecution of the Jews by Antiochus. After the failure of his Egyptian campaign he vented his disappointment and anger on the Jews, who resisted his attempts to introduce heathen worship among them (1 Mac 1²⁹⁻⁴⁴). In particular he abolished the Temple sacrifices (1 Mac 1⁴⁵), and on the 15th of Chisleu (December), 168 B.C., he caused a small heathen altar to be set up on the great altar of burnt offering (1 Mac 1⁵⁴). This altar was used for sacrifice on the 25th of the same month (1 Mac 1⁵⁹). The severest measures were taken against those who adhered to the practices of the Jewish religion.

30. Intelligence with] RV 'regard unto.' Antiochus favoured the apostate Jews who supported his policy: see 9²⁷. 31. See 8^{11,18} 9²⁷. 32. The people, etc.] referring to the heroic resistance of the Jews, even to death (1 Mac 1⁶²⁻⁶⁴). 33. Understand] RV 'be wise.' Similarly in v. 35: see 12^{8,10}.

34. A little help] the Maccabæan revolt (1 Mac 2-4). Many... flatteries] The strict Jewish party had insincere adherents of its own. 35. The martyrs included leaders whose death tested and developed the faithfulness of their followers. The time of the end] see 8^{17,19} 9²⁶.

36-39. The blasphemous pride of Antiochus.

36. According to his will] like Alexander the Great (8⁴ 11³) and Antiochus the Great (11¹⁰). And magnify himself, etc.] Antiochus IV called himself on his coins Basileus Antiochus Theos Epiphanes ('King Antiochus, God Manifest'). The indignation] of God against Israel: see 8¹⁹. That that (RV 'which') is determined] see 9²⁷. 37. The God (RV 'gods') of his fathers] All the Greek kings of Syria were heathens, but Antiochus honoured the Greek Zeus (Jupiter) more than the Syrian deities of his forefathers. The desire of women] probably the Syrian god Thammuz, who was specially worshipped by women (Ezk 8¹⁴). 38. In his estate (RV 'place']) instead of Thammuz. The God (RV 'god') of forces (RV 'fortresses']) probably Zeus (Jupiter), to whom Antiochus built a temple at Daphne near Antioch. 39. Whom he shall acknowledge, etc.] RV 'Whosoever acknowledgeth him he will increase.' Gain] RV 'a price.' Offices were disposed of for bribery.

40-43. A final Egyptian campaign of Antiochus. He invades Egypt with a great army and navy. Palestine is overrun and many countries are overthrown, but Edom, Moab, and Ammon escape. The treasures of Egypt are seized, and the conquest extends westwards to Libya and southwards to Ethiopia. Nothing is known of this expedition from contemporary historians.

40. At the time of the end] This expedition introduces the historical crisis which terminates Daniel's prospect of the future.

44, 45. The sudden end of Antiochus. He is recalled from Egypt by tidings of trouble in his Asiatic dominions, returns in anger and encamps between the Mediterranean and Jerusalem, and perishes helplessly. The death of Antiochus actually took place at Tabæ in Persia (164 B.C.). The vague account of his end is in striking contrast with the minute historical description of the rest of his reign, and suggests that the author is here writing of the future and not of the past. For the bearing of this on the date of the book see Intro.

45. Seas in] RV 'sea and.'

C. 12. 1-4. These vv. describe the final tribulation of Israel which follows the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, the deliverance of the faithful Jews, the subsequent resurrection of the dead, both good and evil, and the glorious reward of the righteous, especially of their eminent leaders. The last-mentioned ideals are part of the Christian faith, but, in accordance with the limited view of all OT. prophecy, they are presented in connexion with the Jewish race, and without reference to their distance from the prophet's horizon.

1. Michael] see on 10¹³. His intervention at this point indicates a special crisis in the fortunes of the Jews. The book] cp. 7¹⁰.

2. Many] The resurrection contemplated is not universal, though it will include both the righteous and the wicked. 3. They that be wise] see 11^{33,35}. 4. Knowledge] better, with LXX, 'evils.' The last half of the v.

sums up the confusions and calamities of the long period which has been described, between Daniel's days and the 'time of the end.'

(c) Concluding Explanations (12⁵⁻¹³)

The angel who has spoken throughout the vision has now two companions, one on either side of the river. In reply to one of these he states that 'a time, times, and an half' shall elapse before the end to which the vision points. In answer to Daniel he explains that from the taking away of the daily sacrifice and the setting up of the abomination of desolation 1,290 days are first to be reckoned, and then 45 days more, making in all 1,335 days. The 1,290 days seem to correspond to the general distress under Antiochus Epiphanes, and the 45 days to the further period of tribulation spoken of in v. 1. As the author is here writing of the actual future no exact correspondence of these numbers with historical dates is to be looked for.

9. repeats v. 4, and 10. repeats 11³³.

10. The wise] RV 'they that be wise,' as in 11^{33,35} 12⁸. 11. See 8^{11,13} 9²⁷ 11³¹.

HOSEA

INTRODUCTION

1. The Man and his Message. The book of Hosea is for several reasons one of exceptional interest. With that of Amos, his older contemporary, it marks the beginning of literary, as distinct from purely oral, prophecy. By this is not meant that Hosea was a composer in the sense that the word would be applied to a Macaulay or a Bishop Butler; but that his discourses, some or all of them at first delivered orally, were afterwards written down in a collected form, together with such incidents of his life as had a direct bearing upon his teaching. This fact is of great importance. We know that Elijah and Elisha exercised a great influence upon the religious history of their time; but we can only to a small extent gauge that influence, because we can form only a crude notion of what their teaching was really like. It is their acts, rather than their words, which claim the reader's interest. With Hosea it is very different. It is impossible not to see that he was a living force; and if his actual influence was not great, that was due to no weakness or omission on his part, but to the fatuity and moral degradation of the people.

Like Amos Hosea was a prophet to the northern kingdom, but unlike him he was also a prophet of the north. His sympathy was unquestionably with Israel: the fortunes of Judah have only a subordinate interest for him. His mission was to check, if possible, the growing corruption of morals, religion, and politics; and to rouse the nation to repentance, in order to ward off the impending catastrophe. The nation had acquired great prosperity and wealth under Jeroboam II: but these, without moral character and religious purity, only tended to disruption and decline.

What gives quite a unique and pathetic interest to the book is the personal history of the prophet, and its influence on the form which his early and, to some extent, all his teaching took. Other prophets performed various symbolical acts to explain or enforce their teaching (see e.g. Isa 20^{2,3} Jer 13¹⁴ Ezk 4), but Hosea's domestic life was itself an acted parable. Sweet and noble as that life was, its importance, as the prophet understood it, lay not in itself, but in the religious truth which it symbolically expressed. In early life he married a woman who proved a faithless wife, and he seems to have made many fruitless efforts to reclaim her (1^{2,3}).

After bearing him three children, to whom he gave symbolic names, she deserted him for her lovers (2²). So forbearing was he, however, that he redeemed her for the price of a slave (3¹), and tried to win her back to purity and love by gentle restraint (3³).

As Hosea looked abroad on the idolatry and wickedness of his time, he realised that 'the state was the individual writ large,' and that here was being repeated on a larger scale his own domestic tragedy. In Gomer's unfaithfulness to him, he saw a parable of Israel's unfaithfulness to God; in his own love and tenderness, he saw the reflection of God's love to Israel; and in his own forgiveness and continued efforts for his wife's salvation, he saw a parallel to Jehovah's loving-kindness and tender mercy towards the faithless nation (3³⁻⁵). Israel, the paramour of heathen gods, had been wooed and wedded by Jehovah, but had proved faithless, going back again to idols, and coquetting with foreign powers. But ever and again, and now most of all, Jehovah was seeking to win the nation back; even though, as with Gomer, a painful discipline might be necessary (4¹⁻⁴).

Tenderness may, in fact, be described as the keynote of Hosea's prophecy. It was a necessary attribute of God, without which He would not be true to Himself. Those who imagine that the God of the Old Testament is only a God of justice and wrath might well study this book attentively.

Though we find no such definite Messianic pictures as those of Isaiah, more than once the prophet foretells the restoration of Israel from captivity, the union of Israel and Judah in one kingdom under a Davidic king, and the establishment of a purer worship and a fuller knowledge of God, as constituting a glorious hope. This hope appears sometimes as imminent, as succeeding a short period of captivity, or even as an alternative to it; sometimes as belonging to a far-off, or possibly ideal, future: see especially 1^{10,11} 3⁵ 6¹⁻³ 14⁴⁻⁸. St. Paul explains some of Hosea's prophecies as fulfilled in the Christian church: see Ro 9^{25,26} 1 Cor 15⁵⁵.

The style of the book is very terse and difficult, and marked by rapid changes of thought and feeling. In some cases it may be conjectured that we have before us fragments of teaching, rather than complete discourses. In many verses the meaning is so obscure that the explanations offered must be regarded as far from certain. In some few no really satisfactory explanation has been yet given, and that partly because our knowledge of many of the events alluded to is very meagre.

2. The Historical Situation. Hosea lived and prophesied in the last period of the northern kingdom of Israel, and probably witnessed, perhaps even shared, the captivity. His work began in the closing years of Jeroboam II (782-741), and was continued under his successors: see 1¹. In Jeroboam's hands the government was firm and stable, and the northern kingdom extended its boundaries as far as the borders of Hamath (2 K 14²⁵) on the north, and to the Dead Sea and 'the brook of the wilderness' (Am 6¹⁴) on the south. The death of Jeroboam was followed by a period of anarchy and terror, which was only ended by the Assyrian captivity. Zechariah, the son of Jeroboam, reigned for only six months, when his career was closed by assassination at the hands of Shallum, an adventurer, who mounted the throne only to be slain and succeeded a month later by Menahem, the general commanding the troops at Tirzah (2 K 15¹⁰⁻¹⁴ Hos 7³⁻⁷). In order to strengthen his position, Menahem seems to have asked assistance from Tiglath-pileser III, king of Assyria (the Pul of 2 K 15¹⁹), who took advantage of the weakness of the king's position to claim a tribute. Menahem's reign extended only over four or five years. He was succeeded by his son Pekahiah (2 K 15²³), who reigned two years when Pekah, one of his generals, murdered him in his palace and seized the throne. Pekah was probably the leader of the party in the state that was opposed to Menahem's alliance with Assyria, and preferred to seek the aid of Assyria's rival Egypt (Hos 7¹¹). In 735 Pekah joined with Rezin of Damascus in an expedition against Ahaz, king of Judah (2 K 16⁵ Isa 7¹⁻⁹). Ahaz invoked Assyrian aid, and Tiglath-pileser came to his assistance, ravaging Galilee and Gilead (2 K 15²⁹), and taking the inhabitants into captivity. Pekah, who had reigned for about three years, fell a victim to a conspiracy headed by Hoshea, whom the Assyrian ruler recognised as king. Hoshea ruled quietly for nine years (731-722); but, on the death of Tiglath-pileser, he entered into a conspiracy with Sereb or So, king of Egypt, and ceased his tribute to Assyria. Shalmaneser, the new king of Assyria, thereupon invaded his territory, and laid siege to Samaria, which fell to his successor Sargon (722), when the kingdom of Israel came to an end.

3. Politics and Religion. There seem to have been two political parties in the kingdom of Israel in the latter years of the nation, just as there were in the kingdom of Judah, one of which favoured alliance with Assyria, the other alliance with Egypt and resistance to Assyria (Hos 7¹¹). Sometimes one of these was in the ascendant and sometimes the other, but the prophets looked upon the policies of both parties as unfaithfulness to God (Hos 8⁹). Isaiah told the people of Judah that their true policy was to trust in Jehovah, and not entangle themselves in foreign bonds. The prophets of Israel took up a similar attitude, and maintained that every movement after outside help was a movement away from God, who would watch over them and preserve them, if they repented and put their trust in Him.

The religious condition was also extremely corrupt. Worship was offered to Jehovah at many high places throughout the land. These were probably in many cases the old Canaanite shrines, and it was but natural that when the Israelites first came into possession of the land they should worship Jehovah at the places where the Canaanites had worshipped their gods. In Hos 10's day Jehovah was worshipped at these high places. He was symbolised by the figure of a bull—the natural symbol to an agricultural people of life and power. Jeroboam I set up two such symbols, one at Bethel and one at Dan, where he established the northern kingdom; and in all probability similar symbols were erected at other holy places: cp. Am 4¹ 5⁵ Hos 4¹⁵ 5¹⁰⁻¹² 12¹¹. The temptation to combine the worship of Jehovah with elements borrowed from the worship of the Canaanite nature-gods was too strong for the Israelites, who had adopted many of the old religious festivals in celebration of the agricultural seasons.

Their familiarity with the worship of the Canaanite local deities or Baalim (Hos 2¹⁷) made the lapse into idolatry easy for them, especially as the Israelites were in the habit of addressing Jehovah as Baal (my Lord) (2¹⁶), a title innocent and proper enough in itself, but improper and dangerous in view of its heathen application. It was no great step from worshipping Jehovah symbolised by a bull to worshipping the bull-image as a symbol of the local Baal: consequently they came to identify Jehovah with the local deity, and assimilated the worship of God to the worship of the Baalim in such a way that the former was practically lost sight of, and they became to all intents and purposes idolaters (2⁹). 'For they served idols, whereof the Lord said unto them. Ye shall not do this thing' (2 K 17¹²). This worship of the bull-images (or 'calves,' as AV renders) is the idolatry which Hosea so vehemently denounces (4^{12, 17} 8³ 9¹⁰ 10^{1, 2} 11² 13^{1, 2, 8}).

The religious condition of the people was reflected in their moral state. The sanctuaries were scenes not only of idolatry, but of gross immorality. The whoredom and adultery of which Hosea speaks (4¹⁰⁻¹⁵ 5^{3, 4}, etc.) are not only figurative of the departure of Israel from the service of God; they are also descriptive of actual moral degradation. The priests were men of no principle (4⁹); they let the people destroy themselves for lack of teaching (4⁶); they rejoiced at the sin of the people, because they benefited by their sin-offerings (4⁸); and they provided temptations to induce them to evil (5¹). And so it came to pass, as the proverb has it, 'like people, like priest' (4⁹). The worshippers were only too ready to abandon themselves to the sensual rites of debasing worship, and thus degradation and decay spread through the nation. 'The heathenish, secular worship and heathen immorality overpowered it, and brought about the premature dissolution of the state.'

4. Contents. The book falls into two parts.

1. Chs. 1-3 describe in different ways and at different stages the domestic tragedy of Hosea's life and its symbolical interpretation.

2. Chs. 4-14 contain separate prophecies dealing with Israel's moral, religious, and political faults, the impending calamity, and the possibility of averting it by repentance or recovering from it after punishment has done its work.

The first part belongs to the time of Jeroboam II (see 1¹), when the judgment had not yet overtaken the dynasty of Jehu (1¹); the second, for the most part at least, to that of his immediate successors, but especially Menahem. There are passages which imply a change of dynasty effected by violence (cp. 8⁴ and 7⁷) a state of general disorder such as is naturally associated with a weak government (4^{10, 15} 6^{3, 10}, etc.) and the heavy taxation exacted under Menahem (7⁹⁻¹¹ 8¹⁰).

CHAPTERS 1-21

HOSEA'S MARRIAGE AND ITS LESSONS

1. A general heading. 2-9. The prophet's marriage with Gomer, the birth of her three children, and the symbolical meaning attached to them. 10-C. 21. The future material and religious prosperity of the people.

1. A general heading, perhaps the work of a late Judean editor. Chs. 1-3 probably belong to the time of Jeroboam II; but it is extremely improbable that any of the prophecies belong to so late a date as the days of Hezekiah, when the punishment foretold at the hands of Tiglath-pileser (Pul) had already been partially fulfilled on Israel (2 K 15²⁹). That Hosea wrote the book is clear from 3¹.

2. The beginning. . . LORD] RV 'When the Lord spake at the first by Hosea.' A wife of whoredoms] Hosea is probably speaking in the light of his later experiences. His wife was probably innocent of this evil when he married her—or if not the prophet was ignorant of her true character.

4. For the giving of names for a prophetic purpose cp. Isa 7³⁻¹⁴ 8¹⁻⁴. The name Jezreel ('God will sow') signified, (1) the town which was the capital of Israel during Jehu's dynasty, and the scene of the murders by which he established his rule (2K9); (2) the resowing of the restored Israel (v. 11). The name was given to the child as a reminder of the punishment due for the massacre. I will avenge the blood] This prophecy was fulfilled by the overthrow of the ruling dynasty when Jeroboam's son, Zechariah, had reigned six months: see 2K15¹⁰, and cp. Am7⁹. Hosea looks at Jehu's murders from a different point of view from that of Elisha and the editors of the book of Kings: see especially 2K10³⁰. They regarded chiefly his outward religious policy and his probably genuine detestation of Baal-worship. Hosea sees mainly the motives of personal ambition and lust of cruelty which underlay his actions. Time had shown that neither Jehu nor his descendants had justified his zeal by any high religious principle. Will cause to cease] This and v. 5 extend the prophecy to the final destruction of the kingdom at the hands of the Assyrians: see 2K17⁶. The valley of Jezreel was the battlefield of Palestine, and nothing would seem more probable to the prophet than that the final overthrow would take place there.

6. Lo-ruhamah] i.e. 'not pitied.' But... away] RV 'that I should in any wise pardon them.' 7. The verdict on the kingdom of Judah is in the earlier portions of the book more favourable than in the later: cp. 5^{10,14}, etc. This prophecy was fulfilled by the destruction of Sennacherib's army (2K19³⁵).

9. Lo-ammi] i.e. 'not my people.' By their sin and perfidy Israel had ceased to act as God's people. They had refused the responsibilities of their calling, and could not expect its privileges.

10. Here, as elsewhere, Hosea cannot bear to dwell upon God's punishments without looking beyond them to His greater mercies. Here he evidently contemplates a restored people, fulfilling the promise of earthly greatness made to Abraham (Gn32¹²), and brought into even closer relation to God, that of sonship: cp. Ro9²⁶. Living God] i.e. God manifesting His power in action. 11. As with many other prophecies, the vision of the future includes the union once more of Israel and Judah in one people (cp. Isa11¹³ Ezk37¹⁹), a prophecy unfulfilled except so far as the church is symbolised by the whole of Israel. The day of Jezreel] The union of Israel and Judah is to be marked by a prosperity which shall take away the reproach from Jezreel (see on v. 4). This is more fully explained in 2²⁸.

C. 2. 1. Ammi... Ruhamah] This v. is closely connected with 1^{10,11}, and must be read along with them. As Jezreel is to become a name of honour in the predicted future, so also the old names of the other two children will have become quite inappropriate. The not will have to be omitted, and they will become 'My people,' 'Pitied.'

CHAPTER 2²⁻²³

THE DISCIPLINE AND RESTORATION OF FAITHLESS ISRAEL

The unfaithful conduct of Gomer and the prophet's gentle treatment of her are regarded as an analogue of the nation's faithlessness and God's gentle correction, a proof of the love which will triumph in the end. But the acted parable and its interpretation are so blended that they cannot always be separated; and frequently the prophet's personal experience is overshadowed by the larger thought of God's dealings with His people.

2. Plead] addressed to Gomer's sons. The people Israel in this acted allegory are sometimes the sons, as in 2¹, but more generally the wife. When as here distinguished we may suppose that the prophet is appealing to those willing to hear to remonstrate with the faithless majority. There is a somewhat similar mixture of figure in Isa62⁵. She is not my wife] The people by their idolatry had put themselves into a false relation with Jehovah. He was no longer their God, nor they His people: cp. 1⁹.

3, 4. As a punishment for her faithlessness, the country would be made desolate by an invading enemy, and the inhabitants slain with the sword. So would she be put to shame.

Children of whoredoms] By their idolatries the people had proved themselves to be children of other gods, the lovers of v. 5.

5. They worshipped the gods of the land—the local deities who were supposed to give abundant crops if propitiated. See Intro. They did not ascribe the fertility of the land to Jehovah, but to the local Baalim, who were personifications of the reproductive powers of nature, and in whose worship they had practically merged the worship of Jehovah.

6, 7. Through the disasters brought by a foreign enemy, including the siege of their cities, the people would discover the impotence of their idols, and seek Jehovah in earnest: cp. 14³, etc. Make a wall] RV 'make a fence against her.' 7. Lovers] i.e. the Baalim.

8. They prepared for Baal] RM 'made into the image of Baal.' How absurd and how insulting to use God's gift in this way!

9. Will I... take away] RV 'will I take back.' In the time thereof] i.e. when it should be ripe, the crop would fail. God would thus punish them for the abuse of His gift.

10. Her lovers] The idols would be ashamed, unable to help their devotees, when the land was laid waste. 11. Jehovah would put an end to her religious feasts of all kinds. New moons and sabbaths were the most distinctive feasts in connexion with the worship of Jehovah in the N. (1S20³ 2K12³).

12. Rewards] RV 'hire': the bribe for which Israel had worshipped the idols (lovers) under the mistaken belief that they gave them these things: see on v. 5.

13. Baalim] RV 'the Baalim,' i.e. the images of Baal: cp. v. 8. The allusion here is to heathen or heathenish festivals looked upon as acts of faithlessness to Jehovah. They are spoken of as past in relation to the future judgment which Hosea has in mind, or because idolatry had from the first been the besetting sin of the northern kingdom.

14. Therefore, etc.] 'This being her miserable condition, I will entice her to repent by gentle discipline.' The key to such expressions lies in the tenderness felt by Hosea for his sinning wife (see Intro.). The wilderness] either the land of captivity in which she realises her sin and turns to God, or the land wasted by the enemy. Men allure to destruction: God allures to punishment, to make the outpouring of love possible. Comfortably] Heb. 'to her heart,' as in Isa 40¹, etc. 15. I will give] The vineyards destroyed by the enemy (v. 12) would be restored. Achor] i.e. trouble. Achor was the valley where Achan was stoned for his sin (Josh 7²⁶). It was on this account called the valley of Achor, or trouble. What is meant by its use here is that, while the Israelites would find that as of old sin would be followed by punishment, the punishment was meant to purify and discipline, and the 'trouble' was thus the 'door of hope.' Though Israel had been again unfaithful, God was still 'plenteous in mercy.' Sing] RV 'make answer,' i.e. listen to the call of God. 16. Ishi.. Baali] Both words were used by a wife for her husband. The first, 'my man,' implied a relation of intimacy: the second, 'my lord,' that of servitude, or at least ownership. But the passage seems to imply that Baal, a common name for all heathen gods, had in common practice been used also of Jehovah. This would account for its appearing in several place-names, such as Baal-Hamon, Baal-Shalisha. 17. Baalim] RV 'the Baalim.' Whether they represented Jehovah or heathen gods, the names with their debasing associations would be utterly discarded.

18. Make a covenant] Jehovah is here represented poetically as making an agreement with, or laying a command upon, noxious animals, that they will not, it may be supposed, hurt either man or the fruits of his labours: cp. Isa 11⁹. Break the bow, etc.] destroy the weapons of warfare no longer needed in a land of security: cp. Isa 9⁵ (RV).

19, 20. The idols had hired Israel's love with gifts of worldly prosperity, and even these they could not really give (v. 12). Jehovah would woo Israel in the first place with much higher gifts, righteousness, judgment, etc.

21, 22. I will hear, etc.] The natural order of thought is reversed, because Jehovah (through the prophet) is speaking of His work. The whole thought is highly poetical. Jezreel ('God-soweth,' used for Israel, for the sake of the play on the word) cries for the corn and wine and oil. These cry to the earth to produce them. The earth in its turn cries to the heaven for rain, and the rain cries to Jehovah to send it. Jehovah hears the cry, and so the heart's desire of the people is granted, even without their expressly asking Jehovah for it.

23. I will sow] With reference to the name Jezreel see on 14. Jehovah promises the renewed increase of the population: cp. Jer 31²⁵.

I will have mercy] a repetition of the promises of 1¹⁰ 2¹.

CHAPTER 3

THE ATTEMPTS TO RECLAIM THE ERRING WIFE

In an episode in the life of Hosea and his relations with Gomer (cp. 2¹⁴) the prophet finds a parable of Jehovah's punishment of Israel. Having bought back his erring wife, as though she were a slave, he subjects her to gentle restraint, depriving her for a time of conjugal rights, in hope of securing her love (1-3). So Israel, deprived in exile of forms of government and of outward worship, would be ready to receive her true king and spouse (4, 5).

1. Her friend] rather, 'neighbour,' i.e. a guilty lover. To refer it to Hosea involves a clumsy tautology. Yet, etc.] RV 'and an adulteress, even as the LORD loveth.' The love of the prophet for his adulterous wife, here as before spoken of as a direct inspiration of God, is a symbol of the love of Jehovah for Israel, who nevertheless coquets with idols.

Flagons of wine] RV 'cakes of raisins,' such as were offered to idols. 2. Bought her] She appears to have become the voluntary slave concubine of her paramour. Fifteen.. silver] presumably the ordinary price for a female slave. Joseph was sold for twenty (Gn 37²⁵).

3. For me] i.e. as my property. For another man] RV 'any man's wife.' For awhile Gomer was to live as though unmarried.

4. Gomer's isolation is the symbol of that of exiled Israel, deprived of political organisation and religious services. Sacrifice, etc.] cp. 2¹¹. All forms of religious symbolism are included in this v. Image] RV 'pillar.' A religious symbol, probably borrowed from the Canaanites. Ephod] The word is most frequently used of the high priest's dress, but in Jg 8²⁷ of a golden or gold-plated image set up by Gideon, and that would appear to be the meaning here. Teraphim] small household images, probably something like Roman Lares: see Gn 31³⁴, Jer 17³, etc. Their use was probably general in early times. Even David did not discard them in his early life (18 19¹³), and they were in use at the time of Josiah's reformation in Judah (2 K 23²¹). 5. Return] often used of a new line of action or change of life: cp. 14⁷. David their king] The idolatrous worship of Israel was closely connected with their political schism: see 1 K 12²⁷⁻²⁹. Hosea contemplates once more a united kingdom under the Davidic monarchy. It is quite possible, however, that by David is here meant the Messiah; cp. Jer 30⁹ Ezk 34³⁴ 37²⁴. In the latter days] lit. 'In the after part of the days,' i.e. at the end of time, used of the Messianic age: cp. Isa 2² Mic 4¹.

CONDEMNATION OF THE PRIESTHOOD

An arraignment against Israel as a whole, because of all manner of wickedness against God and man. Prophet and priest, who ought to have taught them better, are only too like them in character, and must share their doom. In vv. 15-17 there is an appeal to Judah not to follow the idolatrous practices of Israel.

1. Controversy] i.e. a lawsuit: cp. Isa 3^{13,14}. 2. By swearing] RV 'There is nought but swearing.' Break out] commit acts of violence. Blood toucheth blood] The whole land is covered with the blood of the murdered, a strong expression to denote the frequency of murder: cp. Isa 28⁸. 3. The whole land (with its animal and vegetable life) is polluted by their sin, and must share their punishment: cp. Jer 4²³, etc. 4. Thy people, etc.] The reading here seems corrupt. We should probably read, 'thy people are as they that strive with Me. O priest, thou shalt stumble,' etc., vv. 5, 6 being addressed to the priest.

5. The prophet] i.e. the class of prophets who said what they knew would please their hearers: cp. 1 K 22^{11,12} Isa 30¹⁰ Jer 5³¹.

Mother] i.e. the nation: see on 2².

6. Lack of knowledge] The priests should have instructed the people in God's law (i.e. His moral teaching), and were therefore responsible for their ignorance. Instead of that they had wilfully refused even to learn themselves. Thy children] i.e. the whole body of priests, who only sinned worse as they increased in number. 8. They eat up] RV 'they feed on.' The priests enriched themselves with the sin-offerings, and with this aim encouraged instead of checking sin: cp. Ezk 34. Set their heart] i.e. took delight in, because it paid so well. 9. Like . . . priest] Priest and people had sinned alike, and would be punished alike. 10. Eat . . . enough, etc.] Greed and lust were both violations of God's natural laws, and would therefore have an unnatural result. 11. Heart] here probably as the seat of 'the understanding' (RV).

12. Cp. Jer 11²⁷. Idols were frequently made out of stumps and stems of trees, and were not only worshipped, but sometimes used for oracular purposes. Such a thing proved how senseless the people had become.

Whoredom is here faithlessness to Jehovah; but as such rites as those referred to were characterised by gross licentiousness, the metaphor is especially appropriate. 13. The summits of hills were the most frequent situations for sanctuaries in primitive times; hence the 'high places.' Elms] RV 'terebinths.' Trees were often connected with sacred rites: cp. Isa 1²⁹ 57⁵. Therefore] Such faithlessness towards Jehovah would be punished by the faithlessness of their daughters. 14. I will not punish] They have no right to ask Jehovah to punish sins in their daughters or their brides, which in another form they commit themselves in their impure rites.

15. Let . . . offend] Hosea appeals to Judah not to imitate Israel's sins. Gilgal (that of Benjamin: cp. 1 S 13⁸) and Bethel ('house of God,' here contemptuously called Beth-aven, 'house of vanity,' i.e. idolatry) were two of the most important Israelitish sanctuaries: see Am 4^{4,5}. The latter had been a sanctuary since the days of Jacob (Gn 28²² 35¹⁻⁸ Jg 21¹³). Nor swear . . . liveth] Hosea is here condemning the use of Jehovah's name in oaths, because that name has been so profaned by its association with idolatrous symbols. 16. Slideth back . . . heifer] RV 'hath behaved himself stubbornly like a stubborn heifer,' as yet not fully trained to bear the yoke, which jibs instead of going obediently forward. Now the LORD will feed them, etc.] better, 'now would the LORD feed them,' etc. He would gladly have treated them as docile lambs, not as stubborn heifers. Others understand it as an exclamation: 'Israel is stubborn and self-willed. How then can the Lord feed them as a lamb in a wide pasture!'

A large place] always in Scripture used as a symbol of safety (Ps 18¹⁹ 118⁵). 17. Ephraim] i.e. Israel. Let him alone] a general exhortation to any who might seek to meddle with idolatrous Israel.

18. Their drink is sour] RM 'their carousing is over.' Hosea is referring to some idolatrous festival. With shame . Give ye] RV 'dearly love shame,' with reference probably to licentious practices connected with idolatrous feasts.

19. Wings] RM 'skirts': a curious metaphor to express the completeness of their punishment. They would be carried off without reprieve by the wind of judgment. They . . . sacrifices] RM 'Their altars shall be put to shame,' i.e. by being destroyed.

CHAPTER 5

PREDICTIONS OF PUNISHMENT

The priests, the people, and the royal dynasty have alike sinned, and will alike be punished. Their coquetting with Assyria will prove utterly futile. Judah has also sinned, and will receive their punishment. But there is ever yet hope in the future, if they will but repent.

1. Toward you] RV 'unto you.' Judgment belongs to you by right, and having abused your privilege you deserve greater punishment.

Mizpah and Tabor are both spoken of as ancient sanctuaries: cp Jg 21^{1,8} 1S 7⁵⁻¹⁰, and see on 4¹³. The assemblies for religious and political purposes had been made occasions for robbing the people by unjust judgments and perhaps by extortionate demands for sacrifices: see on 4⁸. 2. Are profound . . slaughter] lit. 'have gone deep to slaughter,' i.e. have committed horrible slaughter. It refers probably to the violence of political factions: cp. 7⁷.

Though I have been] RV 'but I am.' Their violence will not escape punishment. Them all] priests, people, and rulers (v. 1).

3. I know . . from me] Israel and Ephraim are in this book synonymous. The people had corrupted themselves by sins of impurity, but Jehovah had seen it and would punish: cp. Ps 10¹⁴. 4. They . . doings] RV 'Their doings will not suffer them.' To repent would mean to give up their cherished vices. 5. The pride . . face] Worse still; they were actually proud of themselves and their doings. Their vaunting of their wickedness was its most obvious proof. 6. The time would come when they would in vain offer sacrifices to Jehovah.

7. Strange children] Some see here an allusion to intermarriage with the Canaanites: cp. Ezr 9, 10. But it may be merely metaphorical. The result of their faithless union with heathen gods was a race of people who were not true Israelites, acknowledged and loved of Jehovah. A month] RV 'the new-moon.' The profanation of their festivals would be punished by the enemy destroying them and their land.

Portions] RV 'fields.'

8. With this begins what is probably a new prophecy. Hosea ironically bids the herald call the people to arms to defend themselves against an invading foe. Gibeah ('a hill') and Ramah ('a high place') would both be suitable spots for sounding an alarm. Beth-aven] see on 4¹⁵. After thee . . Benjamin] RV 'behind thee,' etc. From Jg 5¹⁴ it is supposed that this was the battle cry of the Benjamites, used by the soldiers in following their leaders. It would have been a summons to the Benjamites to battle. 9. But such preparations would be quite useless. The judgment was surely coming.

10 The princes . . bound (RV 'landmark')]

They had abused their power to oppress and rob the people. The prophet here includes Judah in his denunciations and threats of consequent punishment. The Assyrians who demolished the northern kingdom crippled Judah in the days of Hezekiah. The deliverance of Judah, temporary as it in fact proved, was a later revelation of prophecy. 11. Broken in judgment] i.e. defeated in his suit and condemned. After the commandment] RM 'after vanity,' i.e. idolatry.

13. Assyrian . . Jareb] cp. 10⁶. This refers probably to Menahem paying voluntary tribute to Tiglath-pileser (Pul, 2K 15¹⁹). The name Jareb ('adversary') is coined by Hosea to point out the absurdity of their seeking help from such a source. In the words, when Judah saw his wound, Hosea seems to hint at a similar policy on the part of Judah, which was afterwards pursued by both Ahaz and Hezekiah (2K 16^{7,8} 18¹⁴⁻¹⁶). 14. See on v. 10. 15. The prophet still hopes that these calamities will produce repentance and the remission of the full calamity. Meanwhile Jehovah will leave them to the discipline of His punishment.

CHAPTER 6

THE SHALLOWNESS OF ISRAEL'S REPENTANCE

Hosea now represents the people as counselling one another to repentance in presence of the impending danger; and goes on to point out the futility of a hurried repentance, and the greatness of their sin.

2. After two days] This is probably a proverbial expression for a very short time.

3. Then . . know, etc.] RV 'And let us know, let us follow on.' His going forth] Just as the morning will dawn after the darkest night, so God will arise bringing brightness and hope. As the rain] The land of Palestine was absolutely dependent on its winter rains, the former rain beginning about the end of October with fair intervals which permitted the seed to be sown, becoming heavier about the end of December and continuing at intervals during the winter; the latter rain coming in showers in March and April refreshing the ripening crops.

4. The thought of the possible future stands in deep contrast to the gloomy present, and the note of joy passes into a note of wailing.

Morning cloud] As the morning cloud and the dew rapidly disappear, so the efforts of Israel after real goodness (especially 'kindness,' RM) lack endurance. 5. Hewed . . slain them] The prophets are here spoken of as themselves doing what their language threatened. Thy judgments . . forth] It is better to read with LXX, 'My judgment goeth forth as the light.' The reference is to the clear manifestation of the judgment.

- 6. God cared more for goodness and piety—the knowledge and doing of His will—than for formal offerings and sacrifice, and nothing at all for religious observances that were insincere and corrupt: cp. Isa 1¹³⁻¹⁵ 18¹⁵ 22. Our Lord twice quotes the first clause in justification of doing good on the sabbath day: cp. Mt 9¹³ 12⁷. 7. Like men] RV ‘like Adam.’ In regarding mere sacrifice as a substitute for goodness which God had made the condition of His covenant they had broken it as much as Adam had done by his disobedience: cp. Gn 2^{16,17} Ex 20²¹⁻²⁴ 11. There] in the land given them on condition of a good and holy life.

8. Gilead] cp. 12¹¹. Probably Ramoth-Gilead. Being a city of refuge it was doubtless the place of an early sanctuary. But holy cities were now become notorious for their wickedness. 9. In the way by consent] RV ‘in the way toward Shechem.’ At Shechem also, as we know from Josh 24¹, there was an ancient sanctuary. In the time of Jeroboam I it was the capital of the northern kingdom. Hosea here appears to refer to some definite act of robbery and murder in which some priests were actually implicated. 11. He hath set] RV ‘there is appointed.’ When I returned] RV ‘when I bring again.’ This v. is often understood of the harvest of judgment (cp. Joel 3¹³), but the phrase ‘to turn, or bring again, a nation’s captivity,’ means its restoration. The words, however, should probably be taken with what follows.

CORRUPTION OF THE COURT

In this c. the tone again becomes despondent. How can Israel be saved when her iniquity is so deep, so glaring, so obstinate? Samaria is especially instanced as the centre of a wicked and corrupt government sustained by a lawless people and false teachers. Hosea dwells chiefly on some plot which ended in regicide and the reliance on foreign powers which meant want of faith in God.

2. They fail to realise how patent in God’s sight their iniquity is, while they attempt to combine a profession of religion with sins of the worst type. Now they are ‘holden with the cords of their sins’ (Prov 5²²). 3. They induced their rulers not only to connive at, but to take part with delight in their wicked practices. 4. The fire of lust is likened to a baker’s oven. But the simile seems also to include the passion of anger which worked in the heart and produced acts of violence, such as regicide.

5-7. A scene from the palace. The king carouses with his courtiers, who have formed a plot against him, and wait the fitting moment to rise and put him to death. It would appear that Hosea has in his mind the assassination of a king at a feast, or just after a feast, in the early morning. The case is perhaps that of Zechariah, son of Jeroboam II (see Intro.).

5. The day . . king] some royal feast, probably the king’s birthday. Have . . wine] RV ‘made themselves sick with the heat of wine.’ By their drunken carouse they heaped up fuel on the fire of their malicious hate. He stretched out] i.e. in hospitality. The hand is stretched out by the host to offer the cup to his guests. Scorners] those who in their heart despise the king and are ever plotting his death. 6. Their baker] Perhaps we should follow the LXX, etc., and read, ‘their anger.’ Their anger sleeping would mean that they manage to control it, until it can work with effect. If we keep the reading ‘baker,’ it will mean that just as the baker sleeps when once he has made up his fire and heated his oven ready for use in the morning, so they wait for the morning to execute their purpose.

7. Judges . . kings] whatever definite event the prophet has in his mind this describes the general character of the northern kingdom, a restless disloyalty to kings and rulers. The only dynasties of any duration were those of Omri and Jehu. None . . calleth unto me] Irreligion lay at the root of this constant disloyalty.

8. Ephraim, he hath mixed himself among the people] RV ‘the peoples’ or nations. Another fault, and another evidence of a want of patriotism, the tendency to court foreign alliances and foreign influences, such as was seen in the policy of Menahem with reference to Tiglath-pileser (2K 15¹⁹). A cake not turned] which is therefore burnt on one side, and half raw on the other, and so spoilt. 9. Strangers . . strength] the natural consequence of seeking help from a foreign alliance, which meant the exaction of what was practically tribute, and consequently heavy taxation (2K 15²⁰). Israel did not realise that these signified the beginning of national decrepitude, just as grey hairs here and there are the first signs of old age.

10. The pride . . face] see on 5⁵. He is so besotted with pride that he recognises neither the evil itself nor its true remedy.

11. A silly dove] As the dove flies helplessly one way and another, so Israel turns to one power after another, only eventually to make enemies of both. The only recorded alliance with Egypt was that of Hoshea (2K 17⁴); but it was a common policy of Judah, and is frequently condemned by the prophets. There was a natural temptation to play off Egypt against Assyria, and such an alliance may have been already projected by those opposed to Menahem's action. Heart] RV 'understanding,' as in 4¹¹. 12. They shall go] i.e. for help. This courting of allies will inevitably, by God's providence, end in their destruction. The metaphor of the dove suggests that of the fowler. Jehovah will through their own folly lure them to their ruin. As their congregation hath heard] Hosea had warned them beforehand of what was to befall.

14. Howled . . . beds] Their prayers do not proceed from any reverential fear of God. They are like the howling of an animal from pain. They cry out because they are in trouble, but their prayers are for material blessings, and they are still rebellious at heart: cp. Job 35^{9f}. They assemble themselves] i.e. meet in religious exercises, but RM has 'cut themselves,' referring to heathen practices in time of tribulation: ep. 1K 18²⁸.

15. Bound] RV 'taught,' by chastisement.

16. They return, etc.] Their turning is ever farther away from God. Their princes shall fall] As a punishment for their insolence they would perish amidst the derision of the very people whose aid they had sought: see v. 11.

CHAPTER 8

THE LONG-MERITED RETRIBUTION

The enemy is coming immediately to destroy their temples and palaces and desolate the land, and as a punishment for their idolatry and disloyalty to God. In vain will they appeal to Jehovah.

1. RM 'The trumpet to thy mouth! As an eagle against the house of the Lord.'

2. RV 'They shall cry unto me, My God, we Israel know thee.' They use the name Israel with its sacred associations, as an inducement to God to help them. 3. Israel] Hosea answers their appeal by saying that the name is worthless without the character which God requires. 4. In the constant changes of dynasty there was no thought for the religious character of the king, nor counsel asked of God's prophets. Revolution and idolatry had all along been the besetting sin of Israel.

That . . . off] Had self-destruction been their object, they could not have achieved it more effectually.

5. Thy calf . . . off] RV 'He hath cast off thy calf, O Samaria'; meaning that the calf would be taken off by the enemy, Samaria, the capital, being put for the whole people. The allusion is, of course, to the golden bull at Bethel, under which symbol they worshipped God. 6. From Israel] The idol was the mere creation of Israel. Therefore . . . God] RV 'and it is no God.' It has no real existence: ep. 1 Cor 8⁴. 7. The wind] i.e. idolatry. It . . . stalk] RV 'he hath no standing corn,' as the result of his sowing. The bud] RV 'The blade.' If so be . . . up] Again Hosea formally modifies his previous statement, only to hint more plainly at the fate of the nation.

8, 9. The condition of Israel in the land of captivity is here described. A vessel wherein is no pleasure] i.e. a cheap and worthless piece of pottery. 9. Hired lovers] with reference to the tribute paid to Tiglath-pileser by Menahem (ep. 7⁹⁻¹¹), and the attempts made by others to equate with Egypt. 10. This courting of foreign princes will be of no avail. Very soon the people will be gathered for judgment by God and taken into a strange land.

They shall . . . little] They already begin to feel the oppressive tribute exacted by Tiglath-pileser: see on 7⁹⁻¹¹. King of princes] perhaps with reference to the many small dependencies under the Assyrian sway: ep. Isa 10⁸. 11. The multiplication of altars and sacrifices only led to increased wickedness.

12. I have written . . . law] RV 'Though I write for him my law in ten thousand precepts.' It mattered not how emphatically God's teaching should be made known to Israel; they would ignore it. 13. The sacrifices to Jehovah were a merely formal act, only killing and eating. Such sacrifices without repentance are not acceptable to Him, and will not induce Him to forget or overlook their sins: cp. Isa 1¹². They . . . Egypt] The prophet in God's name here threatens to undo the greatest act that God had ever done for His people: ep. 7¹⁶. Hosea evidently contemplated the possibility of the punishment which he foresaw coming from Egypt. More frequently he speaks of Assyria as the instrument of God's vengeance.

14. Temples] RV 'palaces.' The building of fenced cities by Israel and Judah implied a want of faith in God's power to save.

CHAPTER 9

EXILE IS AT HAND

This prophecy appears to have been written in a time of rejoicing over a good harvest and vintage. Israel need not rejoice, says the prophet, with the wild joy of the heathen. Their praises to the local Baals are insults to Jehovah, whom they have denied. Their rejoicing will end in disaster, culminating in captivity either in Egypt or Assyria.

1, 2. People] RV 'peoples,' i.e. the heathen nations around. The allusion is probably to the orgies of the heathen festival. The sins of the people called rather for sorrow and contrition.

Reward] RV 'hire,' the bounteous crops being regarded as due to the favour of the idols in return for Israel's worship. As a punishment the corn and wine would fail. 3. See on 8¹³. Egypt and Assyria were the nations which assailed them on either side. By one of them they would be taken captive. 'Unclean food' (RV), in contrast to the fertile products of their own land : cp. 2K 18²⁷⁻³¹

~~Ezek 4^{12, 13}~~.

4. Bread of mourners] Instead of being joyous festivals they would be like funeral feasts. For their bread, etc.] RV 'for their bread shall be for their appetite : it shall not come,' etc. A further step in their misery. They would only have enough bread to satisfy the pangs of hunger, and have none left to offer to God. The reference here appears to be to the horrors of a siege. 5. The feast days come, but no one is ready or able to observe them. Their only concern is to escape destruction. 6. Egypt . . up] Their efforts to escape are useless. They would be captured and brought to Egypt, with only death and burial to look forward to : see on 8¹³. The pleasant . . silver] RV 'their pleasant things of silver.' While they die in captivity, all their treasures are laid waste and overgrown with weeds : cp. Isa 34¹³. Tabernacles] RV 'tents.'

7. Israel shall know . . it] The people have refused to believe the prophet's threats ; they would realise the truth very soon, when the calamities came upon them. The prophet is a fool] The meaning is doubtful. Some interpret thus : 'Into such excesses have they fallen that their prophets have gone mad, so that they utter no clear message, but only the incoherent muttering of frenzy.' In this case the prophet would refer to the false prophets. Or it may mean that their iniquity and enmity had hitherto made them ignorant of the real character of the true prophet, who appeared to them a mad fool. The spiritual man] lit. 'the man of the spirit,' an unusual synonym for prophet. 8. The watchman] 'Watchman' is similarly used metaphorically of a prophet in Isa 21^{6, 11}. The meaning is very uncertain.

Was with my God] perhaps, 'is with my God,' i.e. is in the keeping of my God. A snare of a fowler . . ways] Wherever he goes he is in danger of being trapped. Hatred in . . God] The enmity of the people dogs him in his most sacred duties.

9. Gibeah] The reference is to the glaring sin of the Gibeonites described in Jg 19 : cp. 10⁹.

10. Grapes in the wilderness] the last place to find grapes. But God had found these poor tribes in the wilderness, and made them His people. Time] RV 'season.' The first ripe fruit is eaten with peculiar relish, all the more so if it be the first crop of the figs : cp. Isa 28⁴. Israel was the first nation which God had chosen. Baal-peor] see Nu 25. God's love even at the beginning did not hinder them from acts of idolatry and gross impurity. Separated . . shame] RV 'consecrated themselves unto the shameful thing,' i.e. the idol and the licentiousness which its worship involved.

11-13. The prophet threatens them with barrenness as the punishment for immorality : cp. 4¹⁰. Even if children should be born, they would fall by the sword of the enemy. 13. As I saw Tyrus] i.e. like Tyre. Pleasant place] perhaps fold, as in Jer 23³, the reference being to security rather than natural beauty.

14. The prophet here appeals to God's justice to carry out the punishment foretold. The prophet has his moods ; at one time an earnest hope for the nation's repentance, at another a disgust at their hopeless irreligion and immoralities. Even here the language implies a struggle of different feelings. He seems to begin with a prayer and to end with something like a curse. 15. Gilgal] cp. 4¹⁵. Gilgal was the home of idolatry and its accompanying iniquity. There Israel called forth the wrath of God. Mine house] These words show that the worship at Gilgal was at least in theory paid to Jehovah.

CHAPTER 10

DENUNCIATIONS AND ENTREATIES

This prophecy appears to have been uttered at a later date than the last. There is no longer any mention of Egypt, but the calamity from Assyria seems imminent. Again Hosea urges them to repent while there is time, and again gives way to despair.

1. Empty] RV 'luxuriant,' with reference to the prosperity of Israel. The more he prospered, the more he multiplied his heathenish altars and symbols. Fruit unto himself] RV 'his fruit.' Images] RV 'pillars' ; see on 3⁴.

2. Their . . divided] It is no simple worship of Jehovah, but a confused heathenish worship, which God will altogether destroy : see Intro.

3. What . . us] RV 'and the king, what can he do for us ?' They have no king, because they have not submitted themselves to their natural king, Jehovah ; and they realise too late the impotence of him who is a king only in name (i.e. probably Hoshea). 4. They . . covenant] They have spoken words, i.e. mere words not followed by deeds, and sworn falsely to agreements which they have not kept. The reference is probably to their commercial dealings with each other as in 4². Hemlock . . field] Judgment will come upon them like the rank growth of a noxious weed. 5. Samaria] as in 8⁵⁴, for the whole people. Calves of Beth-aven] see on 4¹⁵. They will be terribly afraid lest their God be taken away. Priests and people alike will mourn for sorrow. 6. King Jareb] see on 5¹³. There is a fine touch of irony in the suggestion that a god is sent off as a present to a king. 7. Samaria is doomed, and her king disappears, like a foam-bubble bursting on the water. 8. A picture of the desolation and terror following invasion. Aven] for Beth-aven : see on 4¹⁵. They . . us] In their despair they would welcome the most violent death. The words are quoted by our Lord in His prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem (Lk 23³⁰): see also Rev 6¹⁶

9. From the days] RM 'more than in the days.' Gibeah] see on 9². The battle] RV 'that the battle.' Hosea finds a parallel between the battle of vengeance against the Benjaminites in Gibeah (Jg 20) and the judgment that is coming against Israel. They remain impenitent, hoping that a similar calamity may not overtake them. 10. It . . should] RV 'when it is my desire, I will,' etc. There may be some delay, but, when God wills, the punishment must come. When . . furrows] RV 'when they are bound' (RM 'yoked') 'to their two transgressions,' usually explained of the two 'calves.' For a somewhat similar figure cp Isa 5¹⁵. But translation and interpretation are both very uncertain.

11. See on 5³. Ephraim is like a heifer accustomed only to the light work of threshing; but both she and Judah must now bear the yoke of a foreign oppressor. I passed . . neck] a rather curious but forcible way of saying, 'I have put the yoke upon her neck.' It is an instance of the prophetic past, describing as done an event only determined by God. The images which follow express the same general thought, the dominion of a foreign power.

Jacob] instead of Israel or Ephraim

12, 13. The metaphor of ploughing leads to that of sowing and reaping. Hosea uses it to make another appeal for repentance. In the past they had devoted themselves to iniquity, and were beginning to reap the consequences. Let them now devote themselves to righteousness, and they will receive mercy. Rain righteousness] RM 'teach you righteousness.'

Trust . . way] i.e. you chose your own path instead of allowing yourselves to be directed by God. Another reading is, 'in thy chariots,' which is a better parallel to the next clause.

14. Among] RM 'against.' Their confidence would be found misplaced. The fortresses manned by their mighty men would be destroyed by the enemy. Shalman . . battle] Nothing is known of this event, and neither the man nor the place can be identified with certainty; but the sack of Beth-arbel had evidently created a terrible impression of the horrors of war.

15. So shall Beth-el do] RM 'so shall it be done unto you at Beth-el.'

CHAPTER 11¹⁻¹¹

THE INGRATITUDE OF ISRAEL

Jehovah had been like a tender father and a kind master to Israel from the first, yet had they ever rejected Him and turned to idols. He cannot bear the thought of punishing them, but punish them He must. Yet punishment will be tempered with mercy, and lead at last to repentance and deliverance. The tenderness of the whole passage and the changing phases of feeling are very characteristic

1. The allusion, of course, is to the deliverance out of the bondage of Egypt, a proof of God's fatherly love to Israel. St. Matthew refers the last clause to the recall of the Infant Jesus from Egypt: see on Mt 2¹⁵. 2. As them] An interesting example of the terse style of Hosea. It is God who calls, but He calls by the instrumentality of others, Moses and the prophets. The call is the call out of bondage to the service of God. 3. I] RV 'Yet I.' Jehovah is here compared to a father teaching his child to walk, and carrying it when tired.

Taking . . arms] RM 'He took them,' etc. The prophet sometimes speaks as the mouth-piece of God in the first person; less frequently he speaks of God in the third. 4. Cords . . man] not with cords used in drawing a beast which is being broken in, but something more gentle, the kindly discipline needful for winning a man's allegiance. And I was . . unto them] In the evening, when work is over, the kind master takes off the yoke, gently passing it over the animal's face, and then gives it food.

5. Kindness has failed to lead them to repentance; therefore they must be purified by punishment. Not to Egypt, however, shall they go, but the Assyrians shall conquer and carry them away. Not . . into . . Egypt] In 8¹³ 9¹ the prophet spoke of Egypt as a possible place of captivity; but now, at this later date, it was evident that Assyria was to be the instrument of God's vengeance. 6. The mention of apostasy produces a severer tone of threatening. Abide on] RV 'fall upon.' His branches] RV 'his bars,' i.e. his defences, meaning either his strong cities or his nobles, on whom he depended for safety. But their evil counsellors (if we take it in the latter sense) would prove their ruin. 7. Though . . him] Though they formally called on God, they do not really exalt Him in their hearts.

8. Hosea's feeling again turns to tenderness. How can the loving Father bear to chastise His people as they deserve! Admah . . Zeboim] with reference to the destruction of the cities of the plain: cp. Dt 29²³. My repentings] RV 'my compassions.' 9. Jehovah's feelings grow stronger still. He will not punish His people.

I am God] therefore more long-suffering and less vindictive than man: cp. Ps 130¹ and Collect, 'Who declarest Thy almighty power most chiefly in showing mercy and pity.' Enter into the city] RM 'come in wrath.' 10. Hosea is confident that the people will make themselves deserving of Jehovah's love and follow Him. Roar . . lion] In Am 3⁸ the same figure is used of God's threatening through the prophet. Here it is used of His calling for His people out of captivity, the point of comparison being the earnest longing on God's part, reverential awe on man's. Shall tremble] RV 'shall come trembling.' West] i.e. Egypt. as distinctly stated in the next v. 11. They . . . Egypt] Taken literally, it is in contradiction to v. 5; taken together, they may be paraphrased thus: They shall not go into Egypt; and even should they go, thence will I bring them—a form of thought similar to that in 9^{11,12}, etc. Dove] The timidity of the dove is what is probably thought of. For another use of the simile see 7¹¹.

CHAPTERS 11¹²⁻¹²¹⁴

A REPROOF OF COMMERCIAL DISHONESTY

The Hebrew text divides the c. more correctly at this v. The prophet returns to the subject of the unfaithfulness both of Israel and of Judah. They have sought help where it was not to be found, and neglected God, the only source of help, in forgetfulness of the example of their ancestor Jacob.

12. Judah . . . saints] RM better, 'and Judah is yet unstedfast with God, and with the Holy One who is faithful.'

C. 12. 1. Ephraim . . . east wind] an attack on Israel's foreign policy and cunning commercial dealings with foreign powers. The wind stands for what is useless and unsatisfying. The east wind was noted for its violence and destructiveness: cp. Ps 48⁷. They seek eagerly to obtain what in the end will destroy them.

Oil . . . Egypt] Oil was one of the richest products of Palestine: see Dt 8⁸ 2K 18³².

2. Jacob] as before used to introduce the personal history of the Patriarch, from which Hosea seeks to draw an analogous lesson for the people. Jacob had begun life by cunningly supplanting his brother, but afterwards had made a covenant with God. Israel is now exhorted to do likewise. 3. By his strength] RV 'in his manhood.' It refers to Jacob's wrestling with the angel at Peniel (Gn 32²¹⁻³⁰). 4. He wept] Not mentioned in Gn 32²⁵. He found him] the subject is Jehovah. In Beth-el] The reference is probably to Jacob's dream (Gn 28¹⁰⁻²²). With us] Hosea here regards God's promises to Jacob as made to the people Israel, whom in fact they chiefly concerned. 5. Lit. 'And Jehovah is the God of armies. Jehovah is His memorial.' The thoughts emphasised are, (1) the protective power of God; (2) His faithfulness. Hosea has probably in his mind Ex 3¹⁵. Jehovah was the God of the Patriarchs, who would keep the promises which He had made to them. Memorial] that by which a person is known, his name: see Ex 3¹⁵.

7-14. Israel, too, is unjust and unmerciful. In the pursuit of gain they are no better than the heathen, though they pride themselves on their honesty. Jehovah has long warned them: now He will punish them: their sanctuaries will be utterly destroyed.

7. He is a merchant] RM 'as for Canaan the balances,' etc. Balances of deceit] cp. Am 8⁵. 8. And Ephraim] The Israelites had only too readily learnt the tricks of cheating from the Canaanites. Yet] RV 'surely.' It is the natural consequence of his unjust dealing. In all . . . sin] Israel is nevertheless perfectly self-satisfied and has no pangs of conscience. 9. And] RV 'But.' In spite of all this I will not leave you to your evil ways.

Tabernacles] RV 'tents.' Israel had learned nothing since the days in the wilderness. In religion and morality they were still like those who came out of Egypt. Therefore they would have to go back to captivity and begin their discipline anew. Solemn feast] i.e. the Feast of booths (Tabernacles). 10. The moral degradation of the people was not from want of warning. Visions and similitudes] two of the commonest modes of prophetic utterance. We have instances of the first in the vision of Micaiah (1K 22¹⁰⁻²³), the basket of summer fruit (Am 8¹), etc.; of the latter in the simile of the baker in Hos 7. A definitely acted parable became a common feature of later prophecy, c.g. Ezk 4.

11. Gilead . . . Gilgal] both sanctuaries: see 4¹⁵ 6⁸. Is there iniquity, etc.] RV 'Is Gilead iniquity?' The question is only a rhetorical way of stating an astounding fact. 12. The idolatry of Israel implies a forgetfulness of God, by whose providence Jacob was rescued from servitude. The reference is to Jacob's servitude under Laban in order to win Rachel (Gn 29, 30). 13. The rescue of Jacob was repeated in the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt by Moses, and their preservation in the wilderness. Moses, as Israel's first inspired teacher, was their first prophet: cp. Dt 18¹⁵ 34¹⁰. 14. Ephraim . . . bitterly] In spite of all this kindness Ephraim had provoked God to great anger. His blood] plural, meaning 'bloodshed.' The blood which he has shed shall not be wiped off, but remain in God's eye, a witness of his crime. For a somewhat similar idea cp. Gn 4¹⁰. His reproach] God will punish him for his reproach, i.e. for his scornful contempt of God: cp. 2K 19^{4, 22}.

ISRAEL'S IDOLATRY AND ITS CONSEQUENCES

The main thought of this c., which is a continuation of the last (cp. 12⁹ 13⁴), is the folly of Israel incurring the enmity of God, who had shown Himself such a loving friend, but might become so terrible an enemy. The sudden change of tone in v. 14 is highly characteristic.

1. When . . . trembling] RV 'When Ephraim spake, there was trembling.' Ephraim was a strong and powerful tribe, which could command obedience, as especially in the days of Joshua. He died] Baal-worship was the cause of the national decay and its final doom.

2. Kiss] as an act of worship. For men that sacrifice RM has 'sacrificers of men.' Murder is combined with sacrifice: cp. Isa 1¹⁵. 4. Yet... Egypt] see on 12⁹. 5, 6. I... thee] In the wilderness Jehovah became their friend. He knew them, and bade them know Him. But when they prospered in a land of fertility, they became proud and forgot Him.

10. I... king] RV 'Where now is thy king?' What use would the king and princes whom they had so clamoured for be in their trouble?

11. I... anger] This has often been referred to Saul, but the Hebrew tenses suggest repeated action, and the allusion may, therefore, be to the frequent changes of dynasty in the northern kingdom. 12. Hid] RV 'laid up in store.' The sin of Israel is kept stored in God's remembrance, and will surely bring about its own punishment. 13. He is an unwise son, etc.] Ephraim is like a foolish child that delays his own birth by staying in the passage from the womb. In other words, he has not the wisdom to rouse himself in this great crisis.

14. With a startling transition of thought, Hosea contemplates the power of Jehovah to save, even from death itself: cp. Isa 26¹⁹. If it is too much to regard it as a definite prophecy of the resurrection, it is at least an example of faith in the unbounded mercies of God, and His power to trample even upon death and Hades.

O death... destruction] RV 'O death, where are thy plagues? O grave' (RM 'Sheol'), 'where is thy destruction?' Cp. v. 10, where the same negative answer to the rhetorical question is intended. See 1 Cor 15⁵⁵, where St. Paul, quoting freely from LXX, gives a better rendering than AV. Sheol is the place of departed spirits, Hades, as in Isa 14⁹, etc.

Repentance... eyes] i.e. I will not relent in my purpose.

15. Suddenly again the hope vanishes. Ephraim in his prosperity is compared to a fertile country suddenly dried up by the east wind from the desert, and the failure of water.

Wind... LORD] RV 'breath of the LORD,' the wind being poetically conceived of as God's breath, just as the thunder was His voice: cp. Gn 1². He shall spoil] i.e. the east wind, or rather the enemy whom it typifies.

16. Shall become desolate] RV 'shall bear her guilt,' i.e. be punished for her sin. Their... up] Ephraim would have to bear the cruelty inflicted by a merciless foe in a barbarous age.

CHAPTER 14

ISRAEL WILL SURELY REPENT AND BE FORGIVEN

Hosea makes a touching final appeal for repentance. He assures Israel of God's mercy, and closes with a description of the blessings that will follow the renewal of His favour.

2. Take... words] go to Him, prepared to confess your sins. Receive us graciously] RV 'accept that which is good,' i.e. what is good in us, in contrast to the iniquity which God is asked to take away. Render] i.e. offer. The calves... lips] better, 'our lips as bullocks,'—that sacrifice of penitence which is outwardly expressed not in the sacrifice of animals, but in confession of sin: cp. Ps 51¹⁷. 3. Israel would no longer depend upon the help either of foreign powers or of the idols, but trust in Jehovah, the helper of the fatherless.

5. Dew] a frequent metaphor to express spiritual blessing: cp. Dt 32². The paucity of rain made the land dependent on frequent and heavy dews: cp. 1 K 17¹. Grow] RV 'blossom.' 6. Olive] the emblem of fatness and fertility.

8. This v. passes into a sort of dialogue between Ephraim and God. Thus:

Ephraim. What have I to do any more with idols? i.e. I will in future have nothing more to do with them.

Jehovah. (RV) 'I have answered, and will regard him,' i.e. I have heard his prayer, and will answer it.

Ephraim. I am like a green fir tree] I am strong and prosperous.

Jehovah. From me is thy fruit found, i.e. do not in prosperity once more forget that it comes from Me: cp. Jn 15⁴.

9. A general reflection on the teaching of the book, which cannot be understood except by the wise and prudent, but in the end will be found to be true wisdom: cp. Ps 107¹³. This epilogue may have been added at a later date, to point the moral of the whole book.

JOEL

INTRODUCTION

1. Author. Nothing is mentioned concerning the personality of the prophet Joel beyond the name of his father, Pethuel (1¹); but he clearly lived in Jerusalem, since the Temple appears ever present before him (1⁹, 1¹³, 1¹⁴, 1¹⁶ 2¹⁷), and the sound of alarm is given from Zion (2¹), and the people are summoned thither for a solemn assembly (2¹⁷). He also does not notice the northern kingdom, but speaks of Judah and Jerusalem having suffered from their enemies (3^{1,6}), and promises to them a recompense (3⁸, 17⁴, 20).

2. Date. The date of the book of Joel is determined alone by internal evidence. A terminus a quo is fixed by the dispersion and wrongs mentioned in 3¹⁻⁶. Many have seen in these a reference to the sacking of Jerusalem during the reign of Jehoram (about 850 B.C.) by the Philistines and Arabians, recorded in 2 Ch 21^{16,17}. In that case the book would probably be one of the earliest of the prophetic writings, a formerly prevalent view, suggested by its position in the Canon after Hosea. Agreeable to this early date have been pointed out, (1) that the condemnation of Egypt and Edom for having shed innocent blood (3¹⁹) may refer to the invasion of Shishak during the reign of Rehoboam (1 K 14²⁵), and to the revolt of Edom under Jehoram (2 K 8²⁰); (2) that the mention of the valley of Jchoshaphat preserves a lively recollection of that king's victory at the valley of Beraiah (2 Ch 20²⁶); (3) that the simplicity of the teaching of Joel indicates an early period of written prophecy; (4) especially as fixing the date of his book in the early part of the reign of Joash (837-801 B.C.), that it is silent concerning the king—then in his minority; (5) that idolatry and Baal worship are not mentioned, since they did not flourish when the king was under the influence of Jehoiada the priest (2 K 12² 2 Ch 24^{17,18}); (6) that the priests and the worship of Jehovah are made prominent (1¹³ 2¹⁷), something also to be expected at the same time through the influence of Jehoiada; and, finally, (7) that the failure to mention the Syrians, Assyrians, or Chaldeans as enemies of Judah, is also agreeable to this date, since only late in the reign of Joash did the Syrians, through Hazael, threaten Judah (2 K 12^{17,18}).

But, in spite of this apparent accumulation of evidence, it is doubtful whether the dispersion and wrongs of 3¹⁻⁶, where the partition of the land is definitely stated (3²), can refer to any other event than the Chaldean conquest of Judah, and the following considerations also are in favour of a post-exilic date. (1) The words of Joel stand in strong contrast to those of the early prophets, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, and Jeremiah, who emphasised the defection of Israel from Jehovah through deeds of violence and oppression, political alliances and idolatry, and based almost wholly upon these their calls for repentance or forebodings of divine judgment. But these features are entirely wanting in the book of Joel. Human agencies, also, are not found as instruments of divine judgments, as in the earlier prophets, except in the slightest degree, but supernatural manifestations take their place, and thus the book is of the nature of an apocalypse, a kind of writing prevalent from the captivity and onward. One feature of the apocalyptic literature is the use made of parallels from earlier writings, and these are frequent in the book of Joel. (2) The stress laid upon sacrifices and the prominence given to the priests (1⁹, 1¹³, 2¹⁷) reflect a highly developed ecclesiastical community, which the Jews became after the exile. (3) The mention of the Grecians in connexion with the slave trade (3⁶) points strongly to the post-exilic period when Syrian slaves were in request in Greece. (4) The silence concerning the northern kingdom and the Syrians, Assyrians and Chaldeans, and a king in Judah, already mentioned, favour a post-exilic date. (5) The references to Edom and Egypt can also readily be explained from the post-exilic point of view, since bitter feeling then continued toward Edom, and Egypt might be mentioned typically: see 3¹⁹. And, finally, (6) the language favours a post-exilic writer. Hence the more prevailing view among scholars now is that the book of Joel belongs to the post-exilic period, and was written circ. 500 B.C., though possibly considerably later.

3. Subject and Occasion. The general subject of Joel is divine judgment, or the Day of Jehovah. This is depicted in 1-2¹⁷ under the form of a locust plague, which undoubtedly was the occasion of the prophecy. So vivid is the description of the locusts, especially under the figure of an army (2⁶⁻¹¹), that some have supposed the language figurative and have taken the account as presaging a future invasion or experience of Israel after the analogy of that of the hosts of Gog and Magog described in Ezk 38, 39. But the prophet is rather speaking of literal locusts, addressing his contemporaries in view of present distress. His description of the advent of these insects as a Day of Jehovah and as a destruction from the Almighty (1¹⁵) with terrifying natural phenomena (2¹⁰) is none too strong to express the feeling awakened by the presence of real locusts. The fearfulness of their devastations has been attested again and again by travellers and scientific observers. Locusts darken the sky, their sound is like that of a rushing wind or falling water; nothing can break their ranks or turn them back; neither fire nor water as ordinarily applied stays their progress; they devour all vegetation; they penetrate into houses; and finally, when their work is accomplished, driven by the wind into the sea their dead bodies have been cast up in heaps to putrefy the atmosphere and produce disease. Thus the interpretation that finds literal locusts is justified, and yet, doubtless, in the prophet's mind the scourge itself was a figure of a great and final day of judgment, and that thought intensified his language and made it somewhat ideal.

After a two-fold description of this day of judgment through locusts, with calls for fasting and prayer (1²⁻²¹), it is said, 'Jehovah had pity on his people' (2¹⁸ RV), implying that the people had fasted and prayed and that their intercession had availed. Then the promises are given of the removal of the locusts and the restoration of the fruitfulness of the land (2¹⁹⁻²⁷), and of the bestowal of the divine spirit of knowledge (2²⁸⁻³²). In connexion with this latter promise a glimpse of the already suggested terrible day of final judgment is given (2³⁰⁻³²), and this becomes the direct theme of the remainder of the book in two different forms: first, a judgment restricted to the immediate neighbours of Israel (3¹⁻⁸); and then, secondly, one embracing all nations (3⁹⁻²¹).

4. Teaching. The book of Joel addresses the Christian Church under visitations of evil with a call for humility and intercession both through outward form and ceremony and through the inward motions of the heart, with the assurance that God hears and answers prayer, turning the day of calamity into one of prosperity. It heralds Jehovah as the judge of all mankind to right wrongs, giving temporal and spiritual blessings unto His faithful people without distinction, and punishing evildoers. Thus it appeals to our innate sense of justice and becomes a source of hope and strength when the righteous are tried. A final blissful salvation is assured to the people of God. But, at the same time, the book has limitations in fostering a spirit of retaliation (3⁸), in presenting no salvation for the heathen (cp. in contrast Isa 2²⁻⁴ 19¹⁸⁻²⁵), and, while doubtless the assumption is that the saved Israelites are righteous and the other nations are wicked, yet the distinction between the saved and unsaved is racial rather than spiritual and moral, and the narrow feeling of the Jews, which the book of Jonah was written to counteract, is reflected, and its universal judgment scene (3⁹⁻²¹) needs to be supplemented by that of Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶, even as its promise of the outpouring of the Spirit (2²⁸⁻³²) finds fulfilment in spiritual gifts to the Church which are far wider than those of the single day of Pentecost (Ac 2¹⁴).

CHAPTER 1

THE COMING OF THE LOCUSTS A HARBINGER OF THE DAY OF THE LORD

After the title (v. 1), the prophet announces an unheard of and long to be remembered ruin, wrought by locusts (vv. 2-4), and summons the users of wine to bewail the destruction of vineyards (vv. 5-7). He calls for lamentation, like that of a widowed bride, over the loss of sacrificial offerings, and wasted fields and orchards (vv. 8-12). He commands the priests to lament and to appoint a fast and a meeting for prayer (vv. 13, 14), and then he vividly describes the failure of crops and distress of cattle (vv. 16-20).

1. Joel] see Intro. Pethuel] entirely unknown.

4. The palmerworm, cankerworm, caterpillar, and locust, are not different insects, but in the original four different names of the locust, possibly representing it in different stages of growth; yet here in a climactic description, i.e. 'swarm upon swarm.' The use of synonyms for a common object is characteristic of Hebrew.

5. New wine] RV 'sweet wine,' primarily the freshly pressed juice of the grape or other fruit. 6. A nation] figurative of the locusts: cp. similar figure for ants and comes in Prov 30²⁵. My land] i.e. of Jehovah since the prophet gives His message. The teeth of a lion] in destructiveness. The cheek teeth] RV 'The jaw teeth.' The lion was common in ancient Palestine.

7. Locusts consume not only plants and vegetables, but also small branches and tender bark, thus exposing the white wood. Cast away] i.e. the uneatable fragments of bark and wood which fall to the ground.

8. A general address to the people. The simile may contain an underlying reference to the abandonment of the people by Jehovah, since the union between them was often typified by the marriage relation, and the disaster of the locust plague implied that

Jehovah had forsaken the land. 9. The meat offering (RV 'meal offering') and the drink offering] Two daily offerings which went with the morning and evening sacrifice of a lamb, the one consisting of fine flour mingled with oil and the other of a libation of wine: cp. Ex 29³³⁻⁴² Nu 28¹⁻⁸ Lv 2¹⁻¹⁰. Is cut off] i.e. cannot be provided. 10. The land mourneth] Nature is represented in the OT. with the same feelings as those of man. Cp. for mourning Isa 33⁹ Jer 12^{4, 11} 23¹⁰ Am 1².

Corn, wine, and oil, the three principal products of the soil of Palestine, frequently mentioned together as from Jehovah (2¹⁹ Dt 7¹³ 11¹⁴ 28³¹ Jer 31¹² Hos 2^{9, 28}). The corn (ARV 'grain') was principally wheat, barley, and spelt or vetch. Rye and oats were not grown. The oil was that of the olive. 11. Be ye ashamed, etc.] RM 'The husbandmen are ashamed, the vinedressers howl.' 12. Palm tree] Symbol of glory or beauty (Ps 92¹² Song 7^{7, 14} Jer 10⁵), but here mentioned as a fruit tree. Its dates are very valuable. The apple] sometimes rendered 'apricot,' although apples are found in Palestine: cp. Prov 25¹¹ Song 2^{3, 5} 7⁰. 13. Gird yourselves] i.e. with sackcloth: cp. Isa 32¹¹. Lie all night] cp. David (2S 12¹⁰), Ahab (1K 21²⁷). Nothing was more terrible to the Jewish mind than the failure of the daily sacrifice.

14. Sanctify... a fast] i.e. keep a holy fast unto Jehovah. As feasting is a natural expression of joy so fasting is of grief, and fasts were observed in times of distress along with confession of sin and prayer for divine favour (Jg 20²⁶ 1S 7⁶ 2S 12¹⁶ 1K 21²⁷ Ps 69^{10, 14} Ezr 10⁶ Neh 9¹ Jon 3⁵⁻⁹ Dan 9³), and entered also regularly into the Jewish calendar (Lv 16²⁹ Zech 7^{3, 5} 8¹⁹). Gather the elders, etc.] better, 'Gather, O elders, all the inhabitants,' or omit 'elders.'

15. The day of the LORD] early in popular thought a time when Jehovah granted victory unto Israel (Am 5¹⁸), but in prophetic discourse a time of signal divine manifestation in judgment (as here in the locust plague, 2^{1, 11}, cp. Isa 2¹² 13⁶ Am 5¹⁶ Zeph 1^{7, 14} Mal 4¹), and especially in connexion with the final consummation of Jehovah's plan for Israel, and thus a day of salvation (2^{31, 4} 3¹⁴ Mal 4^{5, 6}).

16. Meat] i.e. food. Many of the celebrations at the Temple were occasions of rejoicing over abundant harvests and the like (Dt 16^{10, 13-15} 26⁷ 26^{14, 10, 14}). 17. RM 'The seeds shrivel,' from the drought, which seems to have accompanied the locust plague. 19. Fire... flame] figurative of the drought.

CHAPTER 2

REPENTANCE FOLLOWED BY RESTORATION

Vv. 1-17 are another description of the locust plague. An alarm is sounded as though the Day of Jehovah had come (vv. 1-3). The advance of the locusts into the city is described under the figure of an invading army (vv. 4-11). A message to the penitent is given from Jehovah (vv. 12-14), and a call is issued for a fast of supplication (vv. 15-17). Then follow the announcements that Jehovah has had pity on His people, and that He will remove the locusts (vv. 18-20), and restore abundantly the prosperity of the land (vv. 21-27), and afterward pour out His spirit and grant deliverance in His great day (vv. 28-32).

1. The blown trumpet was a signal of danger (Jer 6¹ Ezk 33^{3, 4} Am 3⁹). Day of the LORD] cp. 1¹⁵. 2. Darkness, etc.] caused either by the clouds of locusts, or a figure of calamity: cp. Am 5¹⁸ Zeph 1⁵.

3. The devastation wrought by the locusts was as though the country had been swept by a fire. Garden of Eden] Gn 2^{8, 9}; called also 'garden of Jehovah,' Gn 13¹⁰: cp. Ezk 28¹³ 36³⁵. 4. The head of a locust resembles somewhat that of a horse, hence the German name heupferd and Italian cavalletta. So shall they run] RV 'so do they run.' The description in this and the following vv. is not of a future but a present catastrophe, hence the verbs are to be rendered in the present, as in RV. 5. Shall they leap] RV 'do they leap.' The rustling noise of locusts has been likened by travellers to the sounds 'of the dashing of waters by the mill wheel,' and 'of a great cataract,' and their feeding to the noise 'of the crackling of a prairie fire.' 6. RV 'At their presence the peoples are in anguish: all faces are waxed pale.' 7. RV 'They run... they climb... they march... they break not.'

8. RV 'Neither doth one thrust another; they march every one in his path: and they burst through the weapons, and break not off their course.' Thus compact is the march of locusts. No weapons avail to stem their approach. 9. RV 'They leap upon the city; they run upon the wall; they climb up into the houses; they enter.' 10. 'The earth quaketh... heavens tremble... are darkened... stars withdraw.' The advent of the locusts is idealised as though with them came also the earthquake and the eclipse. The Hebrews conceived of the heavens as solid, and hence spoke of their trembling. 11. RV 'uttereth.' The voice of Jehovah is thunder (Ps 29), hence the thought is that of a great storm accompanying the locusts.

12. With all your heart] cp Dt 6⁵. 13. Rend your heart] even as the Psalmist speaks of a broken heart (Ps 51¹⁷). 14. The divine will is neither arbitrary nor fixed, but is deeply affected by human intercessions and conditions, and hence a purpose of destruction may be changed (Jer 18¹⁸ 42¹⁰ Am 7^{8, 9}). 15. Cp. v. 1, 1¹⁴. 16. Closet] The same, of course, as the chamber of the bridegroom. The Heb. word means 'canopy' or 'pavilion,' and its usage comes from the primitive nuptial tent provided for the wedded pair. 17. The porch of the Temple, in front of which stood the altar in the court of the priests. That the heathen, etc.] RM 'that the nations should use a byword against them,' i.e. that they should become a byword through their wretched abandonment by God. RV 'among the peoples.' On the taunt, cp. Ps 42¹⁰ 79¹⁰ 115². 18. ARV 'Then was Jehovah jealous for his land and had pity on his people.' It is implied that the fast and solemn assembly were held, and that Jehovah responded to the cry of His people with the promises of vv. 19-32. 19. RV 'and the LORD answered and said unto his people.'

20. The northern army] or, 'the northerner,' i.e. the locusts, which might possibly have come from the N., although usually in Palestine from the S. or SE. Probably they are idealised as typical of the enemies of Israel, who are frequently spoken of as coming from the N. (Jer 1¹⁴ 4⁶ 10²² Ezk 38^{4,15} 39²). Land barren and desolate] the deserts S. and SE. of Judah. With his face] RV 'his forepart.' The east sea] i.e. the Dead Sea. The utmost sea] RV 'the western sea,' i.e. the Mediterranean.

And his stink, etc.] See Intro. Hath done, etc.] i.e. in destruction. The same phrase is used of the beneficent acts of Jehovah in v. 21.

21. Introduces the promise of renewed prosperity. 22. Be not afraid] of famine. Do spring] i.e. are renewed with fresh grass: cp. 17, 12, 18², where the desolation is described.

23. Moderately] RV 'in just measure.'

The former . . and the latter rain] the rains at seed time in early winter and before the harvest in early spring. In the first month] RM 'at (= as at) the first,' i.e. before the calamity of drought and locusts. 25. Cp. 1⁴ 2¹¹.

26. And my people, etc.] probably by copyist error from next v. 27. The rain and the harvests are evidences of Jehovah's presence. Israel] the Jewish community so called after the exile. None else] an assertion of monotheism: cp. Dt 4^{35,39} 1 K 8⁶⁰ Isa 45^{5,6,18}.

And my people, etc.] The glorious climax. Under the figure of the locust plague and the promised years of plenty, the prophet saw the final judgment and felicity of Israel, and thus he is naturally led to the thought of vv. 28-32.

28. Afterward] The prophets saw the future purposes of God realised one after the other without fixed intervals of time. Material blessings imply spiritual ones: both nature and man are to be renewed. My spirit] of knowledge or divine revelation, since it results in prophecy, dreams, and visions: a spirit of obedience is presupposed: cp. Jer 24⁷ 31³³. 32²⁹ Ezk 11¹⁹ 36²⁷ 39²⁹ Isa 32¹⁵ 44³. All flesh] all classes of society, as the context shows. Your daughters] Women frequently had the prophetic gift in Israel. Under prophecy we may understand an utterance, through divine ecstasy or compulsion (1 S 10¹⁰. Am 3⁸ Isa 8¹¹ Jer 1⁷ 20⁹). Dreams, although belittled by Jeremiah (23²⁸), and visions were frequent means of divine revelation: cp. Dreams, Gn 20³ 28¹² 37^{5,9}; Visions, Isa 6¹ Am 7^{1,4,7} 8¹ Jer 1¹¹ Ezk 1¹, etc. Since young men are dreamers and old men seers, it may be implied that youth shall have the knowledge of age and age the enthusiasm of youth. 29. All persons, even menials, receive the spirit. 30. Great events, according to the thought of the ancient world, were accompanied with striking historical and natural phenomena; hence the great Day of Jehovah, which involved the destruction of His enemies and the redemption of His people, would be heralded with wonders. Blood and fire, and pillars of smoke] indications of warfare are the wonders in the earth. 31. Eclipses are the wonders in the heavens: cp. Am 8⁹ Isa 13¹⁰ Ezk 32⁷ Mt 24²⁹ Lk 21¹⁰. 32. RV 'In Jerusalem shall be those that escape as Jehovah hath said, and among the remnant those whom Jehovah doth call.' In the general destruction the condition of escape is calling on Jehovah, and the saved remnant of Israel is at Jerusalem, and among them are those whom Jehovah has called from elsewhere, i.e. the Jews of the dispersion: cp. Isa 27¹² 66¹⁹. Vv. 28-32 are applied in Ac 2¹⁴ to the day of Pentecost. This application shows that this OT. prophecy is fulfilled in facts of divine manifestations rather than in an identity of form.

CHAPTER 3

THE JUDGMENT OF THE HEATHEN AND THE GLORY OF ISRAEL

A general judgment of all nations, for their mistreatment of Israel, is announced in the valley of Jehoshaphat (vv. 1-4). Tyre, Zidon, and Philistia, immediate neighbours of Israel, are arraigned for robbery and slave trade, and sentenced according to the lex talionis (vv. 5-8). All nations are then summoned as though to a tryst of arms before Jehovah (vv. 9-13), whose terrible Day is described (vv. 14-17), ending with the blessing of Judah through the fertility of its land, and with the doom of desolation for Egypt and Edom (vv. 18-21).

1. In those days, etc.] i.e. the period of the Day of Jehovah just mentioned. Bring again the captivity] restore the prosperity, a technical phrase for an epoch-making change: cp. Am 9¹⁴ Ps 147 Job 42¹⁰ Ezk 16⁵⁸.

2. Valley of Jehoshaphat] an ideal valley in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, called Jehoshaphat from the meaning of the name, 'Jehovah judges.' This prophecy probably occasioned the name (not traced earlier than 800 A.D.) of the modern valley of Jehoshaphat, S. of Jerusalem. 3. Captives of ancient warfare were distributed by lot (Obad 11 Nah 3¹⁰) and bartered in connexion with carousals.

4. Coasts of Palestine] RV 'regions of Philistia?' The question implies a protest against punishment by Tyre, etc. Will ye render, etc.] RM 'Will ye repay a deed of mine, or will ye do aught unto me? swiftly,' etc. Do you think to repay me a wrong which I have done you? or will you wrong me? In either case vengeance will be speedily executed upon you.

5. My silver, etc.] not necessarily from the Temple, but the property of the people was reckoned as Jehovah's. Temples] i.e. palaces, the dwellings of the rich. 6. The Phœnicians (Tyre and Sidon) were famous as slave traders (Ezk 27¹⁸ Am 1⁹). Grecians] Heb Jeranim, i.e. 'Ionians,' the name by which the Greeks were commonly known amongst the Hebrews: cp. Gn 10²⁻⁴ Ezk 27¹³ Isa 66¹⁹ Zech 9¹³. That ye might, etc.] and thus increase your gain; since the further a slave from home, the greater his value, owing to his less opportunity to escape. Vv. 5, 6 do not necessarily refer directly to any specific events, but to a long course of conduct whereby these peoples profited by every disaster that befell Judah. 7, 8. The captives are to be returned; the enemies in turn are to be taken captive and sold by the Jews to the far distant Sabæans in Arabia, a people famous for traffic in spices and gold (Isa 60⁶ Jer 6²⁰ Ezk 27²² Job 6¹⁹): cp. for story of their queen 1 K 10.

9. The theme of the general judgment announced in vv. 1, 2 is resumed. Heralds are to summon the nations as though to a trial of arms with the hosts of Jehovah (vv. 9-11). Gentiles] RV 'nations.' Prepare] RM 'sanctify' with sacrifices or other religious ceremonies (1 S 7³⁴ Jer 6⁴ Mic 3⁵). 10. Instruments of peace are to be made those of war, the reverse of the promise of Isa 2⁴ Mic 4³. 11. Assemble yourselves] RV 'Haste ye.' Jehovah also is to bring His heavenly hosts (Ps 68¹⁷ 103²⁰ Zech 14⁵).

12. Jehovah now speaks announcing His advent for judgment. According to the NT. the advent of Jehovah is fulfilled in the first and second advents of Christ: cp. Mt 25³¹⁻⁴, and see below. 13. The heavenly host is addressed. The harvest, ordinary symbol of joy and bounty (Ps 4⁷), is here one of terror (Isa 63¹⁴ Rev 14¹⁵): cp. also Mt 13^{30,39}.

14. The valley of decision] determination, judgment: the valley of Jehoshaphat (vv. 2, 12).

15. Cp. 2^{10,31}. 16. Roar] suggests the lion. His voice] the thunder: cp. Ps 29. The figure is of a great tempest with the cry of the beast and thunder combined. Shake] cp. 2¹⁰.

The hope... the strength] RV 'a refuge... a stronghold': cp. Ps 14⁶ 27¹ 31⁴ 43² 46¹. The very sounds announcing the doom of the nations will herald a place of safety for Israel.

17. The prophet knew of no heavenly Jerusalem, and he thought of the final consummation of the people of God in Palestine. Holy] inviolable. No enemy should again pass through Jerusalem.

18. Judah shall be wonderfully productive: cp. Am 9¹³. The perennial spring of the Temple mountain, which Isaiah (8⁶) and the author of Ps 46 had mentioned as a symbol of Jehovah's presence, Joel saw, after the manner of Ezekiel (47¹⁴), issuing as a stream to water the dry and desert portion of the land symbolised under the valley of Shittim, or, RM, 'Acacias' (which is the meaning of Shittim), since the acacia grows in very dry places. A Shittim E. of the Jordan is mentioned (Nu 25¹ 33⁴⁹ Josh 2¹), but it is not probably referred to here. 19. As a foil to the fertility of Judah is the desolation of Egypt and Edom, probably mentioned as typical examples of the countries hostile to Judah, and from which Israel had suffered the cruelties of warfare and massacre from the outset of their history. Edom, after the exile, was the object of bitter feeling for recent hostilities. Egypt, it may have been thought, had never adequately suffered for its treatment of Israel when in bondage, since it had escaped the overthrows of Assyria and Chaldea.

20. In their felicity, as described in vv. 17 f.

21. For I will cleanse, etc.] Either the city will be cleansed from all bloodguiltiness, cp. Ezk 22³⁴ Isa 4⁴ Mal 3³; or, more probably, we must render, with RM, 'and I will hold as innocent their blood which I have not held as innocent,' i.e. the blood of Israel will be held to have been shed innocently, and hence will be avenged upon their enemies. The guarantee is, For the LORD dwelleth in Zion: cp. v. 17. 'Joel, in his little book, passes from the City of Destruction to the City Celestial.'

AMOS

INTRODUCTION

1. The Man. We have but one trustworthy source of information concerning Amos, viz. the book which bears his name. Happily it is so written as to convey a sufficiently full and clear impression of the man and his career. He was born in the land of Judah, of unnamed and unimportant parents, during the first half of the 8th cent. B.C. His possessions consisted of a few sycomore trees, and a small flock of sheep which belonged to a peculiar breed, ugly and short-footed, but valuable for the excellence of their wool. These he pastured in the neighbourhood of Tekoa, in the wilderness of Judah. Although his means were but meagre, his position was independent, and when he wished to leave his flock he was able to do so, entrusting them perhaps to some lad, like that son of Jesse who in the same neighbourhood had followed the ewes great with young.

2. His Call. Three causes combined to turn the shepherd into a prophet. First, his knowledge of the deplorable state of affairs in the northern kingdom. The victories won by Jeroboam II (2 K 14) had brought wealth and power to the ruling classes in Israel. But luxury, impurity and intemperance were rife amongst them (27, 8 64⁶). And as to the poor, their case could hardly have been worse. They groaned under the most oppressive exactions; they were totally unable to get justice; they were treated as chattels, not as men (84⁶). And the warnings sent by Providence—drought, locusts, famine, pestilence—were not understood by the well-to-do oppressors of the poor (46⁴). There is nothing to wonder at in the fact that Amos, a subject of Uzziah of Judah, knew all this. And the shepherd's soul was stirred with deep indignation, like Nehemiah's at a later day (Neh 5). Secondly, he had heard of the campaigns against Western nations, waged by the great kings of Assyria; he could not help foreboding that God would use this mighty instrument for chastising the crying sins of Israel (527 6). Thirdly, and most important of all, God's spirit communed with him and impelled him to speak. Amos was as conscious of a direct call from heaven as St. Paul was (715 Gal 11). He knew himself to be in possession of the divine counsel; he could not refuse to declare it (36).

3. The Prophet's Work. It is impossible to state precisely when the call came. If we could determine the date of the earthquake (11 Zech 145), there would be no difficulty. We must be content to know that it lay within the period when Jeroboam II and Uzziah occupied contemporaneously the thrones of Israel and Judah, about 775-750 B.C. It was at Bethel, the religious centre of the former kingdom, that his voice was heard. But Amaziah, chief priest of that famous sanctuary, soon intervened, sending a message to the king to accuse the uncourtly prophet of treason, and trying meanwhile to frighten away the preacher (Am 710-17). Jeroboam does not seem to have taken any notice. Probably he cared as little for Amos as Leo X did for Martin Luther. And the prophet was not to be frightened. He explained his position, completed his message, turned upon the worldly minded priest with a threat of divine retribution, and then withdrew unmolested. An unreliable Christian tradition of the 6th cent. asserts that Amaziah's son struck him on the forehead with a club, and that he died from the effects of the blow soon after reaching home.

4. The Book. One thing is certain. On his return to Judah he reduced to writing the substance of his speeches at Bethel; not, indeed, giving us a verbatim report of each several address, not indicating precisely where one ends and another begins, but furnishing, rather, copious notes of these weighty discourses. And the exclamation, 'Oracle of Jehovah' (see on 216), is the Nota Bene of the writer, calling attention to peculiarly grave words. Besides writing out his message he added to it. He had preached against the crimes of Israel: he writes of the sins and punishments of surrounding nations (12-216).

Remembering that the book of Amos is in all probability the earliest of the prophetic writings, it helps our comprehension of him and his successors to keep four points in view.

(a) His Idea of God. His faith in the Unity of God was not won by reasoning. He had a deep sense of the nearness, greatness, righteousness of One Holy Being; there was no room for another. The One God is all-powerful in Heaven and Hades, Carmel and the depths of the sea, Caphtor and Kir, Edom and Tyre. His mightiness appears in the control of human history, especially in His direction of the fortunes of Israel. It directs all that happens;

there is no such thing as chance; calamity, equally with prosperity, is of His ordering. This implies dominion over Nature; drought, dearth, mildew, pestilence, locusts obey His orders. He is not a mere Power, however great; but a distinctly Personal Being, who can be spoken of as rising up against the wicked, sword in hand, or as moved by pity to change His purpose.

(b) The Relation between Jehovah and His People. In common with all other Hebrews, the prophets believed that Jehovah was in a peculiar sense their God. But in their eyes the bond was a natural and indissoluble one, so that if they paid His dues in the form of sacrifices, He was under an obligation to protect and bless them. Amos, on the contrary, insisted that the tie was a moral one, inevitably dissolved by unrighteousness (3² 9⁷). Here his splendid originality comes out. Ceremonial worship has no intrinsic value (4⁴ 5²¹). Justice and righteousness form the true service of God (5²⁴); if His worshippers are immoral and oppressive, He shrinks from contact with them as a defilement (2⁷); inhumanity and unbrotherliness are hateful to Him, whether displayed by heathen or Hebrew (chs. 1, 2). To Amos, Jehovah is above all else the God of Righteousness.

(c) The Coming Judgment. This is the first Scripture in which 'the Day of Jehovah' is mentioned. Not but what it had already become a current phrase. The Israelites thought that when the Lord should arise in judgment it would be to their advantage—their sufferings would terminate, their dominion would be extended. Now they were told that this 'Day' would be one of judgment upon themselves, and that its advent was nigh (5^{18,19}). Repentance would have averted destruction, but they have put it off too long.

(d) The Picture of a Happier Future (9⁸⁻¹⁵). This is quite unlike the general tenor of the prophecy. Israel has been the almost exclusive subject of the prophet's thought. Here Judah comes into the foreground, or, if Israel is in view, it is only as reunited to Judah. The Davidic kingdom is to be restored, but no stress is laid on the person or the character of the monarch. The ancient bounds of the empire will be reestablished, Edom and other foreigners being reduced to subjection. The restored exiles rebuild the wasted cities. Agriculture and kindred pursuits flourish to a miraculous degree on an extraordinarily fertile soil. And the people will never be dispossessed from this earthly paradise. Whether this appendix was added by Amos himself or by a later patriot need not be discussed here.

'The style is the man.' It is so in this case. When the shepherd from the south of Judah interfered in the social and religious life of Israel, he displayed extreme boldness. His style is a bold one. His language is clear, vigorous, direct. The imagery, as might have been expected, is drawn from rural affairs—threshing-sledges, wagons, harvests, cattle, birds, lions, fishing. But the Oriental shepherd, though he be not familiar with books, is not necessarily uncultivated. The poetic structure of c. 4 is quite perfect: the refrain, 'Yet have ye not returned unto me, saith Jehovah' (4^{6,8,9,10,11}), is used with great effect; the technical arrangement of the dirge is perfectly understood (5² 8¹⁰), and Amos knows how to work up to a climax.

5. Contents. We have already shown what is the substance of the prophet's teaching, but it will interest some readers if we roughly trace the order of his ideas as they appear in the book. It opens with a denunciation of the cruel wrongs done by the surrounding nations to each other and to Israel. All of these shall have their due recompense of reward (1⁸⁻²⁸). Judah's turn comes next: her offence is more directly against God, but her punishment is no less certain (2^{4,5}). When Israel is reached, the note is struck which resounds all through the book: it is the oppression of the poor, unchastity, a wrong idea of the character and requirements of Jehovah which will bring down chastisement (2⁶⁻⁸). These sins are due to ingratitude for God's mercies, and are aggravated by attempts to silence the voice of truth. They will bring on an attack and utter defeat at the hands of an enemy (2⁹⁻¹⁶). The next section teaches that the closeness of the relation between Jehovah and Israel itself involves the punishment of the people (3¹⁻⁹). The neighbouring nations are summoned to witness the oppressions which are going on: the doom of palaces and altars is pronounced (3⁹⁻¹⁵). The rich women are rebuked and threatened (4¹⁻³); the futility of superstitious worship is proclaimed (4^{4,5}); the failure of God's attempt to reform Israel is bewailed (4⁶⁻¹²). A bitter lament over Israel is followed by some account of the injustice practised by the powerful; then the fond hopes cherished respecting the 'Day of the Lord' are shattered, and the elaborate ritual with which it was sought to please Him is sternly rejected (c. 5). The luxury of the higher classes is the main theme of the next address, which ends with an intimation of Assyrian invasion (c. 6). Three visions set forth in pictorial form the speedy end of the nation (7¹⁻⁹). Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, attempts to drive Amos out of the country (7¹⁰⁻¹⁷). Another vision is described, and the common theme of dishonesty and injustice is again taken up: from the penalty thus provoked there will be no deliverance either in man or God (c. 8). None shall escape (9¹⁻⁶). Jehovah repudiates a special interest in Israel (97). The final paragraph rejoices in the hope of a happier future, a restoration of the kingdom in the line of David, a fertile land, an undisturbed security of tenure (9¹¹⁻¹⁵).

CHAPTERS 1-25

THE SINS OF ISRAEL'S NEIGHBOURS AND THE PUNISHMENTS WHICH SHOULD FOLLOW

1. We may paraphrase the main part of the sentence thus: 'The words of Amos, describing what he saw in prophetic vision.'

Herdmen] or rather, 'keepers of a peculiar breed of sheep called naqad.' There must have been a number of these sheepowners in and near Tekoa. Mesha, king of Moab, is called by the same name naqed (2K 3⁴), where our English Bible uses the word 'sheep-master.' Tekoa] 5 m. S. of Bethlehem, on a hill 2,788 ft. high, was at the border of the 'wilderness of Tekoa' (2Ch 20²⁰ 1Mac 19³³), which was fit only for pasturage and largely used for this. Palestine has always been subject to earthquakes, but the one here referred to, which occurred in the reign of Uzziah (Zech 1⁴), seems to have been of exceptional violence. The language of many passages in the poetical and prophetic books is derived from the alarming movements of the earth-shaken ground (Ps 46², 60² Isa 24¹⁹, etc.).

2. The threatening character of this v. gives notice beforehand of the tone of the whole prophecy. Zion and Jerusalem are God's abode, from which His voice is heard like a lion's roar. The burning wind is His voice. A modern traveller speaks of the simoom 'caressing you like a lion with flaming breath.' Habitations] RV 'pastures,' i.e. the sheep, which mourn because the grass is parched (Joel 1^{18, 20} Isa 3²⁰). The summit of Carmel is usually wet with heavy dews; even it becomes withered.

3. Amos was sent to preach to Israel, but he here (13-25) prefixes to his records of that preaching a section which shows that Jehovah is the Guardian of Righteousness, the Avenger of wrong and cruelty, amongst all the neighbouring races as well, Syria, Philistia, Tyre, Edom, Ammon, Moab.

For] i.e. because of. Three transgressions . . and . . four] an indefinite and considerable number (Job 5¹⁹). For the attacks made by Damascus see 2K 8¹² 10³² 13²². Gilead, being the nearest Israelite district, bore the first brunt. The threshing-sledge, a thick wooden board with pointed pieces of iron or of basalt on the under side, and a heavy weight or a driver above, is the figure for the harshest severity.

5. The bar is that by which the city gate was secured. The plain (RV 'valley') of Aven] the plain of Coele-Syria, in which Heliopolis (since called Baalbek), the great seat of sun-worship, was situated. Beth-Eden (the house of Eden) was in Syria, but its precise locality is uncertain, and we can only say of Kir that it must have been not far from Elam in the distant east (Isa 22⁶): cp. 2K 16⁹ Am 9⁷.

6-8. During the troubles with Syria the Philistines doubtless made raids, carrying off the whole captivity, i.e. the whole of the population of the district, at one swoop. The captives were sold to their bitterest enemies, the Edomites. Gaza] richest and strongest city of Philistia, on the caravan route to Petra, the capital of Edom. The expression the remnant of the Philistines indicates that a portion of them had already been destroyed. In 2Ch 26⁶ Uzziah's victories over them are enumerated.

9, 10. Tyre became the leading city in Phœnicia about 900 B.C. The Phœnicians were the great slave-dealers of antiquity: see 1Mac 3⁴¹ 2Mac 8²⁵. The 'covenant of brethren' (RM), or brotherly covenant (AV), is the friendly agreement which always subsisted between Tyre and the Hebrews (2S 5¹¹ 1K 5¹ 9^{11, 14}, etc.), and doubtless had occasionally been cemented by formal treaty. We never read of wars waged by the Israelites against Tyre or Sidon.

11, 12. Edom's crimes were hostility against a kindred nation, his brother (Mal 1²); the casting off all pity, or, as RM has it, 'the corrupting his compassions' (cp. Ezk 28¹⁷), i.e. the doing violence to his own better, kinder nature; the tearing his prey continually, like an infuriated beast (1K 13²⁸ Job 16⁹); the insatiableness of his revenge. We know that in later times Israel had no more relentless foe (Obad 10-14 Ps 137⁷).

12. Teman was the name of a city and district of Edom, 15 m. from Petra. The ruins of Bozrah are 4 m. SE. of the Dead Sea.

13. Jg 11 and Jer 49¹ show how eager the Ammonites were to 'enlarge their border.' Such barbarities as are here mentioned were quite common in Oriental warfare (2K 8¹² Hos 14¹), but the OT. seems to represent the Ammonites in a peculiarly unfavourable light (1S 11² 2S 10). 14. Rabbah] on the banks of the Upper Jabbok (2S 11, 12). The shouting means the war-cry. 15. Some of the ancient translations, with which Jer 49³ (see RV) agrees, understand this v. as referring, not to the king, but to the Ammonite god Molech, with his priests and his princes. This involves no alteration in the consonants of the principal word, which in either case is Molech.

C. 2. 1-3. Jehovah will punish the wrongs which these petty nations do each other, as well as their outrages upon Israel.

1. Burning the king's bones into lime was a gross indignity (Josh 7²⁵ 2K 23^{16, 18}). Their thorough destruction prevented the man's being 'gathered to his fathers.' And there may have ...a belief that the spirit suffered when the corpse was abused (Job 14²² Isa 66²⁴). Jewish tradition looked on this cremation as an act of vengeance for the part taken by Edom in the campaign described 2K 3. Kirioth] RV 'Kerioth.' Perhaps to be identified with Ar. the capital of Moab: when one of these is named the other is omitted. It is mentioned in the famous inscription of Mesha, who was king of Moab in Ahab's time, and seems to have been a sanctuary. His words are, 'before Chemosh in Keriyyoth.' 3. Judge, sceptre-holder (1⁵⁻⁶). king (1¹⁵), are all practically identical in meaning.

4, 5. The surrounding nations are charged with violations of the law written in the heart, Judah with offences against a law set forth in positive commandments. Their lies] the unreal, imaginary deities, the Baalim and Ash-taroath, who have no existence save in the mind of the worshipper, and therefore are sure to disappoint his hopes.

CHAPTER 24-16

ISRAEL'S SINS AND INGRATITUDE

6-8. Israel is now threatened in the same form as the rest, but vv. 6-16 were not spoken by Amos at Bethel; they form the conclusion of the preface which he wrote after his return home.

6. The unrighteous judges condemn the innocent for the sake of a bribe. A pair of shoes would have been too paltry a present, but for the fact that the shoe was a symbol of property (Ruth 4⁷ Ps 60¹⁰). To hand over the shoes was equivalent to our delivery of title-deeds.

7. They begrudge the very dust, a sign of mourning, which a poor man has sprinkled on his head: they hinder the man who is in a lowly position from attaining his modest purpose. To profane... name] The religion of many of the nations of antiquity sanctioned unchastity and even adopted it as part of the worship of the gods, but if Jehovah's worshippers are morally unclean they pollute His Holy Name. 8. The poor in the East sleep in their day-clothes. Garments taken in pledge should therefore be restored ere nightfall (Ex 22²⁵ Dt 24¹²); but these creditors, undeterred by their supposed nearness to their god, treat the needy man's clothes as if they belonged to themselves. Possibly, however, Amos wrote, 'And they stretch out beside every altar clothes taken in pledge,' meaning that they hung them up as a votive offering in honour of their god.

They drink the wine of the condemned in the house of their god] that is to say, at their sacrificial banquets they drank wine obtained by unjust fines, and whilst they imagined themselves to be worshipping the God of Israel He disclaimed them: they were really worshipping an idol of their own imagination.

9-16. The ingratitude thus evinced and the judgment which it provokes.

9. We may exhibit the emphasis designed by Amos by rendering thus: 'Yet it was I who destroyed... and it was I who brought you up,' etc. The Amorite here is a name for all the earlier inhabitants of the Holy Land. Instead of fruit from above, etc., we say 'root and branch.' But the Canaanites were not utterly extirpated (Josh 13¹³ 16¹⁰ Jg 1¹⁹⁻²⁶ 2S 5⁷). 11. The accounts we have of Samuel, Elijah, Elisha, and the 'schools of the prophets,' show that prophets, declaring God's will by word of mouth, had been more numerous in the northern than in the southern kingdom. The 'Nazirites' (RV) showed their obedience to His will by self-control, austerities, renunciations of pleasant things (Nu 6). God's most precious gift to His people consisted in true men, and, above all, in inspired prophets. 12. It was exceedingly base to tempt the Nazirite to break his vow. For the silencing of the prophets see 1K 22 Isa 30^{10,11} Mic 2^{6,11}.

13. The v. may be understood in two ways. First, as in AV, which represents Israel as a burden on God (Isa 1¹⁴ 7¹³ etc.). Secondly, and better, as in RV, 'Behold, I will press you in your place, as a cart presses that is full of sheaves.' As the ground reels under the loaded wagon so shall they under God's heavy hand (Ps 32⁴ Job 33²). 16. The stress lies on the word naked. In headlong flight the long, outer garment would be cast away as a hindrance.

Here, and at 3^{12,13} 4^{3,5,6,8,9,10,11} 6⁸ 8¹¹ 9⁷, 8,12,13, the expression rendered saith the LORD is a kind of exclamation, thrown in parenthetically to call attention to the gravity of what is said. Utterance of Jehovah! the prophet cries.

CHAPTER 3

THE FIRST ADDRESS

1-8. A call to attention. 9, 10. The expressions practised by the powerful. 11-15. The disasters which should overtake them, their sanctuary and their palaces.

1. 'Race' would be a more correct word than family. Judah is included in the appeal, but immediately drops out of sight again.

2. In the Bible to know frequently means to care for, to be deeply interested in (Gn 18¹⁹ Hos 13⁵ Nah 1⁷ Job 22¹⁸ Ps 1⁶ 73¹¹ Prov 2¹⁰ Gal 4⁹): at Jer 1⁵ and here it has the allied sense 'to choose.' Jehovah chose Israel alone to be His people. And they argued as Dr. Arnold did when he was a child: 'I could not make out how, if my mother loved me more than strange children, she should find fault with me and not with them.'

3. Be agreed] RV 'have agreed,' have made an appointment. If two people were seen walking together in the desolate regions with which Amos was familiar it might be assumed that they had not met by chance. Nothing happens by chance. There is a reason and cause for Israel's calamities. 4. 'Thicket' is preferable to forest: wild and broken country is in view. Amos intimates that a prophet's threats are not idle sound, any more than a lion's roar is. 5. Shall one take up a snare from the earth? etc.] RV 'Shall a snare spring up from the ground?' etc. The snare is the bird-trap as a whole: the gin (the word is a contraction of 'engine') is the mechanism by which the trap acts. But the trap does not go off till the bird starts it. The thought is that when the time of misfortune arrives Israel will be caught in it as the bird in the trap. 6. Israel cannot plead lack of warning (Ezk 33^{4,5}). All things are ordered by God, and therefore His prophets are able to give such warning. Evil here means disaster.

7. His secret is the purpose He has formed: cp. Gn 18¹⁷. 8. Luther said, at the Diet of Worms: 'Here I stand: I can do no other.'

9. In the palaces] RM 'upon'; the proclamation is made from the flat roof: cp. Lk 12³. Those who dwell in palaces are to be judged by their peers. Possibly Amos wrote, 'Asshur and Egypt,' the two great nations, Assyria and Egypt, the hammer and anvil, between which Israel lay. The mountain of Samaria (the capital of Israel) is surrounded by loftier ones, on which the spectators are supposed to stand. The oppressed] RV 'oppressions.'

10. They have lost the power to do equity. Their eyes gloat over treasures of gold and silver in their palaces: a prophet's eye sees only stores of violence and robbery (Ro 2⁵ Jas 5¹⁻⁴).

12. Even the wealthiest will escape with nothing but bare life. 'They sit in Samaria in the corner of a couch, and on the silken cushions of a bed' (RV). These cushions formed the divan, which is often the sole article of furniture in an Oriental reception room: the corner seat is the place of honour. The shepherd prophet loathed these modern luxuries.

14. Beth-el had been a sanctuary prior to the Israelite occupation of the land. In the days of Amos it was the undisputed religious capital of the northern kingdom (7¹³), whose subjects gathered there for seasons of special worship (4¹). No doubt the sacred pillar and post which we read of so often in connexion with the high places stood near the altar. The idol to which devotion was paid as the representative of Jehovah was the golden calf set up by Jeroboam I (1K 12²⁹). Burnt offerings, thank offerings and meal offerings were presented on the altars (5²²), and the service was made more attractive by singing and the music of the viol. But all this was vitiated by two faults. First, the god whom the worshippers adored was not the Holy One who alone is worthy, but a mere nature-god, dispenser of corn and wine and oil, of water, flax and wool (Hos 2⁵ 9¹). And, secondly, the worship was not of a kind to make men better, it was closely associated with immorality and with luxurious eating and drinking (Am 2^{7,8}); it did not promote either justice or generosity to others (Am 2⁸ 5²⁴). The horns were the most sacred part of the altar: to cut them off was to desecrate it thoroughly.

15. Winter and summer house were in some cases distinct buildings, but in others were parts of the same structure differently situated (Jg 3²⁰ Jer 3²²). The houses of ivory remind us of Nero's 'Golden House' at Rome: 'The interior was decorated in the most lavish way, with gold, precious stones and ivory... The supper rooms had panelled ceilings, overlaid with ivory.' It was a valuable commodity. Sennacherib, on one of the inscriptions which have come down to us, states that Hezekiah gave him 'a couch of ivory, thrones of ivory, an elephant's tusk.'

CHAPTER 4

THE SECOND ADDRESS

1-3. The heartless luxury of the rich women. 4, 5. The elaborate sacrifices and pilgrimages. 6-12. The failure of God's chastisements to produce amendment.

1. These pampered women are compared to cows grown fat through feeding in the rich pastures of Bashan (Nu 32¹⁻⁵ Dt 32¹⁴ Mic 7¹⁴).

Mrsters] RV 'lords,' i.e. husbands (1Pet 3⁶). 2. He] RV 'they,' i.e. the conquerors.

Your posterity] RV 'your residue.' Those farthest removed from danger will be dragged out of their retreats like fish from the water.

3. Like excited cattle each woman would make for the nearest breach in the city wall and endeavour to escape through it. The second half of the v. is corrupt. Possibly it may have run: 'And ye shall be cast out of your palaces' (Mic 2⁹).

4. This v. shows that the pilgrimage to a holy place was then, as it has been in almost all times and lands, one of the popular forms of devotion. The pious Jew delighted in the annual visit to Jerusalem for the Feasts of Passover or of Tabernacles. Jeroboam I set apart Bethel and Dan as the two sanctuaries to be visited by his subjects (1K 12²⁸⁻³²) for the same purpose. Other places were venerated in like fashion. Amos mentions Beersheba (8¹⁴) and Gilgal. The latter place, which was situated between Jericho and the Jordan, derived its name, 'a circle,' from the circle of sacred stones which existed there from time immemorial. Josh 4 and 5 speak of it as the site of the first camp of the Hebrews in western Palestine and the scene of the circumcision of the great mass of the people.

The prophet asserts that these journeys to the holy places, for the purpose of worship, failed to win the favour of God: the more zealously they were engaged in the greater the guilt of the pilgrims. The reason was that men substituted such devotions in place of good morals. There is an Arabic proverb concerning the ceremonies performed by pilgrims to Mecca: 'Circumambulate, and run, and commit the seven deadly sins!' Another plays thus on words: Al-harām fīl Harāmayn = 'Unholiness dwelleth in the two holy cities.'

Every morning . . . after three years] 'in the morning . . . on the third day,' seems preferable. On the morning after arrival the pilgrims brought an oblation: on the next day—the third, according to Heb. reckoning—they paid the tithes. In the great Mohammedan pilgrimage to Mecca the observances due on each day are strictly defined. 5. According to the Levitical legislation leaven might not be burned as part of a sacrifice (Ex 23¹⁸ Lv 2¹²); but even in those laws there are traces of some degree of freedom (Lv 7¹³ 23¹⁷). And in northern Israel it would seem that leavened cakes were consumed on the altar as a praise or thank offering. This liketh you] i.e. this is what you like.

6. Doughty speaks of an Arab who 'would often show that he had nothing left to eat . . . in cracking the thumb nail from the backward upon the upper front teeth.' Yet have ye not returned unto me] a pathetic refrain, expressing His disappointment and His appealing love. All warnings have been in vain. 7. In the plains harvest comes at the end of April; a month later in the hills. Heavy rains are necessary from Nov. to Jan. to soften the ground sufficiently for ploughing and sowing.

One piece was rained upon, etc.] cp. Gideon's fleece (Jg 6³⁷⁻⁴⁰). 8. Cities] i.e. the inhabitants.

9. Blasting] the effect produced on grain by the burning wind from the desert (Gn 41⁶).

Palmerworm] or locust. 10. After the manner of Egypt] 'Life and death march in "double companies" through Egypt. All epidemics revel here.' 2K 13⁷ is an illustration of the loss of horses. We are to think of the people as shut up in a fetid camp, with decaying bodies of men and horses, and all the other foul odours of the East. 11. The overthrow of these cities had become a type of utter destruction (Dt 29²⁸ Isa 1⁷, 8 13¹⁹ Jer 49¹⁸ 50⁴⁰). The brand plucked out of the burning is a figure for grievous damage.

12. Thus] but we are not told how. Imagination is to fill up the blank, and the partial overthrow already inflicted is enough to indicate what the final and total ruin will be. They must meet God as a foe (Josh 5¹³).

13. This verse, 5⁸⁻⁹, and 9⁶, were probably written on the margin by an admirer of Job 9⁴⁻¹⁰. His thought] i.e. the determination He has arrived at. He darkens the heavens with storms and eclipses. He marches majestically over the mountains in clouds and thunder (Dt 33¹³ Mic 1³ Hab 3¹⁹ Job 9⁸).

CHAPTER 5

THE THIRD ADDRESS

1-6. A lament, a warning, and an invitation. 7, 10-20. Denunciation of injustice and oppression, with threats of pestilence and judgment. 21-27. A repudiation of their attempt to please God by mere ritual.

1, 2. Lamentation] a technical term for mournful poetry consisting of short lines of unequal length: here, for instance (v. 2), the dirge consists of four lines, the first and third having three accents, the second and fourth two. Virgin] because, though often defeated, Israel had not yet been thoroughly conquered.

5. Pass not to Beer-sheba] People living in the northern kingdom would have to 'pass,' to cross over, the territory of Judah to reach the famous sanctuary in the extreme S. of the land. In the reference to Gilgal there is one of those plays on sound which are so common in impassioned speech: 'Hag-Gilgal galōh yigleh.' And in that to Beth-el a play on ideas: Bethel ('House of God') shall become Aven ('Nothing'). Hosea actually calls it Beth Aven, 'House of Nothing' (4¹⁵ 5⁸ 10⁵), and also Aven (10⁸). Bethel is now called Beit-in. 6. The better reading would be: 'Lest he send forth fire' (cp. 1⁴, 7, 10, 12 2², 5) 'upon the house of Joseph and there be none to quench it for Bethel.' Israel is entitled the house of Joseph, because Ephraim, the descendant of Joseph, is the chief tribe in the northern kingdom.

7. Instead of justice there is injustice, bitter as wormwood.

8, 9. (cp. 4¹³, and see Job 38³¹ Isa 13¹⁰ 25^{2,12}. 8. The seven stars] RV 'the Pleiades,' lit. 'the heap.' The shadow of death] RM 'deep darkness,' is better.

10. The subject of v. 7 is now resumed: they who turn justice into wormwood, etc., hate in the gate the man who reproves injustice. The gate is the broad, open space before the city wall, where all business is discussed and justice is supposed to be administered: cp. v. 12.

11. Burdens of wheat] RV 'exactions of wheat.' These remind us of the way in which the French nobility used to 'grind down the peasantry to the utmost farthing to extort money to spend in debauchery and riot in Paris': cp. also 2S 12³. Houses of hewn stone were a mark of great wealth (Isa 9¹⁰).

12. RV 'For I know how manifold are your transgressions and how mighty are your sins; ye that afflict the just, that take a bribe, and that turn aside the needy,' etc. Bribe] The word means 'ransom' (see Ex 21³⁰ Nu 25³¹ Prov 6³⁵); on many occasions it would defeat the ends of justice if a ransom was accepted.

13. What is the use of talking? As a modern writer says:

'For what avail'd it, all the noise
And outcry of the former men?'

14. As ye have spoken] RV 'as ye say,' i.e. as ye say He is, as ye flatter yourselves He is. 15. The remnant] At best a mere fraction will escape. 16, 17. Streets] RV 'broad ways': what we call squares and open spaces. The wailing is the tremulous, high-pitched lament for the dead. The most necessary occupations are suspended because of the great number of deaths. Where the merry shout of the grape-gatherers had been common, sounds of woe may now be heard. The skilful of lamentation are the professional mourners (Mt 9²³: cp. 2 S 3³¹ Jer 34⁵ Ezk 26¹⁷ 27³²).

I will pass through, etc.] as the destroying angel passed through Egypt (Ex 12).

18-20. Day of the LORD] see Intro., and cp. Isa 5³⁰ 8²³ Joel 2² Obad v. 15.

21. Festivals such as Tabernacles (1 K 12³³) are meant. I will not smell] RV 'I will take no delight.' The original words refer to the smelling the pleasant odour of the sacrifice (Gn 8²¹ Lv 26³¹). 22. The burnt offering was the costliest of sacrifices, and in early times was not often presented by private individuals.

Meal offerings] RV 'meal offerings': flour, or flour mingled with salt, oil, and incense.

Peace offerings] The 'thank offerings' of RM is better. These were partly eaten by the worshippers. Fat beasts were, of course, a costly sacrifice. 23, 24. Vocal and instrumental music was employed in the Temple service at Bethel, but was utterly distasteful to God because of the unrighteousness of the singers and the people generally: cp. Isa 1¹⁸ Ezk 26¹³.

Viols] a kind of lute or guitar, with ten or twelve strings and a sounding-board. Mighty stream] RM 'ever-flowing.'

25. Have ye offered?] RV 'Did ye bring?'

The answer is 'No.' So far is God from being influenced by sacrifices that all the time when His Providential care over them was most marked they were in the habit of presenting Him no oblations at all: cp. Josh 5⁵⁻⁷ 1 S 15²² Jer 7^{22, 23}. 26, 27. Render, 'And ye shall take up Sikkuth your king, and Kēwān your images, the star of your god which ye made for yourselves. And I will cause,' etc. Kēwān is the name of one of the Babylonian planetary deities who has been variously identified with Saturn or Mars. Another title of the same god, Tsalme, is probably concealed under the words rendered 'your images.' It is at present uncertain who is meant by Sikkuth. The idolaters will have to carry their idols into exile, beyond Damascus, i.e. into Assyria, which is thus vaguely indicated.

CHAPTER 6

THE FOURTH ADDRESS

1-3. False security of Judah and Israel. 4-6. Carelessness and luxury. 7-11. Captivity, siege, death, ruin. 12, 13. Preposterous errors. 14. The coming of the avenger.

1, 2. Render, 'Woe to the easy-going in Zion and to the secure in the mountain of Samaria! Make the round of the foremost nations and come to them, O house of Israel. Pass over to Calneh and see, and from thence go to Hamath Rabbah: then, etc. Are you better than these kingdoms? or is your border,' etc. that you should be so favoured. The site of Calneh is uncertain. Hamath is the well known city on the Orontes. 3. They refused to think of the coming retribution; they enthroned violence in their midst.

4. Reclining at meals was a custom introduced from the farther East: contrast 1 S 20²¹. The grandees now 'stretched themselves,' etc.: cp. Spenser's 'Poured out in looseness on the grassy ground'; luxury and idleness are implied. Eat the lambs, etc.] To a frugal shepherd the feeding up of beasts for food seemed shameful extravagance: 'Seldom the nomads eat other flesh than the meat of their sacrifices: but it be some beast that will not thrive, or is likely to die on their hands' (Doughty).

5. Chant] RV 'sing idle songs' is an improvement. The musicians were lazy triflers.

Invent to themselves, etc.] In the psalm which closes the Greek Psalter, David is made to assert: 'My hands fashioned an instrument, and my fingers fitted together a psaltery': see also 2 Ch 29^{26, 27}. 6. The goblet is not enough, they must have bowls to drink out of, bowls of costly material such as were generally used in divine service (Zech 9¹⁵ 14²⁰). The threatened ruin of the nation did not move these unpatriotic feasters to dispense with costly unguents, as men in trouble were usually ready to do (2 S 14²).

7. First in sin, first in punishment. The banquet, etc.] RV 'The revelry of them that stretched themselves shall pass away.' A play on sounds: Sar mirzach seruchim. 8. Excellency] i.e. the excellent things of which the nation was proud. 9. The city is besieged, and if there is a house in which the pestilence has left ten men alive their turn shall come.

10. And a man's uncle, etc.] RV is a little different: 'And when a man's uncle' (RM 'kinsman') 'shall take him up, even he that burneth him, to bring out the bones out of the house, and shall say unto him that is in the innermost parts of the house, Is there yet any with thee? and he shall say, No; then, etc. Taking this difficult v. as it here stands, we must remember that it was the duty of the next of kin to see to the disposal of the body, and that, whilst interment was the almost universal rule, cremation might be resorted to in special circumstances (1831¹²). The plague-stricken man in the inner rooms of the house must not defile the LORD's name by uttering it in the immediate presence of death, as a Mohammedan may not say his prayers in an unclean spot. A simpler form of the v., suggested in part by LXX, would be: 'A remnant shall be left' (in the plague-swept house), 'and when men break through to bring out the bones from the house it shall be said to him who is in the recesses of the house. Is there yet any with thee? and he shall say, None.'

12. Read, 'Shall horses run upon the cliff? Will a man plough the sea with oxen?' No! but in moral and religious matters they will do things as absurd as these. 13. No alteration of the original is required to obtain the following: 'Ye which rejoice in Lo-Debar, which say, Have we not taken for us Karnaim by our own strength?' For Lo-Debar see 2894 17²⁷, and for Karnaim Gn 14⁵ Dt 14⁴ Josh 21²⁷ 1 Mac 5²⁶: both towns lay E. of the Jordan and may have been taken by Jeroboam II.

A great change had come over the fortunes of Israel during the reigns of Joash of Israel and his son, Jeroboam II. Israel had been reduced to a very low ebb in the time of Jehoahaz by the repeated and successful assaults of the Syrians (2K 13^{7,22}). With the advent of Joash all this was altered. He recovered ten cities which Hazael had taken, and gained three victories (2K 13²⁵). Jeroboam II carried these successes still further. 'He restored the border of Israel from the entering in of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah' (RV) and appears to have been uniformly victorious. This was largely due to the fact that he never came into collision with Assyria, whereas the power of Syria had been greatly reduced by the campaigns of Shalmaneser III and Assurad.

Such a collision was, however, inevitable (v. 14). The earliest contact between Israel and Assyria of which we have any record was when Ahab, as an ally of Hadadezer of Damascus, shared in the disastrous defeat inflicted on the Syrian king by Shalmaneser II at the battle of Karkar, 854 B.C. On the famous obelisk of black basalt, now in the British Museum, ambassadors from Jehu are represented bringing tribute to the same Assyrian monarch at Hamath, 842 B.C. Tiglath-pileser III, called in the Bible 'Pul,' marched against Northern Syria in 738 B.C. and Menahem gave the king a thousand talents of silver, 'that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand'

(2K 15¹⁹). In 732 B.C. Tiglath-pileser III invaded Israel, took a number of towns, including the whole district of Naphtali (2K 15²⁹), and compelled Pekah, king of Israel, to pay a considerable tribute. The kingdom of Israel was destroyed in the year 722 B.C., when Samaria was taken by Sargon in the first month of his reign, after a siege which was begun by his predecessor, Shalmaneser IV, and had lasted three years.

14. The entering in of Hamath] the ideal northern boundary of the Holy Land (Nu 13²¹ 2K 14²⁵⁻²⁸): it is the great depression between the N. end of Lebanon and the Nusariyeh mountains. The river of the wilderness] RV 'the brook of the Arabah,' the Wādi-el-Ahsih, the southern boundary.

CHAPTER 7

THREE VISIONS AND AN INTERRUPTION

1-9. The visions. 10-17. The interruption.

There are two senses in which the word 'Vision' may be used of one of the forms of Hebrew prophecy. In the first sense a state of mind closely akin to that of a dreamer is intended: 'I the LORD will make myself known unto him in a vision, I will speak with him in a dream' (Nu 12⁶). The prophet falls into a kind of ecstasy, and has no control over the pictures which pass before his mind. Every one will remember the language ascribed to Balaam: 'He saith . . . which seeth the vision of the Almighty, falling down, and having his eyes open' (Nu 24^{4,10}). In the second sense of the word it is meant that the subject-matter of the preaching was divinely inspired, but the prophet's own mind and will played an important part in throwing this matter into the form of a picture. The visions of Amos belong to the latter class. God's Spirit made the coming destruction of Israel certain to this man. Amos drew, and then explained, the pictures which were emblems of that destruction, the locusts, the devouring flame, the measurement with a plumb-line, the basket of summer fruit, the fall of temple and column.

1. Grasshoppers] RV 'Locusts.' The latter growth may possibly mean the grass which springs in Palestine after the late rains in March-April. We cannot be quite certain whether the king's mowings or 'shearings' are here mentioned. Sheep-shearing in N. Palestine takes place about April. The king's mowings would be a portion of the crops taken to feed his horses. 2. Render, 'And as they were about to make an end of eating . . . Who shall raise up Jacob?' The question is equivalent to an exclamation: 'Oh that Jacob might be raised up!'

4. He would not conduct His controversy with words, but with a consuming fire (Isa 66¹⁶). The great deep] the abyss on which the earth was supposed to rest (Gn 7¹¹ Ps 24²). A part] RV 'the land,' the portion appointed to Israel: this, also, the fire was about to consume.

7, 8. Upon a wall] RV 'beside a wall.' The testing of the wall is a symbol of the searching investigation into the people's conduct, which would be followed by a strictly just recompense (2S 8² 2K 21¹³ Isa 34¹¹ Jer 1^{14,12} Lam 2⁸). 9. The high places of Isaac] i.e. Beer-sheba (5⁵), which was especially associated with Isaac (Gn 27²³ 28¹⁰).

10, 11. Amaziah, being a royal official, intervenes as soon as the king's name is brought in (v. 9). He sends a message to Jeroboam II at Samaria (2K 14²³), charging the prophet with stirring up sedition at the very centre of the national life. And he exaggerates. Amos had not said that the king himself should be killed. 12, 13. How contemptuous Amaziah is! His words literally are: 'Secr, go, flee thee away,' etc. There is a proverbial saying, 'Eat your pudding, slave, and hold your tongue.'

The king's chapel] RV 'The king's sanctuary': his 'Chapel Royal.' The king's court] RV 'a royal house': one of his residences (Dan 4³⁰).

14. We catch the emphasis if we render: 'No prophet am I, and no son of a prophet am I.' The latter expression may mean that he had not been trained in one of the schools for prophets (1S 19²⁴ 2K 4³⁸ 9¹), but it is better to understand it as referring to the Oriental custom of the son following his father's occupation. A gatherer of sycamore fruit] RV 'A dresser of sycamore trees.' The sycamore fig required pinching or scraping to bring it to ripeness. It was not thought much of in Palestine. 15. Cp. 2S 7⁵ 1K 19¹⁰ Ps 78^{70,71} Gal 1¹. 16. Thou sayest] in opposition to what the LORD said (v. 17). Drop not thy word] don't let it drip, drip, drip, in imbecile and wearisome fashion (Mic 2^{6,11} Ezk 21^{2,7}).

17. An harlot] violated by the victorious soldiers. The greatest disaster that can befall an Eastern is to leave no son to continue his name. The ample domain of the wealthy priest would be divided into small properties for the new settlers (Jer 6² Mic 2¹). A polluted land] or, 'a land that is unclean' (RV), is one where Jehovah, not being its recognised lord, could not be legitimately worshipped (1S 26¹⁹ 2K 5¹⁷ Hos 9³⁻⁵ Ezk 4¹³).

CHAPTER 8

THE VISION OF THE RIPE FRUIT, FOLLOWED BY A FIFTH ADDRESS

1-3. The vision. 4-14. The address, denouncing dishonest traders (vv. 4-6), threatening earthquakes, eclipse, mourning, a painful sense of abandonment by God, an utter destruction of the superstitious (vv. 7-14).

1-3. Notwithstanding the interference of Amaziah, the prophet finishes the recital of his visions.

1, 2. Another play on words—qayits is the word for ripe fruit, and qêts for end. We might represent it by, 'A basket of ripe fruit. My people are ripe for judgment.' 3. The literal translation of this picturesque v. is, 'And the songs of the Temple shall howl in that day—utterance of the Lord Jehovah! Many the corpses! In every place they cast forth! Hush!' Temple] RM 'palace.' The building is regarded as the palace of the Great King; the word came to the Hebrews from Babylonia, and literally signifies 'Great House.' The pestilence is so fatal that men have no time either to burn or bury the dead, and no inclination to talk.

4. To make the poor of the land to fail] i.e. to exterminate those who are in lowly circumstances. 'They make a solitude and call it peace.' 5. The new moon was originally a more important festival than the sabbath. For points in its observance see 1S 20⁶ 2K 4²³ (sa 1¹⁰ Hos 2¹³, and cp. the Levitical ritual in Nu 28¹¹).

The ephah] the measure by which they sold, was fraudulently small; the weight by which they tested the money paid them was as dishonestly great. Money was not coined, but was weighed on every business occasion (Gn 23¹⁶). The ephah contained about 6.5 Imp. pbs.; the shekel of 252 grs. would be worth about £2 1s. of our money.

7. Jehovah Himself is the Excellency, the Pride and Boast of His people.

8. The movements of the land shaken by the earthquake, or whatever other calamity was divinely inflicted, are compared to those of the Nile: 'Yea, it shall rise up wholly like the River; and it shall be troubled and sink again, like the River of Egypt' (RV). The word for 'river' is regularly employed of the Nile.

9. The eclipse of June 15th, 763 B.C., may have impressed his imagination powerfully.

10. Feasts] religious, not secular. The cloth of camel's or goat's hair was bound round the loins with a cord. Shaving the head was a sign of mourning (Lv 21⁵ Isa 4²¹ 22¹²). This day would end as badly as it began.

11. The word which they craved was not one of spiritual instruction, but of guidance out of trouble: cp. 1S 3¹. 12. From sea to sea] i.e. from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea.

14. The sin, or, rather, the 'guilt' of Samaria, is the idolatrous object worshipped by the Samaritans, either the calf at Bethel (1K 12²⁹ Hos 8¹⁵ 10⁵), or the Asherah at Samaria (2K 13⁶).

The manner] RV 'the way of Beer-sheba' may perhaps mean the pilgrimage thither. Mohammedans swear by the pilgrimage to Mecca. But Amos not improbably wrote, 'By the life of the deity of Beer-sheba.'

CHAPTER 3

THE CONCLUDING VISION AND A DISCOURSE.
COMFORTABLE WORDS

1. The vision. 2-10. The discourse, declaring that none shall evade God's judgments (vv. 2-6); that Israel stands in no peculiar relationship to Jehovah (v. 7); that all the sinners amongst them shall perish (vv. 8-10). 11-15. Comfortable words, predicting the restoration of the Davidic kingdom in all its former extent (vv. 11, 12); the exuberant fertility of the land (v. 13); the complete and final establishment of the nation on it (v. 15).

1. Read, 'I saw Jehovah standing beside the altar; and he said, "Smite the capitals of the pillars, so that the thresholds may shake, and break them in pieces on the head of all of them... there shall not one of them flee away, and there shall not one of them escape."' The altar is that at Bethel, the chief sanctuary of the kingdom (1K 12³⁸ Am 7¹³); assembled there for worship, the great mass of the people meet with destruction, like the Philistines in the house of their god (Jg 16^{20, 30}). The blow from heaven shakes the building throughout, and its loftier parts come crashing down on the worshippers.

2. Hell] Heb. Sheol, the abode of the departed. 3. Carmel's lofty, rough, wooded summit would be an ideal place to hide in. Fugitives had the right of asylum on this sacred mountain. The reference to the serpent reminds us of the Babylonian myth in which the dragon of chaos is vanquished by Merodach: cp. also Isa 51⁹ Ps 74¹³. 5, 6. This may have been a note written on the margin, suggested by 5⁸ 8⁸. 6. RV 'It is He that buildeth His chambers in the beaven, and hath founded His vault upon the earth.' The vault of the sky appears to rest on the ground.

7. At 3² Amos admits that there is a special bond between Israel and the Lord; here, with splendid boldness, he repudiates it. Their conduct has dissolved the connexion. Not only so: Providence has guided other races as well as the Hebrews: cp. Mt 3⁹ Jn 8³³ Ac 17²⁶). The Ethiopians inhabited that part of the Nile Valley which stretches from Assuan southwards. Caphtor] probably the island of Crete (cp. Ezk 25¹⁶); but some authorities identify it with the coast of the Egyptian Delta.

8-10. The qualifications at the end of vv. 8, 9 rob the threat of much of its force, and are not quite in the manner of Amos. At all events, we have three stern messages here: the kingdom is to be utterly destroyed, the people are to be wanderers amongst all nations, the sword is to slay all the sinners.

11. The dominion exercised by David's descendants is spoken of as the tabernacle of David, and is figured as a small, dilapidated bouse, part of which has fallen in, the rest being full of gaps: cp. 1K 12¹⁶ Ezk 34^{23, 24} 37²⁴. 12. The remnant of Edom is an expression which implies that this people has been much weakened; the victories of Amaziah greatly reduced its power (2K 14⁷⁻²²). Over other nations, also, Jehovah's name had been proclaimed as victor and owner: cp. Dt 28¹⁰ 2S 12²⁸ Isa 63¹⁹ 2Ch 6³³. 13. Vintage comes in the dry months of autumn, and is soon over. In the happy future the grapes will be so plentiful that this work will last till the rainy season, when the grain is sown. Sweet wine] the newly expressed juice of the grape. 14. To bring again the captivity is an expression which does not necessarily imply exile. It often means a favourable change in one's fortunes. But the mention of the waste cities, and the land gone out of cultivation, agrees with the idea of a real captivity, and the promise in the closing v. suggests that Israel had been 'plucked up out of their land.'

OBADIAH

INTRODUCTION

1. Contents. The book of Obadiah, as the title in v. 1 states, is a prophecy against Edom. The main divisions are as follows:—Vv. 1-9, Edom is about to be driven out of its land by a confederacy of nations; vv. 10-14, this is in punishment for its participation in the capture of Jerusalem; vv. 15, 16, a day of judgment is coming upon all nations; vv. 17-21, in that day Judah and Israel shall escape, and shall regain the lands that the Edomites and other enemies have taken from them.

2. Composition. All criticism of this book must set out from the remarkable correspondence between it and parts of Jer 49. The parallelism is as follows:—Obad 1^a = Jer 7^a, Obad 1^b 2 = Jer 14, 15, Obad 3, 4 = Jer 16, Obad

5^a = Jer 9^b, Obad 5^b = Jer 9^a, Obad 6 = Jer 10, Obad 8 resembles Jer 7^b slightly, Obad 9 resembles Jer 22 slightly.

(a) The theory that this parallelism is due to quotation of Obadiah by Jeremiah is open to a number of formidable objections. (1) Obad 10-14 seems to refer to the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar in 586 B.C., but Jer 49 is commonly supposed to have been composed immediately after the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C. In that case Jeremiah wrote before Obadiah, and therefore cannot have quoted him. The words of Obadiah cannot be referred to the capture of Jerusalem by Shishak (1 K 14²⁵⁻²⁶), nor by the Philistines and Arabians (2 Ch 21^{16f}), nor by Israel (2 K 14^{13f}), for in none of these cases is there any record of a participation of Edomites. The pre-exilic prophets never accuse the Edomites of assisting in the sack of Jerusalem: cp. Amos 1⁹⁻¹² Jer 9²⁶ 25²¹ 49^{7f}. Only in the post-exilic prophets is this charged: cp. Ezk 35 Ps 137 Lam 4^{21f}. It seems impossible, therefore, to refer Obad 10-14 to anything else than the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar. (2) Obad 7 states that the allies of Edom have expelled him from his land. This event is anticipated in Ezk 25^{10, 12, 14}, and it is an accomplished fact in Mal 1³. There is no event before the exile to which these words can be referred; consequently Obadiah cannot be earlier than Jeremiah. The view that Jer 49 is a late post-exilic interpolation in the book of Jeremiah is inconsistent with the fact that Obad 7, 10-14 and all other allusions to late events in the book of Obadiah are absent from the parallel in Jer 49.

(b) The reading of Jer 49^{15b} is preferable to Obad 2. Jer 49⁹ lacks the clumsy addition found in Obad 5. Jer 49¹⁰ is a more natural sequel to Obad 5 than is Obad 6. These facts indicate that in several particulars the text of Jer 49 is more primitive than that of Obadiah.

(d) The theory that Jeremiah is quoted by Obadiah is also untenable. (1) Because the order of the vv. is more primitive in Obadiah than in Jeremiah. Obad 1 is evidently the beginning of the oracle, and this is logically followed by vv. 3-6, 8, 9. The different order of the vv. in Jer 49 is unnatural and cannot be primitive. (2) The text of Obad 1, 3, 5, 8 is more primitive than the parallel vv. in Jeremiah. (3) The form of the prophecy in Obadiah is much briefer than that in Jeremiah, and is therefore probably more primitive. Moreover, the vv. in Jer 49 that are not found in Obadiah show the characteristic language of Jeremiah.

(c) In view of these facts the only possible theory of the relation of Obadiah to Jer 49 is that both prophets quote a third earlier prophet. The vv. that are found both in Jeremiah and Obad 1-6, 8, 9, are the only ones that can be ascribed with certainty to the older prophecy.

3. Date. How long before Jeremiah the prophet lived who wrote Obad 1-6, 8, 9 and the parallels in Jeremiah can only be conjectured. Some regard him as a contemporary of Isaiah, and refer the disaster threatened in these vv. to the humiliation of Edom by Amaziah (2 K 14⁷). It seems, however, that the enemies of Edom in this passage are not Israelites but Gentiles, and it is perhaps better to understand the danger as the Arabian invasion mentioned in 2 Ch 26⁷. The same disaster apparently threatened Moab according to Isa 15-16¹². The second half of the book of Obadiah (vv. 10-21) was written during the exile, while the memory of Edom's wrong was still fresh.

4. Value. The purpose of the book of Obadiah is to express Judah's hatred of Edom and its confidence that Edom will ultimately be destroyed. This conviction rests upon a recognition of the fundamental difference between the national characters of the two nations. The Edomites were famous for their secular wisdom, but no allusion to their religion is ever made in the O.T. Esau figures in Hebrew tradition as a profane person, destitute of spiritual instincts. The confidence that Edom shall not ultimately triumph over Israel is, therefore, no mere expression of Jewish patriotism, but is a spiritual conviction that the religion of Jehovah cannot be extinguished by the forces of evil. As an expression of this conviction the book of Obadiah has permanent value.

1-9. The question has been much discussed whether vv. 1-9 are prediction or description. V. 7 is clearly description, and on the strength of this some seek to explain the whole passage as descriptive; but, as we have just seen, v. 7 is not found in Jer 49, and is, therefore, no part of the old prophecy that Obadiah quotes. It is to be attached to v. 10, and is part of Obadiah's addition to the original oracle. Apart from this v. there is no reason for regarding vv. 1-6, 8, 9 as predictive. The expression 'we have heard' (v. 1^b) does not indicate that the disaster of Edom is past, but only that the news that it is impending has just reached the speakers. 'I have made' (v. 2) also does not indicate that the disaster is accomplished, but merely that it is determined in the divine purpose. V. 3 clearly implies that Edom is still dwelling in his rocky strongholds, and does not believe that he can ever be expelled from them, and in v. 4 the words 'I will bring thee down from thence' show that the catastrophe still lies in the future. To understand these words as a purpose of God uttered in the past is very unnatural. Accordingly, we conclude that the ruin of Edom predicted in vv. 1-6, 8, 9 lies in the future, that knowledge that it is impending has already reached Israel.

1. Vision of Obadiah] A title added by the collector of the Minor Prophets. Who Obadiah was is unknown. The name means 'Servant of Jehovah.' Thus saith the Lord GOD concerning Edom] a remark by the author of Obad 7, 10-21 designed to introduce his quotation from the older prophet. We have heard] a better reading than 'I have heard' (Jer 49¹⁴). This sentence is not a natural continuation of the introductory formula in v. 1^a, and it shows that the passage quoted was not originally an oracle spoken by the Lord, but a report heard by the Israelites. Rumour] a correct translation of the original. This word is never used in the sense of 'oracle.' This meaning is rendered certain by the parallelism of the next clause, an ambassador is sent among the heathen. The added words, from the Lord, do not indicate that the 'rumour' is an utterance of the Lord, but only that the coming disaster is caused by Him. The 'rumour' is news of the impending attack of the nations upon Edom. In v. 1^b the language of Obad. is more original than that of its parallel Jer 49¹⁴. Heathen] better, RV 'nations.' The allusion is probably to Arabian tribes that menaced Palestine in the time of Uzziah (2 Ch 26⁷). The names of the kings of Edom in the Assyrian inscriptions in comparison with the list of Gn 36³¹⁻³⁹ show that a new Arabian population entered the land of Edom by the middle of the 8th cent. B.C. To this impending migration the author of this ancient prophecy probably refers.

2. Behold, I have made thee small] does not refer to an accomplished overthrow of Edom, since in v. 1^b the nations are summoned to come against him, and since in vv. 3, 4 he still feels secure in his strongholds; but it refers to a divine determination already made. The parallel in Jer 49¹⁵ omits 'thou,' thus making it more clear that the whole v. refers to the divine purpose. Small and despised refer to the condition in which Edom will be left after the conquest by the nations. The word greatly is a textual corruption of 'among men' that is preserved in Jer 49¹⁵.

3. The confidence of Edom that he cannot be dislodged from his rock-dwellings and fortresses. The land of Edom was full of caves, artificially enlarged and fortified, whose remains are still to be seen in great numbers at Petra and elsewhere throughout the land.

4. The divine determination to dislodge Edom from his land in spite of the inaccessibility of his strongholds.

5. States that even thieves leave something behind them, and that grape-gatherers leave a few grapes. The thought is the contrast in the condition of Edom after it has been invaded. The nomads of the desert will leave nothing behind when once they have overrun the land. In Obad. the thought is expressed in the form of a question expecting an affirmative answer, but in Jer 49⁹⁻¹⁰ it is expressed as an affirmative statement. The form in Obad. is obviously the more poetic and original. The words 'how art thou cut off' are not found in the parallel in Jer., and are a weak addition made by the writer of the second half of the book or by a later scribe.

6. Things] RV 'treasures.' After v. 5 we naturally expect a statement of the contrast between the treatment of Edom and the conduct of thieves and grape-gatherers in leaving a remnant, but this is not found in the v. This leads some to reject it as a gloss and to regard v. 7 as the original continuation of v. 5; but, as we have seen, v. 7 is not found in Jer 49 and refers to an event after the fall of Jerusalem, so that it is unquestionably an addition made by the writer of the second half of the book. The best solution of the difficulty is to regard Jer 49¹⁰, which is parallel to v. 6, as the original continuation of v. 5. This v. is much more perfect than the parallel in Obad., and contains a statement of the complete destruction of Edom that the context requires. Obad 6 is apparently merely a broken-down form of the text in Jer 49¹⁰.

7. Brought thee] RM 'driven thee out.' The v. refers to the complete expulsion of Edom from his territory by the Nabataean Arabs at some time during the exile of Israel. The event is spoken of in the past tense, and shows that the writer lived after the fall of Jerusalem. This v. is not found in Jer 49 and must come from the hand of the author of Obad 10-21. It joins on naturally to v. 10. The word translated in AV 'they that eat thy bread' is omitted by LXX. It is a dittograph of the last letters of the preceding word.

8, 9. Some reject these vv. as glosses because the verbs are in the future, instead of the past tense, as in v. 7; but, as we have seen, v. 7 is not part of the original prophecy, and vv. 1-6 regard the fall of Edom as still future. These vv. join on logically to v. 6. Jer 49^{7b, 22} contain slight resemblances to these vv. The text of Obad. appears to be more original on account of the use of the first person and the expression 'saith the Lord.' The worldly wisdom of the Edomites was proverbial among the Hebrews: cp. Jer 49⁷.

10-14. The vv. describe the co-operation of the Edomites in Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerusalem and state that the foregoing prediction of destruction is due to this unbrotherly conduct. These vv. together with v. 7 and vv. 15-21 come from the hand of the later writer. It is clear that he is ignorant of the original meaning of the ancient prophecy in vv. 1-6 and 8, 9, and regards it as a still unfulfilled prediction of the destruction of Edom. The last word of v. 9 is to be attached to the beginning of v. 10, translating 'because of the slaughter, because of the violence.'

10. The imperfects in Hebrew describe the present condition of Edom, and should be rendered 'shame covers thee, thou art cut off for ever.' The allusion is the same as in v. 7 to the recent Nabatean migration through which Edom has been dispossessed.

11. This is a clear reference to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. The Edomites are blamed for assisting in the work of destruction. The past tenses show that we are dealing with description, not with prediction. Thou stoodest on the other side, in a hostile sense (RM 'aloof') as in Ps 38¹¹.

Forces] RV 'substance,' i.e. wealth.

12-14. These vv. describe poetically in the form of a warning what Edom has actually done. 12. Looked on, with the sense of gloating over misfortune as in Mic 7^{10b}. The day is evidently the day of the fall of Jerusalem. The details of the hostility of Edom supplied by this v. are the same that are emphasised in Ezk, Lam, Pss, and other writings of the post-exilic period. This v. is partly identical with v. 14, and belongs logically after 13. It is, therefore, open to suspicion of being an editorial insertion. 14. The word translated crossway by RV and AV is of unknown meaning. In LXX 'a mountain pass.'

15, 16. These vv. describe an impending day of judgment upon all the heathen. The expression day of the LORD is the technical term used by all the prophets for a turning-point in history when the new era of blessing for Israel shall be inaugurated. In the older prophets this day is ushered in by the assault of Assyria, Babylon, or one of the other foreign nations, upon Israel. In Ezk and the prophets that follow him it is a day of judgment upon the heathen. This is the conception of this passage and shows that it cannot be earlier than Ezk. In v. 15^b Edom is addressed in the second person singular, as in the preceding vv., and is told that he shall be included in the general catastrophe of the nations. V. 16 is not to be understood of the Edomites, as is generally done, since the address is in the second person plural, and since the Edomites are included in all the heathen of the preceding v. The Jews are addressed 'who have drunk of the cup of the wrath of Jehovah,' and they are told that all the heathen shall be forced to drink the cup that they have drunk of. Instead of swallow down, a slight textual emendation will give 'stagger,' which is more consistent with the context.

17-21. These vv. describe the happy destiny of Israel. 17. Deliverance] RV 'those that escape,' i.e. in the coming day of judgment, and regain the land that they have lost at the time of the exile. This suggests that they are still in captivity. 18. Jacob is a designation of the kingdom of Judah, Joseph is a designation of the kingdom of Israel. Israel had certainly not returned at the time when this prophecy was written, and there is no more reason to think that Judah had returned. The thought of the reunion of the divided kingdoms of Judah and Israel is common in the prophets from the days of Amos onward. The closing words of the v., for the LORD hath spoken it, seem to be a reference to the ancient prophecy in vv. 1-6, 8, 9, which the author regards as still unfulfilled.

The text of vv. 19, 20 is very corrupt, and neither the AV nor the RV gives a satisfactory sense. The LXX allows us to restore the text and translate as follows:

'The Negeb (i.e. south Judah) shall possess Mount Esau (i.e. Edom), and the Shephelah (i.e. the inhabitants of the maritime plain of Judah) shall possess the Philistines, and the Mountain (i.e. the people of the mountain district of Judah) shall possess Ephraim and the open country of Samaria, and Benjamin shall possess Gilead. And the exiles of this host of the sons of Israel shall possess the land of the Canaanites unto Sarephath, and the exiles of Jerusalem who are in Sepharad shall inherit the cities of the Negeb (i.e. south Judah).'

20. Sepharad was probably the name of a district in the north of Asia Minor.

The historical situation here assumed is that Edom has been expelled from its own land and has occupied the S. of Judah left vacant by the captivity. The maritime plain has been seized by the Philistines, the Samaritans have occupied the land of Judah, and the Arabs from E. of the Jordan have seized the territory of Benjamin. This condition of things shall be reversed in the good time coming. The invaders shall be expelled from the lands that they have unjustly seized, and the tribes of Israel shall occupy their ancient territory.

21. This v. describes the glory of Israel after Edom and all the other nations have fallen. Saviours refers to the monarchs that are to be raised up to rule the restored nation. The closing words, the kingdom shall be the LORD'S, show that the author's confidence of the fall of Edom and the triumph of Israel is based upon the conviction that the religion of Israel cannot perish.

JONAH

INTRODUCTION

1. The Book and its Hero. This little book stands alone amongst the writings of the prophets with which it is grouped. It does not contain any prophecies, except the message of Jonah to the Ninevites, yet it is placed with the books of Amos and Micah, which contain hardly anything else. It is written in prose, except the Psalm in c. 2, and appears at first sight to be a simple narrative of fact, yet it is separated from both the groups of books to which the histories of the O.T., Samuel and Kings, Chronicles and Ezra, belong.

The hero of the story lived in the reign of Jeroboam II., king of Israel, in whose time Amos's work was accomplished. According to 2K14²⁵, he prophesied the recovery from Syria of the lost border possessions of Israel. That fixes the date of his activity, as there recorded, in the first half of the 8th cent. B.C. He is said to have belonged to Gath-hepher, a town of Zebulun, and his grave is still shown in the vicinity of Nazareth.

2. The Author of the Book. But the author of the book before us cannot have been the hero of the story. That is proved, (1) by 3³. 'Nineveh was an exceeding great city.' The Hebrew makes it plain that the writer is looking back on a time already past, writing to those who are no longer familiar with the greatness of Nineveh. But as Nineveh was the metropolis of the world till its fall in 607 B.C., this book must have been written after that date. Further, no writer of the time when Assyria was the greatest of the world-powers would have described its ruler as 'the king of Nineveh,' any more than Napoleon at the height of his power could have been called king of Paris. (2) As is shown in the notes, the Psalm in c. 2 is full of allusions to various Psalms. Most of these are certainly later than the 8th cent. (3) The language of the book contains words and phrases which were unknown before the captivity. Hence it is generally agreed that the book was not written earlier than the 5th or 4th cent. B.C., in the period following the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, three centuries after Jonah's day.

3. Character of the Book. Many Christian and Jewish expositors formerly considered the whole book a literal narrative of actual facts. At the present time nearly all scholars judge it to be an O.T. parable, or instructive story, made to convey in pictorial form great spiritual truths. Against the strictly historical view of the book may be urged, (1) the complete silence both of the O.T. and of other history as to any such conversion of the Ninevites as that described in c. 3. On the contrary, they are uniformly described as idolaters, and threatened with the direst punishment: cp. especially the whole prophecy of Nahum, or Isaiah, chs. 10, 37, etc. (2) The book breaks off most abruptly, giving no account at all of the future fortunes either of Jonah or of the repentant people. From the literary point of view this is one of the beauties of the book (see on 4¹¹), but it seems to show that the design of the writer was not the writing of history. (3) To many readers the whole book suggests inevitably that we are in the world of parable, as surely as does the 'Pilgrim's Progress' or the 'Holy War.'

A modern reader may find difficulty in understanding how in such a parable an incident like that of the great fish could be introduced; to him its very strangeness might suggest that it was not mere invention. But to a Jew of the 4th or 5th cent. no such difficulty would appear. In Jer51³⁴⁻⁴⁴ (the whole passage should be carefully considered) the Babylonian captivity had already been compared to the swallowing of the nation by a huge dragon, and the deliverance from the exile to being cast out alive from the devourer's maw. Other O.T. passages, such as Job 7¹² 26¹² (RV) Ps 74¹³, show how familiar was the thought and the dread of the monsters of the deep. To represent a great disaster occurring to a man who run away from duty by such an image, was as natural as was the picture of the Slough of Despond to a man who lived in a marshy and ill-drained locality. Against this view devout Christian thinkers used to urge the references of our Lord in Mt 12²⁹⁻⁴¹ 16⁴ Lk 11^{29, 30}, which they supposed compelled us to accept the narrative as historical. It must be carefully observed that those who hold the position advocated here, do not challenge the authority of our Lord, but only the justness of this method of interpreting His words. It may fairly be said that He is using an illustration which is equally forcible whether it is drawn from fact or from poetry. Just as we refer to the Prodigal Son, or the Good Samaritan, in precisely the same terms we should use were their adventures historical facts, so may Christ have done here. On the whole, then, we conclude with confidence that though it is possible that a historical tradition of the mission of Jonah to Nineveh suggested the writing of the book, its author has freely worked on this material, and has subordinated everything to the conveying of spiritual truths. So in the parable of the pounds (Lk 19¹¹⁻²⁷), our Lord starts from the well-known incidents of the visits of Herod the Great and Archelaus to Rome. 'to receive a kingdom,' and from that point develops the story with its urgent lessons. So in his historical plays Shakespeare uses the old Chroniclers. But the historical parts of Machbeth or Richard the Second are of little interest to us, compared with the analysis of motive and the insight into character that are of such abiding value. It is of great interest to observe that in the OT, as in the NT, the natural human love for a story is so often appealed to, so that 'truth embodied in a tale may enter in at lowly doors.'

4. Aim and Teaching of the Book. The one pervading aim of the book is to exhibit the true relationship between man and God, only realised by understanding what men are, and what God is. In opposition to the teaching of later Judaism, with its bitter contempt and hatred of the heathen world, and its belief that God regarded it in the same way, the author is eager to show how kindness of heart and readiness to repent of sin may be found everywhere amongst men, and are always acceptable to God. So in the story of the voyage the heathen sailors shrink from the thought of violent or unjust dealings with Jonah, and both they and the people of Nineveh reverently own the power of Jehovah, so soon as His claims are put before them. With this may be compared our Lord's words in Mt 11²⁰⁻²⁴ Lk 11^{31, 32}, and His choice of the Good Samaritan as the type of brotherly kindness, in contrast with the priest and the Levite.

From such teaching about mankind follows naturally the teaching about God. He is revealed as full of infinite compassion, looking pitifully upon the thousands of innocent little children and helpless cattle in the great city, swift to hear and receive the cry of penitence. It is in accordance with this general view that God's individual dealings with His disobedient servant are set forth. He may punish, but is always at hand to deliver. He is willing to reason with His messengers as He does with Jonah in c. 4. Again, we compare our Lord's picture of the pleading of the father with the elder brother (Lk 15²⁸⁻³²).

One other truth is brought out with great beauty in c. 4, where Jonah's pity for the gourd is made an image of God's pity for Nineveh. We are taught that man may trust his nobler instincts as being true revelations of God, and from his own compassion argue upwards to find such qualities in perfection there.

'Though He is so bright, and we so dim,
We are made in His image to witness Him.'

Nowhere else in the OT. is there so close an approximation to the great saying of 1 Jn 17, 'For love is of God, and every one that loveth is begotten of God and knoweth God.'

We see, then, that in this little book of 48 vv. we reach the high-watermark of OT. teaching. It is of priceless value, and will remain so as long as men need to learn what God thinks of the teeming masses in the world's great cities, what we ought to think of them, and how God judges us by our judgment of them.

5. It should be noted that many scholars give a more particular application to the story than has just been set forth. To them it is an allegory, teaching the meaning of the history of the nation. Jonah stands for Israel, intended from the first by God to be the missionary people to the rest of mankind, but refusing to recognise its destiny. The swallowing by the fish represents the captivity, the deliverance the return from exile. Read thus, the book is at once a reproof and an appeal to those who, like the community in Jerusalem, even after their marvellous restoration, were still narrow and bigoted, hating the nations round them, not able even yet to understand the breadth of God's love. 'Who is blind, but my servant, or deaf as my messenger that I send?'

It is claimed that this permits a closer application of the vv. quoted from Jer 51. Against this, however, must be set the significant fact that the rest of that passage breathes the old bitter spirit of hatred against the heathen world. Further, the perfection of the allegory is certainly spoilt if both the great fish and the great city have to represent, in different connexions, the same thing.

Doubtless national implications are not excluded. But one is disposed to think that the real appeal of the book is to the common conscience of the people, perhaps also to some who claimed to be prophets, but could do nothing but repeat the harsh and cruel denunciations of days that ought to have been left behind for ever.

CHAPTER 1

THE DISOBEDIENCE OF JONAH

2. Nineveh] the world-famous capital of Assyria, on the Tigris. For its wickedness cp. Nah 3. 3. Jonah seeks to escape from the unwelcome task, both because he hates the Ninevites, and because he fears that, after all, God may spare them. Tarshish] Tartessus, SW. Spain, probably an old Phœnician colony. It would be in the opposite direction to Nineveh. Joppa] Jaffa, the only port of any size on the Palestinian coast. 5. The ship's crew is composed of a blend of nationalities. Each man appeals to his own god. Jonah, however, declares his God to be the Creator of all things (v. 9). For the story of the sleeper in the storm cp. Mk 4. 'Jonah was peaceful because he thought he was far from God's hand, Jesus was confident because He knew He was hidden in God's hand' (Marti). 6. The captain thinks that the deity of their passenger might deliver them.

11. Wrought, and was tempestuous] RV 'grew more and more tempestuous.'

14-16. The natural piety of the heathen sailors is strikingly shown. Compelled to believe, by the rising of the storm, the impossibility of reaching land, and the falling of the lot, that Jonah is guilty, they make a last appeal to be held innocent if a mistake has been made. Then, convinced of the power of Jehovah, they at once offer sacrifices on the deck, and vow further offerings if they arrive safely from their voyage. For the vow cp. Gn 28²⁰ 1S 11, etc.

17. A great fish] Nothing is said of the species of the fish; either a giant shark or a cachalot whale could swallow a man. But the Intro. shows that it is needless to argue whether the miracle of Jonah's remaining alive has ever been paralleled. We have given reasons for our view that the author never meant or expected his story to be regarded as anything but a parable. If that is so, it is useless for us to bring in a difficulty which never even occurred to him.

CHAPTER 2

HIS PRAYER OF THANKSGIVING

This beautiful song of deliverance shows clearly the familiarity of the writer with earlier Psalms. It reflects very plainly the horror inspired by the sea in the minds of an inland people. It is not necessary, on the interpretation adopted, to argue whether or not it is suitable to Jonah's position. Advocates of the national view of the book think it specially suitable to describe the sorrows of the people when drowning in the deep gulf of exile. If so, the references to 'thy holy temple' are not happy. On the whole, a personal application suits best the quotations from the Psalms, especially v. 4 = Ps 31²², v. 9 = 42⁴ 50¹⁴.

2. Out of the belly of hell] hell = Sheol, the realm of the dead, thought of here as a devouring monster. The phrase is purely pictorial; cp. 'from the jaws of death.'

3. Both parts of this v. are echoes from Ps 86, 7 427. 4. Cp. Ps 31²². Toward thy holy temple] cp. 1K 8³⁶⁻³⁸, and for the longing for the Temple Ps 84, etc. 5. Even to the soul] cp. Ps 69¹. The meaning is that the waters so press in that life itself is threatened. The weeds] Floating sea-weed entangles him as he sinks. 6. The bottoms of the mountains] their roots or foundations lying deep in the heart of the sea: cp. Milon, 'Hymn on the Nativity': 'While the Creator great... Cast the dark foundations deep.' Was about] RV 'closed upon.' The thought is that as he sinks he goes far from the earth, the home of the living, and its doors are closed and barred against him for ever. No return to the light and sunshine seems possible. Corruption] RV 'the pit,' i.e. of Sheol, as in v. 2. 7. (cp. Ps 107⁵ 142^{3ms} 186. 8. Lying vanities] cp. Dt 32²¹ = idol gods. 'Vanity,' lit. 'a breath,' means something evanescent and worthless.

Their own mercy] This is used as a name for Jehovah. In Ps 144² the same word is rendered 'my goodness,' RV 'loving-kindness.' It is here a pregnant use describing Jehovah as the sum and source of mercy. 9. (cp. Ps 42⁴ 50^{11, 23}. For vowed cp. also 1¹⁶.

CHAPTER 3

REPENTANCE AND PARDON OF THE NINEVITES

3. An exceeding great city] lit. 'great unto God,' i.e. regarded as great by God: cp. Gn 10¹¹. Of three days' journey] i.e. in breadth.

8. Even the cattle join in the mourning. Neglected by their owners, they fill the air with their groanings. (cp. Joel 1²⁰, 'The beasts of the field pant unto thee,' and for an interesting parallel, Judith 1¹⁶. The Persians are said, by Herodotus, to have clipped the hair of the horses and baggage animals that they might seem to share in the mourning for a general. 10. For the term 'repentance' = 'change of purpose,' as applied to God, cp. Jer 18³, and for the action Ex 32¹⁴.

CHAPTER 4

JONAH'S JEALOUSY CONTRASTED WITH JEHOVAH'S COMPASSION

1. Jonah's anger has a double cause, wounded pride that his words are proved false, and indignation that the God of Israel should pity heathen, only fit to be fuel for fire. 3. A striking parallel to the dejection and disappointment of Elijah (1K 19).

4. Doest thou well to be angry?] RM 'Art thou greatly angry?' A kindly remonstrance to awake better feelings. Jonah makes no reply yet, but goes and sits in his booth to watch whether, after all, God will not change His mind again. 5. The booth, like those used at the Feast of Booths, or Tabernacles, would be a rough structure made of poles and leaves. 6. Gourd] most likely the bottle-gourd, often planted to grow over trellis-work, whose broad leaves would form a good protection against the sun. 8. Vehement] RV 'sultry' = the sirocco. 9. See on v. 4. Jonah transfers his pity for himself, as an ill-used prophet, to the gourd which likewise has been hardly treated. A wonderfully true touch of human nature.

10. The argument is very fine. Jonah's feeling of pity for the gourd is just enough, a withered tree is always a sad sight. Yet on this gourd, 'child of a night' (so the Heb.), he had spent neither labour nor strength. How much more should God, of whose goodness man's highest virtue is but the faintest shadow, pity and spare the helpless and ignorant work of His own hands, who now fill the streets of Nineveh with pathetic appeals for forgiveness!

11. That cannot discern] i.e. little children. There is no finer close in literature than this ending. The divine question, 'Shall not I have pity?' remains unanswered. Its echoes are heard still in every crowded haunt of men Above the stir and din and wickedness the Infinite Compassion is still brooding.

MICAH

INTRODUCTION

1. Date and Period. Micah the prophet was a younger contemporary of Isaiah. His work began, according to 1¹, in the days of Jotham, and may have lasted right through the reign of Hezekiah (726-697 B.C.), into the time of Manasseh his successor. This date is confirmed by the historical reference in Jer 26¹⁷⁻¹⁹, where the prophecy of 3¹² is quoted in defence of Jeremiah, and is said to have been spoken in the days of Hezekiah (see notes). The period of Hezekiah was marked by great outward changes. Northern Israel was finally overthrown when Samaria was captured by Sargon of Assyria. During Sargon's reign and the early part of that of Sennacherib his successor (705-680 B.C.) Judah also was constantly threatened by Assyria. Then came the great deliverance of Jerusalem (701), which formed the crowning triumph of Isaiah's life (see notes in loco). Micah must have lived through this, if, as seems probable, the last two chapters of the book come from him.

As it stands, the book consists of a number of short oracles which were uttered separately and brought together later. Unless the reader remembers this, he will be bewildered by the abrupt transitions. There are two main divisions, widely separated in time. The earlier, chs. 1-5, belong to the period of Jotham and Hezekiah; the later, chs. 6, 7, probably to that of Manasseh.

2. Social Condition of Judah. The inward changes in the social conditions of the people of Judah during this period were as great as the outward. Judah had been forced out of its isolation. Trade relations had sprung up with the neighbouring peoples. The best intelligence and energy left the country for the capital, where the opportunities of advancement were greatest. Increased trade made the rich and clever richer, the poor relatively poorer. Power became centralised in Jerusalem. It was the seat of the Temple, which had won a new importance through Hezekiah's reforms, the heart of the national defence against Assyria, and the chief centre of the new wealth. The country districts and the city had lost touch with each other. Besides, whether Judah succeeded in maintaining a precarious independence, or became a vassal state to Assyria, its condition under Hezekiah required money, either to pay tribute or maintain its fortresses and army: and these charges fell specially on the peasantry.

3. Personality and Teaching of Micah. His Relation to Isaiah. Micah belonged to the country. He was a native of Moresheth-gath, a village among the low hills between the highlands of Judah and the Philistine plain. Prophesying at the same time as Isaiah, he speaks from a different standpoint. Isaiah was one of the ruling class in the capital; Micah was one of the oppressed peasantry. The vices of the city he selects are almost the same as Isaiah scours, avarice (2²), oppression of the poor (2⁹), and luxury (2¹¹). But Micah is specially severe on the religious leaders (3⁵⁻¹¹). Evidently, when Hezekiah made the Temple the centre of the national religion, he unintentionally made the religious teachers more dependent on the ruling class.

Isaiah preached, however, the security of Jerusalem. God will intervene to deliver His city from Assyria. Micah found men misunderstanding this promise, and believing that God would not destroy city and Temple, no matter what they did. He told them the only reason why the city was to be preserved was that it might become the centre of a better morality and a purer faith. Samaria and Jerusalem, the centres of the nation, ought to be the centres of justice and true religion. Instead they were the centres of irreligion (1⁵ 2¹⁻¹¹ 3¹⁻¹⁰). Therefore Samaria has fallen (1⁶) and Jerusalem shall fall (3¹²).

But this does not mean that Judah shall pass away. Judah's mission does not depend, like that of Assyria, on money and arms. There was a time when Jerusalem was a mere hill fort, when the 'glory of Israel' could house in the cave of Adullam (1¹⁵), when Bethlehem, an open village, was a king's birth-place. This 'former kingdom' could not compete with the other nations in chariots, fortresses, and a wealthy capital, but it was rich in a great ideal, the ideal of a king who shepherded his people, and received their willing obedience. Though this time should come back, and the pomp of the capital disappear, the result will be to show the nation their true mission of teaching religion to the world (4⁶⁻¹⁰ 5¹⁰⁻¹⁵). God is not casting away His people, though He destroy Jerusalem. There shall arise One from the old stock to represent the divine ideal. Messiah cannot arise in the soil of Jerusalem, full of vulgar ideals of vain glory, but in Bethlehem, where power is turned to unselfish uses and the eternal because divine hopes can be cherished (5²⁻⁵).

Then Israel will have a mission to the world. So long as she tries to compete with it in chariots (5¹⁰⁻¹⁵), she is doomed to failure, and has nothing which Assyria cannot give better. But, when she stands for true religion she offers what the world needs, and becomes the source of Messiah and the world's light (4¹⁻⁵).

It should be added that Micah seems to vary in his prophecy of the result of Israel's mission. This is due, (a) to the idea he has of true religion, as no mere observance of a ritual, but as implying a moral claim (6³⁻⁵), in this showing a striking resemblance to the strong ethical teaching of Amos; (b) to his view of the nations as free agents, who determine their own attitude to religion. Hence he now sees the peoples joyously accepting Israel's God, and sharing in Israel's peace and blessedness (4¹⁻⁵); again he sees them pursuing their own ideals and coming to ruin (4¹¹⁻¹³). But, because these truths are divine, they cannot fail of their effect, either in curse or in blessing (5⁷⁻⁹).

4. Micah's Later Ministry. Chs. 6, 7 date from the time of Manasseh (690-641 B.C.), but the exact dates are very uncertain (cp. 2 K 21). Sennacherib retreated from Jerusalem, but Esarhaddon — his successor — returned, subdued Phœnicia in 678, Tyre in 671, and made Judah tributary in 676. The old misery and uncertainty continued in Jerusalem. Men turned against the faith which seemed to have promised more than it could give. There was a reaction against Hezekiah's reforms. Men were not irreligious, only they doubted the supremacy of Jehovah. Their nation's impotence against Assyria seemed to prove the existence of other gods, whom it were wise also to propitiate (6¹⁶). Their worship of Jehovah took on darker elements. They construed their misfortunes as the evidence of His anger, and, like their heathen neighbours, offered their children to propitiate this anger (6⁷). The gloomy terror led them to persecute those who worshipped Jehovah only (7²). Against this Micah raised his noble and simple definition of true religion (6⁸). He rebuked anew their inhumanity to one another (6⁹⁻¹⁵ 7³⁻⁶). He insisted on the historic facts which proved the grace of God (6¹⁻⁵).

The prophet speaks, however, like a man who is almost alone in his faith in Jehovah's supremacy. The basis on which a new Israel can be built is almost gone (7¹⁻⁶), since the faithful are so few and dispirited. But Micah rallies on his trust in God. God's purpose for and through Israel cannot fail (7⁷⁻¹⁸). And the prophecy closes with prayer and a confident doxology. Though he has none save God, he will lean the more on God (7¹⁴⁻²⁰).

CHAPTER 1

JUDGMENT ON SAMARIA AND JUDAH

Sargon destroyed Samaria, the capital of North Israel, 722 or 721. Micah, about 720 B.C., declaring (v. 6) that Samaria's fall has been due to its sin, announces a like fate for Jerusalem, guilty of a like sin (v. 9). To the prophet this ruin of the people is not like that of the other nations Assyria has destroyed. Since God is manifesting Himself in it, Micah summons the nations to witness the event (vv. 2-4). The scourge will fall most heavily on the capitals, because the sin of the people has centred there (v. 5).

Micah sees the route of the invaders through Philistia and SW. Judah, and as he was a native of the district, he laments the fate of the villages he has known (vv. 10-16). Sargon may have marched along this route to attack Egypt at Raphia, 720 or 719 B.C.

1. Micah] A shortened form of Micaiah, 'who is like Jehovah.' Morasthite] native of Moresheth-gath: cp. v. 14. Which he saw] The revelation was made to his inward eye: cp. 1 S 9⁹.

2. All ye people] RV 'ye peoples, all of you.' His holy temple] i.e. heaven, as in Hab 2²⁰ Isa 63¹⁵. Israel's ruin is to be an object-lesson to the nations. 4. God's judgments in figures taken from earthquake, storm, and lightning. 5. The first Jacob must mean the whole nation, the second the ten tribes. High places of Judah] LXX and Syr. read, 'sin of the house of Judah.' The capitals, Samaria and Jerusalem, were the centres of moral and religious corruption. 6, 7. The verbs should be read as presents, 'I am making,' etc.

6. Plantings of a vineyard] Samaria is to become heaps of stones, like the stoneheaps over which vines were trained. Into the valley] Samaria stood on a hill (1K 16²⁴).

7. The hires thereof] the offerings at the idol shrines. For she gathered, etc.] The wealth of the offerings and plating on the idols, part of which has been gathered through the unelastiness of their women at the idol shrines (cp. Dt 23^{17,18}), will be carried to foreign lands, and dedicated to similar idolatries and similar foul rites.

8. Stripped and naked] i.e. without the outer garment (cp. 1S 19²⁴); here used as a sign of mourning. Dragons] RV 'jackals.' Owls] RV 'ostriches.' As a patriot Micah laments the calamities he predicts. 9. He is come] RV 'it' (i.e. the wound) 'reacheth.' The gate was the seat of the old men, the scene of justice. Jerusalem is called the gate of the people, as the centre of its wisdom and justice.

10-16. The vv. contain a series of word-plays on the names of villages in SW. Judah. The text is often obscure, and the point of some of the references depends on local allusions which we have lost. The district may have suffered when Sargon marched by this route to attack Egypt at Raphia, and when he captured Ashdod in 711 B.C.

10. At Gath] cp. 2S 1²⁰. In both cases the meaning is, 'Let us in our defeat be spared the malicious glee of our foes.' There is a word-play in the Hebrew here which may be imitated by saying, 'Tell it not in Tell-Town.' The Heb. for 'tell' and for 'Gath' being somewhat similar in sound. Weep ye not at all] read, 'in Akko (or Bokim) weep ye not.' 'Bokim' means 'weeping.' House of Aphrah] or, Beth le Aphrah. Aphrah and dust (Heb. aphar) are very similar. 'In House of Dust, roll thyself in dust.'

11. Saphir] 'beauty-town' with its beauty shamed. Zaanai] in sound like the Heb. for 'outgoing.' The town of outgoing shall be straitly shut up. In the mourning, etc.] RV 'the wailing of Beth-azel shall take from you the stay thereof.' Beth-azel may mean 'the house of stay.' Beth-azel shall be so busy lamenting its own fate that it cannot support any one. 12. For the inhabitant, etc.] RM 'for the inhabitant of Maroth is in travail (labour) for good, because evil is come down.' This fresh bitterness gives a new justification to the name of Maroth = 'bitterness' when good was so much desired. 13. Bind the chariot to the swift beast] i.e. 'you shall need your swiftest beasts for your flight.' Lachish suggested by similarity of sound, the Heb. reckesh, i.e. 'swift beast.' We have not the key to the allusion in the end of this verse. It may mean that Israel's idolatry made its first entry into Judah through Lachish.

14. Presents] RV 'a parting gift,' the marriage portion of a bride: cp. 1K 9¹⁶. Judah shall be obliged to relinquish More-sheth-gath ('the possession of Gath'), once her possession, to the conqueror. The houses of Achzib] shall be achzab, 'deceitful,' i.e. the kings of Judah shall no longer be able to rely on their support. 15. Mareshah] which may mean possession. 'I will bring to the possession a new possessor,' i.e. the king of Assyria. He shall come, etc.] read, 'the glory of Israel shall come even unto Ashdod.' David, the glory of Israel, had already found shelter there (1S 22¹). If those who are the glory of Israel return thither for refuge, it may be to rise with new vigour as David did. The threat is also a promise. 16. Make thee bald] artificial baldness was a sign of mourning (Lv 19²⁷ Dt 14¹). Eagle] probably griffon vulture. Judah is here addressed as a woman mourning over the loss of her children.

CHAPTER 2

THE SINS THAT BRING RUIN

Chs. 2 and 3, as dealing with the same subject, should be read together.

Micah now enumerates the sins which must bring punishment on Judah. He inveighs bitterly against the rapacity of the rich towards their poorer neighbours. The leaders in the capital, judges, prophets, and priests alike are destitute of the religion which makes a man interpret his power as a means of helping men and so glorifying God. Instead they regard it as a means to win money and position to themselves. The national institutions have been degraded into a means by which selfish men aggrandise themselves (21, 28, 31-5, 9, 10). Therefore these shall not continue (28-5), and even Jerusalem shall be plowed as a field (31²). The leaders reproach Micah as no patriot since he utters such things against his people, and no prophet since he forgets that God must save His chosen nation (26, 7). Micah replies that God will keep His nation, but that Jerusalem is not essential to God's purpose. When the capital is ruined, the nation may only be made more fit to fulfil its true ends in the world (21^{2,13}).

2. Cp. 1K 21 for the Israelite's attachment to his heritage. 3. This family] cp. 'The whole family which I brought up out of the land of Egypt' (Am 3¹). I devise] as contrasted with their devising (v. 1). 4. Turning away] RV 'to the rebellious,' i.e. God divides the ill-gotten fields to heathen and idolaters. 5. This may mean that the oppressor nobles shall have none to cast the measuring line on an allotment, when the periodical redistribution of the land took place, and some respect was had to old family rights. Their line is to fail.

The text of vv. 4 and 5 is uncertain, but the sense is clear. It shall be rendered to them as they have rendered to others.

6. Cp. Isa 30⁹⁻¹¹. Translate: 'prattle not, thus they (the nobles) prattle. They (the prophets) should not prattle of these things; their scoldings are unceasing.' The nobles turn on Micah. Prophets have no right to meddle with social and political questions, but should leave them to men whose business it is to deal with them. We are weary of this eternal scolding. 7. The first part of the v. probably continues the speech of the nobles: 'Shall it be said, O house of Jacob, is the spirit of the Lord straitened? are these His doings?' Can we, a nation whom God called the house of Jacob, endure to hear a prophet foretell its ruin? Micah replies abruptly, 'Your sins are blinding you. My words are good to men who bring a conscience to their appreciation.'

8. Even] RV 'but.' With the garment] RV 'from off the garment.' The robe is a mantle, the garment what is usually called the upper garment. Men averse from war] quiet, peaceful people. Micah seems to refer to some merciless treatment meted out by creditors to their debtors: cp. Ex 22^{26, 27}.

9. My glory] i.e. their inheritance in the holy land. The prophet implies that women and children are being sold into foreign captivity. 10. Because it is polluted, etc.] better, 'because of uncleanness ye shall be destroyed with a sore destruction.' They shall be driven from the land from which they have driven others. Their guilt makes the land no resting-place for them. 11. In the spirit and falsehood] better, 'after wind and lies.' What promises material benefits alone appeals to them.

12, 13. An oracle of restoration, which has been inserted between the two denunciations, when the separate oracles were collected in writing. Micah promises restoration, when the judgment has done its work. The expulsion from the land (v. 10) shall not be permanent. 12. The sheep of Bozrah, etc.] better, 'as sheep into a fold, as a flock into the midst of the pasture.' The great noise is the noise of the joy at return. 13. Read the verbs throughout as perfect. The writer speaks as though what he promises had already taken place. The breaker] or, 'deliverer': they have been shut up as in a prison. One will come to open their way.

CHAPTER 3

WICKEDNESS IN HIGH PLACES

Micah returns to his indictment against the people's leaders. Their power was given for the sake of justice, and they have abused it for extortion (vv. 1-3). Their time shall be short (v. 4). The prophets have abused their trust in order, by flattery of the rich, to make a good living for themselves. To them Micah prophesies judicial darkness (vv. 5-7). He declares his own ideal of the prophetic office (v. 8). Finally, he accuses all the leaders of the nation of having followed their own appetites and trusted in their being necessary to God. God will prove by the ruin of Jerusalem that He loves righteousness more than Jerusalem (vv. 9-12).

1. Is it not for you, etc.] i.e. is it not the reason for your holding power, to declare right to the people? 2. From off them] i.e. the common people. 4. When God comes to judgment, they will find no mercy. 5. That bite with their teeth, and cry, Peace] i.e. any one who fills the prophet's mouth secures his silence about his patron's sins. 6. Judicial darkness shall fall on these prophets. When men play fast and loose with principle for the sake of money, they lose all sense of principle. Right and duty become empty words.

7. Cover their lips] a sign of mourning: cp. Lv 13⁴⁵ Ezk 24^{17, 22}.

8. Micah's ideal of the prophet's function, viz. to call sin by its right name. 10. i.e. they make the common people sweat blood to build their mansions in the capital. 11. Is not the LORD among us?] the same mechanical faith in the presence of the Temple as in Jer 7⁴: cp. 1 S 4⁸.

12. Cp. Jer 26¹⁷⁻¹⁹. The people of Jeremiah's time, angered by his prophecies of disaster, wished to put him to death. Some of the elders reminded them that, when Micah denounced a like judgment, Hezekiah, instead of killing him, repented at his words, and so averted the disaster. This implies that the religious minds of that time recognised how true prophecy is always conditional, and how the fulfilment of its predictions is conditional on the attitude men take to them. High places of the forest] better, 'heights in a wood.' The slopes of the ravines shall be overgrown with brushwood, out of which the bare scalp of the Temple-hill will rise.

CHAPTERS 4, 5

BRIGHT VISIONS OF THE FUTURE

Micah's view of Israel's future, especially in relation to the nations. He believes that God chose Israel to maintain and teach true religion, and that in this lies Israel's greatness. The people have forgotten this and have tried to emulate the other nations in wealth and pride and armed strength. Such a contest was hopeless, and God will prove its hopelessness by bringing ruin on Jerusalem, where these pomps were gathered. But, when the chastisement has done its work, the nation will return to its divinely-given task. It will have a mission to the nations.

The chs. appear to contradict each other as to the result on the nations' fate. This is because Micah regards the peoples as free agents, and the religion Israel teaches as no mere ceremonial observances. The nations may recognise Israel's message, and, submitting to God's will, receive the blessing He gives (4¹⁻⁵). They may refuse it. But, if they obstinately oppose it, they shall be overthrown (4¹¹⁻¹⁸). For, since the truths Israel represents are divine in their origin, these must be a blessing or a curse, according as men accept or refuse them (5¹⁻⁹).

CHAPTER 4

ZION THE SPIRITUAL CENTRE OF THE EARTH

1-10. Here purified Israel is the light to the nations, which joyously acknowledge the supremacy of its God. The Temple shall be glorified, because known as the source of a help which all men need. When men grow eager for this, their wars shall cease (vv. 1-4). Because Israel is holding its faith as a trust for all men, Micah bids his people hold it more resolutely (v. 5). Though their very national existence is threatened (vv. 9, 10), let them not despair. God can restore them. Their being driven out of their own land may be His means for making them see themselves as bearers of His religion (vv. 6-8, 10). The oracle may have been uttered when Sennacherib was threatening Judah, 701.

1-3. Cp. Isa 2²⁻⁴. The great Messianic prophecy of the OT, which has been fulfilled since Jesus Christ of the stem of Jesse became the Light of the world. Some think that this locus classicus of Messianic prophecy was taken by both Micah and Isaiah from an older prophet. Professor Cheyne thinks that it is a post-exilic utterance, and was inserted by compilers or editors into the works of these prophets.

1. In the top] RM 'at the head.' The kingdom of God will be supreme. People] RV 'peoples': Micah means the heathen nations. 3. Judge among] RV 'between.' God shall be the arbiter of their quarrels, and so war will cease. The nations shall be more eager for justice than aggrandisement. 4. This v. is not in Isaiah. Isaiah belonged to the city, Micah to the country.

5. Translate: 'because all the peoples walk, every one in the name of his god, let us (or, we will) walk in the name of the LORD.' Micah drops back into the present. Since Israel's faith is to enlighten the world, let them be the more diligent to keep the faith.

6. In that day] the latter days of v. 1.

7. Here and in 2¹² Micah expects the return from the Assyrian captivity, not of all Israel, but of the remnant who, remaining faithful to their religion, shall become the stock from which the Messianic future will spring: cp. Isa 6¹³ 10^{20,4} 11^{11,4} 24¹³. 8. Tower of the flock, etc.] i.e. Jerusalem. Unto thee, etc.] RV 'unto thee shall it come: yea, the former dominion shall come, the kingdom of the daughter of Jerusalem.' When the people have repented of the sins which brought their ruin, God will restore them as wide a dominion as in the days of David.

9. The captivity which seems to destroy the kingdom with its king and counsellors will be the birthpangs of a better state. 10. Probably Thou shalt go even to Babylon was added to explain the prophet's meaning, by one who saw the Babylonian exile. Essentially he was right. But the enemy in Micah's time was not Babylon, but Assyria. And what Micah means is that his people shall be cast out of Jerusalem, and, when they are compelled to dwell in the field, i.e. without a capital and a court, they shall learn that God's ideal of a kingdom can be realised without these.

11-13. But Assyria is about to besiege Jerusalem: cp. Isa 36. Their aim is to destroy Jerusalem (v. 11). But they are only the instruments in God's hand (v. 12). Their proud self-confidence shall bring them to shame before Israel (v. 13).

11. Many nations] the polyglot hordes of Assyria: cp. Isa 33³.

12. He shall gather] RV 'He hath gathered.' God has brought them to their ruin. 13. Hoofs] oxen were used to tread out corn (Dt 25⁴). I will consecrate] RV 'thou shalt devote': cp. Lv 27²⁸.

The nations, which try to destroy Israel, shall be destroyed by Israel in the interest of the truth Israel represents.

CHAPTER 5

THE BIRTH OF THE MESSIAH

1-5^a. Jerusalem is besieged, its ruler in sulted by the invader (v. 1). Micah proclaims not only deliverance, but a deliverer. He will arise from Bethlehem, David's birthplace (v. 2) God raised up thence a ruler who shepherded his people instead of fleecing them, and who represented God's eternal ideal of a ruler, not his own interests. He will send us in our new need another like the first. And this man shall be our peace (v. 5). It is Micah's prophecy of Messiah. Jesus Christ has taken away its temporary and local allusions, and made it greater than Micah knew.

1. Now gather thyself] better, 'now thou mayest gather thyself in troops, thou daughter of troops.' The reference is to Assyria. Micah sees the armies gather against Jerusalem.

and foresees the possible overthrow of the dynasty (the judge of Israel). But Judah's future does not depend on Jerusalem. God can raise up from a village a deliverer.

2. Thousands] or, families: cp. Nu 1¹⁶ 10⁴ Josh 22^{14, 21}. Several such families made up a tribe. Unto me] or, 'for me,' i.e. to fulfil my will. The true ruler represents God's will in Israel. Since God's will has been the same from everlasting and must be manifested, the goings forth of one who lives to manifest it are equally from everlasting. When Israel's rulers fail Him, He raises up another. Bethlehem] cp. 1¹⁵ 4¹⁰. When Saul failed Him, God chose David from following the sheep, and set him to shepherd Israel. When the rulers of Jerusalem have failed Him, God will raise up even an obscure villager to represent His ideal of righteous government.

3. Will he give them up] better, 'He is giving them up.' She which travaileth, etc.] the reference is to Isaiah's prophecy of Immanuel (Isa 7¹⁴). Then the remnant, etc.] better, 'and until the remnant of His, i.e. Messiah's brethren shall return unto the children of Israel.'

As Messiah was to arise from Judah, this means 'until the tribes are reunited.' The reference is to Isaiah's name for his son, Shearjashub, 'a remnant shall return' (Isa 7³). Probably the v. is a gloss from the exile: cp. 4¹⁰. Some one explained that Micah's promise of a deliverer from Bethlehem was delayed, and God was still giving His people to captivity, until Isaiah's prophecies had been fulfilled.

4. Feed] not himself, but his flock. The figure of the shepherd-king is continued.

5. Connect the first clause with the preceding, and put a full stop after peace.

5, 6. The power of Assyria, which rests on brute force and has no sympathy with the mission of Israel, can only last till God raises up a stronger than itself. It fell, as a matter of fact, before Babylon.

5. Eight principal men] Seven was sufficiency, eight is super-abundance. 'We shall not want for leaders.' 6. Land of Nimrod] cp. Gn 10¹¹.

7-9. Israel's dual mission. Its message has been trusted to it by God, and cannot remain without effect. To those who receive this truth gladly, it will come like refreshing dew. To those who oppose it, it will come like a ravaging beast.

7. People] RV 'peoples.' The influence of Messiah is not to be confined to Israel. Tarrieth not for man] the 'mysterious dewfall, inexplicable by man, is meant. 9. Better read as a prayer: 'let thine hand be lifted up upon thine adversaries, and let all thine enemies be cut off.'

10-15. Since war and pomp have driven any higher national ideal from their minds, God will strip them of the things in which they have trusted. Micah puts chariots and idols on the same level and under the same condemnation.

11. As the centres of the oppression described in chs. 2, 3. 13. Standing images] the stone pillars of Lv 26¹ Isa 19¹⁹, etc.

14. Groves] RV 'asherim': cp. Jg 3¹⁷: emblems of idol-worship. 15. Such as they have not heard] RV 'which hearkened not.' God will judge the nations according to their attitude to Messiah and Israel's faith.

CHAPTERS 6, 7

GOD'S GREAT CONTROVERSY WITH ISRAEL

Note the change in the prophet's attitude. He speaks no longer to a united nation, but to parties. Now he speaks to a party, pious but discouraged (6¹⁻⁸); again, he testifies against men who have turned their backs on the Law (6⁹⁻¹⁶). Persecution for religion's sake has appeared, and taught men to distrust each other (7²⁻⁶). Probably the chs. date from the time of Manasseh. Sennacherib recoiled baffled from Jerusalem, but Assyria was not exhausted. Esarhaddon succeeded in making Manasseh tributary in 676 B.C. Their religion had not brought Judah all the relief men expected. The heathen elements in the nation, repressed by Isaiah's and Hezekiah's influence, reasserted themselves. A reaction set in and found a leader in Manasseh: cp. 2K 21. Especially men remembered that in his reign persecution for religion's sake was practised: cp. 2K 21¹⁶.

CHAPTER 6

GOD'S ARRAIGNMENT OF HIS PEOPLE

1-8. Micah's message to the discouraged believers. They have lost heart because of the apparent contradiction between the promises of their prophets and the hard facts of their history. They have lost faith in God's grace, and are trying to propitiate His favour by such sacrifices as the heathen offered to their gods. Micah appeals to nature, to history, and to the reasonable service God requires. He calls on the hills to witness what God has done (vv. 1, 2). He appeals to the great deeds of God's redemption for His people (vv. 3-5). He insists on the simplicities of God's requirements (vv. 6-8).

2. Strong] RV 'enduring.' The mountains have outlived so many generations of disobedience and unwearied mercy: cp. Isa 1².

3. Wearied] God's demands are so simple (v. 8). 5. From Shittim unto Gilgal, etc.] RV 'Remember from Shittim unto Gilgal, that ye may know the righteous acts of the Lord.' Shittim was the last station of the desert-wanderings, Gilgal the first in Palestine itself. The prophet reminds them how in their national history God has proved His compassion.

6, 7. The people are represented as asking what more God requires from them. 6. Calves of a year old] a choice gift: cp. Lv 9⁸.

7. Human sacrifice was practised (2K 21⁶ Jer 7³¹ 9⁵), especially in times of great national danger (2K 3²⁷).

8. Micah brings forward to a generation which is seeking fantastic ways of propitiating its God, the grave and tender simplicities of His requirements. He does not want their wine and oil and children: He wants their obedience. The other things are only valuable to Him as the evidence of their willing obedience. Compare how, when Abraham has shown himself willing to surrender his son, Isaac is not required from him.

9. The text is uncertain but the sense is clear. 'When God speaks in warning, it is the part of a wise man to fear (RM) and to seek to discover the reason why God uplifts His rod.' The reasons in this case follow in the succeeding questions. 10. The scant measure] cp. Dt 24¹⁴. Am 8⁵. 11. Shall I count them pure] RV 'shall I be pure,' i.e. can any man be pure? 13. RV 'Therefore I also have smitten thee with a grievous wound.'

14. Thy casting down, etc.] RM 'thy emptiness shall be in the midst of thee,' i.e. thy famine shall continue, because thou shalt have food but not sufficient. Thou shalt take hold, etc.] RV 'thou shalt remove but shalt not carry away safe,' i.e. thou shalt fail in the effort to remove thy people from the enemy's power. 15. Sweet wine] RV 'vintage,' 'Thou shalt tread the grapes, but shalt not drink the wine made from them.'

16. The statutes of Omri and the works of Ahab's house are the worship of Baal: cp. 1K 16³¹⁻³³. Manasseh has gone back to the sins of the northern kingdom, though its fate might have warned him: cp. 2K 21¹³. The reproach of my people] better, with LXX, 'the reproach of the Gentiles,' which Ahab's house, through the captivity which was the punishment for its idolatry, is bearing.

CHAPTER 7

CONFESSION AND CONTRITION BRING BACK HOPE

1-6. Jerusalem laments her estate. The righteous among her children are taken from her by violence (vv. 1, 2). The rulers misuse their position for their selfish ends (vv. 3, 4). Worst of all, the trust of a man in his neighbour's honour, which makes the cement of all society, is gone. Even the ties of nature are disowned (vv. 5, 6).

1. Desired the firstripe fruit] RV 'desireth the firstripe fig,' which, now the harvest is past, is gone. The righteous (the early figs) have been gleaned out of the city. 2. (cp. Isa 57¹). Both passages speak of a scourge which has specially fallen on the righteous, and so point to a period of persecution. 3. The probable sense is: 'their hands are busy in evil, the prince asks the judge to do some knavery, the judge is ready to do it at a price, the great man needs but utter his bad desire to find ready instruments: so they weave together a web of fraud and violence.' 4. The day of thy watchmen and thy visitation] the day of God's visitation foretold by the prophets: cp. Isa 21⁶. It will confound such men, since its principles are the opposite of theirs. 5. Guide] RM 'familiar friend.' 6. The final proof of social corruption is the death of men's trust in each other. See our Lord's adoption of these words (Mt 10³⁰).

7-20. Everything seems lost but God: therefore Micah looks more to God (vv. 7, 8). His chastisements are tolerable, because they have meaning (v. 9). Their end will be that through her sufferings Israel shall rise glorious and purified (vv. 10-13). God who called them will restore them and work through them (vv. 14-17). Micah closes with a doxology. Even Israel's sin cannot weary God's faithfulness and compassion (vv. 18-20).

7. Therefore] RV 'but as for me.' In such evil days the true man finds refuge in God.

8. When I fall] calamity, not sin, is meant.

11. Decree] RM 'boundary,' i.e. when God restores the nation and permits the walls to be rebuilt, He will give ample room: cp. Isa 33¹⁷. 12. RV 'In that day shall they come unto thee, from Assyria and the cities of Egypt, and from Egypt even to the River,' i.e. Euphrates. From sea to sea is not meant of any specific sea: rather the exiles from West to East and from East to West shall return home. 13. The land] Canaan. Before this return must come chastisement.

14. The prophet passes abruptly to prayer.

Solitarily] Israel was always separated from the nations as the flock of God: cp. Nu 23⁴.

Carmel . . Bashan . . Gilead] perhaps chosen because they were districts devoted to pasturing, as contrasted with the cities and their vices.

15. According to] RV 'as in the days of.' God in answer points back to His past mercy.

16. Confounded] RV 'ashamed' to see how impotent is their might. 17. RV 'they shall come trembling out of their close places' (their useless fortresses); 'they shall come with fear unto the LORD our God.' 18. Who is, etc.] Micah's name means 'Who is like the Lord?' The prophet concludes with an outburst of praise.

NAHUM

INTRODUCTION

1. The Man. All that we can learn concerning the prophet must be gathered from the brief superscription and from the contents of this small book; the traditions relating to his dwelling-place are late, uncertain, and contradictory. The name Nahum (probably = 'Comforter,' same root as in 3⁷) occurs only twice in the Bible, here and in Lk 3²⁵. 'Elkoshite' means belonging to Elkosh (cp. Mic¹¹), but the identification of the place is quite uncertain. The suggestion that Nahum was an Israelite, dwelling near Nineveh, a descendant of one of the families that had been carried off to that region by the Assyrians, is interesting but unreliable. The same may be said of the attempts to find a home for the prophet in Galilee. Although the writer is wholly concerned with the fate of Nineveh and the idea of Jehovah as an avenger upon the outside oppressor, it is still probable from the subject of the book and the sympathies of the prophet that he was a resident of Judaea.

2. The Date. The superscription gives us no help, and the date must be inferred from the contents of chs. 1 and 2. Here we have two fixed points, the destruction of No-Amon (Thebes) about 664 B.C. by Assurbanipal, king of Assyria (3⁵), and the fall of Nineveh about 606 B.C. The capture of No-Amon lies behind the prophet, how far we cannot tell, while the destruction of Nineveh, or some great disaster to that city, was immediately in front of him. It is likely that the fall of the Egyptian fortress would long be remembered by the Jews, as many of them looked to that nation for help against Assyria. In that case, Assyria was the conqueror: and the prophet saw in the disaster to Egypt the hand of the same living God, the God of Judah and the world, who was now about to mete out to the proud conqueror a similar fate. Hence it seems probable that these strong, stirring words were uttered not long before the final struggle which transferred the supremacy from Nineveh to Babylon.

3. Historical Situation. This was an important period in the small kingdom of Judah. It was the period before the destruction of Jerusalem; the Babylonian empire which became supreme for a while after the fall of Nineveh was destined to crush the kingdom of Judah and carry the people into captivity, but this lies beyond the ken of our prophet. It is probable that in his day Josiah, the good king, had attempted a religious reformation, and that Jeremiah was calling the people to a deeper life and a more spiritual service. But there is no echo of this in the book; its patriotic passion, its cry for vengeance, is all concentrated on the one hateful oppressor.

4. The Book. Though the book is small it has been subjected to keen investigation, and the text has given rise to much critical discussion. The attempts at detailed analysis cannot be considered here. Many scholars regard 1²⁻¹⁵ 2² as an eschatological psalm from later Judaism, describing Jehovah's judgment upon oppressors, and giving promise of salvation to Judah. Those who take this view have worked over this c. and discovered in it an alphabetic poem, but as a matter of fact, in the present state of the text, this alphabetic arrangement can only be discovered at the beginning. However, there is one thing clear, the c. is of similar spirit to the rest of the book; it gives a graphic poetic description of the coming of Jehovah to judgment, while the other part pictures in forcible language, a particular instance of such judgment, in the case of Nineveh. In chs. 2 and 3 there is a vivid description of the siege and a passionate denunciation of the blood-stained city.

5. The Spiritual Significance of Nahum. This short prophecy may be looked upon as one permanent expression of the cry of humanity for justice. It is not mere Hebrew patriotism that expresses itself here, though that gives form and colour to the message; this sharp cry might have come from any of the small nations of Palestine and Syria that had been trampled underfoot by the ruthless armies of Assyria. It is the cry of outraged human nature in the face of brutal oppression; it is a cry that God will not allow violence to rule unchecked, that He will not look calmly on when the earth is drenched with innocent blood. If the answer to the pathetic cry of the saints 'Lord, how long?' could be 'for ever,' then faith would be driven to despair, both piety and patriotism would wither at the roots. The preacher to-day may need to warn the people against a spurious patriotism, a patriotism which counts only material success and selfish glory, but behind all this preaching there must lie the great belief which Nahum grasped with such intensity, that God does arise and come to judgment, that He does vindicate the struggling few who love truth and righteousness; that with all our lofty Christian sentiment we must sometimes stand face to face with the sterner majesty of the law, and prepare to meet the God who comes in the terror of judgment.

CHAPTER 1

GOD'S VENGEANCE ON HIS PEOPLE'S ENEMIES. DELIVERANCE FOR JUDAH

1, 2. Superscription: 'Oracle concerning Nineveh. The book of the vision or prophesying of Nahum the Elkoshite.' A theological introduction describing a theophany or a coming of Jehovah to judgment. Cp. the brief statements in a similar spirit, Am 1² Mic 1^{3,4}. The whole should be printed as verse:

A jealous and avenging God is Jehovah;
Jehovah is avenging and wrathful;
Jehovah taketh vengeance on His adversaries,
And He reserveth wrath for His enemies.

3-6. The prophet sketches the character of Jehovah in terms suitable to his general theme; it is the vengeance of God upon Israel's enemies, who are also His enemies, that we are here invited to consider: cp. Ex 20⁵ 34¹⁴ Dt 4²⁴. Note the terrible manner of His appearance when He comes to judgment.

3. He is slow to anger, and great in power, yet He will not absolve the guilty, etc.

The LORD hath his way] 'The meaning is not so much that Jehovah uses the whirlwind and storm as the vehicle of His movement as that these commotions and terrors in nature are created by His presence. The splendid words clouds are the dust of his feet, like the others, "the earth is His footstool," need to be conceived not explained' (A. B. Davidson). The doings of God in history (Ps 114) and His appearances in nature's most awful moods are mingled in this sublime description of His irresistible strength and impetuous fury.

7-15. Jehovah will completely destroy the enemies of His people.

7. Read, 'Jehovah is good towards those who hope in Him. A stronghold in the time of need.' An everlasting truth, but particularly appropriate in times of great shaking: cp. Ps 25³ 37⁹. In the following vv. the text is difficult; if we follow AV we must find a reference to Nineveh. 8. The place thereof] If this poem is an original part of the book we expect such references, though it comes abruptly here: cp. v. 14. On this view, the line of thought is the opposition of Jehovah to the proud oppressor and his favour towards judgment, with emphasis laid on the radical nature of the judgment. 9, 10. 'Not twice does He take vengeance on His enemies; He makes a full end of them for ever.' You cannot easily set fire to the damp, closely packed thorns, but the fire of His vengeance will burn them up as dry stubble.

13-15. These vv., along with 2², must be grouped together. Read the last of these four vv., as in RV, 'For Jehovah bringeth again the excellency of Jacob,' etc. In these four vv. we have evidently an address to Judah; she is called upon to rejoice over her ancient foe, to keep the feasts and carry out the vows made in the days of sorrowful oppression: cp. Isa 52⁷. V. 14 is a denunciation of the Assyrian.

The whole c. is difficult from the linguistic point of view; the technical problems have called forth much ingenuity, but the main outline is clear. Jehovah is coming to judgment; this coming means a day of terror and darkness for the proud oppressors, but the lowly believers shall find new hope. When freed from narrow patriotism and sectarian bitterness this is a great and abiding truth; behind it there lies a keen faith in the true meaning of history and a righteous order of the world.

CHAPTER 2

ATTACK AND CONQUEST OF NINEVEH

1. Description of the attack begins, and Nineveh is called upon to face the invader.

'He that breaketh in pieces is come up against thee;
Guard the watch, look out upon the way.
Gird up the loins, gather together thy strength.'

V. 2 seems misplaced, as it interrupts the sense. It should perhaps come after 1¹.

3-10. Poetic picture of the sack of the city. It dwells upon, (1) The approach of the hostile army in brilliant, terrible splendor, with flashing shields, furious horses and ornish of chariots. The general impression is vivid, though some of the details have become indistinct. (3. Shall be with flaming torches] RV 'flash with steel.' Fir trees] RV 'spears') (2) The attack upon the city. Here again individual features are uncertain: e.g. we are not sure whether v. 5 refers to the besiegers or the besieged. Recount his worthies] i.e. call up his bravest warriors. Defence] (RV 'mantlet') is a word difficult of interpretation; it may refer to the movable roof which protected the battering-ram. It is not easy to give a precise explanation of the phrase, 'The gates of the river are opened,' but it is clear that the great city is attacked and its inhabitants thrown into confusion. The actual siege was spread over a long period: here it is sketched with a few sharp strokes and represented in a few memorable scenes. (3) The carrying away captive of the queen and her maidens; the flight of the people and the spoiling of the city. (a) Huzzab is obscure; we must take it to mean the queen of the city, or amend the text. RM has 'It is decreed: she is uncovered,' etc. Tabering] i.e. beating, lit. 'drumming.' A taber was a small drum. (b) 8. The phrase translated of old is very awkward in the original. It may have arisen through ditto-graphy; in that case we interpret 'Nineveh is like a pool of water,' whose waters rush away where the dam is broken down: thus do the inhabitants of the conquered city flee away.

9, 10. Then all its rich treasures and its magnificent adornments are given to the spoil. All who had any hope or interest in the doomed city are confounded and put to shame.

11. The prophet exults over the downfall of Nineveh. In this stern ironical question the prophet implies that Nineveh has vanished completely; it is vain to seek for it. Thus does he express his full confidence in its utter destruction. 12. This destruction is justified by pointing to the selfish, cruel career of the Assyrian empire. 13. An oracle of Jehovah containing a strong assurance of the judgment that is due and cannot be escaped.

CHAPTER 3

THE DOOM OF NINEVEH

1-7. Another threat against Nineveh, showing that disaster has come upon her on account of her sins. The keynote of the whole c. is the fierce cry, Woe to the bloody city! it is all full of lies, etc. In ancient states the capital was virtually the kingdom, and to Nineveh are here ascribed all the characteristics of the Assyrian monarchy. The cruelties perpetrated by the Assyrians were shocking. Captive princes who had offered resistance in defence of their country were shut up in cages and exposed to the gaze of the populace; the heads of those already executed were hung round the necks of those still living, and others were flayed alive. The Assyrians appear to have been the most ruthless people of antiquity (see Camb. Bible). 2, 3. Picture of the attack made by the enemy's cavalry and chariots, these instruments of the divine vengeance. 4-7. The reason for this doom, the evil influence which this great empire has exerted among the nations. Jehovah assumes responsibility for the execution of this judgment; He will carry it out to the last extremity. 8-10. Nations and cities quite as proud and strong have fallen when the hour of divine judgment has sounded.

Populous No] RV 'No-Amon,' i.e. Thebes. See Intro. Rivers] RM 'canals.' The sea] i.e. the Nile. Her wall, etc.] The Nile was her protection. All the provinces of Egypt helped her (v. 9). 11. Strength] RV 'a stronghold.' 12-15. The outer defences have fallen; it is the beginning of the end. 14. Go into clay, etc.] make bricks to strengthen the walls. 15-17. Cankerworm . . grasshopper] species of locusts.

16-19. Prosperity and pride have been 'the cankerworm that spoileth,' so that in the great crisis there is no power of resistance; it is a mortal wound.

18. Thy shepherds slumber] Thy great rulers have passed away. Thy nobles, etc.] RV 'thy worthies are at rest.'

19. No healing of thy bruise] RV 'No assuaging of thy hurt.' Bruit of thee] i.e. the report of thy downfall.

HABAKKUK

INTRODUCTION

1. Author. Nothing whatever is known of Habakkuk other than what may be inferred from his book. The inference, based on the subscription 'on my stringed instruments' (3¹⁹), that he was a singer or player in the Temple choir is altogether precarious, if not untenable; partly because there is no certainty that this c. is Habakkuk's own (see on 3¹⁷); partly because the text is probably faulty, the true reading being simply 'on stringed instruments'; and still more, because this subscription is in all probability no part of the original poem which forms c. 3. All that we know of the person of Habakkuk is that he was a great prophet who has left us one of the noblest and most penetrating words in the history of religion (2^{1b}).

2. Summary of Contents. (1⁴) The prophet begins with a complaint to Jehovah touching the prevalent violence, oppression, and perversion of the law. 'How long,' he cries, 'and why?' For answer (1⁵⁻¹¹) comes the divine word that the Chaldeans are to be raised up in chastisement, and the work which they will do is such as to be almost incredible. Then follows a graphic description of their terrible army, with their swift horses, their keen cavalry, their cruel and brazen faces. They laugh at all authority, and at every attempt to stop their advance. They worship might, not right. But in the next section (1¹²⁻¹⁷) the prophet's attitude towards this people (if it is the same people as in vv. 5-11) has changed. He shudders at their impiety, and is confounded by it. They have overstepped the limits of their commission; how can Jehovah reconcile with His own holiness and purity the barbarities perpetrated by the conqueror?

(2¹⁻⁴) The divine answer to the prophet's perplexity comes when he climbs his tower (the tower of faith) and looks abroad. The answer is that the proud shall perish and the righteous shall ultimately live. It may not be obvious now: the visible solution may tarry a long time; but faith sees it already. 'The just shall live by his faithfulness.' The next section (2⁵⁻²⁰) consists of five 'woes,' which elaborate the thought of 2⁴—the sure destruction of the proud. Woes are denounced upon the cruel rapacity of the conquerors, the unjust accumulations of treasure, the passion for building, the unfeeling treatment of the land, beasts, and people, and finally the idolatry. In contrast to the impotent gods worshipped by the oppressor, is the great Jehovah whose Temple is in the heavens, and before whom all the earth must be silent (2²⁰). He comes, and His coming is described in c. 3 in rich and varied imagery; and this 'prayer' concludes with the expression of unbounded confidence and joy in Jehovah, even when all visible signs of His love may fail.

3. Occasion calling forth the Prophecy. The prophecy of Habakkuk may be dated approximately about the year 600 B.C. The last twenty-five years had been a time of great significance for Western Asia in general and for Judah in particular. At the beginning of that period Assyria had been the great world power; but from the year 625 B.C., when Nabopolassar succeeded in establishing an independent Babylonian monarchy, the Assyrian empire had rapidly declined, till at length, in 607 B.C., Nineveh, the capital, was taken, and by the battle of Carchemish, in which Egypt, the great competing power in the West, was defeated, Babylonian supremacy was assured. Judah naturally became a vassal of Babylon, and about the year 601-600 was invaded because of the rebellion of king Jehoiakim.

Within Judah herself, much that was of first-rate importance both for history and religion had happened. Zephaniah and Nahum had prophesied, and Jeremiah was in the middle of his great career. In 621 B.C., on the basis of the newly-discovered book of Deuteronomy, king Josiah had inaugurated a reformation which had raised the hopes of good men; but its influence, as we learn from Jeremiah, had been, upon the whole, but brief and shallow. The death of Josiah upon the battle-field in 608 B.C. aggravated a situation already difficult enough. His son Jehoahaz, who reigned but three months, was succeeded by Jehoiakim, a man of extravagant tastes and contemptible character—the very last man to guide the state through the perplexities and perils of the time.

It was in his reign, apparently, that Habakkuk delivered his message. Through his words we can clearly read the prevalent disregard of law and order, and the abounding political confusion and religious perplexity occasioned by the supremacy of the Chaldeans. The precise interpretation and occasion of the book however, are unusually hard to determine. We shall very briefly indicate the difficulties and the solution which seems the most probable. In 1¹⁻⁴ it is not clear who the oppressors are, whether foreigners or the ruling classes within Judah itself. As in 1⁵⁻¹¹, the Chaldeans (i.e. the Babylonians) appear to be raised up to chastise them, it is more natural to suppose that the oppressors are natives of Judah. But in 1¹²⁻¹⁷ the Chaldeans themselves seem to be the oppressors—though this is not expressly said—as they are described in terms very similar to the description in 1⁵⁻¹¹; and they bring fresh perplexity to the prophet by 'swallowing up the man that is more righteous than' they (v. 13). The 'righteous' would in this case be Judah, and that description of Judah, coming after such a picture of anarchy as we have in 1¹⁻⁴, would be somewhat strange.

The difficulties may be partly met by assuming that the various sections were written at different times, 1¹²⁻¹⁷, in which Judah is relatively righteous in comparison with the Chaldeans, being later than 1¹⁻⁴. The only real clue to the historical occasion of the prophecy is the mention of the Chaldeans in 1⁵⁻¹¹. Their appearance and their military methods are apparently well known, and this circumstance implies a date shortly before, or more probably shortly after, the great battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C., in which the Babylonian army under Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians, and established a supremacy, which lasted about seventy years, over Western Asia. The prophet welcomes the advent of the Chaldeans (vv. 5-11) as the divinely-appointed scourge of the evils among Jehovah's people in Judah (1¹⁻⁴); but this solution only heightens the horror of his problem, as he becomes better acquainted with the cruel and aggressive pride of the Chaldeans (1¹²⁻¹⁷); and he must find a deeper solution. He finds it finally, upon his watchtower, in the assurance that somehow, despite all seeming, the purpose of God is hastening on to its fulfilment, and that the moral constitution of the world is such as to spell the ultimate ruin of cruelty and pride, and the ultimate triumph of righteousness (2¹⁻⁴). His faith was historically justified by the fall of the Babylonian empire in 538 B.C.

4. Religious Ideas of the Book. The dominant ideas of the book shine most clearly out of the great vision which Habakkuk saw from his watchtower (2¹⁻⁴). Briefly, they are Patience and Faith (2^{3,4}). The prophet had expected an adequate solution to his doubts to arrive in his own day (cp. 1⁵, 'in your days'); and he welcomes the Chaldeans as divine avengers of sin. But Habakkuk is an independent and progressive thinker, and the more he watches the Chaldeans, the more he feels sure that the solution they bring is utterly inadequate. Then he lifts his sorrowful heart to God, and he is soothed and strengthened by a larger vision of the divine purpose and its inevitable triumph. He does not now know, as once he thought he did, by what human and historical means that triumph is to be secured; but he knows that it is certain. 'It is sure to come, it will not lag behind.' That is faith, and the obverse of faith is patience. It is so sure that he can afford to 'wait for it, though it tarry,' and though it come not in his own day. It is 'trust' in God that will carry the 'righteous' across his doubts and fears, and sustain his 'life' even when he seems to perish (2⁴). 'The righteous shall live by his faithfulness.' This is also the great lesson of the closing vv. of c. 3, that God may be trusted, even when all visible signs of His presence fail; and this trust is not resignation, but joy unspeakable (3¹⁷⁻¹⁹).

CHAPTER 1

THE PROPHET'S BURDEN. THE ANSWER OF JEHOVAH

1. Burden] RM 'oracle': see on Isa 13¹.

2, 3. How long? . . . Why? Even a prophet (v. 1) can ask such questions. He never denies the existence of God, but he cannot understand His seeming failure to interpose in human affairs. In the end, however, the despondency merges into a faith which can believe where it cannot see (2³ 3^{17,18}).

5. Behold ye among the heathen] For this we ought to read, 'Behold, ye treacherous' (as in the quotation in Ac 13⁴¹, 'ye despisers'). The despisers are those in 1¹⁻⁴ who trample upon moral and social law, thinking Jehovah will never intervene. In your days] The profounder solution in 2⁸ contemplates the possibility of a long postponement of the issue. 6. The Chaldeans] possibly written after the battle of Carchemish, in 605 B.C., with reference to Nebuchadrezzar and his army, so graphically described in vv. 6-10.

7. The last clause means that the Chaldean recognises no master or judge: he is a law to himself. 9. RM 'Their faces are set eagerly forwards, and they gather captives as the sand.' 10. They shall heap dust] i.e. they shall throw up an enlargement of earth, to take the fortress. 11. The correct translation should probably be: Then he sweeps by as a wind, and passes on and makes his might his God—an admirable climax to the description of the Chaldeans.

12-17. A new riddle.

12. Habakkuk's faith is staggered by the conduct of the Chaldeans. He had welcomed them as ministers of the divine judgment, and lo! they had shown themselves to be cruel and hanghty, working out not God's will, but their own. How was this consistent with the holiness of God?

13. The cry of a perplexed heart: Thou art too pure to look upon evil, why then dost Thou look upon it? God looks on in silence: He does nothing, says nothing! The wicked (i.e. the Chaldean) swallows up one who is more righteous than himself (i.e. Judah).

14. And makest] probably this should be 'and makes.' It is, as vv. 15, 16 show, the Chaldean who makes men like fish, sweeping them into his net. 16. He sacrifices to his net] i.e. to his weapons of destruction, as to a god: for was not might his god? cp. v. 11.

17. This v. should probably read, 'Will he draw the sword for ever, slaying nations mercilessly evermore?'

CHAPTER 2

FAITH TRIUMPHANT

1-4. The view from the watchtower.

1. The prophet climbs his tower, for he must reach a vantage point, if he is to contemplate with real understanding and insight the confusion about his feet, i.e. occasioned by Chaldean aggressiveness and indifference to right. The tower is not, of course, a literal tower—some high and lonely place to which the prophet may retire; it simply suggests the inner light of revelation, by the aid of which he contemplates the perplexing situation. The last clause should read, 'and what answer He will make to my complaint.'

2. The answer which he expects is given, and he is instructed to write it down on tablets, because it is of permanent value, and to write it plainly so that any one might be able to read it fluently. Run] i.e. in his reading, read easily.

3. The ultimate moral issue is clear, though it may be far away. If it is slow, it is sure. It may not come 'in your days' (1⁵), but 'it is sure to come, it will not be late: and if it tarry, wait for it,' for in 'your patience ye shall win your souls.' When the kingdom will come is not clear, but come it will; for some day 'the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of Jehovah, as the waters cover the sea' (214). That is the inevitable goal of history.

4. The first few words of this vision, which is regarded as so important and reassuring, are very obscure, but the two clauses of the v. appear to contrast the destinies of the good and the bad respectively; and the meaning probably is, 'As for the wicked, his soul is not straight, or is faint and feeble, within him,' that is, is doomed to death; 'but the righteous shall live by his fidelity,' i.e. his faithfulness, his firm trust of Jehovah. In the long march of history, the nations of men that trust in their power and resources and defy morality, are doomed, they do not live. It is the righteous that live, those who regard right and God. However much they suffer, and even when they seem to die, they live; and they live by their faithfulness, i.e. by leaning firmly upon the God who lives for ever, and whose life is a guarantee of theirs. This in one of the profoundest utterances of the Old Testament.

5-20. Woe to the oppressor.

This section is an expansion of 214: it describes the oppressor—no doubt the Chaldean—and thereby justifies the doom pronounced upon him. The section takes the form of a series of woes, dramatically pronounced by the nations which the Chaldeans had crushed.

5-8. Woe unto the lust of conquest! V. 5, which has nothing to do with wine, should probably read, 'Woe to the proud and the faithless, the haughty man who is never satisfied.'

6, 7. Woe to him who takes upon himself a heavy burden of debt—referring to the property of which the Chaldeans had plundered the nations. Instead of heavy 'pledges' (RV), AV (by dividing the single Heb. word into two) reads thick clay. Doubtless both senses are intended: the Hebrews were fond of such plays upon words. Suddenly will thy creditors arise. The 'biters' are the creditors (the words are alike in the Hebrew), and the Chaldeans will in their turn be bitten, i.e. they will be punished in kind; the plunderers will be themselves plundered (vv. 7, 8). 8. Of the land, of the city, etc.] RV 'done to the land, to the city,' etc. The city] perhaps Jerusalem.

9-11. The third woe. 9. RV 'Woe to him that getteth an evil gain for his house.' The plunder was stored for security in great high buildings, but the very stone and timber cried out against the rapacity which had accumulated it. Their silent tongues were eloquent; accusing voices were everywhere. Considering the range of v. 10, however, it is possible, if not probable, that the whole passage has a larger meaning: for in v. 10 it seems best to interpret the house not as a literal house, but—as often in Hebrew—of the dynasty. In that case, the ruin of the Chaldean dynasty is predicted as the consequence of their cruel and unscrupulous ambitions. 10. Consulted] i.e. contrived: cp. Mic 6⁵.

12-14. The fourth woe. Every fabric reared upon iniquity is doomed to destruction. The triumph of the kingdom of God, and of that alone, is sure. The world-conqueror is not Nebuchadrezzar, but Jehovah. 13. The people shall labour in the very fire] RV 'The peoples labour for the fire': i.e. their cities, built with blood, will be consigned to the flames. The parallel clause (v. 13^b) shows that the meaning is, their efforts are spent in vain.

15-17. The fifth woe. The references in vv. 15, 16 to intoxication must, as v. 17 shows, be taken figuratively. The meaning is that the Chaldeans have dealt with other nations in a spirit of contemptuous cruelty, depriving them of their strength, and doing with them what they would. They will, therefore, be punished, as before, in kind, being compelled by Jehovah to drink the cup they had held to the lips of others. A specimen of their high-handedness is given in v. 17: they had robbed the land and the beasts of their rights—for they, too, have rights—by destroying the cedars of Lebanon to secure material for their own palatial buildings.

18, 19. The sixth woe. The real explanation of the immorality of the Chaldeans is to be found in their foolish conception of God (cp. 111). They worshipped idols, gorgeous indeed, but stupid, impotent, dumb, and lifeless.

19. Arise, it shall teach! RV 'Arise! Shall this teach?' The parallelism shows that Arise corresponds to Awake, and that, therefore with the next words a new sentence begins. It is best to read this sentence interrogatively as RV, 'Shall this teach?' 'This'—pointing with scorn to the motionless image—'what power has this to give the needed instruction or help?'

20. What a contrast to these idols is the majestic God of Israel, the God of all the earth, whose Temple is in the heavens! He is about to appear (c. 3); hush! before Him, all the earth.

CHAPTER 3

JEHOVAH COMES TO JUDGMENT

This is one of the most brilliant poems in the OT. It was written by a man of imagination as well as of faith. It is not quite certain whether 3³⁻¹⁶ are intended to refer to a past or future manifestation of Jehovah: in any case, there is the hope, or rather prayer, that history may repeat itself (v. 2). The poem rests upon older theophanies: cp. Jg 5 Dt 33. Long ago at the exodus Jehovah had shown His power to interpose in history against all hope. He had come in the terrors of judgment and taken vengeance on the enemies of Israel: and what he did then, the Psalmist prays that He will do again. The power which He revealed on Israel's behalf at the dawn of her history, He can make known again in the midst of the years.

1. Upon Shigionoth] RV 'Set to Shigionoth.' This very obscure phrase (cp. Ps 7) has been supposed to mean 'in a wandering, ecstatic manner,' implying that the poem that follows is a sort of dithyramb. Probably, as the LXX suggests, the original word simply meant, 'to the accompaniment of stringed instruments.'

3. The storm which accompanies Jehovah's coming begins in Sinai, His ancient home, and sweeps northward. Teman] a district in the NW. of Edom. Paran] the mountain range between Sinai and Seir. 4. Horns coming out of his hand] RV 'Rays coming forth from his hand.' This clause some take with the next one, so that the meaning would be 'the rays at His side He makes the veil of His power,' that is, the brightness is so blinding that His real and essential majesty cannot be seen.

5-8. Accompanied by His dread attendants, He takes His stand upon the earth, which reels and rocks beneath Him, and the nomad tribes are in terror. 5. Burning coals] RV 'fiery bolts.' 7. Cushan] Some identify this with Cush, i.e. Ethiopia. The parallelism suggests, however, that it may indicate some district in the neighbourhood of Sinai.

8-11. Wherefore such wrath? Why did Jehovah so confound the sea—perhaps the Red Sea—by means of His storm? 9^{a,b} probably ought to read, 'Thou didst bare Thy bow, and fill Thy quiver with shafts'—an allusion to the thunder and the lightning. Fear kept sun and moon from shining (v. 11).

12-15. It is to save His people that He comes. 13^b. Thou woundedst the head out of the house of the wicked, by discovering (RV 'laying bare') the foundation unto the neck. There seems to be here a confusion of metaphor—'foundation' suggesting a building and 'neck' a man. The situation may be partially saved by reading 'rock' instead of 'neck'; but even so, it is not quite clear whether head in the first clause refers to a building, as the second clause suggests, or to a man, as the same word is used unambiguously of a man in the very next v. (14^a). In any case, the reference appears to be to the overthrow of Pharaoh.

14^a. Probably we should read, 'Thou didst pierce with Thy staves the head of his warriors.' In the next line the word me shows that the description is passing into the present: they come storming on to scatter me.

16-19. The triumph of faith. It is difficult, if not impossible, to translate v. 16; provisionally we may accept the following, 'I will wait for the day of distress which cometh over the people that distresses us.' But the v. seems to indicate the terror with which the Psalmist (or prophet) listens to the dying notes of the storm. He had prayed for God to reveal Himself: and He had come in His terrible majesty—come, however, to save: and though the poet trembles, his faith is radiant and glad.

17. The connexion between this v. and the previous part of the poem is no doubt such as has just been suggested; but it may be doubted whether it is an integral part of the original poem. With its flocks and fields and trees, it seems to presuppose a different situation from vv. 2-16; but, however that may be, the v., together with vv. 18, 19, expresses the same kind of faith as that of the poem, and indeed of the book at large, a faith which is independent of material evidences and supports (2^{3,4}). It teaches that God is better than His gifts, and that the possession of Him, even without them, makes the heart strong and glad. In its independence of things material, the OT. never uttered a grander or more emancipating word than these concluding vv. of Habakkuk.

It is not certain that this poem was composed by the prophet. The title and musical directions seem to indicate that it was taken from a collection of Psalms: there are no references in it to the special circumstances of the age in which Habakkuk lived: while in vv. 14, 18, 19 the community rather than an individual is the speaker. The conclusion suggested by these features is that this poem belongs to a later date: it may be a Psalm composed for the post-exilic church in a time of distress. But, on the other hand, the ascription of it to Habakkuk is confirmed by the fact that it is wholly in conformity with his spirit in the other chs. of this book: and it is appropriately placed in its present position, as it shares with the prophecy a pure faith in God and in the certainty of His coming.

ZEPHANIAH

INTRODUCTION

1. The Prophet and his Message. Zephaniah, like his young contemporary, Jeremiah, was one of the first to break the long silence of more than half-a-century which followed the death of the great Isaiah. During the reactionary reign of Manasseh the Canaanitish Baal cults and the Assyrian star-worship and the other heathen institutions, to which the prophet alludes in his opening words, had been tolerated without rebuke in Jerusalem and Judah (2K 21³⁻⁶). King and people had repudiated the teachings of the earlier prophets and reverted to the old heathenism, or else adopted the religion and customs of their Assyrian conquerors, although they still, as a nation, continued to worship the Jehovah of their popular belief.

At last, however, the Assyrian empire, which for centuries had stood as the embodiment of heathen might, began to show unmistakable signs of weakness and disintegration. The more thoughtful in Judah also commenced to weary of the crimes and excesses which followed in the train of popular idolatry. Probably a small group of disciples had never ceased to cherish in secret the noble ideals and principles of the earlier prophets, and to work for their ultimate acceptance by the nation. When Isaiah recognised that his teachings were rejected by the princes and people, he had turned with confidence to his disciples and expressed the hope that they would treasure up his doctrine (Isa 8¹⁶). This expectation was fully realised, and the eternal principle illustrated that truth, clearly and courageously proclaimed, can never be permanently put down, but will in time surely become a powerful factor in the life of mankind.

Silenced in public, the followers of the true prophets appear to have devoted themselves to revising the primitive laws of their race, incorporating the lofty principles laid down by Amos and Hosea and Isaiah, and adapting them to the new conditions presented by the reign of Manasseh. Many hold that in the book of Deuteronomy, which is a prophetic reformulation of the laws of Moses, designed to meet the needs of a new age, we have the supreme product of their activity. Later this became the basis of Josiah's great reformation in 621 B.C.

Before there could be any effective reform, it was necessary to educate the people and to secure the support of Judah's rulers. It is a surprising fact that Josiah, the son of Amon, and grandson of the reactionary Manasseh, should later become the leader in the great prophetic reformation. The records are silent, but there can be little doubt that the boy king, who was raised to the throne at the age of eight, early came under the influence of the prophetic party. The indications point strongly to Zephaniah as the one who was most prominent in exerting that influence, for the superscription affixed to his prophecy traces his ancestry back for four generations to Hezekiah, who was in all probability the king under whom Isaiah prophesied. If so, Zephaniah himself belonged to the royal line. This inference is confirmed by the boldness and assurance with which he proclaims the guilt of the princes and members of the royal family (1⁸). It is also significant that he says nothing about the sins of the king himself, but rather places all the responsibility upon his advisers (1⁹). The most satisfactory explanation of the omission is that Josiah was still a young man, and already known to be amenable to the counsel of true prophets like Zephaniah. If these inferences be correct, the prophet commands our interest, because he stood very near both by birth and influence to the great reformer-king, and because he was the pioneer in the religious movement which culminated in 621 B.C. Like Josiah and his prophetic colleague, Jeremiah, who calls himself a boy (Jer 1⁶), Zephaniah was probably still a young man when he first raised his voice in public. Youthful courage and undaunted zeal for righteousness ring through his brief prophecy. With the eye of faith he sees the speedy passing of the heathen practices, which for half-a-century had stood in the way of the general adoption of the noble ideals proclaimed by Hosea and Isaiah.

2. Occasion. The immediate occasion of his preaching appears to have been the advance of an enemy which threatened Judah and its neighbours with sudden and complete destruction. Evidently the dreaded foe is not their old masters, the Assyrians, nor their allies, the Egyptians, but the barbarous Scythians, who had already disturbed the politics of south-western Asia: cp. Herod. i. 105, Ezk 38^{8, 17}. A detachment of these ruthless foes, who worshipped their swords and gloried only in murder and plunder, was evidently already sweeping down the eastern shore of the Mediterranean.

The prophet had his text, and his audience good reason to listen. Their old complacency was shaken. The awakened national conscience found expression on the lips of the royal prophet. Rising above the terror of the moment, he announced that these pitiless destroyers were Jehovah's instrument of punishment, and the catastrophe that threatened His day of judgment. The horror and mystery that were inspired by the Scythians colour the prophet's picture of that day. It explains why the mediæval church and Thomas of Celano, in his Dies Iræ, Dies Illa, drew from Zephaniah the imagery of the last great Judgment Day. It was the influence of this same powerful prophecy that doubtless led the early Jewish and Christian writers to transform the original conception of the Day of Jehovah as a gradual process, working out in the life of nations, into the dramatic picture of one definite judgment scene, projected into the distant future.

3. Teaching. Zephaniah, like all the true prophets, aimed to arouse the moral sense of his contemporaries, and thus to render unnecessary the fulfilment of his grim predictions. Unlike most of his colleagues, he soon saw the fruits of his efforts; and yet through all his utterances rings the knell of seemingly irrevocable doom. In its original form it is the most uncompromising of all the OT. prophecies. Like the passages from the Deuteronomistic school of writers, who, in their version of the conquest, picture the wholesale slaughter of the heathen, it reveals the intense moral earnestness and zeal of the reformers who rallied about the young Josiah. As a chapter in the religious history of Judah, the prophecy is of great value.

Fortunately, it is also possible to date it with unusual exactness. It was probably delivered only a few days before the Scythian hordes, in 626 B.C., swept down the Mediterranean coast plain, devastating the Philistine cities. There is no evidence that they undertook the more difficult and less promising task of invading Judah itself; but a deep impression had been made upon the popular consciousness, and Zephaniah's stern message of warning remained to remind Judahites of the doom that had impended.

4. Contents. The book of Zephaniah contains two distinct themes: the one (1-2-3¹³) is that of universal judgment upon guilty Judah (c. 1); upon her neighbours the Philistines, the Moabites, and the Ammonites; upon her allies, the Ethiopians, and upon her old oppressors the Assyrians (c. 2); and upon Jerusalem's corrupt rulers (3¹⁻¹³). The last judgment is represented as culminating in the purification of the surviving remnant. This introduces the second theme, which is the song of rejoicing overredeemed and restored Zion (3¹⁴⁻²⁰). Thus the book in its present form is a complete literary unit with its cycle of judgment, purification, redemption, and restoration. In striking contrast to the dark thunderclouds of Jehovah's wrath with which it opens is the brilliant sunshine of divine forgiveness and favour with which the book closes. This completeness is, however, probably due to a later prophet who appreciated both sides of the divine character. The original prophecy appears to have begun and ended with the same solemn message of warning, and to have included simply 1²⁻²², 4-7b, 12-15 3¹⁻⁷ 11-13. The rest assumes the point of view and very different conditions of the Babylonian exile, and voices the hopes of restoration which kept alive the faith of the scattered remnants of the Jewish race. Its language and vocabulary are also those of the later age. Like many other books of the OT, the prophecy of Zephaniah reflects the exceedingly diverse and yet significant religious experiences which came to the Israelitish race at various periods in their history. Each section, studied in the light of its historical setting, reveals certain important aspects of the divine character and purpose.

In the older portion of the prophecy the influence of Isaiah's brilliant figures of speech, as well as ideas, can frequently be recognised. Through Zephaniah the message of the great prophet again found fervent expression. The language is highly poetical. In several sections, especially those which predict the punishment and ruin of Judah, Moab, Ammon, Ethiopia, and Assyria, the lamentation metre, a line with three followed by a line with two beats, appears. Unfortunately the text of the first part of the prophecy has suffered considerably in transmission. In some cases the Gk. versions facilitate the restoration of the original.

CHAPTER 1

THE DAY OF JEHOVAH A DAY OF JUDGMENT FOR GUILTY JUDAH

The prophecy opens with the declaration of universal destruction for all living things. In this way the prophet impresses upon his hearers the completeness and appalling nature of the impending judgment. In the succeeding vv. he defines in detail the character of the punishment and the guilty classes in Judah upon which it will especially fall. It is in keeping with the genius of the Semitic mind thus to pass from the general to the specific. The Hebrews, for example, began with God and then turned to note the evidence of His work in history and nature; while the Aryan mind first gathered the evidence from life and a study of the universe, and then from these ultimately rose to the conception of a deity.

3. Stumblingblocks] or, slightly correcting the text to bring it into harmony with the rest of the v., 'I will destroy the wicked.'

4. I will also stretch out mine hand] cp. the similar powerful refrain in Isa 5²⁵ 9^{12, 17, 21}. All traces of Baalism, together with the 'Chemarim' (Lv), the black-robed priests of Baal are first to be destroyed, as well as the wicked priests of Jehovah, who degraded His worship.

5, 6. The sweeping judgment and reformation will also affect those who follow the example of their Assyrian masters and worship the stars upon the housetops (cp. 2K 23^{5, 12} Ezk 8¹⁶), those who bow down before the moon (Heb. Jehovah, but cp. Jer 8² Dt 17³, and the parallelism), those who swear fealty to the Ammonite god, Mileom, and all those apostates who have ceased to worship Jehovah.

7. Jehovah's Day is here conceived of as a day of judgment, as in Am 5¹⁸, and is likened to a great sacrificial feast: cp. 1S 9¹³, and the guests are Judah's enemies: cp. for the same figure of speech, Isa 13⁸.

8. The chief crime of the princes in the prophet's eyes is the introduction of foreign customs: see Isa 2⁶⁻⁸.

9. Leap on the threshold] Evidently here also the crime is that of the members of the court, perhaps a foreign religious custom: cp. 1S 5⁶. But as there is no reference to religious customs in the context, the words may simply refer to the retainers of the king, who were in constant attendance at his doors, and who used their influence to enrich themselves at the cost of others. Fill their masters' houses (Heb. 'house') with violence and deceit] i.e. by their acts of oppression and injustice.

10. The reference is to the advance of the enemy against Jerusalem from the N. The fish gate was at the northern end of the Tyropoean valley (cp. Neh 3³ 12³⁹), and opened into the second or new quarter: cp. 2K 22¹¹ RV.

11. Maktesh] or, 'the mortar': the local designation of the merchants' quarter, which probably lay in the Tyropoean valley, W. of the Temple area.

12. Search . . with candles] i.e. thoroughly, as was required in the poorly-lighted houses of Palestine: cp. Lk 15⁸. Settled on their lees] i.e. have received no infusion of new and noble teachings, but retain the old fallacies: cp. Jer 48^{11, 12}. 13. Cp. Am 5¹¹ Mic 6¹⁵. 14, 15. Jehovah's judgment day is compared with a fierce tempest rapidly advancing toward Judah. The figure was suggested by the swift approach of the hordes of Scythian invaders.

CHAPTER 2

JEHOVAH'S IMPENDING JUDGMENT UPON JUDAH'S NEIGHBOURS AND FOES

The universal note which is struck in 12⁸ is now further amplified. Jehovah's agents of punishment, the Scythians, shall carry desolation along the Philistine plain to Egypt (as they actually did), and to the nations E. of the Jordan and Dead Sea, and even to distant Assyria, which in 605 B.C. fell before them.

1-3. Exhortation to repentance. The Heb. text is exceedingly doubtful. It is also not clear whether or not vv. 1-3 should go with the preceding or following section. If the latter, Philistia is the nation addressed: RV 'O nation that hath no shame.' 2. Before the day, etc.] The parallelism suggests that the original read, 'before you become like the passing chaff.' 3. The earnest exhortation in this v. must primarily have been addressed to the people of Judah, whether it comes from Zephaniah or from a later editor of his prophecy. In doing the will and winning the favour of God is man's only sure way of escape from all the dangers of life.

4. As in Am 1⁶⁻⁸ their chief cities represent the Philistines as a whole. Each name suggests the fate awaiting it. To reproduce the assonance in exact English is impossible: 'Gaza shall be a ghastly ruin; Ashkelon a deserted ash-heap.' The measure is elegiac, so that the literary form powerfully aided in conveying the prophet's message. 5. Cherethites] a synonym of Philistines, as in 1S 30¹¹ Ezk 25¹⁶. 6, 7. The Philistine coast plain shall be desolate and given up to shepherds and their flocks.

8. The nations of Moab and Ammon were hereditary enemies of the Israelites whom they treated with contempt on every possible occasion. Their hatred was returned by Israel, whose attitude is well expressed in their accepted view of the origin of these nations (Gn 19³⁰⁻³⁸). The reproach of Moab, and the revilings of . . Ammon were the taunts and curses they had uttered from time to time, especially when Israel was in danger from other foes: cp. Isa 16⁶ Jer 48^{26, 27, 29, 30, 42}. Cp. also for the same attitude at a later date Ezk 25¹⁻¹¹. 11. Famish] i.e. 'starve'; hence it means 'weaken', 'cause to fail.' 12. Ethiopians] lit. 'Cushites,' i.e. the Egyptians who at this time were ruled by Ethiopian rulers. Ethiopia was the part of Egypt S. of the first cataract of the Nile.

13-15. Assyria with its capital city, Nineveh, will also be destroyed. The cormorant and the bittern] RV 'the pelican and the porcupine' (i.e. the hedgehog), both of them being signs of desolation, as they avoid the presence of man: cp. Isa 34¹¹. Upper lintels] RV 'chapters,' i.e. the capitals of the pillars, now lying with the other stones in heaps on the ground as they have fallen. Their voice shall sing] better, 'the little owl shall sing,' as many scholars read. For desolation read 'the raven.'

For he shall uncover] RV 'for he hath laid bare.'

CHAPTER 3

THE JUDGMENT UPON THE EVIL RULERS OF JERUSALEM, AND ITS ULTIMATE PURIFI-CATION AND RESTORATION

Like Amos and Micah, the prophet sternly denounces the crimes of the ruling classes in Jerusalem, points out their ingratitude to Jehovah, and announces the doom that is inevitable. The gloom of the opening vv. is dispelled, however, by the hopes of restoration which appear to reflect a later age. Vv. 9, 10, 14-20 have the exultant ring of Isa 40-55.

1. Her that is filthy and polluted] evidently Jerusalem. The cause is the crimes of her civil and religious leaders. 3. They gnaw not the bones till the morrow] LXX is more in accord with the context and the habits of wolves, 'they leave nothing over till morning.'

6. Towers] i.e. the fortified towers at the corners of the walls. 7. So their dwelling . . punished them] LXX renders, 'And nothing that I have enjoined her will be cut off from her sight.'

9. Pure language] cp. Isa 6² Hos 2^{16,17}. They will no more call upon the names of the heathen gods: cp. 1². 10. R.M. reads, 'From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia shall they bring my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, for an offering unto me.'

14-20. A Messianic hymn, in which not the Messiah but Jehovah Himself is the promised King and Deliverer (vv. 17, 18). 18^b. R.M. 'which hath borne the burden of reproach.'

19. Her that halteth, and . . was driven out] i.e. the exiled Jewish race: cp. Mic 4^{6,7} Jer 33⁹ Isa 42⁷.

20. When I bring again (R.V.) your captivity] i.e. when I restore your captives: cp. Ps 53⁶ 126^{1,2}.

HAGGAI

INTRODUCTION

1. The Prophet. Very little is known concerning Haggai. He was a contemporary (Ezr 6¹⁴) and colleague of Zechariah. His reference to the first Temple (2³) has been made the basis for a not improbable inference that he was a very old man at the time of his public prophesying, one who had outlasted the Babylonian exile. But, like many others through whom God has spoken, we know Haggai only through the messages he delivered.

2. The Date of the Prophecies. The book of Haggai is one of the few sections of Scripture which can be dated with great accuracy. Its messages were delivered in the course of four months, during the second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspes, 520 B.C., nineteen years after Cyrus had proclaimed the freedom of the Jewish exiles to return to their homes in Palestine. On at least five occasions during this short period, the prophet appealed to the people on behalf of what seemed to him to be the great and immediate need of the day. He was determined to carry it to completion.

3. The occasion of writing. The prophet had before him a very practical aim, the awakening of a popular enthusiasm among his fellow-countrymen for erecting or completing the second Temple. According to Ezra (chs. 1-6) there had been an immediate return of exiles from Babylonia to Judah after the permissive decree of Cyrus in 538 B.C. These exiles had promptly begun to build a new Temple on the hallowed site of the old one, now in ruins. They had been checked by Samaritan opposition, and for sixteen years the work of rebuilding had been neglected. At best the work accomplished had been slight, and, as a whole, was still to be achieved.

The prophet clearly addresses a people who need to be roused into activity. The hopes created by the generosity and friendliness of Cyrus had been crushed by the pressure of Samaritan jealousy in Palestine, and by the neglect of the successor of Cyrus. They had experienced a series of barren seasons, and were desperately poor. As a community they had lost heart, and needed some impelling power to give them renewed enthusiasm and hopefulness.

The voice of Haggai was uplifted at just the right moment. Whether old or young, whether he had bided his time all these years, or was seized by his first inspiration for leadership, he was the man of the hour. He saw in a political crisis his people's opportunity to go forward with the enterprise which would be of supreme spiritual significance for them, the building of the Temple.

The political crisis of which he took such instant advantage was the assumption of the throne of Persia by Darius Hystaspes, or Darius the (great. Darius had no indisputable claim to the throne; and found himself at the outset compelled to exhibit his ability to subdue and rule the far-reaching provinces of his empire. The outcome was for some time in doubt. There was a 'shaking of the nations' on every side, and meanwhile the loyal peoples of Syria were left very much to their own devices. It was a crisis which seemed likely to become an opportunity. Darius was likely to prove a friend to the returned exiles, and to secure their friendship by withdrawing the prohibition of the work issued by his predecessor (Ezr 4^{5, 24}), and Haggai seized the opportunity to rouse the dormant energies and ambitions of the people.

4. The Prophecies. The book of Haggai contains four exhortations by the prophet. Three of these relate directly to the building of the Temple, and the last of all concerns Zerubbabel, the governor. These messages are direct and practical. They sound a fine ethical note, recalling the people to their manifest and immediate duty toward God. The first section (c. 1) is a summons to build the house of God, and its sequel; the second (2¹⁻⁹), an encouraging word; the third (2¹⁰⁻¹⁹), an acted parable of explanation; and the fourth (2²⁰⁻²³), a prediction regarding Zerubbabel. There is a unity of meaning from the beginning to the end, in harmony with the claims of the book that it represents the utterances of a brief period.

5. Characteristic Features of the Book. There is much vigour and individuality in Haggai's addresses. His words are those of a leader who perceives a great opportunity and seeks to meet it. He does not enlarge our inheritance of truth, nor give us new visions of God in His universe. He rather rendered a special service to his people at a time of need. He aroused them to their duty, dispelled their faintheartedness, sustained their flagging energies, gave the achievement its true significance as the next step which God called upon them to take, and kept alive their loyalty to the great hopes which his famous predecessors had kindled in their hearts. Altogether Haggai was an important link in the prophetic succession. He just precedes Zechariah, whose first preserved prophecy (Zech 1¹⁻⁶) belongs chronologically to the time between the utterance of Haggai in 2¹⁻⁹ and that in 2¹⁰⁻¹⁹.

That the prophet's style differs from that of Isaiah or Jeremiah is not strange. His style fits the situation. A plain, insistent message of practical duty was what was needed. Spiritual life, hope for the future, loyalty to God and to national traditions—all these supreme aims waited on the erection of the Temple. That Haggai saw this was an undoubted proof of his prophetic quality.

CHAPTER I

A CALL TO BEGIN BUILDING THE TEMPLE

1-11. Haggai repeatedly urges the leaders of Judah and the people to bend their energies to the rebuilding of the ruined Temple (August, 520 B.C.).

1. Darius the king] This was unquestionably Hystaspes, who was raised to the Persian throne after the death of the impostor, Sinerdis.

Sixth month] the 6th of the Jewish year, i.e. the month Elul (August-September).

Zerubbabel] A prince of the royal line of Judah, and the accepted civil leader of the people, just as Joshua was the religious leader. He ruled Judah as a Persian province.

2. This people] Haggai, like other prophets, did not need to create a sense of wrongdoing, but only to awaken conscience. He challenged their idle excuses. The time is not come] Evidently this was no sincere desire to await some specified date, but a wilful delaying of duty. In the interests of religion it demanded attention. 4. Time for you, O ye] lit. 'for you, you,' the repeated pronoun being very emphatic, so as to make a sharp contrast between them and the God they dishonoured.

Cieled houses] houses panelled with costly cedar planks. They could seem to afford luxuries for themselves, but were indifferent to the ruined state of the Temple.

5. Consider your ways] lit. 'Set your heart on your ways,' i.e. consider thoughtfully the situation in which you find yourselves. An appeal made four times by the prophet. 6. Ye eat, but ye have not enough] lit. 'but not to satisfy.' This v. formulates a series of vigorous comparisons, indicating that their labour had been ill rewarded. They had experienced failures of crops, continuous poverty, and lessening of physical vigour. Bag with holes] No one gets ahead, but seems to lose his money as fast as he accumulates it. A vivid picture of alluring hopes and baffling disappointments.

8. Go up to the mountain] They were to act at once. The prophet was in earnest. The mountain would be 'the hill-country of Judah,' the mountainous neighbourhood. Compare Neh 2⁸ and 8¹⁵. Bring wood] i.e. timber suitable for building. The house] the Temple of Jehovah, which had been lying in ruins since being destroyed at the command of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25⁹). And I will be glorified] better, 'and that I may display my glory.' Here the prophet first interprets these calamities as being due to God's anger at their selfishness. The two following vv. emphasise this explanation. The people were zealous enough over their own affairs, but wholly neglectful of their obligations to God.

12-15. The leaders and people, their consciences awakened, encouraged by Haggai, begin work upon the Temple (September, 520 B.C.).

12. The remnant of the people] i.e. the rest of the people; those who had returned from Babylon were but a fraction of the once numerous nation. Did fear] It was a real religious change that came over them. They obeyed, not because of terror, but from a new sense of reverence for God. 13. The LORD'S messenger] This v. is rejected by many scholars as superfluous. They also question this title as needless. It is the only instance in Scripture where a prophet uses such a title concerning himself. Nevertheless, it is not incongruous. I am with you] This encouraging word assured the people that they were acting as God would have them do. 14. Stirred up the spirit] The first result of Haggai's unsparing sermon was a spiritual change in the hearts of his hearers. A zealous purpose was once more kindled. The second result was practical. Within three weeks from the date of his first appeal the work upon the Temple had begun, with unanimity and heartiness. What more searching test could a preacher have or what more convincing proof of his power?

CHAPTER 2

WORDS OF ENCOURAGEMENT. THE GLORY OF THE SECOND TEMPLE

1-9. An encouraging message in counteraction of disparaging comments upon the Temple structure, setting forth the significance and glory of the new Temple.

1. Seventh month] i.e. Tishri, September-October. This message was delivered just four weeks after the beginning of the work. So heartily had every one united in it that the general outline and character of the new edifice had become apparent. The Feast of Tabernacles was in progress. Haggai spoke to the people on the last day of this feast, when all were gathered in one great assembly.

3. Who is left among you] More than 66 years had passed since the destruction of the first Temple, but it was quite possible that there were some who could describe that glorious structure as they had known it. These elders referred to the newer Temple with disparagement, to the dejection and dismay of the people. Gold and silver and rare woods made Solomon's Temple splendid; the edifice now rising was of rough stone. No wonder the elders became reminiscent.

First] better, 'former.' 4. Be strong] or, 'have courage.' And work] keep at your task: cp. David's words to Solomon, 1 Ch 28²⁰.

5. My spirit remaineth] RM 'abideth,' is standing in your presence. What a basis for continuing courage! cp. Zech 4⁶. Jehovah was in their midst, as He had always been in times of need. Moreover, they would soon have adequate proof of His presence. 6. Yet once, it is a little while] This is literal, but it evidently means 'But a little while.' It seems to refer to the shaking, which might be soon expected.

7. Shake all nations] This clearly refers to political overturnings. The prophet expected that the great empire, all aflame with rebellion, would be broken up, and that the Jewish community would have its coveted opportunity. His language, probably figurative, implies corresponding convulsions of nature. The general idea is that God will soon take hold of the situation and deal with it. The desire of all nations shall come] Through Jerome and the Vulgate the old Rabbinical Messianic interpretation of this phrase was given to the Christian church, as if it referred directly to Christ, but the verb 'shall come' is a plural. More likely the meaning in Haggai's mind was (as RV), 'And the desirable things of all nations shall come.' These were under Jehovah's control. As the nations came to know Him and to render obedience, they would bring with joy to His Temple their choicest gifts. With glory] The Temple then would seem glorious enough.

9. The glory of this latter house] RV 'The latter glory of this house . . . than the former,' a prediction involving courage and foresight. It was spoken to a community politically insignificant, without resources, tributary to the powerful monarch of Persia, engaged in erecting a simple building for religious purposes. It was a triumph of religious idealism. As a permanent promise it beautifully phrases the assurance of the supremacy of Christ and the church in the world. Will I give peace] Where God is established, there is a peace which cannot be disturbed (Jn 16³³).

10-19. A symbolical message emphasising the significance of the long-continued neglect of God by the community and promising blessings for obedience.

10. Ninth month] i.e. Chislev, or Nov.-Dec. The work on the Temple had now been under way for three months. 11. Ask now the priests . . . the law] better, 'ask of the priests a thorn,' or deliverance. In the absence of a definite statement in the written Law covering a case it was the custom to submit a question of usage to the priests (Dt 17⁸⁻¹³). Their reply was a 'thorn' or law. The passage in the written Law most resembling the judgment here rendered is Lv 6^{27, 28}. 12. Holy flesh] flesh that has been offered in sacrifice and is being taken home to be consumed. Shall it be holy?] i.e. is the garment in which such holy food is being carried capable of giving holiness to other food? The priests replied that holiness could not be communicated in that way.

13. Unclean by a dead body] A corpse was regarded as making every one who came in contact with it ceremonially unclean. The priests declared that this pollution would extend to whatever these infected persons touched. Uncleanmess, then, could be propagated readily; holiness could not.

14. That which they offer there] An effective application of these decisions to the situation. The restoration of the ritual service, as described in Ezr 3, was good in its way but insufficient to make them holy as a people, while their actual neglect of the Temple was enough to pollute everything they did. In God's sight they could only be regarded as unclean and worthy of punishment.

15. From this day and upward] better, 'and onward.' He then bids them think of their past sufferings and resumes the thought here begun in v. 18. There should be a full stop after upward. From before, etc.] A better translation is that of Nowack, 'Before a stone was laid upon a stone in the Temple of the Lord, how did ye fare? When one came to a heap of twenty,' etc. 16. Twenty measures] Realisations were but half the expectations. Pressfat] winevat. Fifty vessels] rather, 'measures.' 18. And upward] better, 'onwards.'

The day that the foundation of the LORD'S temple was laid] Probably the day on which he was speaking. Haggai refers to their bitter experience up to the day of active work

19. Is the seed yet in the barn?] Evidently he means to draw out a negative reply. Yet his word is encouraging. God is going to bless them. It takes time to recover from the ill effects of selfishness, but a brighter future was before them.

20-23. An inspiring declaration to Zerubbabel that in him rested the ancient hopes of Israel.

20. Four and twentieth day] the same great festal day. 22. The throne of kingdoms] LXX 'thrones.' Haggai looked forward to a disruption of the great Persian empire into its tributary nations and to struggles between them, which would give Israel its opportunity. 23. In that day] The day of general political convulsion, would be the day of Messianic advance, and of the establishment of Jehovah's kingdom. The forwarding of Israel's spiritual hopes seemed to Haggai, as to earlier prophets, to necessitate the opening of political freedom. Make thee as a signet] the sign of authority. So far as we know Zerubbabel never exercised any real, independent power. He served, however, to embody and keep alive the Hope which gave permanence and power to Israel's ideals.

Haggai contributed but little to the volume of prophecy, but that little was of great value. At a critical moment in Israel's history he said the timely, vigorous, ethical word, and put into apprehensible form the great ideal

ZECHARIAH

INTRODUCTION

1. Historical Background. Zechariah was the grandson of Iddo, who is mentioned in Neh 12^{4,16} as the head of one of the priestly families that returned from the exile. The Jews had been carried captive to Babylon in 597 and 586 B.C.; but Cyrus the Great, soon after the capture of Babylon in 538, promulgated a decree permitting them to return to their native land and restore Jerusalem, under the governorship of Sheshbazzar (called also Sanabassar), probably a prince of their own royal line (Ezr 1¹⁻¹¹ 2 Ch 36^{22,23} Isa 44²⁸ 45¹³). It is uncertain how many of the Jews took advantage of the liberty granted them, as the numbers given in the book of Ezra may be taken from a census of Judæa made at some time subsequent to the return. Certainly the returned exiles included some of the best Jewish families and among them Zechariah, then only a boy, probably accompanied his grandfather.

The religious and patriotic spirit of the exiles had been stirred by Ezekiel (11¹⁷⁻²⁰ 16⁶⁰⁻⁶³ 34¹¹⁻³¹ 36²²⁻²⁸ 37²¹⁻²⁸) and by such writings as Isa 48²⁰ 49⁸⁻¹⁷ 52⁷⁻¹², etc.; but in the difficulties of the return, and the weary task of rebuilding their ruined homes, their enthusiasm soon died away. Their efforts were watched and hindered by enemies (Ezr 4¹⁻⁵), who tried to prejudice them at the Court of Babylon by reporting that they were plotting to obtain political freedom (Ezr 4⁹⁻¹⁶). The years slipped past. Cyrus, the Jews' best friend, died in 529 B.C. His son Cambyses, who succeeded him, did nothing to help them; and when Darius, his successor, ascended the throne in 521, the Jews at Jerusalem had altogether lost heart. Through the misrepresentations of their enemies they had been forbidden to rebuild the city walls. Their Temple, which had been burned in 586 by the Assyrian general, still lay a blackened ruin (although some maintain that the foundation-stone was laid as early as 537); nor did they see how it could be restored. At this critical moment God sent them a message which marvellously encouraged and uplifted them. The prophets Haggai and Zechariah were the bearers of this message.

These two prophets were contemporaries, and their prophecies were delivered almost simultaneously. They are mentioned together in Ezr 5:1-6¹¹, as having been raised up by God to encourage the Jews to rebuild the Temple. Haggai appeared first, and in August 520 B.C. charged the Jews with neglecting the building of God's House: cp. Hag 1. This appeal had immediate results. Within a month the foundation of the Temple was laid. Soon after, Zechariah uttered his first prophecy (Zech 1:1-6). Towards the close of the year 520, Haggai in two oracles finished his recorded prophecies; and early in 521 Zechariah delivered the famous series, comprising eight symbolical visions, which appears in Zech 1:7-6:8, with an appendix, 6:9-15. Two years afterwards chs. 7, 8 were spoken in response to an enquiry by the men of Bethel, or perhaps a deputation from Babylon, as to the observance of a fast; and these are now regarded in most quarters as completing the prophecies of Zechariah, as chs. 9-14 can hardly be ascribed to him.

2. Zechariah's Method. Haggai was a layman, Zechariah was of priestly descent. These facts, to a certain extent, explain the different methods of the two. Haggai is practical, plain, clear, in unfolding his message: Zechariah is equally practical, but his method is not so plain. He clothes his message in the language of symbol. It is true that in the opening passage (Zech 1:1-6) his language is simple and direct. He brings before his hearers the practical teaching of the earlier prophets, especially of Amos and Micah, and urges his own generation not to repeat the mistakes of their fathers. But from 1:7 to 6:8 he unfolds his message in a series of visions, the rich imagery of which would make a powerful appeal to the Oriental mind. This change from the direct method (the 'Thus saith the Lord') of the earlier prophets is characteristic of most of the post-exilic prophecies. From the time of Ezekiel onwards to the 2nd cent. of the Christian era, the symbolic method of writing occupied a leading place in Jewish religious literature. The residence in Babylon would be responsible to some extent for the rise of this kind of prophecy. There the exiles would be subjected to the influences of a highly-developed art; and their situation was such as naturally to induce a visional or symbolic style of thought. To some extent also the change may be ascribed to the fact that Ezekiel, who initiated it, and Zechariah, who followed successfully in his steps, were priests, accustomed to read divine messages through the symbols of religious ritual. In any case, the method was abundantly justified by its results. Their symbolic messages touched the imagination of their hearers in much the same way as the parables of our Lord, in a later age, appealed to the Galilean multitudes. Zechariah's immediate aim was to raise the drooping spirits of his countrymen, and encourage them to proceed at once with the rebuilding of the Temple. In this he was entirely successful, the Temple being completed and dedicated in 516 B.C.

3. Zechariah's Teaching. In chs. 1-8, which are all that can with confidence be ascribed to Zechariah, the Messianic ideas are local and national for the most part. Sin is to be eradicated (5:1-11), the priesthood purified (3:1-5), Jerusalem made glorious (2:1-12), and a prince of the house of David (probably Zerubbabel) set up as ruler (3:6-10). These thoughts are repeated and re-enforced in the appendix to the series of visions (6:9-15). The idea that God dwells far away, and sends messages by angels, etc., appears in 1:9-11, 4:1, etc. This is generally regarded as a feature of later Judaism, influenced by contact with Persia; though, in view of recent discoveries, it is now admitted that points of resemblance between the religion of Assyria and the religion of Israel existed from the beginning. In 3:1, 2 is the first mention of Satan in Hebrew literature. The idea is more fully developed in the (later) book of Job. The personification of wickedness (5:1-11) as a woman is a peculiar feature of Zechariah, and indicates that tendency to regard evil as an independent power warring against the power of good, which characterises the religion of Persia.

Zechariah is a prophet not only to his own time, but to every age. He teaches that repentance—'heart sorrow and a clear life ensuing'—is the first duty of a nation. He finds in the past guidance for men in the present, and seeks to impress upon them that 'the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.' Like all the prophets he is a patriot, anxious for the welfare and prosperity of his nation, but sure that only 'righteousness exalteth a nation,' and that God will dwell only with those who are willing to do His will. He sees that outward advantages are of no avail without the purified heart, and that there can be no real happiness until sin is removed from the national life. He realises too that the forms of religion are useless without the spirit, and proclaims that 'to obey is better than to sacrifice,' and that fasting is no substitute for truth and justice. Also he showed that Israel's priesthood, imperfect though it was, represented an ideal of holiness, and had its place in preparing the way for the ideal Priest—the Messiah.

4. Origin and Teaching of chs. 9-14. When we pass from c. 8 to c. 9 we come into a different atmosphere. In chs. 1-8 the situation is quite clear—dates are given, practical difficulties are discussed, well-known leaders are mentioned by name, and the people are engaged in a specific work, to which Zechariah encourages them. In chs. 9-14 all these guiding lines have disappeared. There is no mention of temple-building, or of Joshua or Zerubbabel, or even of Babylon: instead, we find cities and countries not mentioned hitherto—Hamath, Damascus, Egypt, Greece. In 1¹¹ we read, 'all the earth sitteth still and is at rest'; but in chs. 9-14 there is war, destruction, trouble, mourning. In chs. 1-8 there is a series of well-arranged oracles, with dates, and for the most part the same superscription, 'I lifted up mine eyes': in chs. 9-14 the very period is a subject of conjecture, the various oracles are difficult to disentangle, and both thought and style are much changed. These are some of the reasons why most modern scholars agree that chs. 9-14 were not written by Zechariah. Who the real author was, and what were the date and purpose of his writing, it is not so easy to determine. According to one view, chs. 9-14 are composed of two distinct prophecies—(a) 9-11, 13⁷⁻⁹; (b) 12-14 (with the exception of 13⁷⁻⁹). (a) is considered a very early prophecy, written in the time of Amos or Hosea about the year 740 B.C., on the following amongst other grounds: (1) Ephraim is mentioned (for Israel) with Judah (9¹⁰⁻¹³ 10^{6,7}), which is hardly likely to have been the case after the northern kingdom came to an end in 722; (2) Assyria occurs along with Egypt as a world-power (10^{10,11}), whereas, long before the time of Zechariah, the empire of Assyria had passed away; and (3) the three shepherds (c. 11) seem to represent Zechariah, Shallum, and a third person now unknown—kings of Israel who died a violent death.

These reasons, however, are not conclusive. Ephraim may be explained as referring to the exiles of the northern kingdom: and Assyria seems to have continued in use as a territorial name to designate the rulers of that country, whether Persian, Greek, or Seleucid. With regard to the three shepherds of c. 11, the application to Zechariah, Shallum, and an unnamed king is mere conjecture.

In the same way, (b) (chs. 12-14) is dated in the pre-exilic age. The attacks on idolatry and prophesying (13^{2,3}) are thought to be consistent with the religious decay of the 7th cent. B.C., while the mourning (12¹⁰⁻¹⁴) is referred to the death of Josiah at Megiddo in 608 B.C. Neither here, however, nor in (a), is there anything which corresponds with the style of such pre-exilic writers as Amos and Hosea. The prophetic ideals embodied in chs. 9-14, and especially the visions of the last things (9¹¹⁻¹⁶ 14¹⁻¹⁵, etc.), are consistent only with that well-known phase of Jewish thought which had its beginning not earlier than the time of Ezekiel. Nor is it likely that any pre-exilic writer would picture a state of things such as we find in 13¹⁻⁶, where prophecy is utterly discredited and abandoned. Apparently also there is no king even in Jerusalem: the king is yet to come (9⁹). Besides, the reference to Greece (9¹⁴), as a world-power over which Zion must win the victory, seems incomprehensible at any pre-exilic date.

Some writers find in chs. 9-11 a reference to the invasion of Asia by Alexander the Great in 334 B.C., and date this portion of the book accordingly; but the most recent tendency is to assign the whole of the prophecies in chs. 9-14 to the 2nd cent. B.C. According to this view chs. 9-11, 13⁷⁻⁹ and 12-14 are two groups, each falling into two parts. The first two are 9¹⁻¹¹, and 11⁴⁻¹⁷-13⁷⁻⁹, written in the first quarter of the 2nd cent. The Greeks (9¹³) are the world-power against which Judaism must strive for supremacy. Assyria is the Seleucid kingdom founded in 312 B.C. by Seleucus, a general of Alexander the Great. It included at first nearly the whole of Syria and Babylonia—certainly all the places mentioned in 9^{1,2}. When Antiochus the Great, one of the Seleucid kings, came to the throne in 223 B.C., Palestine was under the rule of the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt. In 198, however, Antiochus defeated the Egyptians, and Palestine passed into his hands. Hence the pre-eminence given to Assyria (10¹¹). Hence also the sheep are the Jews whose 'possessors' (the Seleucid sovereigns) 'slay them' (11²). 'Their own shepherds' (11³) may be the high priests and ethnarchs (in Jerusalem) of foreign sympathies, who 'pity them not.' In that age there was much intrigue and unrest in Palestine—murder and outrage even in high places were not uncommon; so that the cutting off of three shepherds in one month would be no unlikely event.

In like manner chs. 12-14 are regarded as consisting of two prophecies (12, 13¹⁻⁶ and 14), both belonging to the Maccabean age. They may have been written soon after the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes, 175 B.C. The contrast of Judaea with Jerusalem (12³), and the fact that help to the city comes from the country (12⁶), are a likely reflexion of the situation in that age (see Jos. 'Ant.' bk. 12). On the whole, it can hardly be said that modern scholarship has reached a decisive conclusion on this part of Zechariah, though the view that assigns it to a late post-exilic age seems most in accord with the facts of the case.

5. General Characteristics. These chs. (9-14) witness, on the one hand, to a wider contact with the outside heathen world (9¹⁻⁷ 10¹¹ 9¹³, etc.), which tends to universalism (9¹ 14⁹), and, on the other hand, to an intensely narrow patriotism, whose ideals can only be fulfilled by the direct interposition of God (12^{3,6,7,9}). Besides, we find in them the most primitive Messianic hopes—judgment of the nations (9¹⁻⁷ 14^{3,12}, etc.), advent of Messiah (9⁹), deliverance (9^{11,12} 10¹⁰), conflict with the heathen (9^{1,15} 14^{3,4}), final victory over, and conversion of the heathen (14¹³⁻¹⁷), ceremonial purity (14^{20,21}), and God's reign of peace (14^{4,9}). Only the true Messiah, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, could have sifted these elements, and brought them into harmony with His great work.

6. Contents of chs. 9-14. 9¹⁻¹¹ 11³. God will visit the nations in judgment and His people in mercy. Judah and Ephraim will be restored, and Assyria and Egypt discomfited. 11⁴⁻¹⁷ and 13⁷⁻⁹. The parable of the good shepherds and the foolish shepherd. 12¹⁻¹³ 13⁶. The deliverance and the coming glory of Jerusalem. 14. The destruction of the enemies of Jerusalem, and her exaltation as the centre of worship for the world.

CHAPTER 1

LESSONS FROM THE PAST. THE FIRST AND SECOND VISIONS

1-6. The Prophet's message. He calls the people to repentance. 8-17. The First Vision: The Divine Messengers ever watching over the affairs of the nations. 18-21. The Second Vision: Hostile nations subdued by divinely-appointed agents.

1. The eighth month] the month Bul (see 1 K 6³⁸), corresponding to part of October-November. The second year of Darius] i.e. 520 B.C. This was the first Darius, son of Hystaspes, who had just succeeded to the Persian throne. Babylonia formed part of his dominions. He found the old decree of Cyrus in the archives of Babylon, permitting the Jews to return and build the Second Temple and renewed it (Ezr 6¹). The son of Iddo the prophet] There should be a comma after Iddo. Zechariah was the prophet.

2-6. The people are warned to repent by the fate of their fathers, who suffered exile because they refused to listen to God's word by the earlier prophets.

3. Unto them] i.e. the people. The LORD of hosts] a frequent phrase in Zechariah. Probably the original idea was of Jehovah as the leader of Israel's armies, then of sun, moon, and stars, the hosts of heaven, then of angelic hosts. The title expresses God's supreme power and majesty. 4. Zechariah evidently knows the works of the earlier prophets: cp. Amos passim, Jer 26⁵ 35¹⁵, etc. 5, 6. Prophets and people alike die, but the Word of God lives anew in every generation, and from the experience of the past appeals to men to shun those errors of their fathers which brought such dire punishment. Take hold of] RV 'overtake.'

8-17. THE FIRST VISION: The horseman among the myrtles. The seven visions have one date, viz. the twenty-fourth day of the month Sebat, RV 'Shebat' (the name is Babylonish), i.e. part of January and February, 519 B.C. The occasion of the visions is the growing impatience of the returned exiles. They could perceive no sign of God's presence, or of His interest in their labours and difficulties. Haggai had assured them that in 'a little while' God would 'shake the kingdoms' and fill His house with glory (2^{6,7}). But time passed and there was no sign of this. The people began to lose faith in God. These visions of Zechariah thus came at a most important crisis. To his countrymen they were a bright panorama of hope, revealing the marvellous providence of God, and His love for His people.

The first vision assures them that God knows every detail of their circumstances. His messengers are ever on the alert, bringing tidings to their King from all parts of the earth.

8. Myrtle trees] rare in Palestine to-day, but once common around Jerusalem: cp. Neh 8¹⁵. They have no special significance in the vision. Bottom] RM 'shady place.' Red horses, speckled, and white] RV horses, 'red, sorrel, and white.' Some take the colours to indicate various countries whence the messenger came, but this is unlikely. 9. O my lord] addressing the angel of the LORD, who has not yet been mentioned. 10. The figure is military and suggests horsemen hovering on the flank of an army—the scouts of God's great host.

11. At rest] probably a lull in the wars of Darius, and so all the more remarkable.

12. One angel speaks from among the myrtle trees, another from beside the prophet. The second asks why in this universal peace Jerusalem alone is unvisited of God. To the nations He sends peace as a sign, to Jerusalem He seems to give no sign. Threescore and ten years] in round numbers: cp. Jer 25¹¹ 29¹⁰. The first captivity took place in 597 B.C.; the final destruction of Jerusalem in 586; Cyrus' decree for return in 537; this prophecy in 519. 14, 15. Outward condition may be no indication of God's favour. Though the nations are at rest, God is angry with them. They have exceeded their commission in punishing Judah so severely. Though Jerusalem is troubled, yet God is returning with mercies for her. 16. A line] the measuring line which the builders would use in restoring her ruined streets. 17. Shall yet be spread abroad] better, 'shall yet overflow with prosperity' (RM), i.e. the cities of Judah: see v. 12. Zion] a synonym for Jerusalem; properly the higher of the two spurs on which Jerusalem was built.

18-21. THE SECOND VISION: The four horns and the four smiths. This vision forms a fitting supplement to the first, and describes the destruction of those enemies of Israel (the four horns) who, having been too zealous in punishing her for her sins, are now themselves worthy of punishment.

18. Four horns] Vain efforts have been made to identify these with four nations or races, who at one time or another were Israel's oppressors, e.g. Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia. A more likely suggestion is that 'four' may indicate the whole of Israel's enemies from the four quarters of the globe. But even this seems arbitrary. On 'horns,' as a symbol of military power, see 1 K 22¹¹.

20. Four carpenters (RV 'smiths') [lit. 'workers' (se. in iron), as in Isa 44¹². Probably one to deal with each horn. The language is symbolic, and does not necessarily imply the sending of four deliverers. 21. No man did lift up his head] In the events culminating in the captivity, the people were utterly crushed. Fray] an obsolete word meaning 'terrify': cp. Dt 28²⁶. The root is seen in 'afraid,' i.e. affrayed. But the reading in LXX suggests a Hebrew word meaning 'file down,' which certainly gives a better sense to the whole passage. Cast out] RV 'cast down.'

Gentiles] RV 'nations,' and so throughout.

The imagery of this vision is somewhat difficult, but the meaning is quite plain, viz. the judgment of those nations who had harried God's people.

CHAPTER 2

THE THIRD VISION

1-5. A young man with a measuring line goes forth to measure Jerusalem preparatory to rebuilding the walls. But an angel is sent to stop him. The population will so increase as to exceed all human expectations, and God will be the city's best defence. 6-9. The Jews are summoned to leave Babylon, for judgment is to fall upon that city. 10-12. God's gracious promise to dwell in Jerusalem, to which the nations will come.

1. A man with a measuring line] The vision is probably connected with what, at the time, was really under discussion, viz. the rebuilding of the walls. The Jews felt that they were few in number, and without proper defences. 3, 4. The interpreting angel stands near the prophet. He goes forth to meet another angel, who asks him to stop this young man in a useless task. The city is destined to have an overflowing population. No walls will be able to contain it. It will stretch forth its houses far out into the surrounding country and seem, not like a walled city, but like a series of country towns packed together.

5. In addition to this reason, the prophet has no faith in warlike fortifications (cp. the subsequent disastrous sieges of Jerusalem by the Syrians and Romans: Jos. 'Wars of Jews,' 1. 6, etc.). God is her best protection. A wall of fire] a figure suggested by the watch-fires, built round a desert caravan when camping at night, to scare away wild beasts: cp. 1 S 25¹⁶.

6-13. This section forms a poetical prophecy, addressed to the Jews still remaining in Babylon.

6. Land of the north] Babylon. Spread] scattered in exile. 7. Deliver thyself, O Zion] better, 'Ho, escape to Zion.' 8. After the glory] better, 'after glory,' i.e. to win glory, by bringing judgment on the Babylonians who spoiled Israel. Me] the angel is still speaking. Apple of his eye] here lit. 'the door of his eye'; elsewhere, 'the daughter,' i.e. the pupil of the eye, which, from its position, importance, and surroundings, is used as an emblem of what is exceedingly precious: cp. Dt 32¹⁰ Ps 17⁸, etc. 10. This prophecy was fulfilled when the Temple was completed and consecrated by Zerubbabel in 516 B.C.

11. Many nations shall be joined to the LORD] better, 'shall join themselves.' This was fulfilled after the coming of Jesus Christ, who also fulfilled the words, 'I will dwell in the midst of thee.' 12. His portion in the holy land] better, 'his portion shall be upon holy ground,' i.e. in Zion. 13. Be silent] lit. 'hush!' cp. Hab 2²⁰. Is raised up] better, 'hath roused himself'—said of God when He is about to execute some great purpose. His holy habitation] i.e. heaven.

CHAPTER 3

THE FOURTH VISION

Joshua, better known under the later form Jeshua (Ezr 2²³ 3² Neh 12⁷ 8¹⁰, etc.), was the son of Jehozadak, a member of the priestly order. He returned with the Jews from exile, and was prominently associated with Zerubbabel in the erection of the Second Temple. In 1 Esdras and Ecclesiastes the name appears simply as 'Jesus.'

1-7. Joshua, the high priest, is seen in a vision standing before the angel of God, accused by the adversary of being unworthy, as the sinful representative of a sinful nation, to stand before God in the holy office of high priest. He is, however, acquitted, purified, and given charge of the Temple. 8-10. The promise of Messiah and of peace.

1. And he] the interpreting angel.

Satan] The word in the original Hebrew has the definite article, and is thus correctly rendered by RM 'The Adversary.' In OT. it is used first of a human adversary: see 1S29⁴ 1K11¹⁴. Compare also the angel who appears 'as an adversary' to Balaam (Nu22³²). Then, in Zechariah and Job, it is used presumably of an angel, who is permitted to accuse men in God's presence. How far this 'adversary' is sanctioned by God, or works in God's service as one jealous for the right, it is difficult to say. In this c. he is reproved by God Himself for showing himself too eager to emphasise the sinful nature of Joshua, the high priest and representative of the nation. In 1Ch21¹ the word 'Satan' appears as a proper name, and he is represented as the Tempter, cunning, malicious, and opposed to God.

In this passage of Zechariah the motive we assign to Satan is not of much importance. This is a vision. Its purpose is to encourage the desponding Jews. How could they build and consecrate the Temple of God? So feeble and sinful they seemed to themselves; even their best men were polluted: ep. Ezk 22²⁰. By this vision the prophet assures them that their sin is removed, and that Joshua's priesthood is recognised.

At his right hand] the position of a plaintiff in Jewish law courts: see Ps109⁶. To resist him] RV 'to be his adversary,' or accuser—the same word as in Hebrew expresses the noun 'Satan.'

2. Satan is reproved. He would induce God to cast off His people. A brand plucked out of the fire] i.e. something precious rescued from destruction: ep. Am4¹¹. Joshua is the representative of the people who have just been rescued from exile. 3. Filthy garments] symbolical of sin and unfitness for the pure service of God. Probably the sin here signified was the nation's past idolatry and neglect of the worship of God. 4. God (and He alone can) changes all this. Israel's sin is taken away: her negligence changed to glorious service. 5. I said] Here the prophet himself seems to intervene in the vision. But a more probable reading is 'he said.' A fair mitre] lit. 'a clean turban' The root of the word indicates that it was made of a long piece of fine linen wound round and round: see Ex28³⁰.

7. God's solemn charge to Joshua. Judge my house] i.e. regulate the Temple and its services. Places to walk] RV 'a place of access,' probably to intercede with God for the people: Joshua is to have the right of entrée at the heavenly court. Among these that stand by] the attendant angels.

8. A great Messianic promise. Joshua and his fellow-priests are a sign of God's favour, which will culminate in the appearance of the Branch or Sprout, i.e. the Messiah King. So also on the stone (v. 9) with its seven eyes or facets—the stone prepared to be the headstone of the Temple—God will engrave the name of His Messiah, as a token of national sin forgiven. Men wondered at] men of omen: or perhaps the meaning is that being priests they could interpret symbols or omens; consequently they would know what the Branch signified. Branch] better, 'Sprout.' The word has no article in Heb. It was well known as a symbol of the Messiah: ep. Isa42¹¹ Jer23⁵ 33¹⁵. The new sprout was to grow from the nearly dead (extinct) stem of David. 9. Seven eyes] symbolising God's watchful care over His people (see 4¹⁰), guarding them against their enemies. 10. In that day] perhaps the day of dedicating the new Temple. Thou shalt there be peace and prosperity. Call] invite.

CHAPTER 4

THE FIFTH VISION

The prophet's thoughts now turn to the civil ruler Zerubbabel. The purpose of the fifth vision is to encourage him in the difficult task of rebuilding the Temple.

1-5, 11-14. The golden candlestick (i.e. the returned exiles) receives its supply of oil (i.e. the divine grace) through two channels ('pipes,' v. 12), viz. the spiritual and the temporal leaders, Joshua and Zerubbabel, through whose united efforts the prosperity of the nation would be accomplished. These are the two olive trees. 6-10 is an encouraging address to Zerubbabel; weak though he is, yet by the help of God's Holy Spirit he will finish the great work.

1. And waked me] The visions evidently occurred in the night, but so vivid were they that Zechariah seemed to awake. 2. A candlestick all of gold] In the first Temple ten candles gave light (1K7⁴⁹, but see Ex25³¹).

Bowl] holding the main supply of oil. From it a pipe flowed to each lamp. RV reads, 'seven pipes to each of the lamps,' but LXX and Vulgate reading, followed in AV, is probably correct. 3. The lamps are supplied from a perennial and inexhaustible source, viz. two olive trees.

6. Zerubbabel] son of Shealtiel, but called in 1Ch3¹⁹ son of Pedaiah, was governor ('pehah,' as Haggai calls him) of Judah in the time of Haggai and Zechariah. Shealtiel was a son of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, so that Zerubbabel was of royal blood. He returned from exile, probably in 538 B.C., along with his uncle Sheshbazzar, who was the first governor of Judah after the return. He probably succeeded his uncle as governor some time in 522-520 B.C. He is recognised by Zechariah as the civil head of Jerusalem, and as such is encouraged to proceed with the work of rebuilding the Temple. Of his ultimate fate nothing is known.

6. It is clear that v. 6 does not give the answer to the question asked in v. 4; consequently most modern scholars place the section 10^b-14 after 6^a, thus: 'Then he answered and spoke unto me saying, Those seven, they are the eyes,' etc. This makes a most excellent connexion. The seven lamps are symbols of the eyes of the Lord watching continually. And the question concerning the two olive trees follows naturally.

12. The v. seems to be simply an unnecessary repetition of v. 11, and modern scholars omit it. 14. The two anointed ones] lit. 'two sons of oil.' These are Joshua and Zerubbabel, priest and king, both anointed, both receiving all their grace and power from God.

6^b-10^a. These vv. come naturally at the end of the completed vision: so scholars place the section after v. 14, and read: 'This is the word of the LORD unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the LORD of hosts,' etc. (God's Spirit is sufficient; obstacles apparently insurmountable will disappear. Zerubbabel will bring forth the copestone, and complete the Temple amid joyful acclamations. 7. Grace unto it] i.e. May God bless it. 10^a. Scornful doubters shall, by this success, be put to shame. They shall see Zerubbabel moving the plumb-line to test the completed walls.

CHAPTER 5

THE SIXTH AND SEVENTH VISIONS

1-4. A flying roll inscribed with curses comes down upon the earth. The previous visions had promised many blessings to the people; and the sixth and seventh teach that wickedness will be removed from the land; for if evil still remained, the blessings would be worthless. The first part of this process consists in the punishment of evildoers. The flying roll signifies the sin of the evildoer coming home to roost.

5-11. THE SEVENTH VISION: A woman (typifying the besetting sins of Israel) is shut up in an ephah-measure, and carried off to the land of Shinar, the detested and sinful place, where she finds a fitting abode.

1. A flying roll] Rolls were of skin or parchment, on which all writing was inscribed. The document was rolled up much in the same way as a wall-map is rolled now. This roll was evidently unfolded, flying like a bird of prey, and seemed of enormous size (v. 2).

2. He] the attendant angel who is God's immediate messenger to Zechariah. Twenty cubits] over 30 ft.

3. Earth] RV 'land,' i.e. Palestine. For every one that stealeth, etc.] better, perhaps, 'for every thief shall be swept away from hence.' But the expressions are difficult. The exact meaning of the phrase 'on the one side according to it... on the other side according to it' (RV) is most obscure. LXX renders, 'For every thief shall suffer death.' Some scholars refer the phrases to the roll, which does not seem likely. Others, by a very slight change in the Heb., render, 'For every thief has been too long unpunished, and every (false) swearer has been too long unpunished.' It is probable that there is a reference to certain people who did not subscribe to the rebuilding of the Temple, swearing (falsely) that they had no money.

4. Shall remain] RV 'shall abide,' but better, 'shall roost.' The idea is still of this roll as a huge bird of prey, descending upon the home of the evildoer and utterly consuming it. Zechariah's aim is still to encourage his desponding countrymen. Never again will the nation, as a whole, suffer for sin; only the sinner and his house shall perish.

6. Ephah] the greatest measure among the Jews, a round vessel holding about 7 qds. This vision describes the fulfilment of the promise given in 3^o. Resemblance] A very slight change of one Heb. letter gives the reading, 'This is their transgression in all the land.' This makes much better sense. The prophet is referring to the deep consciousness of sin which weighs upon the people from the high priest downward.

7. A talent of lead] lit. 'a circle or round piece of lead,' the heavy lid of the ephah. The later use of the word is 'talent,' a Jewish weight somewhat over 1 cwt. When the lid was lifted, the woman was disclosed in the ephah. 8. Cast it into] RV, 'cast her down into.' The woman, typifying the sin of the nation, is thrust down into the ephah and covered with the lid. 9. The wind was in their wings] bore them along like long winged birds ('storks') on a windy day.

11. Shinar] i.e. Babylonia: see Gen 10¹⁰ 11² Isa 11¹¹. Here regarded as the counterpart of Zion and the proper home of all that is evil, especially of sins such as fraud and false swearing. The vision is remarkable. God not only forgives the sins of His people but carries them altogether away from their land, that they may deceive them no more. Sin is typified by the figure of a woman; but it is worthy of note that it is through women that the land is purified from its sin.

CHAPTER 6

THE EIGHTH VISION. THE SYMBOLIC CROWNING

1-8. Four war-chariots, with variously coloured horses, go forth to execute God's judgments against the enemies of oppressed Israel in different parts of the earth. Two, in particular, go northwards, to 'quiet His spirit' (i.e. to satisfy His anger) upon Babylon. 9-15. Zechariah is commanded to take gold and silver from the Temple offerings, and make a crown for Joshua the high priest. At the same time, the Messiah ('Branch') is again promised. Under Him the Temple will be completed with the help of people from afar, probably returned exiles.

1. It is noteworthy that the first vision showed God's universal providence in mercy (messengers coming from all parts of the earth), the last vision reveals God's universal providence in judgment (war chariots going forth in all directions). And I turned, and lifted] RV 'Then again I lifted.' In Heb. to 'turn' and do something is to do it 'again.' Chariots] used for military purposes, and also on state occasions, therefore symbolical of power and majesty. They are four because they go to the four quarters of the earth.

3. Grizzled and bay] lit. 'spotted, vigorous. It is difficult to explain the two adjectives. The first etymologically means 'spotted as with a hailstorm'; and those who see a significance in the colours of the horses connect hail with the judgment which the fourth chariot carries: cp. Rev 8⁷ 16²¹. The second adjective has, in reality, no reference to colour (see RM), and some scholars omit it. Grizzled] = 'grizzled,' 'grey.'

5. The four spirits of the heavens] RV 'winds' (the word for 'wind' in Heb. means also 'spirit,' i.e. breath); but would the prophet speak of winds 'standing before the Lord'? The addition of a single letter in the Heb. gives the following reading: 'These (i.e. the chariots and horses) go forth to the four winds of heaven after they have presented themselves before the Lord.' 6. North country] Babylonia. South country] Egypt. Egypt, like Babylon, was at this time part of the Persian empire. Cambyses having overcome the Egyptians in the battle of Pelusium in 527 B.C. Two of the chariots go north, a double doom on Babylon. But some scholars consider that the Heb. words for 'behind them' (RV 'after them') are a corruption for words meaning 'to the east.'

7. Through the earth] as a reserve force to go wherever they may be required, but some scholars read 'to the west.' Bay] or 'strong.' Some read 'red,' see RM.

The reading of the vision is somewhat complicated, but its meaning is clear. Jehovah will defend Judah against her enemies, and especially He will deprive Babylon of the power to do her harm.

8. Quieted my spirit in] lit. 'caused my spirit to rest in.' The meaning may be either,

(1) 'brought peace to,' or (2) 'sated my fury by stirring up trouble in.' The historical situation supports the second interpretation. Even while Cambyses was yet alive (in 522 B.C.) the magician Gautama, who pretended to be Smerdis, the brother of Cambyses, had been proclaimed king. Cambyses died of an accidental wound on his way to fight Gautama. The latter was in turn slain by Darius, who ascended the Persian throne in 521. Immediately revolts broke out in all parts of the empire, which were not subdued finally till 514.

9-15. A party of Jews had just come from Babylon. Zechariah is instructed to take part of the silver and gold which they have brought for the Temple, and to make a set of circlets for Joshua, the high priest. Thus he will more fully be a type of One to come, who is both Priest and King to His people.

11. Then take silver] RV 'yea, take of them silver.' Crowns] some read 'a crown.'

12, 13. These vv. are somewhat difficult. The simplest way out of the difficulty is to suppose that, after the word head in v. 11, the words 'of Zerubbabel and' have accidentally fallen out. This explains the use of the plural 'crowns' in vv. 11, 14, but it does not explain why only one of these rulers is addressed in vv. 12, 13. Many scholars hold that the crown is really for Zerubbabel, the civil ruler, whose name, for political reasons, has been suppressed, and that vv. 12, 13 refer to him, as fulfilling the prophecy of the Branch (see Isa 11¹) and completing the Temple. However this may be, the ultimate fulfilment of the prophecy is in Him, through whom we have the far more glorious Temple, 'not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'

13. And he shall be a priest] RM 'there shall be a priest.' If the preceding clauses refer to Zerubbabel, this would refer to Joshua. We should then have a clear meaning for the following sentence, 'and the counsel of peace shall be between them both,' i.e. these two (Joshua and Zerubbabel) would rule together in harmony. Thus these vv. give the same thought as the vision of the golden candlestick.

14. The crowns (RV 'crown') are to be laid up in the Temple, as a memorial of the generosity of the deputation which brought the silver and gold. Helem should probably be 'Heldai'; Hen seems to be a corruption of 'Josiah': see v. 10. 15. As a sign of the fulfilment of Zechariah's word, more people will come (from Babylon) to assist in completing the Temple. And this shall come to pass, if] better, 'and it shall come to pass that if.' The v. breaks off unfinished.

CHAPTER 7

WARNINGS FROM THE PAST

Chs. 7 and 8 go together, and were spoken on a date (fourth day of the ninth month in the fourth year of Darius) two years later than the series of visions described above, viz. in 518 B.C. (On contemporary events see on 6⁸.) They are Zechariah's answer to a question put to him by certain visitors to Jerusalem, who asked whether the fast observed by the Jews in the fifth month, in memory of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, should still be kept. Zechariah says, 'No; God demands not fasts, but observance of moral laws, by neglecting which your forefathers suffered punishment.' C. 8. God has assuredly come to dwell with His people. The Messianic age is at hand. Fast days will soon become joyful feast days; and even the heathen will desire to worship with the Jews.

1. In the fourth year of king Darius] 518 B.C. Chisleu] or 'Chisleu,' corresponds very nearly to December. 2. When they had sent unto the house of God Sherezer] RV 'now they of Beth-el had sent Sherezer.' The v. is difficult. Some scholars suggest the translation: 'Now Bethel, Sharezer, and Regem-melech had sent'; or, 'Now Bel-Sharezer sent Regem-melech and his men.' This latter is the reading favoured by those who think the deputation came from Babylon. But from what follows it is evident that the deputation was a local one—from Bethel rather than from Babylon. To pray before the LORD] RV 'to entreat the favour of God.'

3. Separating myself] The word is the root whence the term 'Nazirite' is derived. The fast involved abstinence from other things besides food and drink; see Lv 16^{29, 31}.

5. Fifth and seventh month] The fasts were four (see 8¹⁹), viz. in the fourth month commemorating the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39² 52^{6, 7}), in the seventh month for the murder of Gedaliah (2 K 25²³), in the tenth month for the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem (Jer 39¹), and specially in the fifth month when the Temple was burned (Jer 52¹²⁻¹⁴). But these fasts seemed now out of place. The form remained, but the spirit was gone.

7. Rather than lay stress on these mechanical devices of religious faith, they should study the words spoken by the old prophets, such as Amos and Hosea, before the exile, before the south land was denuded of its inhabitants. 8. Most scholars omit v. 8: the sense is preserved. V. 9 tells us what the former prophets said. 9, 10. Cp. Hos 6⁶ Isa 1 16-20 Mic 6 6-8 Jer 5 21-23.

11. Pulled away the shoulder] like an obstinate man refusing to listen to good advice, turning away quickly when a hand is laid upon his shoulder: cp. 'to give the cold shoulder.'

12. Hath sent] better, 'had sent.'

14. The prophet wishes to emphasise the truth, that to obey God's word is the supreme demand of religious life: cp. 1 S 15²². The rejection of God's message in days gone by brought desolation and exile. The true fast is to abstain from sin, and to listen to the voice of God.

CHAPTER 8

REITERATION OF GOD'S PROMISES CONCERNING JERUSALEM

The whole c. is made up of ten short oracles each introduced by the formula, 'Thus saith the LORD of hosts' (except v. 3). God has come to dwell with His people. Happiness and prosperity are in store for Jerusalem if it will do His will. All nations will seek to join in worshipping God in Jerusalem.

1. Again] RV 'and': there is no break in thought between the two chs. 2. I was jealous] better, 'I am jealous.' The word indicates strong emotion either for or against some object. In this case the context shows it is on behalf of Zion: 'I burn with zeal for the cause of Zion.' 3. A city of truth] RV 'The city of truth,' i.e. the faithful city: cp. Isa 1²⁶.

4, 5. A beautiful picture of a peaceful time. Amid so many wars and privations, old men and children had been comparatively rare in the ranks of the returned exiles, and even in the homes of Judæa. 6. If it be] Although it may seem incredible to the people, it is not impossible to God: cp. Pss 118²³ 126¹⁻⁴.

8. 'They shall be to me for a people': cp. Hos 2²³.

9. Prophets] i.e. Haggai and Zechariah, and perhaps others now unknown. The working of the v. is difficult. What the prophets had said is given at the end, viz. 'The Temple must be rebuilt.' The rebuilding of the Temple has progressed steadily in the two years. The prophet encourages the workers to go on: cp. Hag 2¹⁵⁻¹⁹. 10, 11. The strife and poverty of the early days, when the building of the Temple was neglected, are contrasted with the peace and prosperity that are to come. 10. Hire] i.e. wages. The affliction] RV 'the adversary,' probably the Samaritans and Ammonites, who plundered the helpless Jews: cp. Ezr 8²². 12. Nature also will contribute to the glory of the Messianic age—a frequent feature of Messianic prophecy: cp. Isa 35¹ 55^{12, 13}. The seed shall be prosperous] RV 'there shall be the seed of peace.'

13. A curse among the heathen] a subject of reproach, something of which they spoke evil: see Jer 24⁹. 14, 15. God's promises of punishment were fulfilled; so surely also will be His promises of blessing.

16, 19. In these vv. the prophet once more answers the question concerning fasts. 'Let them alone,' he says, 'and follow the principles of truth and righteousness, and God shall turn your fast-days into feast-days.' 16. In your gates] The gate was the market-place where all business transactions took place: see Ruth 4¹⁻¹¹. Execute the judgment of truth and peace] be fair-minded and peaceable.

20, 23. The gathering in of the nations was never adequately fulfilled in regard to Jerusalem or the Temple then approaching completion; but the prophecy foretells most strikingly the success of the kingdom of Christ. It was the dream of all Hebrew prophecy: cp. Mic 4² Isa 2³.

23. Ten men] used for a large number: cp. Gn 31⁷ Lv 26³⁶ Neh 4¹². Take hold of the skirt] the involuntary action of one who wishes to be listened to: cp. 1S 15²⁷ Isa 4¹. How earnestly have men sought salvation! They find it in Him—a member of the Jewish race—who is the Saviour of the world.

CHAPTER 9

JUDGMENTS ON THE NATIONS. THE PRINCE OF PEACE

1-8. A judgment is about to fall on Damascus, Hamath, Tyre, Sidon, and the cities of the Philistines. A remnant from Philistia will acknowledge God. God will encamp around His sanctuary. 9, 10. The coming of Messiah and His kingdom of peace. 11-17. Hope for Israel. God will enable her to contend successfully with Greece. He will aid and bless her.

1. Burden] oracle, or prophecy: see Jer 23³³⁻⁴⁰. In the land] RV 'upon the land.'

Hadrach] not mentioned elsewhere in the Bible. On the Assyrian tablets it is associated with Damascus, and must have been somewhere in that quarter, in the valley of the Orontes. The various places mentioned follow the course pursued by Alexander the Great in his campaign in 332 B.C., viz. through Syria, Phœnicia, and Philistia. The rest thereof] RV 'its' (the prophecy's) 'resting-place.' When the eyes of man, etc.] better, 'for the Lord hath an eye upon man (i.e. the heathen) and all the tribes of Israel.' If the prophecy belongs to the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. (see Intro.), then the reference is to the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, in whose territories lay all the places mentioned.

2. Hamath] a city in the valley of the Orontes, in Upper Syria. It was renamed Epiphaneia by Antiochus Epiphanes. Shall border thereby] RV 'which bordereth thereon.' Tyre (Tyros) and Sidon were famous cities on the coast of Syria, inhabited by the Phœnicians, who were renowned, like their descendants the Carthaginians, for their cunning. Though it be very wise] RV 'she is very wise.' This false wisdom of the world God will visit in judgment. 4. In the sea] i.e. destroy her commerce. 5. Ashkelon, etc.] cities of the Philistines. After taking Tyre, Alexander marched down the coast to these cities. He captured Gaza after a two months' siege. For her expectation shall be ashamed] i.e. her pride will be humbled.

6. A bastard] probably a son of a mixed race. The idea evidently is that the city would be depopulated by war, and aliens would be installed by the conquerors. 7. This mixed race will be purified from their idolatry. The second half of this v. might be rendered as follows: 'But there shall be a remnant (i.e. of the Philistines) for our God, and one shall be as a chief in Judah, and Ekron (shall be) as a Jebusite.' Jebusite] The Jebusites were the ancient inhabitants of Jerusalem. The word is used for 'a native of Jerusalem.' 8. Because of the army] RM 'for a guard or garrison.' Because of him, etc.] RV 'that none pass through or return.' Oppressor] better, perhaps, 'invader'; the reference is either to Alexander or some similar conqueror. Have I seen with mine eyes] viz. the iniquity of the oppressing heathen.

9. The advent of the Prince of Peace, a striking contrast to a ravaging warrior like Alexander the Great, who visited the surrounding nations with fire and sword. Just, and having salvation] better, '(declared to be) righteous and victorious.' Riding upon an ass] the symbol, not of lowliness, but of peace, as the horse was of war: cp. Mt 21, etc.

10. The chariot . . the horse . . the battle bow] These too-familiar objects will have no place in Messiah's kingdom. He shall speak peace unto the nations. From sea even to sea] from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean. From the river] the Euphrates.

11. To the Jews in exile specially does the message of peace come. By that well-known relationship (covenant) with God, sealed by the blood of sacrifices, making them His own adopted people, He will restore them all to their own city (Jerusalem). By the blood of thy covenant] the blood sprinkled in the sacrifices whereby the covenant was ratified: cp. Ex 24⁸. Pit] an empty cistern: cp. Gn 37²².

12. Strong hold] probably Jerusalem.

Prisoners of hope] i.e. the Jews, who by their covenant with God had a sure hope of deliverance. Double] cp. Isa 61⁷; evidently a reference to restoration from exile.

13. The prophet again plunges into a vision of war. The vision is figurative; God is to use Judah as a bow, and fit Ephraim as an arrow to the bow. Some who assign this prophecy to an early date believe that the words against thy sons, O Greece, may be a gloss of a later scribe.

Greece] Heb. Javan, so called from Javan, a son of Japheth, the supposed ancestor of the Europeans: cp. Gn 10^{2,4}. According to Sayce, the word 'Javan' (to indicate 'Greeks') is found in various forms on the monuments both of Egypt and Assyria from a very early date, and is the same word as 'Ionian' (Ἰων). The thought of Greece as a power hostile to Judaism would hardly be possible prior to the Macedonian invasion of Alexander in the 4th cent. B.C. From that age onward, even in Jerusalem itself, the great struggle went on between Judaism and the invading influence of Greek culture. This struggle was specially keen, at the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. From a Jewish standpoint the Maccabæan wars were really between Jews and Greeks: cp. Jer 51²⁰.

14, 15. And subdue with sling stones] RV 'and shall tread down the sling stones'; but the text is obscure. It is a vision of war as a storm in which God is the moving Power: cp. Hab 3 Ps 29. 15^b. By a slight change in the Heb. text we might render, 'And they shall drink blood like wine, and they shall be filled (with it) like bowls, and as the corners of the altar (are filled with the blood of the sacrifices).' 16, 17. God will save Israel in honour and prosperity. His goodness] RM 'prosperity.' The pronoun is uncertain, but the reference is to Israel.

CHAPTER 10

RESTORATION OF GOD'S PEOPLE

1, 2. A warning to trust in God and not in sorcerers. 3-7. The Lord will cast out the evil guides of the people, and under new leaders Ephraim and Judah will be victorious. 8-12. Ephraim will be gathered, but Egypt and Assyria will be humbled.

1. The connexion with 9¹⁷ is very slight, fertility demanding the necessary rain. Some believe that the passage is entirely independent. The time of the latter rain] The early rain was in October, when the ground would be broken up for sowing; the latter rain was in Feb.-March, after the crops had sprung up, and was necessary for an abundant harvest. Even in the season it is wise to ask God for rain. Bright clouds] RV 'lightnings.'

2. Idols] 'teraphim,' household images, probably in human form: cp. 1 S 13¹⁶. They were used for purposes of divination, and were probably connected originally with ancestor worship. They went their way] RV 'they' (i.e. the people) 'go their way,' as sheep when the pasture fails in one place go on to another.

3-12. The whole passage is difficult. A good conjecture summarises it as follows: God will visit Judah, in whom will arise brave and wise leaders. By their means the lost Ten Tribes (Joseph . . . Ephraim, vv. 6, 7), who are still in exile, will have a glorious restoration to Gilead and Lebanon.

3. Shepherds] probably religious teachers are here meant: see Intro. Punished the goats] RV 'will punish the he-goats,' i.e. the false guides of the people: cp. Jer 50⁸. Hath made] RV 'shall make.' Evidently the word shepherd, closing v. 2, suggests an attack on the worthless shepherds, religious teachers, perhaps, of foreign extraction or of foreign sympathies. The he-goats may be ethnarchs or civil rulers in Jerusalem. 4. Out of him] better, 'from him,' i.e. from Judah. Came] better, 'shall come.' Corner] i.e. corner-stone. Nail] rather, 'tent-peg': something that will hold firm. Oppressor] RV 'ruler,' i.e. one who keeps guard over workmen.

6. House of Joseph] i.e. Israel, as represented by Ephraim and Manasseh, the two leading tribes. Bring them again] may refer to the many Israelites in exile in Egypt (v. 10) and elsewhere.

8. I will hiss for them] i.e. whistle to attract them: cp. Isa 5²⁶. God will bring back Israel to their own land. 9. I will sow them] As it stands this seems to contradict what follows as well as what goes before. With a slight change of Heb. it is possible to render: 'I scattered them among the nations, but in far countries they remember me. And they will bring up their children and come back.' 10. Assyria] Asshur might here be used of the Seleucid dominions in Syria and Persia; see Intro. 11. He] i.e. Israel. There will be a new exodus for God's people. Sea with affliction] better, perhaps, 'the narrow sea,' i.e. the arm of the Red Sea through which, once before, they passed. The river] i.e. Nile. Assyria and Egypt are chosen as representing the great world forces which harassed God's people. 12. Them] i.e. Israel, to whose glorious restoration the thoughts of the prophet return. Shall walk up and down in his (i.e. the Lord's) name] LXX renders, 'In His name shall they boast themselves.'

CHAPTER 11

THE PARABLE OF THE SHEPHERDS

The perplexing nature of the prophecies in this c. renders exposition difficult, especially as we cannot be sure of the circumstances. Apparently, however, the passage deals with misrule in Jerusalem, either of worthless high priests, or of cruel foreign rulers, or of both, who are spoken of as shepherds: see Intro.

1-3. Another storm of war bursts apparently over northern Israel. 4-14. The people reject their good ruler, and the prophet acts the part of a good shepherd tending the flock and defending it, but is held in contempt by the people. 15-17. The prophet at God's command assumes the garb and insignia of a worthless shepherd, to signify that God will give them into the hand of a cruel and careless ruler. To this most scholars add, as a continuation, 13⁷⁻⁹. The bad ruler will speedily perish. Two-thirds of the people will die, but a remnant will be saved.

1. Open thy doors, O Lebanon] Make way for the invaders. 2. Forest of the vintage] better, 'the impenetrable forest.' Mighty] RV 'goodly ones,' i.e. nobles; but the phrase is doubtful and spoils the whole thought of the passage. Some omit it. 3. The pride of [Jordan] the rank undergrowth where lions had their home: cp. Jer 49¹⁹, where 'swelling' is really 'thickets.'

4. Flock of the slaughter] RV 'flock of slaughter,' i.e. destined or reared for slaughter. This might point to the cruel oppressions and martyrdoms in the times of the Maccabees.

5, 6. According to some views the possessors (RM 'buyers') are those ethnarchs and high priests in Jerusalem who were merely puppets of the Seleucid sovereigns. The latter farmed out the high offices to the highest bidder, who in turn oppressed the people by fraud and extortion.

7. The prophet takes up the office of shepherd (cp. Jer 25¹ Ezk 3, 4), but finds his task too difficult. He pities the poor oppressed people, but feels, at the same time, that they are so ignorant of their own good as to be unable to appreciate a beneficent ruler. But see 12²¹. Beauty] better, 'Favour,' a symbol of God's protecting care. Bands] i.e. 'unity,' a symbol of His desire to make peace among the people. 8. This is an allusion to some event of the time, of which nothing is now known. 9. The good shepherd leaves the flock. According to a recent view the good shepherd, who in despair abandoned the flock, was Hyrcanus, the son of Joseph (see Jos. 'Ant.' 12. 4), who may have been paid to leave Jerusalem (vv. 12, 13), but at a price so small that he threw it into the treasury in disgust.

10. The prophet declares that God has broken His covenant of mercy with Israel.

People] better, 'nation,' i.e. Israel regarded as tribes. 11. The poor of the flock] those wretched ones whom the prophet had been trying specially to instruct and help. But perhaps we should read, 'the dealers in the sheep.'

12. The prophet, personating a hired shepherd, asks for his wages, in order to see what value they put upon his services. His hearers insult him by offering him the price of a slave (Ex 21³²). 13. Unto the potter] better, 'into the treasury' (see RM), by the change of one letter in the Heb. A goodly price that I was prised at of them] a sarcastic parenthesis. St. Matthew applies the incident to the case of Judas Iscariot (see Mt 27⁹), but refers it to Jeremiah. 14. The last hope of uniting broken and distracted Israel vanishes. The prophet abandons his task in despair.

15. Instead he will personate a worthless ruler who will tear and destroy the sheep. According to some this worthless shepherd was Menelaus, a high priest whose rivalry with Jason, also a claimant for the priesthood, brought about the great oppression of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes, 171 B.C. In that case the good shepherd in 13⁷⁻⁹ may refer in the first instance to Jason, who represented the patriotic, as Menelaus represented the foreign, party. Jason, however, was in sympathy with foreign fashions, and he ultimately died in exile. On the other hand, Hyrcanus may be intended. 16. Claws] RV 'hoofs.' The idea is the cracking of the hoofs of the sheep by being overdriven. 17. Idol] RV 'worthless.' The word is used of idols, because of their worthlessness: cp. Jn 10^{12, 13}.

C. 13. 7-9. My fellow] one who has the same interests. Smite the shepherd] cp. 1K 22¹⁷, and the most fitting application of the words to our Lord (Mt 26³¹). The whole section (chs. 11, 13⁷⁻⁹) would most fittingly apply to the year 171 B.C., when Menelaus, with the aid of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, usurped the high priesthood in Jerusalem and Jason was expelled. Feuds and bloodshed followed, culminating in a terrible massacre, and the deportation of thousands of Jews by Antiochus. The third] i.e. a remnant.

CHAPTER 12

THE DELIVERANCE OF JERUSALEM

Many scholars believe that in chs. 12-14 (omitting 13⁷⁻⁹) we have a third separate prophecy, the oldest in the book of Zechariah, written subsequent to the death of king Josiah, 609 B.C. (cp. the mourning in the valley of Megiddon, 12¹¹), but prior to the fall of the kingdom of Judah, 586 B.C. For this view there are some strong arguments—(a) frequent references to the House of David (12^{7, 8, 10, 12} 13¹); (b) Judah and Jerusalem represent the whole nation; (c) idolatry is rampant (13²); (d) prophets are in evil repute (13²⁻⁶; cp. Jer 23⁹⁻¹⁰); (e) Jerusalem is besieged (12² 14²; cp. 2K 24¹⁰ 25¹).

Others produce arguments, perhaps more conclusive, in favour of a much later date. On the applicability of the chs. to the times of the Maccabees see Intro.

1-9. The natives gather to the siege of Jerusalem, but are miraculously smitten by the Lord, who comes to her help. Judah, at first taking part with the nations, perceives that God is fighting for Jerusalem, takes the side of the latter, and shares her salvation. 10-14. A national mourning.

1. Burden] see 9¹. God's omnipotence is the guarantee that this prophecy will be fulfilled. 2. Trembling] RV 'reeling.' The nations assailing Jerusalem would stagger like a drunken man. The figure is common: cp. Isa 51¹⁷ 24²⁰ Jer 51⁷. Against Judah and against Jerusalem] This does not make sense; and most scholars, omitting two letters, render, 'Even Judah shall beat the siege of Jerusalem.' But, as no time is known when Judah was actively opposed to Jerusalem, it is simpler to read: 'And there shall be a siege against Jerusalem.' 3. Those nations that take in hand to capture and rule Jerusalem will find it difficult. Probably the idea is that of raising and carrying a boulder that is too heavy for a man's strength. 4. Every horse of the people] RV 'peoples,' i.e. nations attacking Jerusalem. The eyes of the Lord will be opened to look favourably upon His people, but their enemies will be blinded.

5, 6. The mutual reliance and helpfulness of Judah and Jerusalem. The victory is to be with Jerusalem, so that Judah may not boast over Jerusalem. The contrast between these two points to a post-exilic date, when the social and economic ideals of the city differed from those of the peasant population.

Jerusalem shall be inhabited again] 100,000 Jews were deported from Jerusalem by Ptolemy, king of Egypt, in 321 B.C.; 80,000 were either killed or carried away captive by Antiochus in 167 B.C. 6, 7. These vv. would refer more fittingly to the latter period, and the subsequent uprising of the Maccabees: cp. 1 Mac. On the Maccabean revolt and the causes which led to it see Jos. 'Ant.' 12. 5, 6, and 1 Mac. Judas Maccabeus drove the Syrians from the surrounding country of Judah before attempting to relieve Jerusalem.

8. The angel of the LORD] that led Israel in the wilderness: cp. Ex 23²⁰.

10. Even repentance comes of the grace of God. Upon me] better, 'unto me.' The text is obscure. Some read 'him,' when the reference would be to some unknown martyr in the cause of Jerusalem. 11. The mourning is likened to some great national lamentation. Some connect it with the worship of Adonis (Tammuz, Ezk 8¹⁴), taking Hadadrimmon as one of the titles of Adonis. Others refer it to a mourning over Rimmon, the Assyrian thunder god; others ascribe the mourning to the sacrifice of children to this god; and many take it as the mourning at the death of Josiah, who was slain at Megiddo in the plain of Esdraelon. In any case, the ultimate application of the prophecy to the sufferings and death of Christ is most appropriate.

Megiddon] Elsewhere Megiddo—in central Palestine, the battlefield of Israel. Here fought Barak, Joshua, Saul, and Josiah; here the Jews believed would be the final battlefield of the nations—the Har-Magedon of Rev 16¹⁶. Such a place where so many had been slain might well be a place of mourning.

12-14. Every family apart] indicating the deep personal significance of the mourning. Such had doubtless been the mourning for Josiah, whose death was one of the greatest calamities that could have befallen the Jewish nation. The depth and reality of the mourning is shown by the singling out of certain leading families. Nathan] a son of David and Bathsheba. Levi] a son of Jacob, and progenitor of the priestly tribe which bears his name.

Shimei] son of Gershon (Ex 6¹⁷ Nu 3¹¹). LXX reads, 'the family of Simeon.'

PURIFICATION OF JERUSALEM

Important results follow this great act of national sorrow. 1. The land is purged of sin; 2^a, of idols; 2^b-6, of prophets, who as a class have fallen into disrepute, and who henceforth will be ashamed of their office.

1. The idea of water as a symbol of spiritual cleansing was familiar in Jewish thought: cp. Ezk 36²⁵ 47¹. The Messianic reference is obvious. 2. Idols] Idolatry was never rampant in Israel after the exile. Those who maintain a post-exilic date for this prophecy refer to the Maccabean age, when Greek customs and Greek idolatry were common even in Jerusalem (1 Mac 1⁵⁴). The unclean spirit] which led men to sin. 3. The office of prophet will be so hateful as to be a dangerous occupation. Prophecy had become utterly distrusted, because it had been degraded by men who spoke smooth things rather than truth.

4. Rough garment] RV 'hairy mantle,' either an untanned sheep-skin, or a cloak of camel's hair, such as the Baptist wore. 5. Man taught me to keep cattle] better, with slight change in the Heb., 'the ground has been my possession.' I am so occupied with manual labour, I do not cultivate prophecy: cp. Am 7¹⁴. 6. In thine hands] Heb. 'between thine hands,' probably referring to self-mutilation practised in idolatrous rites: cp. Jer 48³⁷ 1 K 18²⁸. These wounds, says the accused person, I received when frolicking with my companions.

On vv. 7-9 see at the end of c. 11.

CHAPTER 14

THE JUDGMENT OF THE HEATHEN. EXALTATION OF JERUSALEM

This c. has the appearance of a late work. It has all the general characteristics of the style of literature known to students in the book of Enoch, and popular in the Jewish church about the beginning of the Christian era. The terrible punishment of the heathen (v. 12), and the ceremonial purity of Jerusalem (vv. 20, 21), are typical of the narrower phases of late Judaism.

1, 2. Jerusalem again assaulted and taken.

3-7. The Lord descends to the help of Jerusalem, and strange phenomena follow. 8-21. Then comes the Messianic age; the face of nature is changed; the heathen are subdued; Jerusalem, restored, becomes the centre of worship, and all therein are consecrated to the Lord.

1. Lo! a day is coming by the instrumentality of the LORD, i.e. a judgment day. Thy spoil] The city is taken and sacked. 2. Cp. Josh 3². 3. Shall the LORD go forth] An apocalyptic vision, common to later Jewish literature. 4. An earthquake heralds the presence of the Lord, cleaving the Mount of Olives in two parts: cp. Isa 29⁶ Ezk 38^{19, 20}. 5. To the valley of the mountains] RV 'by the valley of my mountains.' This text is obscure. Would they flee if God came to help them? Azal] RV 'Azel,' has been identified with Beth-ezel (Mic 1¹¹), but this is doubtful. Others make the word an adverb, 'very near.' The earthquake] not mentioned in the historical books, but in Am 1¹. Josephus describes some of its results ('Ant.' 9. 10. 4). 6. The light shall not be clear, nor dark] i.e. a murky day. Cp. the effect of modern volcanic eruptions. Others render, 'in that day there shall be neither heat nor cold nor frost.' 7. One day] i.e. a unique day. At evening time] When one would expect the deep darkness to settle down, it will grow clear. The calamities will have an end.

8. Now begin the blessings of the Messianic kingdom. Living waters] flowing perennially, an inestimable blessing in parched Eastern lands: cp. Isa 35⁷ Rev 22¹. Former . . hinder] RV 'eastern . . western,' i.e. Dead Sea . . Mediterranean. 9. The universality of Messiah's kingdom: 'the LORD shall be one, and his name one' (RV). 10. As a plain] RV 'as the Arabah,' i.e. the great plain which stretched from the borders of Palestine to the Red Sea.

Geba] marked the limit of northern Judah (2 K 23⁸). Rimmon] a city in the extreme S. on the borders of Edom. And it] RV 'and she,' i.e. Jerusalem. Inhabited] RV 'shall dwell.' The idea is that even the surrounding country would be depressed in order that Jerusalem might be more conspicuous. Benjamin's gate] on the NW. of the city. The first gate (some render the 'oldest' gate) and the corner gate were probably in the E. The tower of Hananeel] RV 'Hananel,' was part of the Temple castle in the extreme NE. The site of the king's winepresses is unknown.

11. Utter destruction] RV 'curse,' or 'ban.' Jerusalem had hitherto seemed under a curse. Now all this would pass away.

12. The ban in most awful form would turn rather upon the nations who assail Jerusalem. Such hatred of the heathen is characteristic of Jewish apocalypse, and arose in great measure from the cruelties and indignities suffered by the Jews in post-exilic times. 13, 14. A panic will fall on the enemies of Jerusalem, and all their spoil will be left a prey to the Jews. But many think that these two vv. should stand nearer the beginning of the c. If we take v. 15 after v. 12 a much better sense is secured.

16. Some take this v. as pointing to a late date, when the Jews of the dispersion went up to the feasts: cp. the Pilgrim Psalms, especially Ps 122. The feast of tabernacles] was especially a thanksgiving for the harvest. So the nations which do not keep that feast at Jerusalem will be punished by lack of rain (v. 17), and consequent failure of harvest.

18. That have no rain] RV 'neither shall it be upon them.' Both phrases are unintelligible. They are due to an attempt to account for the word not, which is omitted in LXX. Omitting it the v. runs simply: 'and if the family of Egypt go not up and come not, on them shall be the plague,' etc. Egypt is not dependent on rain. Her punishment will therefore be plague.

20. Bells] here only in OT. HOLINESS] RV 'HOLY.' Pots] This seems to refer to the ash-pans used for receiving the ashes off the altar: cp. Ex 27³ 38³ 1 K 7^{40, 45}. These will be as holy as the bowls, probably the golden basins used to hold the sacred blood of the sacrifices in the Temple: cp. Neh 7⁷⁰ 1 K 7⁵⁰ Jer 52¹⁹. 21. Everything in Jerusalem will be specially consecrated to the Lord. The idea of ceremonial and outward holiness is usually considered a feature of later Judaism. On the abuse of this idea, cp. Mt 23²⁵.

The Canaanite] RV 'a Canaanite,' RM 'trafficker,' i.e. any person who is there simply to make money by trading rather than to worship: cp. Mt 21¹²⁻¹⁴.

MALACHI

INTRODUCTION

1. Author. Of the author of this book nothing is known apart from the book itself. Even the name 'Malachi' is not in reality a proper name at all, but a common noun with the possessive pronoun of the first pers. sing. appended, signifying 'My Messenger.' It has indeed been supposed that the word is a contraction of Malachijah ('Messenger of Jehovah'), but it is improbable that any man ever bore such a name. The oldest Jewish tradition, though without adequate reason, identifies the author of this book with 'Ezra the Scribe,' understanding the word 'Malachi' as an honourable title conferred by Jehovah upon His prophet: cp. Hag 1¹³ Mal 2⁷.

The headings of the various sections of the prophetic books generally bear evidence of being the work of later editors, and it is probable that Mal 1¹ is from the same hand as Zech 9¹ 12¹. Since the most striking prophecy in this book is that in 3¹ (cp. Mt 11¹⁰ Mk 1² Lk 1⁷⁰), it is not improbable that the book, being anonymous, came to be known as 'The prophecy of "My Messenger" (Malachi),' whence the idea arose that 'Malachi' was a proper name.

2. Date. The date of this book may be partly inferred from the fact that the head of the Jewish state is termed 'governor' (1⁸, cp. Hag 1¹ Neh 2^{7,9}), the title 'King' being used of Jehovah (1¹⁴), as in the post-exilic Psalms. The only political event referred to is the devastation of Edom, the enemy of Israel (1^{3,4}), which is adduced as a proof of Jehovah's love for His people. There is reason to suppose that 'the day of Jerusalem' (Ps 137⁷) is not the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, but the disaster referred to in Neh 1³, when the jealousy of the neighbouring peoples having been aroused by an attempt to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, an attack had been made on the city (Ezr 4²³), in which the Edomites had particularly displayed their animosity. Malachi (as we may call the prophet) would thus be a contemporary of Nehemiah's, an inference which is confirmed by the substance of his book, which is directed against the same evils that Nehemiah tried to reform.

It is probable that the law-book of Malachi comprised only Deuteronomy and the combined work of the Jehovist and Elohist, the Priestly Code having not yet been published in Palestine. From this it may be inferred that Malachi prophesied before the second visit of Nehemiah in 433 B.C. In this case the general depression which he represents as due to the apparent failure of Jehovah to vindicate the right may be easily accounted for by the disappointment which the godly in Jerusalem experienced when the first reforms of Nehemiah and Ezra proved abortive.

3. Form and Style. Although the book of Malachi evidently had originally a literary form, it is, to Western ideas at least, faulty in arrangement, and it has not improbably suffered somewhat in transmission. The prophet seems to state ideas as they occur to him, paying little or no attention to their logical sequence. Thus we should have expected that the section 3⁷⁻¹² would follow 1¹¹, while 3^{13-4³} is parallel to 2^{17-3⁶}. In its style the book is peculiar. It is more argumentative than any other book of the O.T., the arguments being developed by a series of imaginary objections brought against the prophet's assertion.

4. Readers. The people addressed throughout the book are professedly religious people, who, it would seem, are divided into two classes: (1) the sincerely religious, who have lost heart through the prevailing wickedness, and are beginning to question Jehovah's goodness; (2) the worldly and covetous, who are religious only in name.

5. Contents. The argument of the book may be briefly stated as follows: Jehovah, in punishing the malicious enemy of Israel, has vindicated His claim to be the lover of Israel (1²⁻⁵); but He is not treated by Israel with the respect due either to a father or to a master (1⁶). In particular, the priests perform their ministrations with slovenly indifference; the victims offered are a disgrace to the altar; and it would be better to omit the sacrifices altogether (1⁶⁻¹⁰); Jehovah does not need the ministrations of Israel, for even among the Gentiles throughout the world He has those who serve Him (1¹¹); let it be recognised that Jehovah is a great King, and will not accept a paltry offering (1¹²⁻¹⁴); the priests must repent, or punishment will overtake them (2¹⁻⁸); Jehovah has made a covenant with Levi, and appointed him His messenger to the people (2⁴⁻⁷); but Levi has abused his privilege, and distorted Jehovah's teaching, and lost the respect of the people (28.⁹); the laity, too, have sinned in that they show lack of brotherly love (2¹⁰), and are contaminated by the heathen (2¹¹), for which sin they will be punished (2¹²); their prayers are vain, for they come to the altar with the sin of divorce upon them (2¹³⁻¹⁶); Jehovah has, moreover, been wronged by the people's lack of faith (2¹⁷); He has not forgotten, and will come as the prophets have said (3¹); but the day of His coming will be a time of crisis, and will overwhelm the sinners (3²⁻⁶); let the people show their repentance by the payment of their tithes, and they will at once find a blessing (3⁷⁻¹²); Jehovah has been charged with faithlessness, but He has not forgotten, and His Day will make manifest the difference between those who obey Him and those who disregard Him (3¹³⁻¹²), when the former shall triumph over the latter (4³); let the Law of Moses be had in remembrance (4⁴), and let heed be given to the prophet who will come in this crisis as Elijah came of old (4⁵); thus will the divisions which now break up families be healed, otherwise a curse will come upon the land (4⁶).

6. Teaching. There is no Messianic prophecy in Malachi in the ordinary meaning of the word. Malachi does not look for a king upon the throne of David to deliver Israel, but for the restoration of that communion with Jehovah which existed when Jehovah led His people in a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night.

In his theology Malachi is one of the most advanced thinkers of the OT., albeit he does not entirely free himself from OT. limitations. He not only recognises Jehovah as universal God, but recognises that the worship which the heathen perform, so far as it is sincere, is the worship of Jehovah. He lays stress also upon personal religion, and represents Jehovah not only as Father of the nation (2¹⁰), but as showing in a special sense a fatherly care of the righteous (3¹⁷). He is convinced that 'God is His own Interpreter, and He will make it plain.' He develops the teaching of Deuteronomy in a striking way, dwelling upon the necessity alike of the written Scripture and the spoken word, taking Moses as typical of the one, and Elijah of the other.

It is characteristic of Malachi's teaching as a whole, that it lays stress on the weightier matters of the law, judgment and mercy and faith, coupled with due reverence and devotion in the external expression of religion. It finds therefore its fulfilment, its completion, in the teaching of the greatest Prophet since the world began, who said, 'These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.'

CHAPTER 1

JEHOVAH'S LOVE AND HIS PEOPLE'S INGRATITUDE

1. Burden] RM 'oracle'; properly, 'that which is lifted up,' hence in this connexion 'utterance'; but with play on other meaning 'burden' in Jer 23³⁸ (RM). 2. Wherein hast thou loved us? i.e. 'Wherein hast thou shewn thy love?' So in v. 3, I hated Esau means 'I have shewn myself hostile to Esau.' 'Esau' and 'Jacob' here stand for the nations Edom and Israel, not for the patriarchs. 3. The desolation of Edom here referred to had been already adduced by an unknown prophet (Isa 63) as a proof of Jehovah's care for Israel. Edom was devastated by an invasion of Arabs who for more than a century had been pressing into Palestine: cp. Ezk 25^{4,5,10}. Dragons] RV 'jackals.' 4. We are impoverished] RV 'we are beaten down.' The text is somewhat uncertain: cp. Isa 9¹⁰. Thus saith the LORD] In Heb. 'to think' is often represented by the verb 'to say.' A Hebrew does not hesitate to represent what he believes to be true, and therefore the 'thought' of Jehovah, as 'spoken' by Jehovah. In such a phrase there is no idea of a revelation by vision. 5. The LORD will be (RV 'be') magnified] The Heb. may express either a prayer, as in Ps 40¹⁶, or a statement. Here the meaning is probably that Jehovah habitually manifests His greatness.

From (more literally 'above') the border] Jehovah's activity is not confined to Jerusalem.

6. The priests especially stand to Jehovah in the relation of sons and servants.

7. Polluted] i.e. not actually unclean, but worthless, common: cp. Ezr 2⁶². Bread] sacrificial offerings generally: cp. Lv 21⁶. Table] the altar, not merely the table of shewbread.

8. Cp. Dt 15²¹ 17¹ Lv 22²⁰. Blind . . lame . . sick] i.e. animals unlawful for sacrifice.

It is not evil?] RV 'it is no evil!'

Governor] Heb. Peḥā. The term is applied to Zerubbabel (Hag 1^{1,14}). It is impossible to say whether Malachi has a Jewish or Persian governor in view. Accept thy person] more correctly, 'favour thee.' 9. This hath beer, etc.] Translate the latter part of this verse partly corrected from LXX: 'When this hath been done by you, shall I accept,' etc.

10. RV 'Oh that there were one among you that would shut the doors, that ye might not kindle fire on mine altar in vain!' i.e. Sacrifices so offered are worthless; better to let the altar fire go out and abstain from sacrifice.

11. Shall be (RV 'is') great] Jehovah does not need the worthless worship of lip-serving Jews, for even among the Gentiles, who are accounted heathen, He has those who worship Him: cp. Ac 10^{34,35}. Incense shall be (RV 'is') offered] The sacrifices of the Gentiles, when offered with sincere devotion, are offered to Jehovah's 'name': cp. Ac 17²³. 14. Cp. Lv 22^{19, 20}. The title 'King' is applied to Jehovah in post-exilic writings composed when the Jews had not an earthly king.

Dreadful] RV 'terrible'; better, 'had in reverence.'

CHAPTER 2

THE DEGENERACY OF THE PRIESTHOOD

1. A reminder to the priests that they are to blame for the laxity denounced in 1^{13, 11}. They are responsible for the offering of fit victims, which in some cases it was their duty to provide.

3. I will corrupt your seed] RV 'I will rebuke the seed for your sake'; but the threat of a curse on the crops does not appear to be specially applicable to the priests. A very slight change in the Heb. which has been suggested, gives the admirable sense. 'I will cut off your arm' (cp. 1S 2³¹); i.e. I will make you powerless: cp. Ps 37¹⁷.

The dung of your solemn feasts (RV 'sacrifices') the offal of the animals slain for sacrifices, which at the three great feasts of the year would be very numerous, and a source of great gain to the priests.

The words rendered upon your faces do not necessarily mean more than 'in your presence.' To scatter offal and filth in a person's presence would be an insult to him: cp. Dt 23¹⁴. Malachi seems to mean that the fastidious priests, who now hold aloof while the Temple servants clear away the offal of the sacrifices, will no longer meet with outward respect from the people who even now despise them (2⁹), and who will treat them with less reverence than the humblest of Temple servants. The last words of the v. are obscure and possibly corrupt. They perhaps mean, 'You shall be taken away from your place of honour in the Temple to the place where the offal is taken.'

4. Cp. v. 1. This charge is given to the priests that they may repent, and that so the covenant with Levi may be confirmed to them.

5. Lit. 'My covenant was with him; the life and the peace I gave unto him; fear and he feared me.' 6. Cp. the ideal priesthood described in Dt 33⁸⁻¹¹. 7. To Malachi, as to Haggai (2¹¹), the law is not yet completely crystallised into a book, but means the priests' decisions on points submitted to them. Messenger] cp. Hag 1¹³. 8. Ye have caused many to stumble] i.e. by giving unjust decisions the priests have brought many to ruin. With the charge of partiality in v. 9 contrast the ideal of Dt 33⁹, where it is represented as a priest's duty to give his decisions without regard to his nearest relatives: cp. Mt 10³⁷.

9. Cp. the whole section, 1S 2²⁸⁻³⁰, which was probably written about this period.

10. Malachi seems to have in view mainly such evils as are described in Neh 5. His argument here seems somewhat inconsistent with his argument in 1²⁴, since one God had created both Esau and Jacob; but it is an inconsistency natural enough in the as yet undeveloped teaching. A man must learn to love his brother before he can love his enemy.

11. The mention of Israel is quite out of place in this v. The word has probably arisen by a scribe's blunder from Jerusalem, which it somewhat resembles in Hebrew. The daughter of a strange god must mean either a foreign nation with which Judah has entered into some compact, whether political or religious (by which some alliance or understanding with the Samaritans might be intended); or the text must be corrected by the insertion of one letter, so that for 'daughter' we should read 'daughters.' In either case Malachi denounces the tendency of his people to fuse with the neighbouring nations. 12. The master and the scholar] RV 'him that waketh and him that answereth.' A very slight change in the Hebrew gives the better antithesis, 'plaintiff and defendant'; two opposites being frequently used in Hebrew to denote all. ('p. 'going out and coming in,' etc. Tabernacles] better, 'homes.' 13. Inasmuch that he regardeth] better, 'because he regardeth.' The people are regarded as covering the altar with their tears in the intensity of their desire for the favours He is withholding.

14. The wife of thy youth] i.e. the wife married in youth. The evil here denounced is the divorce of an old wife in favour of a younger woman. The wife of thy covenant] The thought that there is a solemn compact between husband and wife is stated definitely here only in the OT.; but it is the natural inference from the representation of Israel as Jehovah's wife, for though Israel was false to Jehovah, He remained faithful. 15. The text, as it stands, is unintelligible. A simple correction has been suggested, which gives the following sense: 'Did not one (God) make and continue life to us? And what does the one (God) seek? A sacred seed. Therefore take heed to your life, and deal not treacherously against the wife of thy youth': i.e. One God (cp. 2¹⁰) has created a life to which He has given continuance through marriage. The object of marriage—God's object in its institution—is to obtain children, 'seed of God.' When children are born, the object of marriage is attained. Therefore let not a man put away his wife, because she has grown old and lost her attraction. 16. Putting away] i.e. divorce. Covereth violence with his garment] The reference is probably to the ill-treatment of the wife; but the Hebrew is obscure.

17. An address to those who are losing faith through their inability to solve the riddle of the prosperity of the ungodly: cp. Ps 37, 73.

CHAPTER 3

THE SPEEDY JUDGMENT

1. This v. is closely connected with the preceding. It is the answer to the question, 'Where is the God of judgment?' The messenger is evidently a prophet or a succession of prophets: cp. Dt 18⁹⁻²². The phrase he shall prepare the way before me is probably borrowed from Isa 40³⁻⁵, where the thought is that a highway must be prepared on which 'the Glory of the Lord' may lead Israel to the land of Canaan. Zechariah (8³) had promised that Jehovah would come to His Temple. The promise in Malachi's days had not yet been fulfilled, but Jehovah would 'hasten it in its time.' 2. Malachi shows himself here a true son of the older prophets. Jehovah cannot ignore sin: the day of his coming must therefore be a day of judgment: cp. Am 5¹⁸⁻²⁰ Isa 33¹⁴⁻¹⁶. 3. He shall purify the sons of Levi] The judgment will begin at the house of God. 4. Malachi, like other late OT. writers, here idealises the past: cp. 2⁵ 1 K 1^{20, 21}.

6. I change not] better, 'I have not changed.' The therefore in the following clause is wrong: the Heb. has 'but you' (emphatic) 'are not consumed.' As this yields no antithesis, it is not improbable that there is a corruption in the text. The argument seems to be, 'I have not changed, but you have not kept your part of the covenant; you have not performed my words.' 7. Cp. Zech 1²⁴.

9. Cp. Neh 13^{10f}.

11. The devourer] i.e. locusts: cp. Joel 1⁴ Am 4².

13. The godly are here addressed, and in their lack of faith are reminded that 'the Lord is mindful of His own.' 14. Cp. Ps 73¹³ Isa 58³. 16. The change from direct address to narrative utterly spoils the connexion. LXX gives, 'This' (i.e. the complaint of vv. 14, 15) 'have they spoken who fear the Lord; and the Lord hath hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance hath been written before Him concerning those that fear the Lord,' etc.

17. In that day when I make up my jewels] RV 'in the day that I do make, even a peculiar treasure': better, 'in the day that I show myself active' (so in 4⁸), 'even a peculiar possession.' For the last words cp. Dt 7⁶ 14² 26¹⁸.

18. Malachi here treats the prosperity of the ungodly with more freedom than some of the OT. writers. He does not deny it, nor does he affirm that it is illusory or transitory, but that it cannot abide the crisis of 'the Day of the Lord.' Ye] the murmurers; those who were disturbed by the prosperity of the wicked (2¹⁷).

CHAPTER 4

THE NEW ELIJAH

1. The comparison is to an oven heated by a fire lighted within it: cp. Mt 6³⁰. This passage is closely connected with the preceding. Stubble] rather, 'straw.'

2. 'The day of the Lord is darkness and not light' (Am 5²⁰), but when the night of judgment is over, day dawns for the righteous.

The Sun of righteousness] 'Righteousness' is here almost equivalent to 'blessing,' as in Ps 21⁵.

With healing in his wings] Since the dawn spreads with rapidity from the E. over the world (Job 38¹²⁻¹⁴), it is said poetically to have wings (Ps 139⁹). With the dawn of the new era there will be healing. It will be a 'time of restoration of all things.' Grow up (RV 'gambol') as calves of the stall] better, 'trample down like stall-fed oxen,' i.e. the most heavily treading animals with which Malachi was acquainted. 3. The men of Malachi's generation have not yet been taught to pray for those that despitefully use them and persecute them. They shall be ashes] i.e. the righteous shall trample on the ungodly as on the ash-heaps outside their homes.

5. The history of Israel has already, to a great extent, become Scripture, and Elijah is a type for all time. Malachi's meaning would be clearer if we were to translate, with a slight concession to English idiom, 'I will send you a prophet Elijah': cp. 'a Daniel come to judgment.' It is in this sense that our Lord understood it: cp. Mt 11¹⁴ 17^{11, 12}, and also Lk 1¹⁷. The fact that our Lord declared John the Baptist to be a fulfilment of this prophecy would alone be sufficient to entitle Malachi to a place among the goodly fellowship of the prophets. But Malachi's claim to Christian reverence is not exhausted by this one fulfilment of his words. Though John the Baptist was the last and greatest Elijah before that great 'Day of the Lord,' when 'the Word was made flesh,' there had been other fulfilments of Malachi's words before his time, as there have been since. Whenever 'the old order changes, giving place to new,' God sends the world an Elijah. The Old Testament is not made obsolete by the New, for the gospel is the continuation and the interpretation of prophecy.

6. A time of reform is a time of dissension: cp. Lk 12⁵¹⁻⁵⁸. The dissensions can only be healed by giving heed to God's teaching.

ST. MATTHEW

INTRODUCTION

1. The word Gospel. 'Gospel' (lit. 'God story,' i.e. story about God) is the usual English translation of euaggelion, lit. 'good tidings,' which in the NT. always means the good tidings of salvation as preached by our Lord Himself (Mt 4²³ 9³⁵), or by the apostles and other Christian teachers (e.g. 24¹⁴ 26¹³ Ac 15⁷, also Ro 2¹⁶, where 'my gospel' means 'the gospel message as preached by me'). Not till the 2nd cent., apparently, did it come to mean a written biography of Christ, though the way for this use had already been prepared by the title of St. Mark's Gospel, 'The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ [the Son of God]' (Mk 1¹).

2. The Gospels in general. Only four Gospels having any claim to historical authority have been transmitted to us, those of SS. Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. There were numerous earlier ones (Lk 1¹) of which our evangelists have made full use, but the appearance of their far superior narratives rendered the earlier efforts comparatively useless, and they soon ceased to be copied. All that is known or can be probably conjectured about them is stated in the special article, 'The Synoptic Problem.' Numerous Gospels, generally called 'apocryphal,' were written later than the canonical four, but of these even the earliest, such as 'the Gospel according to the Hebrews' (circ. 100 A.D.), and 'the Gospel of Peter' (circ. 100-150 A.D.), are so obviously contaminated by fiction, that it is impossible to feel sure that any of the facts or sayings therein recorded (except those borrowed from our Gospels) are authentic.

The first three canonical Gospels (Mt, Mk, Lk) are generally called 'synoptic,' and their authors 'synoptists,' because they all present the same general view of our Lord's ministry. For the most part they record the same incidents, in the same order, in the same (or closely similar) words, and from the same point of view. To all of them Jesus is the promised Messiah of the Jews, and also the Saviour and Redeemer of all mankind; He is true man, but He is also the superhuman Son of God, who perfectly knows and reveals the Father, who atones for sin by His death, and by His resurrection is exalted to almighty power over the universe. But the main interest of the writers is biographical, not theological. Their aim is to place before the reader a vivid picture of the historical Jesus of Nazareth 'in fashion as He lived,' going about doing good, teaching, healing, comforting, advising, guiding, rebuking, blessing, and drawing all men to Himself by the strong cords of admiration and love. Special objects in writing each evangelist doubtless had. St. Matthew, writing for the Jews, though not perhaps exclusively for them, presents our Lord's claims to the throne of David, and expounds fully His attitude towards the Law; St. Mark, writing for the Romans, carefully explains for their benefit the Jewish customs and observances which were so unintelligible to Gentiles; St. Luke, writing as St. Paul's interpreter, desires particularly to make it plain that in Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, that the poorest and humblest most easily enter God's kingdom, that the good Creator desires to save every soul which He has made, and that accordingly there is hope for the most careless of prodigals and the most abandoned of sinners. But the main aim of each synoptic writer is just the simple one of placing before the reader vividly the gracious personality of Jesus Christ, and letting it make its own appeal to the heart and understanding.

The aim of the fourth evangelist is different. Writing after the rise of heresy, he aims definitely at establishing the true doctrine of the person of Christ. Sayings and incidents are selected not for their biographical interest, but for their doctrinal importance as illustrating various aspects of the Incarnation of the Divine Son of God. The Gospel is, in fact, a sermon on the text 'And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us' (Jn 1¹⁴). Unlike the synoptists St. John is an allegorist, and expects the reader to detect a hidden spiritual meaning beneath the letter of his narrative. Assuming the synoptists to be well known, he omits for the most part the events and sayings which they record, and thus his Gospel forms a supplement—and one of priceless worth—to the synoptic record. Taken all together, the four Gospels give an adequate and harmonious picture of the God-Man, the synoptists delineating mainly His Humanity, and St. John His Deity. As an old writer (St. Irenæus, 177 A.D.) well says: 'The Word, who was manifested to men, has given us the gospel under four aspects, but bound together by one Spirit.'

3. Life of St. Matthew. St. Matthew, the reputed author of the first Gospel, was a customs house officer. His business was to collect the tolls levied on the merchandise that passed through the dominions of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea. He was stationed at Capernaum, on an important caravan route leading to Damascus. Though probably not in the employ of the hated Romans, but of Herod Antipas, he belonged to a despised class. 'Publicans,' that is, collectors of taxes or tolls, were ostracised socially, and though not exactly excommunicated by the synagogue, were treated as 'sinners,' i.e. abandoned and irreligious persons. It required no small courage on the part of the new Teacher to choose as one of His inner circle of disciples a despised publican. Our Lord's object was probably to obtain influence among the class of religious and social outcasts. The call of Matthew was fully justified by its results. It brought Jesus into direct and fruitful contact with a class of persons for whose spiritual welfare none of the orthodox religious authorities had the least concern. The feast which St. Matthew made to celebrate his call was attended by a great multitude of publicans and sinners, and gave Jesus an opportunity of speaking to them of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God (Lk 5²⁹).

St. Matthew's profession was a comparatively lucrative one (cp. Lk 19²), so that it cost him something to 'forsake all' and follow Jesus (Lk 5²⁸). When the call took place, he had probably been a disciple for some time, as was the case with the other apostles. His original name was Levi, and to this, on the occasion of his call, was added the surname Matthew, i.e. 'gift of God,' by which he was generally known in Christian circles: cp. Mk 2¹⁴ and Lk 5²⁷ with Mt 9⁹.

According to the oldest traditions, he preached for fifteen years in Judæa and then visited Ethiopia, Persia, Media, and Parthia. His death seems to have been natural, though later authorities make him a martyr. He is commemorated by the church on Sept. 21st.

4. Composition and Authorship of the Gospel. The first Gospel, though compiled from various sources, is a literary unity, the work of a single writer. This is shown by the occurrence of various characteristic phrases, not in certain sections only, but throughout the work. Thus the phrase 'the kingdom of heaven,' which is found in St. Matthew alone, occurs 14 times in sections which are peculiar to St. Matthew, and 18 times in sections which are common to him and St. Luke or St. Mark. Also the peculiar phrase 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet,' which occurs nowhere else in the N.T., occurs in nearly every part of the first Gospel: see 1²² 2¹⁵, 17, 23 4¹¹ 8¹⁷ 12¹⁷ 13³⁵ 21¹, [26⁵⁶] [27⁹] [27³⁵]. It is plain, therefore, that the same compiler has worked over the whole of the book, and given it such unity as it possesses.

The author's sources were somewhat numerous, and several of them can still be clearly distinguished. His principal authority for narrative was St. Mark's Gospel, which he probably possessed in its complete form, in which it contained an account of an appearance of the risen Lord in Galilee: see Mk 16⁷. He evidently wrote with this Gospel before him, making it the basis of his work, and inserting his additional matter, gained from other sources, at appropriate intervals, but very seldom departing from its order. In transcribing St. Mark, he reproduced his words with considerable exactness, but usually abridged them, generally only slightly, but sometimes very considerably. For example, St. Mark's account of the Gadarene demoniac runs to 20 vv., while St. Matthew's has only 7 vv. He seldom adds anything of importance to St. Mark's narrative. The chief exceptions are the account of the Temptation, where he adds important details from another source (4¹¹), that of the walking on the sea, where he adds the incident of Peter descending from the ship (14²²⁻³³), and that of the confession of Peter at Casarea Philippi, which is described much more fully (16¹³⁻¹⁴). Altogether, St. Matthew has about 470 vv. out of a total of 1,068 vv. parallel to St. Mark, that is, he borrows nearly half his Gospel from St. Mark.

Another source (or sources) is indicated by the large amount of matter which St. Matthew has in common with St. Luke. A complete list of these correspondences, amounting in all to about 200 vv., or nearly one-fifth of the Gospel, has already been given (see art. 'The Synoptic Problem'), and the reader is requested to refer to it. He will find that in at least two-thirds of the cases, the subject-matter (which consists mainly of discourses and sayings) has been placed differently by the two evangelists, and that the variations of phraseology are also very considerable. This suggests that not more than one-third (if so much) of the correspondences between St. Matthew and St. Luke are due to the use of a common document, and that, for the most part, they used different sources. Our evangelist's main source for discourses seems to have been a document (called 'the Logia') in which our Lord's sayings were collected in masses according to subject-matter; but the sources of the discourses in St. Luke seem to have been documents in which our Lord's sayings were preserved in their proper historical connexion. There is no sufficient evidence to show that our evangelist grouped together in his Gospel sayings that were separate in his sources, but rather the contrary, for he several times expresses his conviction that the great groups of sayings, which St. Luke separates, were delivered at one time and place, and this he would hardly have done if his sources had recorded them in widely-separated contexts: see especially 7²⁸ 11¹ 13⁵³ 19¹ 26¹.

A third group of sources is indicated by the matter peculiar to St. Matthew. This amounts to about 400 vv., and consists of the following sections:—

- 1¹⁻¹⁷. Genealogy of Jesus.
- 1¹⁸⁻²³. The Nativity.
- 2¹⁻¹⁸. The Magi; the massacre of the Innocents.
- 2¹⁹⁻²³. Flight into Egypt.
- 3^{14, 15}. St. John's scruple about baptising Jesus.
- 4¹²⁻¹⁶. Isaiah's prophecy fulfilled (Isa 9^{1, 2}).
- 4^{23, 24}. Tours in Galilee.
- 5, 6, 7. Much of the Sermon on the Mount.
- 9²⁷. The two blind men.
- 10. About 8 vv. of the charge to the Twelve.
- 11²⁸⁻³⁰. 'Come unto me, all ye that labour.'
- 12⁵. The priests profane the sabbath and are blameless.
- 12¹⁷⁻²³. Isaiah 42¹ fulfilled.
- 12^{36, 37}. Every idle word.
- 13^{14, 15}. Fulfilment of Isa 6⁹.
- 13²⁴⁻³⁰. Parable of the tares.
- 13³⁵. Fulfilment of Ps 78².
- 13³⁶⁻⁴³. Interpretation of the parable of the tares.
- 13⁴⁴. Parable of the hid treasure.
- 13^{45, 46}. Parable of the pearl-merchant.
- 13⁴⁷⁻⁵¹. Parable of the net.
- 13^{52, 53}. 'Every scribe which is instructed.'
- 14²⁸⁻³³. Peter walks on the waves.
- 15¹²⁻¹⁵. 'Every plant which my heavenly (in part). Father.'
- 15²³⁻²⁵. 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep.'
- 15²⁸⁻³¹. Many are healed.
- 16^{11, 12}. The leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees (but cp. Mk 8¹⁵).
- 16¹⁷⁻¹⁹. 'Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona.'
- 17²⁴⁻²⁷. The stater found in the fish's mouth.
- 18^{4, 7, 10, 11, 12}. Sayings about children.
- 18¹⁵⁻²⁰. 'If thy brother shall trespass.'
- 18²¹⁻²⁵. 'Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me?'
- 19¹⁰⁻¹². Celibacy for the kingdom of heaven's sake.
- 20¹⁻¹⁶. Parable of labourers in the vineyard.
- 21^{4, 5}. Fulfilment of Isa 62¹¹ Zech 9⁹.
- 21^{10, 11}. Astonishment of Jerusalem at the triumphal entry.
- 21¹⁴. The blind and lame healed in the Temple.
- 21^{15, 16}. The children cry 'Hosanna' in the Temple.

- 21²⁸⁻³². Parable of the two sons.
- 21⁴³. 'The kingdom of God shall be taken from you.'
- 22¹⁻¹⁴. Parable of the marriage of the king's son (the wedding garment).
- 23^{1-5, 8-10, 14-22, 21-33}. Woes pronounced on scribes and Pharisees.
- 24¹¹. 'Many false prophets shall rise.'
- 24¹². 'The love of many shall wax cold.'
- 24³⁰. The sign of the Son of Man in heaven.
- 25¹⁻¹³. Parable of the ten virgins.
- 25¹⁴⁻³⁰. Parable of the talents (yet cp. St. Luke's parable of the pounds, Lk 19¹²⁻²⁷).
- 25³¹⁻⁴⁶. Parable of the sheep and the goats.
- 26²⁵. Judas asks, 'Master, is it I?'
- 26⁶². 'Put up again thy sword.'
- 26^{53, 54}. 'Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father?'
- 27³⁻¹⁰. Remorse, suicide, and burial of Judas.
- 27¹⁹. Pilate's wife.
- 27^{24, 25}. Pilate washes his hands.
- 27⁵¹⁻⁵³. Earthquake, opening of tombs, and resurrection of saints.
- 27⁶²⁻⁶⁶. The tomb sealed, and a watch set.
- 28²⁻⁴. A great earthquake. An angel bright as lightning rolls away the stone, and terrifies the guards.
- 28⁹⁻¹⁰. Jesus appears to the women.
- 28¹¹⁻¹⁵. The guards report to the chief priests, who spread a false report.
- 28¹⁶⁻²⁰. Appearance on a mountain in Galilee.

Of this peculiar matter we may assign to the 'logia' most of the discourses and sayings, which include parts of the Sermon on the Mount, of the charge to the Twelve, of the denunciations of the Pharisees; also the parables of the tares, the hid treasure, the pearl-merchant, the net, the labourers in the vineyard, the two sons, the wedding garment, the ten virgins, the talents, and the sheep and the goats. Certain incidents similar in character to the common synoptic tradition, such as the Baptist's scruple (3¹⁴), the tours in Galilee (4²³), the healing of the two blind men (9²⁷), the healing of the blind and lame in the Temple (21¹⁴), the children's cry of Hosanna (21¹⁵), the question of Judas (26²⁵), the remorse of Judas (27³), perhaps also the appearance to the women (28⁹), and to the eleven in Galilee (28¹⁶), seem to point to the use of an authentic narrative source somewhat resembling St. Mark's Gospel. Very little of the Gospel seems due to oral, as distinguished from written, tradition—perhaps only the Nativity (which is confirmed in its essential features by the independent narrative of St. Luke), the visit of the Magi (which fits well into secular history, and is thoroughly credible), the incident of the temple-tribute, and certain details in the narrative of the resurrection, such as the resurrection of the saints, and the setting of a watch. On these the notes should be consulted.

From what has been said, it will be evident that direct authorship of this Gospel by the apostle Matthew is improbable. If St. Matthew had been the author, he would probably have given his own account of the transactions, and not have laboriously occupied himself with collecting and transcribing 'sources.' At the same time a connexion with the apostle Matthew is probable. The name of so obscure an apostle would hardly have been connected with the Gospel without some good reason. Ancient tradition (first in Papias, 130 A.D.) credits St. Matthew with the composition of a book of 'logia' or 'oracles,' written in Hebrew (Aramaic), which may have been a brief Gospel, but was more probably a collection of discourses classified (as we have already suggested) according to subject-matter. Of a Greek translation of these 'logia' our author seems to have made such liberal use, that he acknowledged his obligations to the apostle by calling his work 'according to Matthew.' St. Matthew, therefore, is responsible for the discourses, but probably not for the history.

The author was undoubtedly a Jewish Christian, familiar with Hebrew, and trained in rabbinical methods. His quotations from the O.T. (when they are not copied from St. Mark) generally follow the Hebrew rather than the Greek. He arranges his book on the arithmetical principles so common in rabbinical writings, and shows a particular fondness for the numbers 7, 5, 3, 10. Thus there are seven beatitudes, seven petitions in the Lord's prayer (not five, as in St. Luke), seven woes denounced against the Pharisees; also the names in the genealogy are arranged in multiples of seven (7 x 2); there are five chief collections of our Lord's discourses, three temptations, three chief duties of religion (6¹⁻¹⁵), three prayers in Gethsemane; also between the first and second discourses of Jesus the evangelist inserts ten miracles (chs. 8, 9). Seven is, of course, the number of the sabbath day, five of the books of Moses, three of the priestly blessing, and ten of the plagues of Egypt. The author also shows his Jewish predilections in his affectionate references to Jerusalem as 'the holy city,' and 'the holy place' (4⁵ 24¹⁵ 27³³).

5. Date. The date of the Gospel is rather before than after 70 A.D. The reason for thinking this is that the author has so arranged our Lord's sayings about the fall of Jerusalem and His Second Advent as to leave the impression that these events would be coincident. Had he written later, he would have made it evident that they would be separated by an interval, as St. Luke has actually done (see Lk 21²¹, and contrast Mt 24^{29, 30}). But the Gospel cannot have been written much before 70, because it uses sources, some of which are probably not very early, and embodies traditions which in some cases are apparently not in their earliest form.

6. General Characteristics. This Gospel is one of the most attractive books ever written, and in modern times has exercised a wide influence even beyond the pale of Christianity. One of the most influential of modern Indian converts was brought to Christ simply by reading it. The effect of the book is partly due to its excellent arrangement. The author arranges his material not, like St. Luke, chronologically, but according to subject-matter. Material of the same kind is collected into great masses, which being read uninterruptedly, produce a cumulative impression upon the reader. Good instances of the author's method are the great collection of sayings known as the Sermon on the Mount (5-7); the great group of miracles intended to illustrate and confirm it (8, 9); the charge to the Twelve, apparently composed of sayings delivered at various times (10); the cluster of seven parables (13), the collection of denunciations of the Pharisees (23), and the sublime group of parables illustrating the end of the world (25). The great glory of this Gospel is the discourses. These are from the pen of the apostle Matthew himself, who evidently had a special gift of remembering and recording accurately the very words of the Master. In almost all cases where there is any difference, St. Matthew's version is superior to St. Luke's. This is specially the case in the Sermon on the Mount. In no Gospel, not even in St. Luke, are the unapproachable majesty and splendour of Christ's utterances so apparent. St. Matthew's Gospel is particularly helpful in its treatment of O.T. prophecy, showing how completely and comprehensively Christ fulfilled the ideals and aspirations of the O.T. saints. Sometimes his exegesis, following (like St. Paul's) rabbinical models, is of a kind more calculated to appeal to his original readers than to us, but, after making all deductions, it is not too much to say, that of all the remains of Christian antiquity dealing with the subject of Messianic prophecy, St. Matthew's Gospel is the most fruitful.

We have now to speak of the more special peculiarities of St. Matthew's Gospel, some of which are very definitely marked.

(1) The Gospel is predominantly Jewish-Christian. It reflects the tone of the church of Jerusalem before it was fully realised that the Ceremonial Law had been abolished. Sayings are reported which (literally understood) teach that every letter of the Mosaic Law is binding in perpetuity (5¹⁸), that its permission to divorce still holds good (5³² 19⁹), that not the Levitical distinctions of meats, but only the Pharisaic glosses thereon have been abolished (15²⁰), and that the sabbath day, with all its Mosaic restrictions, will permanently be observed by Christians (24²⁰). The first place in the kingdom of God seems often to be assigned to the Jews (19²⁸), the Gentiles being obliged to content themselves with a subordinate position. Christ's mission is apparently restricted to the chosen people (15²⁴). As for the apostles, they seem expressly forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, or to enter into any city of the Samaritans (10⁵).

But though the writer's sympathies are predominantly Jewish-Christian, he is a perfectly honest witness, and does not attempt to suppress facts or sayings which are of a broader or even of an opposite tendency. He introduces Gentiles as the first worshippers of the infant Messiah (2¹). He records the praise of the Roman centurion, and our Lord's striking words, 'Many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven' (8¹¹), words which affirm not only the admission of the Gentiles to the kingdom, but their admission on equal terms. Other instances of sayings favourable to the Gentiles are, 12^{18, 21} ('in his name shall the Gentiles trust'), 12⁴¹ (the men of Nineveh), 13³⁸ ('the field is the world'), 13⁴⁷ (the net gathering of every kind), 15³⁰⁻³⁹ (feeding of 4,000 believing Gentiles), 24¹⁴ (the gospel to be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations), 25³² (Jews and Gentiles on an equality at the judgment day), 28¹⁹ (all nations to be baptised). St. Matthew even records such anti-Jewish sayings as, 'the children of the kingdom shall be cast into outer darkness' (8¹²), and 'the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof' (21⁴³).

That the evangelist expected to have Gentile as well as Jewish readers is shown by his occasional, though rare, explanations of Jewish words and customs (cp. 1²³ 'Emmanuel'; 27⁴⁶ 'Eli, Eli,' etc.).

(2) In accordance with the Jewish-Christian character of this Gospel, the apostle Peter, the acknowledged head of 'the circumcision,' is brought into special prominence. St. Matthew alone records the remarkable tradition of his attempt to walk upon the water (14²⁸), and the promise that upon him, as upon a foundation, the Christian church should be built, and that whatsoever he should bind on earth should be bound in heaven.

(3) As a Jew, the author is particularly interested in the correspondence between the two testaments. In his view the new dispensation grows out of the old by a process so natural and inevitable, that it can hardly be called new. The Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms are not abolished; they are fulfilled in Christ. To Him alone they pointed, in Him alone they find their true significance. The germs of Christian truth were planted of old by inspired men, and have so vitally influenced the subsequent development of religion, that the author can even speak of the events of Christ's life as taking place to fulfil the ancient prophecies. Thus Christ is born of a virgin at Bethlehem, is named Jesus, sojourns in Egypt, resides at Nazareth, migrates to Capernaum, heals the sick, speaks in parables, enters Jerusalem riding an ass, is deserted by the disciples, is betrayed, and put to death, 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Lord through the prophet' (so with slight variations of phrase 1²² 2¹⁵, 23 8¹⁷ 12¹⁷ 13³⁵ 21⁴ 26⁵⁴; cp. 2⁵ 13^{14, 15} 26³¹ 27⁹). This conception is not found in the other synoptists, except perhaps in one or two isolated phrases (see, e.g. Lk 24^{26, 41}), but it is familiar to the fourth evangelist, and forms an important point of contact between the first and fourth Gospels (see Jn 12³⁹ 17¹² 19^{24, 36} 20⁹). St. Matthew alludes to no less than 65 OT. passages, of which 43 are verbally quoted. St. Luke's allusions to the OT. number only 43, and of these only 19 are direct quotations.

(4) As a predominantly Judaic work, this Gospel portrays Jesus as the Messiah of the Jews. His genealogy is traced back only to Abraham, and not, as in St. Luke, to Adam. Stress is laid upon His descent from David (1^{1, 20} 9⁷ 12²³ 15²² 20^{30, 31} 21^{9, 15} 22^{12, 43, 45}), and the genealogy is an elaborate attempt to prove His right to David's throne. The descent is, of course, traced through the legal father Joseph ('the son of David,' 1²⁰), and exhibits not so much physical descent, as the legal transmission of the right to occupy the throne, and be 'king of the Jews' (2²). But Jesus also satisfies the other and more sublime OT. anticipations with regard to the Messiah. His miraculous conception by the Holy Ghost of a virgin mother is evidence that He is in a unique sense the Son of God. He is, in fact, divine (11²⁷), and consequently may rightly claim the title 'Emmanuel,' 'God with us.' He is the supernatural Son of man whose coming was predicted by the prophet Daniel, and at the end of the world will sit on the throne of His glory to judge the human race (16²⁷ 24³⁰ 26⁶⁴, etc.). Hence He is not only David's son, but David's Lord (22⁴⁴).

(5) The Messiah's kingdom is the most frequent topic in this Gospel. Its title is almost always the rabbinical one, 'the kingdom of the heavens'; hardly ever, as in the other synoptists, 'the kingdom of God' (only in 12²⁸ 21^{31, 43}). The rule over it has been committed by God to the Messiah, who sits on the throne of it as King (25^{31, 40}). The author generally regards this kingdom as eschatological, i.e. beginning at the end of the world, which he expected would happen in his own time (24²⁴). Then there would be a 'regeneration,' i.e. a transformation or new birth of the whole creation, when the Son of man would sit on the throne of His glory and the apostles would sit upon twelve thrones judging (i.e. ruling) the twelve tribes of Israel, and the righteous would shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father (19²⁸ 13⁴³). Other passages illustrating the futurity of the kingdom are 6¹⁰ 7²¹ 8¹¹ 16²⁸ 18⁸ 20^{14, 21} 25^{1, 31} 26²⁹. But the author's conception of the kingdom is many-sided, and he seems often to regard it (though this is disputed) as something present, like 'eternal life' in St. John. Thus the subjects of the beatitudes are already within the kingdom (5³), and so are Christ's disciples (11¹¹), even young children (19¹⁴), and great is the sin of those who hinder others from entering (23¹³). Sometimes the kingdom means the spirit of Christ working secretly and silently in the world like the leaven (13³³); sometimes it is the visible Church (16^{18, 19}), gathering of every kind like a net (13⁴⁷), and spreading abroad like the branches of a mustard tree (13³¹); sometimes, again, it is the Christian's secret communion with God through Christ, as symbolised by the hid treasure, and the pearl of great price (13^{44, 45}). The conception is a broad and fluid one, and the attempt to define it too rigidly and exclusively is probably a mistake.

(6) Another feature of the Gospel is its anti-Pharisaic character. The pointed condemnations of Pharisaism in the Sermon on the Mount (5²⁰ 6^{1, 5, 16}) are peculiar to St. Matthew, and in c. 23 he has 35 vv. of denunciation as against 3 vv. in Mk and 3 vv. in Lk.

(7) An apologetic purpose may also be detected. The author refutes the Jewish calumny that the disciples stole the body of Jesus (28¹⁵). To the objection to our Lord's Messiahship based on His Nazarene origin (see Jn 1⁴⁶ 7^{41, 52} Mt 2⁵), he replies that His birth took place at Bethlehem, in strict accordance with Micah's prophecy (2¹), and that if He afterwards went to live at Nazareth, this was to fulfil another prophecy (2²³). That He ministered in Galilee and Capernaum rather than in Judæa was not a real difficulty, for this had been prophesied by Isaiah (4¹³). To the current calumny that He had visited Egypt to take lessons from a conjurer (see on 12²²⁻²⁷), the author replies that Jesus was never in Egypt except once, when He was an infant, and that this visit was necessitated by a prophecy of Hosea (2¹⁵).

7. Analysis of the Gospel.

(a) The lineage and birth of the Messianic king (c. 1, 2).

(b) His solemn anointing to His Messianic office, and His preliminary temptation by Satan (3-4¹¹).

(c) The proclamation and inauguration of the Messianic kingdom on earth: its laws, principles, and officers (4¹²⁻¹³ 5²).

(d) The Messiah and His kingdom accepted and rejected (13⁵⁸⁻¹⁶ 20): accepted by the disciples (14³³), by the woman of Canaan (15²²), by great multitudes (15³⁰), by St. Peter (16¹⁶); rejected by the Nazarenes (13⁵⁷), by the Pharisees and their sympathisers (15¹² 16¹⁴).

(e) The sufferings and death of the Messiah announced (16²¹⁻²⁰ 34).

First clear announcement (16²¹).

Second clear announcement (17²²).

Third clear announcement (20¹⁷).

(f) The Messiah glorified by Death and Resurrection (chs. 21-28). The triumphal entry (c. 21); final denunciation of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Scribes (chs. 22, 23); great prophetic discourses (chs. 24, 25); betrayal and death (chs. 26, 27); the resurrection, and the exaltation of the Messiah to the throne of the universe (c. 28).

CHAPTER 1

GENEALOGY AND BIRTH OF JESUS

1-17. Genealogy of Jesus: cp. Lk 3²³. The two genealogies of Jesus, which are constructed on quite different principles, require careful comparison and study, if their purpose and significance are to be understood. In both, the descent of Jesus is traced through Joseph, not Mary, partly because the claim of Jesus to the throne of David could only be established through His foster-father Joseph; partly because, in genealogies, the Jews took no account of female descent. The genealogies are not inspired documents. They are the work of Jewish pedigree-makers who did their best to fill the gaps of records which were frequently fragmentary. They are inserted by the evangelists as honest attempts to ascertain the truth. Their accuracy or inaccuracy does not affect the main point at issue, our Lord's descent, through His legal father Joseph, from David. Joseph's family certainly claimed descent from David, and even the enemies of Jesus admitted the claim (see 9²⁷ 12²³ 15¹⁻² 20³⁰ 21⁹ 22⁴² and parallels). As Jewish families were particularly tenacious of family traditions, and were accustomed to preserve genealogical records, our Lord's Davidic descent through Joseph may be regarded as established. His Davidic descent through Mary is more doubtful, but, on the whole, probable. Lk 1³⁶, taken alone, might suggest that she belonged to the tribe of Levi, but Lk 1³² and 1⁶⁹ lose much of their point, unless it be supposed that Mary herself was descended from David. The OT. prophecies and the Apostolic Church regarded Christ as descended from David according to the flesh (Ro 1³ Ps 132¹¹ Isa 11¹ Jer 23⁵), and if Jesus were born of a virgin, His actual descent could only be upon the mother's side.

Both genealogies reflect current rabbinical ideas about the Messiah's descent. It was disputed, for instance, whether He would be descended from David through Solomon, or whether, owing to the curse on this line (Jer 22²⁸ 36³⁰), through another son, Nathan (1 Ch 3⁵). Accordingly St. Matthew's genealogy traces our Lord's descent through Solomon, St. Luke's through Nathan. Other rabbinical features are the omission of links in the genealogies, especially in St. Matthew, and the artificial arrangement of the names in numerical groups, probably as an aid to the memory. St. Luke's source probably grouped the names in multiples of ten (20 generations from David to the captivity, 20 from the captivity to Christ). This was the commonest method. St. Matthew employs multiples of seven (14 generations from Abraham to David, 14 from David to the captivity, 14 from the captivity to Christ). St. Matthew's list is a genealogy only in appearance. It is really an early Jewish-Christian attempt to construct a list of successive heirs to the throne of David, and so to exhibit Joseph, the legal father of Jesus, as the rightful king of Israel. Thus Shealtiel (Salathiel), v. 12, was not the actual son of Jechoniah, who was childless (Jer 22²⁸), but the next heir to the crown, and probably for that reason adopted by Jechoniah: see 1 Ch 3¹⁷. According to St. Luke, Shealtiel's real father was Neri.

St. Luke's list, on the other hand, aims at being a true genealogy, and that not of Mary, as a few authorities still maintain, but of Joseph: see on Lk 3²³. We are thus faced with the serious difficulty that Joseph's father is called by St. Matthew 'Jacob,' and by St. Luke 'Heli.' Have we here an error made by one or both evangelists? It is, of course, possible, but hardly likely, this being only the second step of the genealogy. Assuming both genealogies to be in this point correct, and taking into account the special character of St. Matthew's list, the statements are best harmonised by supposing that Jacob, the true heir to the throne, being, like Jechoniah, childless, adopted the next male heir Heli, who belonged to the other branch of the family, that, namely, which descended from Nathan. A less probable supposition is that Heli and Jacob were brothers, and that, one of them dying childless, the other took his wife and raised up seed to him by what is called a Levirate marriage: see Dt 25⁵ Mt 22²³. The point in favour of this view is that the fathers of Heli and Jacob, Matthat and Matthan, have nearly the same name. The point against it is that Matthat and Matthan have different fathers, and so were different persons, unless we again make use of the expedient of a Levirate marriage, or something similar.

1. The book of the generation] RM 'of the genealogy.' The phrase is from Gn 5¹, and is meant as a title not of the whole Gospel, nor even of the Nativity, but only of the genealogy (1¹⁻¹⁷), which the evangelist probably did not compose himself (though this is possible), but derived from an earlier source. Of Jesus Christ] 'Jesus' is the Gk. form of the Heb. 'Joshua,' or 'Jeshua,' meaning 'Jehovah is salvation.' 'Christ' (Christos) is properly the Gk. equivalent of the Aramaic 'Messiah,' lit. 'anointed one,' but here used as a proper name. The use of 'Christ' as a proper name began soon after the Ascension, and is common in the Epistles. In the Gospels it occurs only in Mt 1^{1, 16, 17, 18} Mk 1¹ Jn 1¹⁷ and possibly 17³. In all other places in the Gospels it should be rendered 'the Christ,' or 'the Messiah.' The use of the word in the sense of 'the Messiah' is unquestionably the earlier one, and the fidelity of the Gospels in preserving it is no small evidence of their trustworthiness. The son of David] a standing title of the Messiah among the rabbis. E.g. it was said, 'The son of David cometh not until that wicked empire (Rome) hath extended itself over the whole earth.' 'If the Israelites shall keep the sabbath even for a single day as they ought, the son of David will come': see Ps 132 Isa 11¹ Jer 23⁵. The poverty of Joseph and Mary is no evidence against their Davidic descent. The great rabbi Hillel, another descendant of David, was even poorer. The Davidic descent of our Lord's family was never questioned in His lifetime even by His enemies, and was so notorious that the descendants of Jude, the Lord's brother, incurred the jealousy of the tyrant Domitian. The son of Abraham] St. Matthew, writing primarily for Jews, carries the genealogy to Abraham and no further. He wishes to show that Jesus is the Messiah of the Jews, born in accordance with the promise made by God to the ancestor of the race (Gn 12³, etc.). St. Luke, writing for Gentiles, and emphasising St. Paul's principle that in Christ there is neither Jew nor Gentile, carries the genealogy back to Adam.

3. Of Tamar] RV 'Tamar.' Contrary to Jewish custom St. Matthew introduces into his genealogy four women, Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba. Of these, two (Rahab and Ruth) were Gentiles, and three were guilty of gross sins. Their insertion is intended to teach certain spiritual lessons: (1) That Gentiles as well as Jews have their rights in the Messiah, seeing that two of His ancestors were of Gentile blood. (2) That Jewish Christians instead of regarding Gentile converts with contempt, should be proud of them, as their ancestors were of Rahab and Ruth, who, on becoming proselytes, were accounted mothers in Israel. Of Rahab the rabbis said, 'Ten priests, who were also prophets, sprang from her'; and of Ruth, 'It is spoken in prophecy that the six most righteous men of the whole world will spring from her, David, Daniel and his companions, and King Messiah.' (3) That remission of sins, complete restoration to God's favour, and a high and privileged position in the kingdom of grace, are possible for the worst offenders. (4) That Christ did not shrink from the closest contact with sinful humanity. He touched and raised the very nature which had fallen. He assumed our sin-stained flesh, and in assuming cleansed it, and made it the instrument of human redemption.

8. After Joram St. Matthew omits three names, Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah (see 1 Ch 3^{11,12}), some think on account of their descent from the idolatrous Jezebel, but more probably simply to reduce the number of generations to fourteen. 11. After Josias St. Matthew omits Eliakim (2 K 23³⁴). The brethren of Jehoniah (Jehoiachin) are really his uncles, Jehoahaz and Zedekiah. Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, though really the uncle of Jehoiachin (2 K 24¹⁷ Jer 37¹), is called his 'brother' even in OT. (2 Ch 36¹⁰). 12. Jehoniah (Jehoiachin) was probably childless (yet see on Jer 22³⁰), and adopted Shealtiel (Shealtiel) as his heir (see 1 Ch 3¹⁷). Shealtiel seems also to have been childless, for although both here and in Ezr 3² Neh 12¹ Hag 1¹, etc., he is said to have had a son Zorobabel (Zerubbabel), this Zerubbabel seems to have been really the son of Shealtiel's brother Pedaiab (1 Ch 3¹⁹), who may have married his childless brother's widow according to the Law.

16. Little importance attaches to the reading of the Sinait-Syriac version, 'Joseph begat Jesus,' which is certainly not original, lacking, as it does, all MS authority, and contradicting the plain statements of the evangelist (vv. 18-25). Probably the reading comes from an Ebionite version of this Gospel. The Ebionites were an early sect, who, while admitting our Lord's Messiahship, denied His divinity and supernatural birth. Or the error may be due to the mechanical repetition by some scribe of the word 'begat,' which he had already written thirty-eight times.

17. As there are only thirteen generations from the captivity to Christ, probably a name has dropped out.

18-25. Circumstances of the Conception and Birth of Jesus: ep. Lk 1²⁶⁻³⁸ 21-20. The order of events is (a) Conception of John by Elisabeth, Lk 1²⁴, (b) Annunciation to Mary at Nazareth six months afterwards, Lk 1²⁶, (c) Visit of Mary to Elisabeth lasting three months, Lk 1³⁰, (d) Return of Mary to Nazareth, Lk 1³⁰, (e) Birth of John, Lk 1⁵⁷, (f) Mary is found to be with child, Mt 1¹⁸, (g) An angel appears to Joseph, Mt 1²⁰, (h) Journey to Bethlehem, Lk 2¹, (i) Birth of Jesus, Mt 1²⁵ Lk 2⁷.

Significance of Christ's Infancy. At first sight it seems unworthy of the Son of God to be conceived and born, and to pass through the stages of human growth. But in truth the interval between God and man is so infinitely great, that the minute difference between infancy and manhood is of no consequence. The marvel is that the Son of God should consent to become man at all; it is no additional marvel that He should become an infant. If it was expedient for the human race which He came to redeem, that He should pass through all the stages of a truly human experience, then the same infinite loving condescension which caused Him to become man would cause Him to be conceived and born. It is a fact admitted by the most sceptical that the human birth of Jesus Christ has appealed to the imagination of mankind, more perhaps than any other event of His life, and has produced permanent effects of the utmost importance (Lk 1⁵¹). (a) It has abolished the once common crime of infanticide by teaching that infant life is sacred. (b) It has raised the dignity of women, and produced in men the feeling of chivalry towards them, which is essentially Christian and was unknown to the ancient world. (c) It has sanctified motherhood and family life. (d) It has placed chastity both in men and women in the forefront of Christian virtues. (e) It has given a new importance to childhood, so that kindness to children and a willingness to conform to the ideal character of childhood, are marks of a true Christian. The human birth of Jesus is thus justified both by its results and by its adaptation to human needs. 'Jesus Christ,' says Irenaeus, 'came to save all by means of Himself. He therefore passed through every age, becoming an infant for infants, a child for children, a youth for youths, an elderly man for elderly men, that He might be a perfect Master for all.'

The Incarnation and the Virgin Birth. A difficulty has been felt in our days in accepting the miracle associated with the conception of our Lord. This arises chiefly from the facts that the two Gospels which record it differ to some extent in their accounts, and that the nature of the miracle itself precludes absolute demonstration.

It may be candidly admitted that the miraculous conception of Jesus has not the same evidence for it as the other miracles, and that if it were affirmed of any ordinary man it could not be believed. But Jesus was not an ordinary man. He was one who, according to credible testimony, worked many miracles, including the raising of the dead, and concluded an absolutely unexampled career by rising from the dead and ascending into heaven. The miraculous manner in which Jesus left this earth thus removes all theoretical difficulty from the miracle by which He is said to have entered it. The main question to be considered is: Do the existing narratives show signs of having proceeded from the only two persons who can have known anything about the matter, viz. Joseph and Mary? Certainly they do. St. Matthew's Gospel regards the matter entirely from Joseph's point of view. It is Joseph who discovers the condition of Mary (1¹⁸), and is doubtful what course to pursue (1¹⁹). It is to Joseph that the angel appears to announce the miraculous conception of Jesus (1²⁰), and again to bid him flee into Egypt (2¹³), and to return (2¹⁹). St. Luke's narrative, on the other hand, reflects entirely the point of view of Mary. It is to Mary that Gabriel appears (Lk 1²⁶). A full account is given of her visit to Elisabeth (1³⁹). The mother's memory appears in the mention of the swaddling clothes and of the manger (2⁷), and in the words, 'But Mary kept all these sayings and pondered them in her heart' (2¹⁹), and again, 'Yea, a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also' (2³⁵). St. Luke's account is much fuller than St. Matthew's, and this is easily accounted for. When St. Luke was collecting his materials in Palestine, Mary was probably still alive, whereas Joseph (St. Matthew's authority) had long been dead, and his account had probably passed through several hands before it reached the evangelist. The historical character of both narratives is shown by their freedom from the extravagant features which mark the apocryphal Gospels, and by their essential agreement, in spite of the fact that they are absolutely independent. It is true that St. Matthew seems to represent Bethlehem rather than Nazareth as the original home of Joseph and Mary, though he does not actually say so. On the other hand, St. Luke seems ignorant of the flight into Egypt, and passes straight from the presentation in the Temple to the return to Nazareth. But these are only instances of one imperfect account supplementing another, not of radical inconsistencies. Both accounts agree as to the two main points, Christ's birth of a virgin and His birth at Bethlehem.

Granting the fact of a real Incarnation, the Virgin Birth would seem to be the most reverent and fitting way of bringing it about. Since natural generation invariably gives rise to a new person, it was plainly unsuitable to the case of Jesus, at whose conception no new person came into existence, but the already existing Son of God entered upon a new human experience. Moreover, natural generation having been generally associated, especially by the Jews, with sin, it was most desirable that the moral miracle of a sinless human nature should be marked by the physical miracle of a miraculous conception. The last appeal, and perhaps to many minds the only possible appeal, is that of the argument derived from 'cause and effect.' Look at the stupendous fact—Jesus. The miracle of the NT., the miracle of the ages is not the Resurrection, but Jesus Himself. The phenomena of His life and character, the incomprehensibility of His person, seem to demand uniqueness and mystery in His birth. To abandon the Virgin Birth because of the difficulties of a few would be to throw greater difficulties in the way of the many. The doctrine has always been regarded as an integral part of the faith. It appears in the earliest form of the Apostles' Creed (100 A.D.).

18. Was espoused] RV 'had been betrothed.' Betrothal was almost equivalent to marriage, and could not be broken off without a formal divorce: cp. on Jn 8³ and Dt 22^{23, 24}. She was found] viz. by her husband. Of the Holy Ghost] Both here and in Lk 1³⁵ the miracle of the conception is ascribed emphatically to the 'Holy' Spirit, to mark the fact that Jesus was conceived sinless, and in a manner the most sacred imaginable. 'The Holy Spirit sanctified the flesh which it united with the Word. Not only was the "new departure in human life" which began with the birth of the Second Adam fitly preceded by a directly creative act, but the new humanity was consecrated at the moment of its conception by the overshadowing of the Divine Spirit' (Swete). The expression 'Holy Ghost' is especially characteristic of the NT., where it occurs over 80 times. In the Gk. OT. (LXX) it occurs only twice. The Jews did not regard the Spirit as personal, hence Mary must have understood the words of the angel, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee,' as identical in meaning with, 'The power of the Highest shall overshadow thee.' Not so the evangelists, to whom 'the Holy Ghost' had become practically a proper name, and as such was used without the article.

19. A just man] i.e. a good or righteous man: here, in particular, a kind or humane man, because although he felt bound to divorce her, he wished to do so as privately as possible, and without assigning any reason. A Jewish husband could divorce his wife if she did not please him, simply by giving her a bill of divorce in the presence of witnesses, without specifying the true cause. The legal penalty for Mary's supposed fault was stoning (Jn 8⁵).

20. The angel] RV 'an angel.' In St. Luke the angel who appears to Zachariah and Mary is named (Lk 1^{20, 26}), and the same angel (Gabriel) is to be understood here. In other passages of the NT. angels appear and speak: at the Resurrection, Mt 28⁵; at the Ascension, Ac 1¹¹; to Peter in prison, 5¹⁰ 12⁷; to Philip, 8²⁶; to Cornelius, 10³. There is no real reason to question the actual existence of angels. Why should man be the highest being in the universe?

21. JESUS] see on v. 1. For he shall save] more exactly, 'for it is He that shall save.' 'Saving from sin' includes two processes: (1) atonement for sin, and (2) sanctification. Both are works of Christ. The natural atonement for sin is penitence; but inasmuch as human penitence is imperfect, and our very repentance requires to be repented of, the aid of a Divine Helper is required. Christ bears the weight of our sins, sorrows for them with a sorrow that is adequate, and gives us grace to repent of them in a manner acceptable to God. As we live the life of faith in Christ our penitence continually becomes deeper, and one day it will be perfect, and God will accept it as adequate. In the meantime God pardons us by anticipation. Sanctification, i.e. the putting away of sin and growth in virtue and holiness, is another most important work of redemption, and no one can safely assure himself of the divine pardon unless he is advancing in the Christian virtues. The faith which does not manifest itself in works is no true faith in Christ. His people] primarily, of course, the Jews; but the Gentiles are also Israel, 'the Israel of God' (Gal 6¹⁶).

22. That it might be fulfilled, etc.] It is characteristic of St. Matthew, though not, of course, peculiar to him, to regard the events of Christ's life as taking place in order to fulfil God's gracious promises in the OT. made through the prophets. This particular phrase occurs 10 times in St. Matthew, and nowhere else in the NT.: see Intro.

23. Behold, a virgin] RV 'the virgin': see on Isa 7¹⁴. It does not appear that the Jews regarded the passage as Messianic; but St. Matthew, writing for Christians, applies it to the Messiah, in accordance with the rabbinical maxim, 'All the prophets prophesied only of the days of the Messiah.' St. Matthew quotes the passage as a prophecy not of the Virgin Birth, but of the giving to our Lord of a name expressing His divinity. He was called 'Jesus' (i.e. 'God is Salvation') to fulfil the prophecy which assigned to Him the name 'Emmanuel' ('God with us'). There is no indication that the evangelist, who was acquainted with Hebrew, attached importance to the word 'virgin' in this passage. In the Heb. it is 'almah, i.e. 'a young woman,' not necessarily a virgin. The LXX, however, renders it parthenos, i.e. 'virgin,' and hence many have incorrectly supposed that Isaiah prophesied the Virgin Birth.

Emmanuel] i.e. 'God with us.' This is a descriptive title rather than a name. It was never borne by our Lord, but He received instead a name ('Jesus') which expressed its meaning, and thus the prophecy was fulfilled. In the mind of Isaiah the title Emmanuel indicated that the bearer of it would deliver Israel from all their enemies. In the mind of the evangelist, who believed in the Incarnation (see especially 28¹⁹), it meant that in Jesus God assumed human nature to save the children of men, and to dwell with and in them for ever (28²⁰). 25. And knew her not till] Some have thought that the evangelist means to imply that after the birth of Jesus, Joseph and Mary lived together as man and wife, and that children were born to them. This may have been the case, but the words of the evangelist here are not meant to imply it. They simply affirm in the strongest manner that Joseph had nothing whatever to do with the conception and birth of Jesus, and are not intended to give information as to what happened afterwards. For the probable relationship to our Lord of His 'brethren,' see on 12¹⁰.

Her firstborn son] RV 'a son.' 'Firstborn' is interpolated from Lk 2⁷, q.v.

CHAPTER 2

THE WISE MEN

1-12. The star in the east and the visit of the Magi (peculiar to St. Matthew). The incident fits well into secular history. About the time when the star appeared (7 or 6 B.C.), Herod the Great, being alarmed by a prophecy that the royal power was about to pass away from him and his line, put the authors of it to death. It is evident, therefore, that the announcement by the wise men that Herod's supplanter in the kingdom had actually been born, would drive him to violent measures. The slaughter of the infants by Herod seems confirmed by the independent account of the heathen historian Macrobius (400 A.D.), who says that when news was brought to Augustus that Herod had ordered children under two years old in Syria to be slain, and that among them was a son of Herod, the emperor remarked, that it was better to be Herod's pig (hun) than Herod's son (huion).

That the Magi should be familiar with and sympathise with Jewish expectations about the Messiah, is not a difficulty. Synagogues existed throughout the East, and exercised a wide influence. At Damascus nearly all the women were proselytes (Jos. 'Wars,' ii. 20. 2: cp. also 23¹⁵ Ac 2⁹ 13⁴⁸, etc.). Belief that the appearance of the Messiah was imminent—a belief widely cherished in Jewish circles, see Lk 2^{25, 26, 38}—joined to belief in the appearance of signs in the heavens at the birth of great men, would sufficiently account for the journey of these astrologers, even if they were ignorant of the more definite expectation, which, according to Edersheim, was entertained at this time by the Jews, that two years before the birth of the Messiah His star would appear in the East. The existence of Messianic expectations throughout the East at a somewhat later period is expressly affirmed not only by Josephus, but also by the heathen historians Tacitus and Suetonius. As to the nature of the star, the most probable view is Kepler's. He calculated that in 7 B.C. there occurred three times a most remarkable conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn in the constellation Pisces, which was next year reinforced by Mars. This triple conjunction was followed by the appearance of a remarkably coloured evanescent star, which was the true star of the Magi. If this view be correct, our Lord's birth occurred about 6 B.C. (i.e. six years before the vulgar era of the nativity), and the visit of the Magi followed soon afterwards.

The spiritual significance of the story lies on the surface. Whereas Herod and the Jews were ignorant of the birth of the Messiah among them, and, when informed of it, manifested the most malignant hatred against Him, strangers from afar knew of it before then, and hastened to pay Him reverence. The incident is thus a prophecy of the history of the succeeding centuries, in which the chosen people have persistently rejected the Messiah, and the Gentiles have accepted Him. The incident also illustrates the true relations between science and religion. In the persons of the Magi, science paid homage to religion. The Magi were the men of science of the period, and their science brought them to Christ. And so it is now. The science of yesterday was (according to not a few of its exponents) hostile to faith, proudly boasting that it could solve the mystery of the universe. The science of to-day is more humble, acknowledging that the deepest natural knowledge only touches the outer fringe of things, and that so-called scientific 'explanations' of the universe are not explanations at all, but only descriptions. Religion and science move on different planes. There is and can be no real antagonism between them, and their natural relationship is one of mutual respect, and cordial coöperation.

1. Bethlehem]—or Ephrathah, the city of David, is 5 m. S. of Jerusalem: see Gn 35^{16, 19} 48⁷ 1 S 16⁴ 2 S 2³² 23¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 1 Ch 11^{16, 20} Ezr 2²¹ Neh 7²⁶. The supposed site of the nativity is a rock-hewn cave, measuring 38 ft. by 11 ft., at one end of which is inscribed 'Hic de virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est.' Above it stands perhaps the oldest Christian church in the world, the basilica built by Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, about 330 A.D. Herod] i.e. Herod the Great, who reigned from 37 to 4 B.C. As Christ was born at least two years before Herod's death (see 2¹⁰), the date of the nativity cannot be later than 6 B.C. See art. 'The Dynasty of the Herods.' Wise men] lit. 'Magi,' a sacerdotal class among the Persians, Babylonians, and other Eastern nations, who occupied themselves with a knowledge of the secrets of nature, divination, astrology, and medicine. The Babylonian Magi are mentioned in Jer 39⁸. Daniel was made chief of them owing to his skill in interpreting dreams (Dan 2⁴⁸). Here the word is used in its strict meaning, and in a good sense. Elsewhere in the NT, it means a juggler or cheat (Ac 13^{6, 8}). Since astronomy was chiefly practised in Babylonia, and Jewish influence was particularly strong there, it may be conjectured that these Magi were Babylonians. But they may have come from Arabia. There is no warrant for the tradition that they were kings. To Jerusalem] The Magi came because they expected to obtain full information at the capital. 2. In the east] better, 'at its rising.' Worship] see on v. 11.

3. And all Jerusalem] They had good reason to be troubled. Only two years before, in a similar fit of jealous fear, Herod had slaughtered all the leading Pharisees (Jos. 'Antiq.' 17. 2).

4. Herod summons not the Sanhedrin, which he had reduced to a shadow, having slain its members wholesale, but a national assembly of theologians learned in the Law.

Chief priests] The name includes the high priest, the ex-high priests, and members of those families from which the high priest was generally chosen. Scribes] i.e. professional students, copiers, and expounders of the Law of Moses, who rose into prominence after the captivity (Neh 8¹, etc.), and were enrolled as members of the Sanhedrin. Called also 'lawyers' (Lk 10²⁵) and 'doctors of the law' (Lk 5¹⁷). Christ] RV 'the Christ,' i.e. the Messiah.

5. In Bethlehem] cp. Jn 7⁴².

6. See Mic 5². St. Matthew follows neither the Heb. nor the Gk., but gives a free paraphrase. He reproduces the prophetic utterance of Micah, exactly as such quotations were popularly made at that time. Hebrew being a dead language, the Holy Scriptures were always translated (in the synagogue) into the popular dialect (Aramaic) by a Methurgeman, or interpreter, and these interpretations, or Targums, were neither literal versions nor yet paraphrases, but something between them, a sort of interpreting translation. It is needless to remark that the NT. writers would "targum" as Christians' (Edersheim abridged).

9. The star... went before them, etc.] a poetical way of saying that the star guided the wise men to Jesus.

11. The house] There is no mention of the stable (Lk 2⁷). As soon as the enrolling was at an end, there would be no difficulty in obtaining accommodation. Fell down, and worshipped him] The customary method of doing homage to a monarch. But in their homage was mingled something also of religious worship, because they understood at least this, that the Child before whom they knelt was the Messiah, the religious head of the human race, standing in a unique relation to God, and destined to establish the kingdom of God on earth.

Gifts] It was, and is, the Eastern custom not to approach monarchs and princes without a gift: Gn 43¹¹ 1S 10²⁷ 1K 10². The Magi brought to Jesus the most costly products of the countries in which they lived, as if to show that nothing is too precious to be used in the service of God. It is a mistake to think that spiritual worship is necessarily a bare worship, or that religion is purest when it is most divorced from art. Art and the love of beauty are among God's greatest gifts to man, and it is right that man in worshipping should render of his best to God. The mystical interpretation of the gifts (gold, symbolising Christ's Royalty; frankincense, or incense, His Divinity; myrrh, His Passion, cp. Jn 19³⁰) is questionable. The Magi would not know that He was actually divine, still less that He would suffer.

12. In a dream] As the Magi were interpreters of dreams, this method of divine revelation was especially appropriate. It is part of God's loving condescension to mankind to make His revelations to different ages, races, and individuals by those channels through which they are accustomed to expect them.

13-15. Flight into Egypt (peculiar to St. Matthew). Egypt was the only place of refuge easily reached from Bethlehem. It was outside the dominions of Herod, under Roman government, and contained a population of at least a million Jews, who were more wealthy and enlightened than those of Palestine. It was notorious for its superstition and gross idolatry, and legend has represented the idols of Egypt as falling flat on their faces before the Holy Child.

15. Until the death of Herod] Herod died probably 4 B.C., possibly 3 B.C., so that the sojourn in Egypt was short, perhaps only a few months.

Out of Egypt] Hos 11¹. It is impossible that the flight into Egypt was invented to fulfil this prophecy, which in Hosea is simply an historical allusion to the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. My son] in the original passage is the nation, not the Messiah, and so the LXX understood it. St. Matthew, however, saw in the history of Israel a typical foreshadowing of the life of our Lord, and so, in accordance with rabbinical methods of interpretation, applied it to Jesus. Here St. Matthew quotes directly from the Heb. The LXX has 'Out of Egypt did I call his (Israel's) children.'

16-18. Massacre of the Innocents (peculiar to St. Matthew). The incident is fully in accordance with what is known of Herod's character, and could not have been suggested by the prophecy in v. 18, which really refers to the Babylonian captivity. It is a true instinct, born of the new significance which Christianity has given to child-life, which has led the Church to enroll the Innocents in 'the noble army of martyrs,' and to commemorate them in the Christmas festival (Dec. 28). 'Not in speaking, but in dying,' says the old collect, 'did they confess Christ.'

16. All the male (RV) children] 'Considering the population of Bethlehem, their number could only have been small—probably twenty at most.' The massacre is not mentioned by Josephus, but 'the murder of a few infants in an insignificant village might appear scarcely worth notice in a reign stained by so much bloodshed. Besides, he had perhaps a special motive for this silence. Josephus always carefully suppresses, so far as possible, all that refers to the Christ' (Edersheim).

18. Was... a voice heard] Jer 31¹⁵. Rachel was buried at Ramah (cp. Gn 35¹⁹ 1S 10²), and when Jerusalem was captured by Nebuchadnezzar, trains of Jewish captives were led by her tomb on their way to exile. Jeremiah poetically represents Rachel as coming out of her tomb, and weeping piteously over her dead and exiled descendants, and St. Matthew applies the prophecy to the circumstances of the slaughter of the Innocents.

19-23. Return to Palestine. Settlement at Nazareth. It is implied that Joseph had settled at Bethlehem and intended to remain there as the most suitable place for bringing up the future Messiah. But God judged that the despised Galilee was a better training-school for the future Saviour of the world.

22. Archelaus] see art. 'The Dynasty of the Herods.' Did reign] RV 'was reigning.' Properly speaking Archelaus was only an 'ethnarch,' but ethnarchs and tetrarchs were popularly called 'kings.' Augustus had promised Archelaus the title of king, if he should deserve it by ruling well. Joseph feared to go back to Judæa, because Archelaus was as suspicious and cruel as his father. The pleasure-loving Antipas, who ruled in Galilee, was known to be more humane. 23. Nazareth] or Nazara, was a town of lower Galilee, in the tribe of Zebulon. It lay in a lofty valley among the limestone hills to the N. of the plain of Esdraelon, or Megiddo. It was quite unimportant (Jn 1⁴⁶), and is not mentioned in O.T. or Josephus.

A Nazarene] A thoroughly Jewish play upon words. In the O.T. and in Jewish writings the Messiah is often called Tsemach (Jer 23⁵), or Netsar (Isa 11¹), i.e. the Branch, so that 'Jesus the Nazarene' would sound very much like 'Jesus the Branch,' i.e. the Messiah. Edersheim says, 'We admit that this is a Jewish view, but then this Gospel is the Jewish view of the Jewish Messiah.'

CHAPTER 3

APPEARANCE OF THE BAPTIST. BAPTISM OF JESUS

1-12. John the Baptist's ministry. The circumstances of John's birth are detailed in Lk 1 (see notes there). He was sanctified from birth to be the forerunner of the Messiah (Lk 1^{13-17, 76f.}), and received a special revelation to enable him to recognise the Expected One when He appeared (Jn 1³³). His mother Elisabeth was a cousin of the Virgin, and he was born about six months before Jesus. Knowing what his work in life was to be, he devoted himself from his earliest years to a life of strict asceticism. 'He was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel,' imitating the austerities of the O.T. prophets, especially Elijah, whom he greatly resembled. Some earnest Jews seem to have followed his example, and adopted the hermit life. For instance, one of the instructors of Josephus, a man called Banus, 'lived in the desert, and had no other food than that which grew of its own accord, and bathed himself in cold water frequently both by night and day.' Josephus adopted his practices and stayed with him three years. The ascetic and unsocial life of John contrasted strangely with the genial and social habits of Jesus, who came 'eating and drinking,' and mingling freely with people of all classes. Yet our Lord had the greatest esteem for John, and spoke of him as greater than the greatest of the prophets (11⁷⁻¹⁰).

The public appearance of the Baptist marked a new era. He came forward in the twofold capacity of a prophet and the forerunner of the Messiah. As prophecy had been silent for 400 years, and all patriotic Jews were longing for the coming of the Messiah to deliver them from the Roman yoke, it is not surprising that he was welcomed with enthusiasm, and that those who ventured to doubt his mission found it expedient to dissemble (21²⁰). He might undoubtedly have claimed the allegiance of Israel as their promised king (Lk 3¹⁶), but, true to his mission, he declared himself only the forerunner of that greater One, whose ministry was about to begin. The testimony of John to the Messiahship of Jesus is undoubtedly a historical fact, and an important one. To it our Lord owed His first and most capable followers (Jn 1^{35f.}), and much of His early success.

The teaching of John was confined within the limits of O.T. ideas, and his aim was to make his converts pious Jews of the orthodox type. At the same time, his views were of a far more spiritual kind than those generally current. In his teaching he laid the main stress not upon the ceremonial law, but upon righteousness. He did not regard the Messiah's kingdom as—in its main aspect, at any rate—a temporal monarchy. It was a kingdom not of this world, a kingdom of righteousness. Not descent from Abraham, but righteousness entitled a man to be a member of it. Hence above all things repentance and amendment of life were necessary. Those who repented and received the Messiah, would be admitted into the kingdom, to whatever nation they might belong, but Israelites who refused to repent and believe would be rejected. John foresaw the difficulties with which Jesus would have to contend, and even predicted for Him a death like his own (Jn 1²⁹). In his preaching John appealed largely to the emotion of fear. He declared that the Messianic age would be ushered in by a terrible act of judgment. The Messiah would hew down every unfruitful tree with the axe of retribution. With the fan of judgment he would winnow the wheat, casting the useless chaff into unquenchable fire. Let hypocrites, especially Pharisees and Sadducees, beware, for only by true repentance could they flee from the wrath to come. Let all men practise charity, sharing their goods with their neighbours. Let publicans collect no more than the taxes due. Let soldiers avoid all violence, and be content with their wages. So and so only could they enter into the kingdom: see Lk 3¹⁰⁻¹⁴. Josephus alludes to John, but in a brief and guarded manner, as 'a good man, who commanded the Jews to exercise virtue both as to righteousness towards one another, and piety towards God, and so to come to baptism.'

St. Matthew and St. Luke both supplement St. Mark's brief account of John from other sources.

1. In those days] i.e. 26 A.D. The wilderness of Judæa] a desert tract about 10 m. wide to the W. of the Dead Sea, including also the W. bank of the Jordan near its mouth. The chief towns in it were Engedi and Tekoa.

2. Repent ye] Repentance is not mere sorrow for sin, but a real change of life. It includes, (1) contrition, i.e. sorrow for sin, regarded as an offence against God; (2) confession of sin, always to God, and, where man has been injured, also to man; (3) amendment of life. The kingdom of heaven] St. Matthew nearly always employs this rabbinical phrase instead of 'the kingdom of God.' 'Heaven' so used is a reverential substitute for 'God.' 'The kingdom of heaven' is, of course, the kingdom of Christ, which the Baptist certainly regarded as spiritual. On the precise meaning of the phrase in this Gospel see the Intro., also the notes on the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5-7), and on the parables.

3. For this is he, etc.] words of the evangelist, not of the Baptist. Isa 40³ is quoted according to LXX. In Isaiah the words are a summons to make level the roads before Jehovah, who is leading home His people from the Babylonian captivity. St. Matthew typically applies them to the entry of Israel, after their long period of waiting, into the Messianic kingdom.

4. Camel's hair] i.e. either a camel's skin, or cloth woven from camel's hair. John's dress was a protest against the luxurious robes of soft wool, which were fashionable at the time. Locusts] They are still eaten in the East, especially by the poor. After being thrown into boiling water their wings and legs are torn off; they are then sprinkled with salt, and either boiled or roasted. Sometimes they are fried in butter or oil. Wild honey] still plentiful in the wilderness, where it flows from combs built in the crevices of the rocks. Certain trees also exude a juice called tree-manna, or honey, and some suppose that this is meant.

6. Were baptized] The Baptism of John was specifically a baptism of repentance, of which public confession was the pledge and evidence. Its significance can be best described in the words of Isaiah: 'Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek judgment' (justice), 'relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow' (Isa 1¹⁶; cp. Zech 13¹). It has points of contact with the baptism of proselytes or converts from heathenism. John required circumcised Jews of the seed of Abraham to submit to his baptism, and thereby to declare themselves outside the Messianic kingdom, and unfit to enter into it without a moral purification. This was distasteful to the pride of the Pharisees, who took offence at being treated as proselytes (Lk 7³⁰). From Jn 1²⁵ it may be gathered that there was a general expectation that the Messiah and those closely associated with Him would baptise, so that John's action was in accordance with Jewish ideas. John's Baptism differed from that of Jesus in being of a preparatory character. It did not confer the Spirit, and was not recognised as equivalent to Christian baptism (Ac 18²⁵ 19³). Confessing their sins] The Gk. word generally, but not always, means a public confession, and that seems to be the sense here. For an example of public confession and repudiation of past sins in connexion with Christian baptism, see Ac 19¹⁸.

7. Pharisees and Sadducees] The Pharisees were the strictest, the most active, and the most influential of the Jewish parties or sects. They were zealously attached to the Law, and still more to 'the traditions of the elders.' By the length of their prayers, the frequency of their fasts, and their devotion to ceremonialism, they sought to win honour with men and merit with God. They were hostile to foreign rule, intensely national and patriotic in spirit, and ready to suffer persecution even unto death for their religion. They believed in angels and spirits (also in revelations made by them), in eternal retribution in the next world, and in the resurrection of the dead. They also cherished with especial fervour the Messianic hope. They were closely allied with the scribes or lawyers, with whom they formed practically one party.

The views of the Sadducees were in most respects the opposite of those of the Pharisees. They made no special pretensions to piety. They acknowledged the Law of Moses as alone authoritative, and rejected the traditions of the elders. They were hostile to the aspirations of the national party, and leaned for support on Rome. Sceptical, or semi-sceptical, in their religious views, they rejected the popular beliefs in angels and spirits, in a future life, and in the resurrection of the dead. They were a worldly, wealthy, and selfishly ambitious party, and their adherents were chiefly found among the chief priests. Their opinions were so unpopular, that they often hesitated to express them publicly. In the Sanhedrin, although the leading Sadducees had seats, Pharisaic views were decidedly in the ascendant.

Come to his baptism] In consequence of John's severe denunciation of their conduct, most of the Pharisees and Sadducees who had come for baptism departed without it: see Lk 7³⁰. Generation (RV 'offspring') of vipers] This peculiar term of condemnation is also applied by Christ to the scribes and Pharisees (12³⁴ 23³⁵). Probably the allusion is to their poisonous opinions and corrupt influence: see Ps 58⁴ Isa 14²⁰. Who hath warned you] Are you, too, conscious of your danger? To flee] The picture is that of vipers fleeing before the flames when the stubble in the fields is set on fire. The wrath to come] the great judgment with which it was generally believed that the age of the Messiah would open. The Jews regarded it mainly as a judgment upon the Gentiles, but John declared that it would be a judgment upon every hypocritical Jew.

8. Fruits meet for repentance] RV 'fruit worthy of repentance.' Fruit is a frequent metaphor for works, and a very suitable one. Fruit is not loosely attached to a tree, but is part of it. It derives its character from the tree on which it grows. So a man's works, i.e. his words and actions, are part of him, and express his true character.

9. We have Abraham to (for) our father] cp. Jn 8^{33, 39, 53}. This insolent spirit is best illustrated by a quotation from the rabbis: 'The fire of hell (Gehenna) has no power to consume even the sinners of Israel, but they go down only to be frightened and slightly singed for their bad actions. Then comes Abraham, who kept all the precepts of the Law, and through his own merit brings them up again.' Of these stones] a hint, not an express statement of the calling of the Gentiles: cp. Ro 4 9⁶ Gal 4²⁸ Jn 8³⁰. 10. A π] a frequent and expressive type of imminent judgment (7¹⁹ Lk 13⁷: cp. Ro 11¹⁷). The trees] i.e. individual Jews, not the nation, though, as a matter of fact, judgment overtook the nation also for its rejection of Christ: cp. 7¹⁹. The fire] see on v. 12.

11, 12. Here is emphatic testimony of John to the Messiahship of Jesus. Jesus is so great that John is unworthy to perform for Him the function of the meanest slave. Jesus is the dispenser of divine sanctification (the Holy Ghost). Jesus is the absolute judge of the human race, with power to reward the good in heaven and to punish the guilty in hell (v. 12). Nothing of importance is really added to this testimony in the Fourth Gospel. There, indeed, the Baptist calls Jesus the Lamb of God and the Son of God, and is aware of His preëxistence; but these things follow naturally from the tremendous prerogatives which even in the Synoptics John assigns to Him. If it be remembered that the synoptic testimony is given before, and the testimony in the Fourth Gospel after Christ's Baptism, all difficulty disappears: see Jn 1^{6, 15, 19} 3²⁷.

11. Whose shoes, etc.] the office of the meanest slave. 'A slave unlooses his master's shoe, and carries it after him; does what he needs for the bath, undresses, washes, anoints, rubs, re-dresses him, and puts on his shoes.'

With the Holy Ghost, and with fire] St. Mark omits 'and with fire.' John says, in effect, 'I can bring you to repentance, but no further. My baptism gives no grace. It only symbolises the greater baptism which Jesus will give. His baptism will give you "the Holy Ghost," i.e. new spiritual life, and inward sanctification, and "Fire," i.e. holy fervour and zeal in God's service': cp. Ac 2³. John here refers directly to Christian Baptism, the spiritual efficacy of which he contrasts with the inefficacy of his own.

12. St. Mark omits this v. Whose fan (or, 'shovel') Jesus holds in His hand the winnowing fan of judgment, for He is the judge of quick and dead. Here John passes far beyond Jewish ideas about the Messiah. His floor] RV 'threshing-floor': not merely Palestine, but the universe. His wheat] i.e. good persons. The garner] heaven. The chaff] the wicked. Unquenchable fire] i.e. Gehenna, hell.

13-17. Baptism of Jesus (Mk 1⁹ Lk 3²¹ Jn 1²²). The Baptism of Jesus has more than one aspect and significance. To John it was with its miraculous accompaniments a sign that Jesus was the promised Messiah and the Son of God (Jn 1³²⁻³⁴). To Israel it was 'the showing to the people' of the promised monarch, and His consecration by the unction of the Holy Spirit to the threefold office of prophet, priest, and king. To the Christian Church it is the type and first example of all true baptism—the baptism, that is, of water and the Spirit. So far all is clear. But when we come to speak of its significance to Jesus Himself we are in a region of mystery, and both prudence and reverence teach us not to dogmatise. Yet we may venture to say this, that the vision at the Baptism was intended primarily for Jesus Himself, and neither for John nor for the multitudes who were present. It was Jesus to whom the heavens were opened, Jesus who saw the Spirit descending as a dove, and Jesus to whom the momentous words were spoken, 'This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' This is expressly testified by St. Matthew and St. Mark, and is not contradicted by St. Luke and St. John, although the last states what St. Luke perhaps also implies in the words 'in a bodily form,' that the vision was also intended for the Baptist. If we take the most natural and obvious interpretation of the incident, we shall hold that our Lord's baptism marked the point in His career when there first awoke in Him the complete consciousness of His divine sonship, and of all the tremendous consequences which this unique relationship to God and man involved. There must have been a time when this consciousness first became fully explicit. He cannot have had it in unconscious infancy, or as a young child. Even as a boy (we are speaking, of course, of His human knowledge) He cannot have possessed it complete. He grew in knowledge of things human and divine (Lk 2⁴⁰⁻⁵²), and one of the things in knowledge of which He grew was the awful mystery of His own Divine-Human Personality. He must, of course, have been always conscious, after attaining the use of reason, of the difference between Himself and other men, of the unique character of His communion with God, and of the greatness of the mission which lay before Him, but He need not have known all. It is possible that full self-knowledge might have hindered rather than helped Him during the thirty years of obscurity which preceded His public ministry. But however that may be, before the ministry began the veil that concealed the mystery of His nature was drawn aside by an inward revelation, and soon the outward testimony of miracles confirmed what the inward voice had declared.

14. I have need] not inconsistent with Jn 1³³ ('I knew him not'). As Jesus approaches, a prophetic presentiment passes through the mind of John that this is the Messiah. The descent of the Spirit makes it a certainty. It is possible, even likely, that as John and Jesus were cousins, they were already acquainted, although John 'knew him not' as the Messiah. As John's baptism was unto remission of sins, it seemed to him strange that Jesus should have consented to such a baptism. But, though sinless, Jesus came to identify himself with sinners. He would be 'under the law that he might redeem those that were under the law' (Gal 4^{4,5}).

15. To fulfil all righteousness] i.e. to fulfil all the ordinances of the old covenant among which our Lord reckoned John's baptism.

16, 17. One of the leading Trinitarian passages in the NT. The voice of the Father is heard proclaiming the essential divinity of the Son, and upon the Son, as He rises from the baptismal waters, the Holy Ghost, the living bond of love and unity in the Godhead, descends. The appearance of the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove was a symbolical vision, and, as spiritual things are spiritually discerned, the vision was probably seen only by our Lord and the Baptist. The dove is a type of the Spirit, because of its innocence, gentleness, and affection; cp. 10¹⁶, 'Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves.' The voice from heaven may be paralleled by the voice at Sinai (Ex 20), to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 4³¹), at the Transfiguration (Mt 17⁵), before the Passion (Jn 12²⁸), to St. Paul (Ac 9⁴), and to St. Peter (Ac 11⁷). The idea that a revelation might be communicated by a supernatural voice, was familiar to the Jews of our Lord's time. The rabbis taught that after the cessation of prophecy, God continued to make revelations to His people by means of the Bath-kol, or heavenly voice. At Jericho, for example, the Bath-kol declared the Rabbi Hillel to be worthy to have the Spirit of God abide upon him, and at Jamnia decided the dispute between the schools of Hillel and Shammai in favour of the former.

16. And he saw] i.e. Jesus saw, though John saw it also.

17. This is] This represents the form in which the Baptist heard the words. 'Thou art' (Mk, Lk) represent the form in which Jesus heard them. My beloved Son] cp. 17⁵. The highest sense is to be given to these words. The Father bears witness, not only to Christ's Messiahship, but to His eternal and divine Sonship, in virtue of which He is from all eternity 'in the bosom of the Father,' loving and beloved. In whom I am well pleased] cp. Isa 42¹ Mt 12¹⁸. Lest the Baptism of Christ should be thought to indicate that He was a sinner like ourselves, the Father was pleased to pronounce Him absolutely sinless. The tense of the Gk is difficult. The Revisers (also Plummer) regard it as a timeless aorist. But it may be an ordinary historical aorist, and thus point to Christ's preëxistence—'in whom I was well pleased,' viz. before the Incarnation and before the creation of the world. The words are also a message full of grace to mankind. As the Son is ever well pleasing and acceptable to the Father, so also are all those who are found in Him.

CHAPTER 4

THE TEMPTATION

1-11. The temptation (Mk 1¹² Lk 4¹). The narrative, which can only have come from our Lord's own lips, describes an actual historical fact, the great temptation which He underwent at the very beginning of His ministry. He was tempted at other times (Lk 4¹³), perhaps at all times (Heb 2¹⁸), during His earthly life, but the two great seasons of trial were now, and immediately before the Passion: Lk 22⁴² Mt 26³⁹. Our Lord records His experience in symbolical language partly because the inward operations of the mind could hardly be represented to men of that age except as visible transactions, but more particularly because the story of Adam's temptation in Gn 3¹ is also told symbolically. Jesus here appears as the second Adam, victorious in the conflict in which the first Adam failed. He wins the victory as man, not as God, so that here the human race in the person of its Head begins to retrieve its defeat and to bruise the Serpent's head, receiving thereby an assurance of final victory. The temptation of the first Adam took place in a garden, i.e. in a universe as yet unspoiled by sin. The temptation of the second Adam took place in a wilderness, i.e. in a world rendered desolate by Adam's fall, and the ultimate effect of His victory will be to make it a garden again. In this connexion should be taken St. Mark's statement that 'He was with the wild beasts.' The wild beasts did not hurt Jesus, because He regained for man the empire over the beasts which Adam lost: 'The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid... They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain' (Isa 11⁶).

The details of three temptations are recorded: (a) The first (vv. 3, 4) was a temptation to abuse His miraculous powers. If, as seems probable, Jesus first received authority to work miracles at His Baptism, the very freshness and greatness of the gift would suggest to the devil the most appropriate form of attack. Jesus was hungry, he also had an unlimited power of working miracles. Why should He remain hungry, when He had the power of making bread? 'Why,' suggested the devil, 'is it right to feed others, and wrong to feed thyself? If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.' So the tempter suggested, but Jesus replied, 'Man shall not live by bread alone but by every word' (i.e. command) 'that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.' These words, taken from Dt 8³, refer to Israel in the wilderness. There they, like Jesus, had no bread, yet they were fed by the word of God's mouth, for God commanded manna to fall from heaven. In effect Jesus said to the tempter, 'It is true that I have no bread, but, since I am here by God's command, He will keep me alive without bread. He has but to utter a word, and I shall be providentially fed, as the Israelites were of old.' If it be asked why it was wrong for Jesus to make bread for His own use, the answer is that in God's working in the world there is in general a strict economy of miraculous power. In the life of Jesus there is not a single example of a miracle worked for His own advantage. In every case His miraculous power was used for the good of others, to remove the ravages of disease and sin, and to advance the kingdom of God, and for these purposes alone was it entrusted to Him. The devil's suggestion was, therefore, a temptation to disobedience, like that of our first parents. Satan would have had our Lord act independently, setting up His will against God's, instead of conforming it to His in filial obedience.

(b) The next temptation (vv. 5-7) was more subtle. The devil took Him in spirit to the lofty platform (not pinnacle) overlooking the courts of the Temple, from which a great multitude could be conveniently addressed. It was from this platform or pulpit that James the Lord's brother delivered the public address which was the immediate occasion of His martyrdom (Euscb. 2. 23). Satan suggested that our Lord should address the assembled multitudes of Israel from this giddy height, and then prove His Messianic claims beyond all question by flying through the air, and descending to the ground unharmed. Stripped of its symbolical form, this was a temptation to take a short and easy road to recognition as the Messiah by giving 'a sign from heaven' which even the most incredulous and unspiritual would be compelled to accept. This short and easy method Jesus decisively rejected. He determined to appeal to the spiritual apprehension of mankind, that they might believe on Him, not because they were astounded by His miracles, and could not resist their evidence, but because they were attracted by the holiness and graciousness of His character, by the loftiness of His teaching, and by the love of God to man which was manifested in all His words and actions. He intended His miracles to be secondary, an aid to the faith of those who on other grounds were inclined to believe, but not portents to extort the adhesion of those who had no sympathy with Himself or His aims.

(c) Then the devil made his last effort (vv. 8-10). He offered Jesus all that he had, 'all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them,' if He would but worship him, i.e. acknowledge his usurped authority, and do evil that good might come. The statement of the devil that all the kingdoms of the earth are at his disposal is a difficult one, but it is in harmony with the NT. view that wealth and power are dangerous snares, which are better avoided, and that religious safety lies in poverty and obscurity. It also harmonises with the familiar experience that the devil often tempts men most severely by making them rich and great. Yet the statement is an exaggeration. The devil's power to dispose of the honour and glory of the world is subject to the permission and overruling providence of God, who continually brings good out of evil. Moreover, since the Ascension of our Blessed Lord, the devil's power over the kingdoms of the earth has, at least in Christian lands, been greatly reduced.

1. Of the spirit] i.e. of the Holy Spirit. God Himself ordained that Jesus should be tempted or tried, because only through temptation can human nature attain to perfection. Even the angels had to pass through a similar trial. Into the wilderness] Since Jesus was 'returning' towards Galilee (Lk), the traditional scene of the temptation, Mount Quarantania, near Jericho, is a suitable one. The devil] The word literally means 'slanderer' or 'accuser.' See special note below.

2. Fasted forty days] It was God's will that before beginning His work Jesus should retire from the world and give Himself entirely to fasting and prayer, with meditation upon His future plan of action. We may suppose that He was so absorbed in contemplation of His Messianic work, that He was not conscious of physical need. For parallels see Ex 34²⁸ 1 K 19⁸ Lk 1⁸⁰ Gal 1¹⁷.

3. If thou be] Probably Satan expressed doubt in order to tempt Jesus to prove Himself the Son of God by a miracle. 4. See prefatory remarks. 5. The holy city] This phrase, peculiar to this Gospel, marks a thoroughly Jewish affection for Jerusalem: see 27⁵³, and cp. 5³⁵. A (RV 'the') pinnacle] see prefatory remarks.

6. The devil is a good theologian, and can quote Scripture to his purpose. Here he quotes Ps 91^{11,12}, omitting one line. The general nature of this temptation is indicated in prefatory remarks. It was, besides, an incitement to tempt God presumptuously by deliberately incurring unnecessary danger.

7. See Dt 6¹⁶. Deuteronomy was one of Jesus' favourite books. 8. See prefatory remarks. 10. See Dt 6¹³, and 10²⁰. 11. Ministered unto him] i.e. perhaps with spiritual refreshment. Cp. Lk 22⁴³.

Note. (1) St. Matthew and St. Luke for the Temptation have access to some other authority than St. Mark, who is here very brief. The order of St. Matthew seems superior to that of St. Luke. (2) If the Temptation of Jesus was a reality (and we can scarcely doubt that it was), the Tempter must have been met and conquered by Him in the strength of His human nature, assisted by divine grace. As God, He could not be tempted at all.

12-17. Beginning of the Galilean ministry (Mk 1^{14,15} Lk 4^{14,15,31}). It might be thought from the synoptic account that Jesus began His Galilean ministry immediately after His Baptism and Temptation. But from the Fourth Gospel it is clear that this was not so. Jesus was baptised late in 26 A.D. He then remained for a time in the neighbourhood of the Baptist, five of whose followers, Andrew, John, Philip, Peter, and Bartholomew, attached themselves to Him, and followed Him back to Galilee. Then in April 27 A.D. He went up to Jerusalem to keep the Passover (the first passover of the ministry) and cleansed the Temple for the first time. He then baptised in the country districts of Judæa with great success (Jn 2, 3). The length of this Judean ministry is disputed. Prof. Sanday thinks that it lasted only 3 or 4 weeks, but most authorities assign to it 8 months: see on Jn 1³⁷. The Galilean ministry begins, therefore, either in May, 27 A.D. or more probably in December of the same year: see Jn 1¹⁹⁻⁴⁵.

12. Departed into Galilee] i.e. from Judæa, where He was baptising (Jn 3²³). He took the route through Samaria (Jn 4⁴), staying at Sychar two days to preach to the Samaritans. Jesus had probably intended to make Jerusalem and Judæa the chief scene of His ministry, but changed His policy owing to the hostility of the Pharisees (Jn 4¹). In many respects Galilee was better suited to His purpose than Judæa. The Galileans were more tolerant, less conservative, and less under the power of the priests and Pharisees than the Judæans. There was a large Gentile population in Galilee, and much of the trade between Egypt and Damascus passed through the country. The people were more industrious, prosperous, and enterprising than the Judæans, who were jealous of them, and affected to despise them.

13. And leaving Nazareth] He went, as was natural, first to Nazareth, but on account of His unfavourable reception there (Lk 1¹⁶), migrated to Capernaum, which is on the NW. coast of the Sea of Galilee. Capernaum is generally identified with the modern Tell Hum. It is in the tribe of Naphtali, but the borders of Zebulun are near. Capernaum was a busy place. Two caravan routes passed through the town. It had a custom-house, and a Roman garrison.

14. The quotation (from Isa 9¹) is, in view of Christ's ministry in Galilee, a singularly apt one, even according to modern ideas. Isaiah prophesies that the northern parts of Israel which have suffered most from the incursions of the Syrians and the Assyrians (2K 15²⁹) will be the first to be restored to prosperity by the Messiah, who will win a great victory in these regions over the enemies of Israel, and establish an eternal kingdom. The quotation is made from memory, and reproduces the original somewhat freely.

15. By the way of the sea] RV 'towards the sea,' i.e. the Sea of Galilee. Beyond Jordan] must be taken to mean 'also the district beyond Jordan.' The other side of the lake was easily reached by boat, and was more than once visited by Jesus (8²³ 14¹³). The district S. of this, E. of the Jordan, was called Peræa, and was the scene of the last stages of our Lord's ministry (Jn 10⁴⁰). Galilee of the Gentiles] In Isaiah the expression means 'district of the Gentiles,' and refers not to the whole of Galilee, but to its northern borders, which were largely inhabited by Gentiles.

16. The darkness means in Isaiah the despair caused by the ravages of the Assyrians: in St. Matthew the spiritual darkness which Jesus came to dispel. 17. The kingdom of heaven] see on 3².

18-22. Call of Simon, Andrew, James, and John (Mk 1¹⁶; cp. Lk 5¹). Simon, Andrew, and John had already been disciples for some time, and so probably had James: see Jn 1¹. The call was therefore not so sudden and unexpected as it appears to be in the synoptic narrative. In Lk 5¹ a very similar call is recorded in connexion with a miraculous draught of fishes, and many suppose the two incidents to be the same. If they are distinct, and this seems the preferable view (see on Lk 5¹), the order of events is as follows. Immediately after His migration to Capernaum Jesus called the four fishermen, who were already disciples, to be apostles. They did not, however, while Jesus remained in Capernaum, entirely leave their trade, but waited for a final summons. This soon came. When about to leave Capernaum for a tour through Galilee, Jesus appeared to them again, and after working a symbolical miracle (Lk 5¹), called them finally to accompany Him. He called them while actually at their work, as He called Matthew (9⁹), in order to show that no idle or useless person can be a Christian.

19. Fishers of men] 'The fisherman Peter did not lay aside his nets but changed them' (Aug.). 21. According to Lk the four fishermen were partners. 22. St. Mark mentions that there were hired servants in Zebedee's boat, which indicates that the family was not poor. St. John was known to the high priest, and probably had a house in Jerusalem (Jn 18¹⁶ 19²⁷). St. Matthew was rich. It cannot be shown that any of the apostles were specially poor or of a mean social position. 'Unlearned and ignorant men' (Ac 4¹⁸), simply means that they had not been trained in the schools of the rabbis. Manual labour was honourable among the Jews, and even the sons of the wealthy were taught trades.

23-25. Journeys of Jesus through Galilee: preaching and healing the sick. St. Matthew interrupts his narrative of what took place at Capernaum to give a general sketch of the early period of the Galilean ministry. After the sermon on the mount he returns to what happened at Capernaum (8¹).

23. All Galilee] A preaching expedition of so comprehensive a character must have lasted several months.

In their synagogues] Synagogues had their origin during the captivity, and rapidly became a general institution after the return. In the time of Christ there was a synagogue not only in every town, but in every village large enough to afford a congregation of ten adult men. The synagogue was primarily a place of worship, but it was also a centre of government, its members forming a local self-governing body. The governing body of a synagogue were called 'elders.' At their head was a 'ruler of the synagogue,' who maintained order during public worship (Lk 13¹⁴), and decided who was to conduct the service (Ac 13¹⁵). The ruler was not a scribe, but ranked immediately after the scribes. Each synagogue had an attendant (Hazzan) (Lk 4²⁰). He was a scribe, but ranked lowest in the scribal body. He had charge of the building, gave the rolls to the readers, called upon the priests to pronounce the benediction at the proper time, and also on week-days acted as schoolmaster. It was he who carried out the judicial sentences of the elders. Many synagogues had an interpreter (methurgeman), who, after the Scripture had been read in Hebrew, gave the Targum, i.e. translated it into Aramaic, which was the vulgar tongue.

The elders of the synagogue were the rulers of the local community both in civil and religious matters. They had power to excommunicate (Lk 6²²), and to scourge (Mt 10¹⁷) with forty stripes save one (Dt 25³ 2 Cor 11²⁴). Unlike the Temple-worship the worship of the synagogue was under the control of the laity. A priest as such had no privilege but to give the blessing. The four chief parts of synagogue worship were, (1) the reading of the Law, (2) of the prophets, (3) the sermon, (4) the prayers. The prayers and lessons were read and the sermon delivered by members of the congregation selected by the ruler. This will explain how it was that Jesus, and afterwards St. Paul, were able to use the synagogues as centres for diffusing Christian truth: cp. Lk 4¹⁶ Ac 13¹⁵. On week-days the synagogues were used as schools for children.

24. All Syria] i.e. the Roman province of Syria. Possessed with devils] See special note below. Lunatick] (lit. 'moonstruck') RV 'epileptic.' Such sufferers were supposed to be influenced by changes of the moon.

He healed them] Great prominence is given in the Gospels to miracles of healing, and our Lord plainly regarded practical work of this kind as an integral part of His work of salvation. Briefly expressed, the teaching of the miracles of healing is as follows: (1) That the preservation of life and health by all the means in our power is a Christian duty. The Christian will seek 'a sound mind in a sound body' for himself and for others. In practice this leads to the establishment of hospitals, efficient sanitation, and factory legislation calculated to protect life and limb and health. (2) That the soul can often be reached through the body. Christ touched the souls of those whom He healed, and the early Church made as many converts by its works of mercy as by its preaching. Missionary societies are well aware of this, and send out many medical missionaries. (3) That pain, disease, and death are no part of God's will for man. Like sin they came into the world against His will, and they are part of those 'works of the devil,' which the Son of God was manifested to destroy. God permits disease, as He permits moral evil, He even overrules it for good, so that sickness may become a visitation from God full of spiritual blessings; nevertheless, disease is no part of His original plan of creation, it is not natural but against nature, and it can have no part in the perfected kingdom of God.

25. Decapolis] i.e. 'ten towns,' a region beyond Jordan, containing originally ten allied or federated cities, among which were Gadara, Pella, Gerasa, and Damascus. It was part of Peræa, and its inhabitants were mainly Greeks.

NOTE ON DIABOLICAL POSSESSION

In the NT. disease, except when it is a special visitation from God (Heb 12⁶), is regarded as the work of Satan (Mt 9³² 12²² Lk 11¹⁴ 13¹⁶ Ac 10³⁸, etc.). In particular, nervous diseases and insanity are represented as due to diabolical possession. This was the universal belief of the time, and our Lord, in using language which implies it, need not be regarded as teaching dogmatically that there is such a thing as possession. There were strong reasons why He should seek to 'accommodate' His language to the popular theory. (1) The insane persons whom He wished to heal, were firmly convinced that they were possessed by devils. This was the form assumed by the insane delusion, and to argue against it was useless. The only wise course was to assume that the unclean spirit was there, and to command it to come forth. (2) It was our Lord's method not rashly or unnecessarily to interfere with the settled beliefs of His time, or to anticipate the discoveries of modern science. The belief in demonic possession, though probably erroneous, was so near the truth, that for most purposes of practical religion it might be regarded as true. He, therefore, did not think fit to disturb it. Believing, as He did, that most of the evil in the universe, including disease, though permitted by God, is the work of Satan, He tolerated a belief which had the merit of emphasising this fundamental truth, and left it to the advance of knowledge in future ages to correct the extravagances connected with it. See also on Mt 8²⁸⁻³¹, Mk 1²¹⁻²⁸.

NOTE ON SATAN

Although from the earliest times the Hebrews believed in various kinds of evil spirits, it was not till the time of the captivity that the idea of a supreme evil spirit, exercising lordship over all orders of demons, emerged into prominence. In the OT. Satan appears only in the prologue to Job (chs. 1, 2), where he ranks with the angels or 'sons of God'; in Zech 3¹, where he is the adversary of Joshua the high priest; and in 1 Ch 21¹, where he tempts David to number Israel. All these passages are subsequent to the captivity. In the NT. Satan is a much more prominent character. His influence is represented as all-pervading. He disposes of earthly kingdoms as he wills. He has an organised kingdom of darkness which cannot be overthrown even by the Christ without a fearful struggle, in which the conqueror tastes the bitterness of death. Physical evil is mainly due to him, for he and his ministers are the direct authors of pain, sorrow, disease, and death. The NT. writers indeed recognise that pain and disease are sometimes inflicted by God Himself for disciplinary purposes, but, upon the whole, they ascribe the universal prevalence of physical evil to the malignant activity of Satan. The moral evil of the world is also ascribed in the main to him. He goes about the world like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, and never ceases from his insidious attempts to detach mankind from their allegiance to their Creator.

That our Lord many times expressed belief in Satan as a personal being, is admitted on all hands. The only question is whether He may not in this matter have accommodated His language to the beliefs of His contemporaries, or perhaps have personified evil in order to express more vividly its pervasive activity. Both suppositions are, on the whole, improbable. The allusions to Satan and his angels as persons are too frequent and emphatic, to make it easy to suppose that our Lord did not believe in their personality; and, moreover, belief in an impersonal devil presents greater difficulties to faith than belief in a personal one. That evil should exist at all in a world created and governed by a good and all-powerful Being, is a serious moral and intellectual difficulty. But that difficulty is reduced to a minimum if we suppose that it is due to the activity of a hostile personality. Opposition to God's will on the part of a personal self-determining agent, though mysterious, is conceivable. Opposition to it on the part of any impersonal evil influence or physical force is (to most modern minds) inconceivable.

CHAPTER 5

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT

5¹⁻⁷²⁹. The Sermon on the Mount: see Lk 6²⁰¹. This sermon is so similar to the sermon reported by St. Luke (Lk 6²⁰), that it is best to regard them as identically the same. It is true that it has been plausibly suggested that our Lord during His preaching tours often repeated nearly the same sermon to different audiences, and that St. Matthew has given us the sermon as delivered at one place and St. Luke as delivered at another, but the resemblances are so extremely close, and the divergencies for the most part so naturally accounted for, that to regard them as identical is more natural. St. Luke's version is much shorter than St. Matthew's (30 vv. against 107), and it contains nothing that is not in St. Matthew except the four woes (Lk 6²¹⁻²⁶). There are, however, striking parallels to St. Matthew's sermon in other parts of St. Luke's Gospel. No less than 34 vv. scattered through his later chs. correspond to utterances in St. Matthew's sermon, so that altogether the two Gospels contain about 61 parallel vv. The natural inference from this is that, upon the whole, St. Luke gives the sermon as our Lord actually delivered it, and that St. Matthew (or, rather, his authority) has inserted at appropriate places in the sermon other utterances of our Lord dealing with the same or similar subjects. In a literal sense, therefore, St. Luke's report is, speaking generally, the more trustworthy, but St. Matthew's is the more valuable as containing numerous authoritative explanations of its meaning. The discourse was probably what we should call an ordination sermon, delivered, as St. Luke states, immediately after the choice of the twelve apostles (Lk 6²⁰). St. Matthew, however, inserts it appropriately enough at the beginning of the Galilean ministry, in order to give the reader a general idea of the Master's teaching at this period.

The great interest of the sermon is that it is a more or less full revelation of Christ's own character, a kind of autobiography. Every syllable of it He had already written down in deeds; He had only to translate His life into language. With it we may compare the wonderful self-revelation in Jn 17, but there is an important difference. There we have His self-revelation as Son of God, holding communion with the Father in a manner impossible to us; here we have Him pictured in His perfect humanity as Son of man, offering us an example, to which, if we cannot in this life completely attain, we can at least approximate through union with Him. In this sermon Christ is very near to us. The blessedness which He offers to the humble and meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers, the seekers after righteousness, and the persecuted for righteousness' sake, He first experienced Himself, and then commended to others. And the power by which He lived this life is the very power by which we also must live it—the power of secret prayer (6⁵¹). St. Luke tells us that the night before this sermon was delivered was spent entirely in private prayer (Lk 6¹²).

The sermon is very important for a right understanding of Christ's conception of 'the kingdom.' It is 'the kingdom of the heavens.' It exists most perfectly in heaven itself, where angels and glorified saints live the ideal life of love and service, finding their whole pleasure in doing God's will and imitating His adorable perfections. This blessed life of sinless perfection Christ brings down to earth in His own person, and makes available for man. Every baptised Christian is taught to pray, 'Thy kingdom come,' and that is interpreted to mean, Let Thy will be done by men on earth as it is done by angels and saints in heaven. The kingdom, then, is just the heavenly life brought down to earth, and its aim and standard is nothing short of the perfection of God Himself, 'Be ye therefore perfect—especially be ye perfect in love—even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect' (5⁴⁸). Of this kingdom God the Father is King (cp. the phrase 'kingdom of God,' used by the other evangelists, and the ancient Doxology to the Lord's prayer), but Jesus Himself exercises the immediate sovereignty, being the Father's full representative and endowed with all His powers. He is expressly called King only in Mt 25³⁴⁻⁴⁰, but His regal authority is sufficiently implied in the Sermon on the Mount, where He appears in the character of a divine legislator (5²¹), as the judge of quick and dead (7²¹⁻²³), and as the sole revealer of absolute truth (7²⁴⁻²⁶).

The inward and spiritual view of the kingdom, which is prominent in the Sermon on the Mount, is not inconsistent with its identification elsewhere with the visible Church of Christ (16^{18,19}), which includes both worthy and unworthy members (13⁴⁷). Our Lord identifies His Church with the kingdom of heaven (16^{18,19}), because it is the divinely appointed means of establishing it. To it is entrusted the awful responsibility of implanting and nourishing the spiritual life of God's children. As to unworthy members of the Church, although they are 'in' the kingdom, they are not 'of' it.

The profound impression which the Sermon made at the time has been surpassed by the impression which it made on subsequent generations. The Mount of Beatitudes has become to all the chief nations of the world what Sinai was to Israel, the place where an authoritative moral code, and what is more than a code, an authoritative moral ideal, was promulgated. Not even the most sceptical deny that it shows originality and genius of the highest order, and reveals a character of unequalled moral sublimity. The many parallels and resemblances to this sermon adduced from rabbinical writings, some of which are quoted in the commentary, rather enhance than detract from its unique character. Its use of current rabbinical phraseology only throws into greater prominence its matchless originality and independence. But what struck the hearers even more than its moral splendour and originality, was the tone of authority with which it was delivered (7²⁹). Jesus spoke, not as a scribe dependent on tradition, nor even as a prophet prefacing His words with a 'Thus saith the Lord,' but as one possessed of an inherent and personal claim upon the allegiance and obedience of His hearers. In His own name and by His own authority He revised the Decalogue spoken by God Himself on Sinai, and declared Himself the Lord and Judge of the human race, before whom, in the last great day, every child of man will stand suppliant-wise to receive his eternal recompense. It is sometimes said that the Sermon on the Mount contains little Theology and no Christology. In reality it expresses or implies every claim to supernatural dignity which Jesus ever made for Himself, or His followers have ever made for Him.

Analysis of the Sermon.

I. The Beatitudes. What kind of persons are really blessed or happy (5³⁻¹²).

II. The relation of Christ's disciples to the world as its salt and light (5¹³⁻¹⁶).

III. The relation of the New Teaching to the Law and the prophets as their fulfilment. It repeats ancient ordinances which were imperfect and transitory, expands the moral and spiritual principles of the OT. to their full development, and in so doing enables Judaism to become the religion of the human race (5¹⁷⁻⁴³).

IV. Practical instructions in righteousness for the citizens of the kingdom, forming a striking contrast to the ideas of righteousness current among the Scribes and Pharisees. Alms, prayer, forgiveness, fasting, wealth, freedom from anxiety, rash judgments, reserve in communicating sacred knowledge, persistence in prayer, the two ways, the necessity of good works, stability of character (6¹⁻⁷²⁷).

1. The multitudes] viz. those mentioned in 4²³. A (RV 'the') mountain] The traditional site is the Horns of Hattin, or Mount of Beatitudes, a low, square-shaped hill with two summits, about 7 m. SW. of Capernaum. St. Luke says that the sermon (if indeed he is speaking of the same one) was delivered 'in the plain' (AV), or 'on a level place' (RV). If we wish to harmonise, we can say that 'the level place' was half-way down the mountain.

Was set] The usual attitude of Jewish rabbis in teaching, indicating authority. So in the early church the preacher sat, and the congregation (including the emperor) stood. His disciples] i.e. not only the Twelve, as would be the probable meaning in the Fourth Gospel, but Christ's followers in general. The Twelve had already been chosen, although St. Matthew places the event later (10²⁻⁴), and this sermon was their ordination address: see Lk 6¹³.

1-12. The Beatitudes. Properly speaking, the beatitudes are seven in number, vv. 10, 11, 12, forming an appendix. These three vv. being counted in, the number of beatitudes is raised, according to different methods of division, to eight, or nine, or ten, the last corresponding to the number of the ten commandments. St. Luke has only four, the first, fourth, second and eighth, in that order. As recorded in St. Luke the beatitudes are more paradoxical and startling. They appear to bless actual poverty, hunger, and mourning, and are followed by four woes upon the wealthy and those who receive their consolation in this life. In form St. Luke's beatitudes are possibly more original than St. Matthew's—they are certainly more difficult—but the sense is best expressed by St. Matthew. The beatitudes express, (1) the qualifications necessary for admission into Christ's kingdom; (2) the blessedness or happiness of those who possess those qualifications; (3) in St. Luke expressly, and in St. Matthew by implication, the misery of those who do not. Observe that the qualifications of the citizens of the kingdom are not the performance of certain legal acts, but the possession of a certain character, and that the 'sanctions' or promised rewards, unlike those of the Decalogue, are of a spiritual nature. The beatitudes must have been a painful disillusionment to those who believed that the coming kingdom of the Messiah would be a temporal empire like that of Solomon, only differing from it in its universal extension and unending duration. The virtues here regarded as essential, humility, meekness, poverty of spirit, are the very opposite of those ambitions, self-assertive qualities, which the carnal multitude admired. We cannot doubt that Jesus intended the beatitudes, and indeed the sermon generally, to act like Gideon's test, and to sift out those who had no real sympathy with His aims. Somewhat later He carried the sifting process still further, and some who had stood this test, 'went back, and walked no more with Him' (Jn 6⁶⁶).

FIRST BEATITUDE

3. Blessed] The beatitude type of utterance, like the parable, is not without example in the OT. (Pss 1¹ 41¹ 65⁴ 84⁵⁻⁷ 89¹⁵ 119^{1,2} 128^{1,2}, etc.), but Christ has made both types peculiarly His own. Beatitudes express the essential spirit of the New Covenant, in contrast to the Old, which was prodigal of denunciations (Dt 27, 28, 29, etc.). The thunders of Sinai proclaiming the Decalogue form a striking contrast to the gentle voice of the Son of man on the Mount of Beatitudes proclaiming the religion of love. Blessedness is higher than happiness. Happiness comes from without, and is dependent on circumstances; blessedness is an inward fountain of joy in the soul itself, which no outward circumstances can seriously affect. Blessedness consists in standing in a right relation to God, and so realising the true law of a man's being. According to Christ, the blessed life can be enjoyed even by those who are unhappy, a paradox which the ancient world, with the exception perhaps of the Stoics, did not understand. The Greeks thought that the blessed life was possible only for a very few. It was impossible for slaves, for the diseased, for the poor, and for those who die young. Christ taught that it is possible for all mankind, for the meanest slave, and the most wretched invalid, as well as for the wealthy, the prosperous, and the great. He went even beyond the Stoics. They taught that the wise man is blessed. Jesus opened the blessed life to the simple and uneducated.

The poor in spirit] St. Luke, 'Blessed are ye poor.' The expression is difficult, and is interpreted in two ways. (1) 'The poor in spirit' are those who feel themselves spiritually poor, and in need of all things, and so approach God as penitents and suppliants, beseeching Him to supply their needs, clothe their nakedness, and enrich their poverty. Poverty of spirit is the opposite of pride, self-righteousness, and self-conceit; the spirit of the publican rather than of the Pharisee; the spirit of those who wish to learn rather than to teach, to obey rather than to command, and are willing to become as little children in order to enter into the kingdom of heaven. (2) Others, following St. Luke's version, see in the saying a more definite reference to actual riches and poverty. They understand our Lord to mean that a Christian, whether rich or poor, must have the spirit of poverty, i.e. he must possess his wealth as if he possessed it not, and be willing to resign it at any moment without regret, and to say with Job, 'The LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD.' This interpretation makes a spirit of detachment from the world and all its allurements, of which wealth is for most men the chief, the first condition of the blessed life.

For theirs is the kingdom of heaven] not only 'shall be theirs hereafter,' but 'is theirs now.' The kingdom is here regarded, like eternal life in the Fourth Gospel, as a present possession. Usually it is regarded in this Gospel as something future, manifested only at the end of the world. On 'the kingdom' see prefatory note and Intro.

The rabbinical parallel to this beatitude is chiefly interesting by way of contrast. It runs, 'Ever be more and more lowly in spirit, since the expectancy of man is to become the food of worms.'

SECOND BEATITUDE

4. They that mourn] St. Luke (following a different recension of the Sayings) has, 'Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh.' That sorrow of the acutest kind (and that is what the Gk. indicates) can minister to blessedness, is a paradox which the world cannot understand, but which is profoundly true in the experience of believers. (1) The sorrows that God sends or permits, if received with humility and submission, ever refine and ennoble the character, and elevate it into closer union with the Father of spirits. Hence the apostle can even 'glory in tribulations also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience' (i.e. tried and proved character); 'and experience, hope' (Ro 5^{3,4}); and a follower of his can write, 'Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them that have been exercised thereby' (Heb 12¹¹). (2) Those who mourn for the sorrows of others out of Christian sympathy, are rewarded by the very exercise of that sweet act of compassion, and find many comforters in their own real sorrows. (3) Those who mourn for sin with a godly sorrow, saying with the publican, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' are comforted by the removal of the burden of sin, and the forgiveness of its guilt. (4) Those who mourn for the sins of others, who pray earnestly for their conversion, are often comforted by the success of their prayers.

Comforted] the word implies strengthening as well as consolation. The faculty which is exercised by the true mourner is strengthened by use. Those who bear their sorrows patiently grow in patience; those who sorrow for others grow in sympathy; those who sorrow for their own sin deepen their penitence; those who intercede for the sins of the world grow in the likeness of the great Sin-bearer and Intercessor. The comfort comes from the exercise of the spiritual faculty, and from the consciousness of growing more like God ; but there is also that final comfort in the world to come, when 'God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes' (Rev 7¹⁷).

THIRD BEATITUDE (not in St. Luke)

5. The meek] A quotation from Ps 37¹¹. The 'earth' is not only the new earth spoken of 2 Pet 3¹³ Rev 21¹, but refers also to the present world. The words are a prophecy that meekness will prove a greater power in the world than pride. This was revolutionary doctrine. Judaism meant pride of race and privilege ; Rabbinism, pride of learning ; Roman imperialism, pride of power ; Greek culture, either pride of intellect or pride of external magnificence. All agreed that the meek man was a poor creature, and the worldly world thinks so still. Nevertheless, meekness is irresistibly attractive, and exercises a wider spiritual influence than any other type of character. 'He hath put down the mighty from their seat, and hath exalted the humble and meek.' See further on 18¹.

Meekness is a virtue which can be exercised both towards God and towards man ; and inasmuch as it involves self-control, it is not a weak but an heroic quality. 'He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty ; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city' (Prov 16³²). A meek man is one who is not easily provoked or irritated, and forbearing under injury or annoyance.

FOURTH BEATITUDE

6. That hunger and thirst after righteousness] St. Luke, 'ye that hunger now.' Righteousness here is goodness or Christian perfection in its widest sense : cp. v. 48 Ps 42^{1, 2}.

Filled] i.e. shall attain completely to the character at which they aim.

FIFTH BEATITUDE (not in St. Luke)

7. The merciful] Our salvation is made dependent upon our showing mercy to every creature that can feel. Every kind of cruel amusement, or cruel punishment, as well as every wanton act of cruelty, is strictly forbidden. It should be remembered that cruel speeches no less than cruel acts are forbidden by this commandment. Words can lacerate more deeply than stripes. By the ancient Greeks and Romans the emotion of pity was generally regarded as a fault, or at least as a weakness. The Stoics were in practice humane men, but they regarded pity in the abstract as a vice. 'The wise man,' they said, 'succours, but does not pity.'

SIXTH BEATITUDE

8. The pure in heart] The 'heart,' both in the OT. and NT., stands for a man's inmost soul, and so the purity here required is not the ceremonial cleanness of the Levitical law, nor even the blamelessness of outwardly correct conduct, but complete purity of inward thought and desire. A thing is pure when it contains no admixture of other substances. Benevolence is pure when it contains no admixture of self-seeking ; justice is pure when it contains no admixture of partiality ; love is pure when it contains no admixture of lust. A man's heart is pure when it loves only the good, when all its motives are right, and when all its aspirations are after the noble and true. Purity here is not synonymous with elasticity, but includes it. See God] Just as the harp does not understand truthfulness, and does not recognise it when he encounters it, so the unholy person does not understand sanctity, and cannot understand the all-holy God. But those who cleanse their hearts understand God in proportion to their purity, and one day, when they are cleansed from all sin, will see Him face to face (Heb 12¹⁴ 1 Jn 3^{2, 3} Rev 22¹).

SEVENTH BEATITUDE (not in St. Luke)

9. The peacemakers] Peacemakers are (1) those who reconcile men at variance, whether individuals, or classes of men (e.g. employers and employed), or nations ; (2) those who work earnestly to prevent disputes arising or to settle them peaceably (e.g. by arbitration) ; (3) those who strive to reconcile men to God, and so to bring peace to their souls. They shall be called the children (RV 'sons') of God] Because in this aspect they are especially like their heavenly Father, who has sent peace and goodwill down to earth in the person of His dear Son, who is charged with a message of reconciliation.

EIGHTH BEATITUDE

10. Which are persecuted] RV 'that have been persecuted.' The reference is not to past persecutions of OT. saints, but to those of the disciples, which Jesus sees to be inevitable, and graphically represents as already begun.

12. The prophets which were before you] By ranking His disciples with the OT. prophets, Jesus seems to imply that they also are prophets. It is this possession of prophetic gifts by the first disciples which justifies the Church in regarding the NT. as the inspired Word of God : see Ac 11²⁷ 13¹ 15² 21¹⁰ 1 Cor 12²⁸ 14¹ Eph 2²⁰ 3⁵ 4¹¹, etc.

13-16. The relation of Christ's disciples to the world. Nothing corresponding to this section is found in St. Luke's sermon, but parallels occur in Lk 14^{31, 32} and 11³³. The section is well placed by St. Matthew. The connexion of thought is clear and natural. Having spoken of their persecutions, Jesus proceeds to encourage His disciples by speaking of the greatness of their mission in the world. They are to be the salt of society. Salt preserves food from corruption, and seasons it, making it wholesome and acceptable. So the disciples are to purify the society in which they move, setting a good example and counteracting every corrupt tendency. For this purpose their Christianity must be genuine. Men must feel that they are different from the world, and have a savour of their own. The salt which has lost his savour is the Christianity which is only worldliness under another name. Again, the disciples are to be the light of the world, being the representatives of Him who is the world's true Light (Jn 8¹²). They are to enlighten it as its teachers, and also by the examples of their lives. They are also to be as a city set on a hill, which cannot be hid. In this figure they are contemplated not as individuals but as a visible society, or Church. The old city set on a hill was Jerusalem (Ps 48²). This was shortly to be trodden under the foot of men as having lost its savour, and the new society was to take its place. Christ here solemnly warns us that the standard of living in the Church must be visibly higher than the standard of living in the world. A Church which tolerates a corrupt ministry, or laxity of life among its communicants, is not bearing its witness before the world.

13. Wherewith, etc.] i.e. either, 'Wherewith shall the world be salted?' or 'Wherewith shall the salt' (i.e. the disciples) be salted?' cp. Mk 9⁵⁰ Lk 14³⁵. Salt in Palestine, being gathered in an impure state, often undergoes chemical changes by which its flavour is destroyed while its appearance remains.

15. A candle] RV 'a lamp': see Mk 4²¹ Lk 8¹⁶ 11³³. A bushel [Lat. modius] RV 'the bushel,' i.e. the one which is kept in the house for measuring the corn or meal for the daily provision of bread. The modius here is probably the Heb. seah = 1½ pecks.

16. Let your light] This is not inconsistent with the command to be humble and to do good by stealth, especially as the collective good works of the Christian brotherhood as a whole are chiefly spoken of. 'Our light is to shine forth though we conceal it,' says St. Hilary. Origen and other writers testify that the good works of Christians did more to convert the world than miracles or preaching.

17-20. Christianity as the fulfilment of the Law and the Prophets. This section is especially appropriate in St. Matthew's Jewish Gospel. St. Luke's sermon, being for Gentile readers, has nothing similar, and in his whole Gospel there is only one parallel v. (Lk 16¹⁷). In one aspect Christ's attitude to the Law was conservative. He regarded Christianity as continuous with, and in a true sense identical with, the religion of the Law and the Prophets. He could even repeat the current teaching of the rabbis that the Law was eternal, and that not a jot or tittle could be taken from it. He severely rebuked such of His disciples as should presume to despise or undervalue the smallest part of the OT. They should not indeed be excluded from His kingdom, but they should be the least in it (v. 19). On the other hand, He made it clear that this eternal validity did not belong to the Law as Moses left it, but to the Law as 'fulfilled,' i.e. developed, or completed by Himself. He superseded the Law and the Prophets by fulfilling them, and He fulfilled them in all their parts. The spiritual and moral teaching of the Law and of the Prophets He freed from all lower elements and carried forward to their ideal perfection. The political teaching of the Law He completed by laying down the principles of the perfect state. Even the ceremonial law He fulfilled. The Law of Sacrifice was fulfilled in His sacrificial death, and in the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise and thanksgiving in which His precious death is pleaded. Circumcision became 'the circumcision made without hands,' i.e. Holy Baptism. The Passover became the Lord's Supper. The sanctification which the Law gave to one day in seven, was extended by Christ to every day in the week, and even the sabbath itself was, in a certain sense, perpetuated and continued by Him as the Christian 'Lord's Day.' Even such minor matters as ceremonial ablutions and the distinction of meats received their due fulfilment when Christ made possible the inward holiness which these outward observances symbolised.

Above all, the prophets were fulfilled by Christ in a most comprehensive way. He was not content simply to carry out their idea of the Messiah, wonderful as it was. He improved upon it, or, in His own words, 'fulfilled it.' No careful student of the OT. can fail to see how infinitely the actual NT. fulfilment exceeded the expectation of even the most enlightened OT. prophets. This, and not the mere literal fulfilment of their predictions, is what Jesus meant by 'fulfilling the prophets.'

18. One jot (Gk. iota) stands for Yod, the smallest letter in the Heb. alphabet. Tittle (lit. 'little horn') is one of those minute projections by which otherwise similar Heb. letters are distinguished: cp. Lk 16¹⁷. The rabbis taught, 'Not a letter shall perish from the Law for ever.' 'Everything has its end: the heaven and the earth have their end; there is only one thing excepted which has no end, and that is the Law.' 'The Law shall remain eternally, world without end.' Christ uses the rabbinical language in a new meaning of His own (see above).

19. A warning against the disparagement of the OT., now so common. 20. The sense is, 'I mention doing as well as teaching, for unless you practise what you preach, you will be unable, like the Scribes and Pharisees, to enter into the kingdom of heaven.'

21-26. Revision of the Law of Murder (not in St. Luke's sermon, but a parallel to vv. 25, 26 occurs in Lk 12^{58,59}). Christ now shows by a few illustrative examples how the Law is to be understood and practised by His disciples: in other words, how it is to be 'fulfilled.' The old law punished only the act of murder. The Law of Christ condemns the emotion of anger in its very beginnings. Unreasonable anger is declared a crime in itself, to be punished as such by the local tribunal (the judgment). Its mildest expression in word (Raca) is to be considered a capital offence, to be dealt with by the supreme Sanhedrin (the council). Its more abusive expression (thou fool) is worthy of hell-fire. Murder itself is not mentioned as being an impossible act for a disciple of Christ. The language is, of course, rhetorical. Its intention is to mark the immense gulf that separates the morality of the Law from the morality of the Gospel.

The passage is interesting as being the first clear reference in the NT. to Christianity as a Church or Organised Society. The Church is spoken of under Jewish terms ('the judgment,' 'the council,' 'the gift brought to the altar'), but a Christian sense is certainly to be read into them. It is implied that the Church will exercise moral discipline over its members, and that its public worship will be in a certain sense sacrificial: cp. Heb 13¹⁰. If it be asked whether the graduated punishments mentioned are temporal or eternal, ecclesiastical or divine, the answer is 'both'; for, according to Christ's promise, the discipline of the Church on earth, when rightly exercised, will be ratified in heaven (Mt 16¹⁹ 18¹⁸; cp. Jn 20²³).

21. It was said by them of old time] RV 'to them of old time.' It was said by God Himself. Hence Christ, in adding to it by His own authority ('But I say unto you'), claims to be equal to God. So also in vv. 28, 32, 34, 39, 43: see Ex 20¹³. The judgment] i.e. the local tribunals of seven men appointed in every village (Dt 16¹⁸ 2 Ch 19⁵, Jos. 'Antiq.' 4.8.14). They appear to have had the power of the sword. 22. Brother] either a fellow-Christian or a fellow-man. Without a cause] RV omits.

Raca (Aramaic) i.e. 'Empty-head': cp. Jg 11¹². The council] i.e. the supreme Sanhedrin of seventy-one members at Jerusalem having cognisance of the most serious offences, such as blasphemy. Thou fool] i.e. 'thou wicked and godless man': see Ps 14¹. Some think that the word here (more) is not Gk. but Heb. (= moreh, rebel). Hell fire] RV 'the hell of fire,' lit. 'the Gehenna of fire.' 'Gehenna,' i.e. the valley of Hinnom (an unknown person), was the place in or near Jerusalem where children were made to pass through the fire to Moloch, and, according to Jewish tradition, where the bodies of criminals were burnt. Hence Gehenna became a synonym for hell, the place of final punishment.

25. Thine adversary] The injured brother of v. 22 is now represented under the figure of a creditor who has power to bring the debtor before the judge, and to cause him to be cast into prison. Prison] i.e. divine punishment in general, whether in this world or beyond the grave in the intermediate state (Hades), from which release was regarded as possible (12³²). Not, however, in hell (Gehenna), from which there is no release (18⁸). The idea is that God will exact the full penalty for all offences against the law of love. In 1 Pet 3¹² 'prison' refers exclusively to punishment in the intermediate state: cp. Jude v. 6. 26. Farthing [Lat. quadrans] about half-a-farthing. Lk (12⁴⁹) has lepton, i.e. about a quarter of a farthing.

27-30. Revision of the Law of Adultery. Jesus expands the Mosaic prohibition of adultery into a law of inward purity of the strictest kind, and gives important counsel to the tempted. 27. By them of old time] RV omits: see Ex 20¹⁴. 29-30. This saying is found in Mk 9⁴⁸, but in a less natural connexion. It is repeated Mt 18⁸. Its meaning is that those who are seriously tempted should discipline themselves with the greatest severity, depriving themselves even of lawful pleasures. Thus certain amusements and certain kinds of reading, in themselves harmless, are to some occasions of sin. Such persons ought to avoid them altogether. Others find drink such a temptation that they ought to be teetotalers. Others find friendships that they value so dangerous that they ought to give them up. This giving up of what is pleasant and lawful, because to us personally it is a spiritual peril, is what our Lord means by plucking out the right eye and cutting off the right hand. Asceticism of this kind is different from the asceticism of those Eastern religions which regard the body as evil. Its principle is that it is better to live a sinless than a complete life. 29. Hell] i.e. Gehenna, the place of final punishment.

31, 32. Revision of the Law of Divorce. Christ restrained the excessive licence of divorce which existed at the time, and declared marriage to be (with possibly a single exception) absolutely indissoluble. Since St. Matthew alone mentions the exception, and all other NT. passages speak of Christian marriage as absolutely indissoluble (Mk 10:2 Lk 16¹⁸ Ro 7³ 1 Cor 7^{10, 11}), it is maintained by very many, probably the majority, of recent critics, that the words 'except for fornication' both here and in 19¹ are an interpolation, introduced by Jewish Christians to modify the excessive strictness of the original utterance, and that Christ Himself forbade divorce altogether. On the principles of criticism now generally accepted, this view is highly probable.

If we accept the words 'except for fornication' as authentic, it is best to understand them as meaning 'except for adultery,' and thus to bring our Lord's teaching into line with that of Shammai, who, in opposition to the laxer view of Hillel, who allowed divorce for any, even the most trivial cause, permitted it only for adultery. The other view that 'fornication' here means premarital sin, for which, when discovered, a Jewish husband was allowed to repudiate his newly-married bride (see Dt 22^{13, 14}), is not so probable, though it is, of course, possible. The question of remarriage after divorce presents considerable difficulty. The remarriage of the guilty party is condemned by our Lord in strong terms: 'Whosoever shall marry her when she is put away' (or, 'whosoever shall marry a divorced woman') 'commiteth adultery.' Whether the innocent party is permitted after a divorce to marry again is a disputed point among Christians. The Eastern Church permits it; the Western Church, upon the whole, forbids it. The stricter rule, though it sometimes inflicts hardships upon individuals, seems the more desirable from the point of view of public policy, seeing that it best maintains the stability of the family, the sanctity and indissolubility of marriage, and the possibility of repentance and reconciliation after sin.

31. See Dt 24¹, and on Mt 19³¹.

32. Shall marry her that is divorced] i.e. for adultery; or, 'shall marry a divorced woman.'

33-37. Revision of the Law of Oaths. The prohibition 'Swear not at all' is to be taken in its widest sense, and not simply as forbidding the common oaths of conversation. Christ looks forward to a time when truthfulness will be so binding a duty that oaths will no longer be necessary even in courts of justice. This is one of those ideal commands which cannot be fully carried out in the present state of society. Our Lord Himself at His trial allowed Himself to be put on oath (26⁶³). But one day there will come a time when a man's word will be as good as his oath.

33. By them] RV 'to them': see Nu 30² Dt 23²¹, etc.

34. Oaths that did not expressly invoke the name of God were considered less binding than those that did. Jesus cuts at the root of the practice by showing that the oaths 'by heaven,' etc. were really in essence, if not in form, oaths by God.

37. Quoted by St. James (5¹²). Of evil] RV 'of the evil one,' i.e. the devil; cp. 6¹³.

38-42. Abolition of the Law of Retaliation; cp. 1k 6²⁻³. It is a difficulty to some that God should ever have sanctioned the barbarous principle of 'an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth' (Ex 21²⁴). They do not reflect that in its own age this principle represented a far-reaching moral reform. The thirst for vengeance is not naturally satisfied with an eye for an eye; it goes on to demand a life. Hence when Moses allowed the injured man to exact an eye and no more, he was imposing a salutary check on private vengeance. Our Lord goes further, and forbids private vengeance altogether. It is true that vengeance contains a good element, viz. righteous anger against wrong, but this is so bound up with personal vindictiveness, and so certain, if gratified, to let loose a man's worst passions, that our Lord forbids it altogether. Christians are not to resent injuries, they are not to attempt to retaliate, they are, in our Lord's figurative language, to turn the cheek to the smiter. Does this forbid us on fitting occasions to expostulate with a wrong-doer, or to bring him to punishment? By no means. There are occasions when in the interests of society, and in the interest of the criminal himself, it is necessary to resist evil and to bring the wrong-doer to justice. Our Lord elsewhere fully recognises this (18¹²).

38. See Ex 21²⁴ Lv 24²⁰ Dt 19²¹. 39. Resist not evil] RV 'Resist not him that is evil,' i.e. the person that would injure you. Right cheek] This is only a figurative illustration of the general principle: cp. vv. 40, 41, 42.

40. Thy coat (Gk. chiton)] 'Vest' or 'shirt' would be better. The cloak (himation) is the outer garment, used also as a covering by night: see on Jn 19²³.

41. Shall compel] RM 'impress.' When Roman troops passed through a district, the inhabitants were compelled to carry their luggage. This compulsory transport was a recognised form of taxation, and is probably what is alluded to here. Translated into modern language, the saying means that Christians ought to pay their taxes and undertake other public burdens cheerfully and willingly. The word translated 'compel' is Persian, and had reference originally to the royal couriers of the Persian empire, who had power to impress men and beasts for the king's service. In Mt 27³² it is used of Simon of Syrene, who was compelled to bear our Lord's cross.

42. Give to him, etc.] Not an exhortation to indiscriminate charity, but to that brotherly love which Christians ought to feel even towards the improvident and wicked. It is right to give to him that asks, but not always right to give him what he asks. The best form of giving or lending is that which helps people to help themselves.

43-48. Hatred of enemies forbidden, love enjoined (Lk 6²⁷⁻³⁶). The maxim 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour' is found in Lv 19¹⁸. The words 'Thou shalt hate thine enemy' are nowhere found in the Pentateuch, which indeed contains isolated texts of an opposite tendency, e.g. Ex 23⁴. Nevertheless, our Lord's words are a fair general description of a code which allowed the law of retaliation, and preserved the rights of the avenger of blood. Even in the Psalms, which represent a later revelation, personal hatred for enemies is openly expressed (e.g. Ps 109). The law of love here proclaimed by our Lord in its most comprehensive sense is the most characteristic feature of Christian morality. In the NT. God is revealed as Love, as a Father who loves his children with impartial affection. And as His supreme perfection consists in Love, so those who would be perfect must love their fellow-men, even their enemies, as He loves them (v. 45).

44. Love your enemies] The word for 'love' is carefully chosen. It is not demanded that we should love our enemies with a natural and spontaneous affection (philein), but with the supernatural Christian love that comes by grace (agapan). Pray for them, etc.] Jesus fulfilled His own injunction when He prayed for those who crucified Him (Lk 23³⁴): see also Ac 7⁶⁰ 1 Cor 6¹².

46-48. The love Christ enjoins is not to be confused with the good feeling and even affection that may exist between members of the same class, the love that is found even among despised tax-gatherers. But "ye shall be perfect" in the obligation of universal love.

46. Publicans] In classical literature 'publicans' are wealthy Romans who bought from the Roman government the right of collecting the taxes in a certain district. The publicans of the NT. are the actual tax-collectors. In NT. times only duties on exports, not direct taxes, were collected by publicans. Publicans bore a bad reputation among the Jews, partly for their dishonesty and extortion, and partly for their unpatriotic conduct in collecting taxes for a foreign power. The rabbis ranked publicans with out-throats and robbers. 48. Perfect] Glorious words! The perfection spoken of is the perfection of Love, the supreme virtue both of God and man (1 Cor 13¹³ 1 Jn 4¹⁶).

1. God's approval, not man's, to be sought in all our actions. Jesus does not say that we are to do good expecting no reward of any kind, but that we are to look for our reward to God alone: see on v. 4. That ye do not your alms] RV 'your righteousness.' The same Heb. word (tsedakah) means both righteousness in general and almsgiving in particular. Our Lord probably used it in the former sense in v. 1, and in the latter sense in v. 2; hence the evangelist translates it differently.

2-4. Ostentation in almsgiving reproved.

2. A trumpet] There was a trumpet in every synagogue, which was sounded on various occasions (e.g. at the beginning of the sabbath and at excommunications), not, however, so far as we know, at the collection of alms. The expression is, therefore, probably a metaphor for 'ostentation.' Hypocrites] In classical Gk. the word means 'an actor.' In the Bible it generally means one who acts a false part in life, i.e. one who pretends to be religious and is not, as here. But sometimes it simply means a wicked person without any idea of hypocrisy, e.g. 24¹¹, and several times in OT., e.g. Job 34³⁰. In the synagogues and in the streets] In a Jewish community alms were given publicly in three ways. (1) Every day three men went round with a basket collecting alms for 'the poor of the world,' i.e. Jews and Gentiles alike. (2) Two synagogue officials went from house to house collecting alms for 'the poor man's chest.' This was for Jews alone. (3) On the sabbath day alms were collected in the synagogue itself. cp. 1 Cor 16². The abuse which our Lord here attacks is probably that of publishing the amounts given, which would naturally lead to ostentatious rivalry. They have their reward] in the praise of men.

3. Let not thy left hand] A metaphor for secrecy. Yet alms need not on all occasions be secret (cp. 5¹⁶, 'Let your light so shine before men,' etc.), provided that ostentation be avoided. The best Jewish thought strongly approved of alms done in secret. In the Temple was 'the treasury of the silent' for the support of poor children, to which religious men brought their alms in silence and privacy, and it was strikingly said by one of the rabbis that 'he that doeth alms in secret is greater than our master Moses himself.' 4. Reward thee openly] RV omits openly. The reward will take place at the Day of Judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed. Yet even in this life there is the reward of a good conscience, and of God's approval.

5-15. Maxims for prayer, and the Lord's Prayer. Perhaps the most significant v. of this section is v. 8, 'Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him.' Christians, therefore, are not to pray mainly with the object of bringing their needs before God who knows them already, but because they love Him and delight to be in His presence, and to open their hearts to Him, and to receive from Him those holy inspirations and aspirations which He gives to those who pray aright. Those who thus understand what prayer is, will not pray like the hypocrites (v. 5), or like the heathen (v. 7). They will pray in secret, as well as in public, from the inner delight of praying. The section concludes with the Lord's Prayer, which is given as the perfect model of all prayer.

5. To pray standing] Standing was the usual Jewish attitude in prayer, as kneeling is with us. In prayer a Jew usually (1) stood, (2) turned towards Jerusalem, (3) covered his head, (4) fixed his eyes downwards. The ancient Church prayed standing on Sundays and festivals, but kneeling on fast-days, and the Eastern Church still observes this rule.

In the synagogues and in the corners of the streets] During the synagogue services those who wished to be thought devout did not follow the public prayers, but said private self-righteous prayers of their own, loud enough to be heard and to attract the attention of the congregation. In the streets the same people would sometimes stand for three hours at a time in the attitude of prayer. The prayers of the phylacteries (see on Mt 23²) were required to be said at a fixed time with great parade and ceremony. When the time came, the workman put down his tools, the rider descended from his ass, the teacher suspended his lecture, to say them. The ostentatious were careful to be overtaken by the prayer-hour in a public place, and to remain longer praying than any one else.

6. Into thy closet] RV 'into thine inner chamber': cp. Isa 26²⁰ 2K 4³³. There is no disparagement here of public worship, which our Lord elsewhere emphatically commends by precept and practice. But private prayer affords a test of sincerity which public worship does not. Shall reward thee openly] RV 'shall recompense thee.'

7. Use not vain repetitions] Our Lord reproves not repetitions, but vain repetitions. In the agony in the garden He Himself prayed three times in the same words. Vain repetition reaches its culminating point in Tibet, where there are mechanical prayer-wheels worked by the wind to spread out written petitions before the Almighty. Good examples of heathen repetitions are found in 1K 18²⁶ and in Ac 19³⁴. The idea that prayers prevail by their number rather than by their earnestness is pagan, and whenever it appears in Christianity is a corruption.

8. Prayer is not to inform God of our needs, as the heathen think, but that we may have conscious communion with Him as His children.

9. After this manner therefore pray ye] Our Lord is not giving simply an illustration of the manner in which Christians ought to pray, but a set form of words to be learnt by heart and habitually used. This is clear from Lk 11¹, 'Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples.' Every Jew was required to recite daily eighteen set prayers of considerable length, or, if hindered by press of business, a summary of them. The rabbis also taught their pupils an additional form of prayer composed by themselves, to be added to these eighteen prayers. Our Lord's disciples would therefore understand that they were to recite the Lord's Prayer every day at the end of their ordinary prayers. That this was done there can be little doubt, for 'The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles,' which probably dates from the 1st cent. A.D., directs the Lord's Prayer to be said three times a day by all Christians.

Our Lord's followers would further regard the prayer as a badge of discipleship, something intended to distinguish the disciples of Jesus from all other men. For this reason among others it has always been regarded as the prayer of the Church, not of the world. So jealously was its secrecy guarded in early times, that, like the Creed, it was only taught to catechumens just before their baptism, and was never used in those portions of public worship to which the heathen were admitted. It was always used at Holy Communion, where it formed the conclusion of the canon or prayer of consecration.

The Doxology ('for thine is the kingdom,' etc.), which is based on Jewish models, is no original part of the prayer. It was added as early as the 1st cent. in the Public Liturgy, and thence passed into the text of St. Matthew's Gospel, where it is found in many MSS.

The prayer is given by St. Luke (11²⁻⁴) in a shorter form (the petitions 'thy will be done' and 'deliver us from evil' being omitted, see RV) and in a different historical connexion. Many account for this by supposing that the prayer was given twice, once complete and once abridged, but it is more probable that it was given only once, viz. on the occasion mentioned by St. Luke, and that St. Matthew has purposely placed it earlier, inserting it in our Lord's first recorded sermon in order to set before the reader at once a comprehensive view of His teaching about prayer. As to the form of the prayer, St. Matthew's version is, without doubt, to be preferred. It is not only fuller, but contains distinct marks of greater closeness to the original Aramaic.

The originality of the Lord's Prayer has sometimes been called in question, but without reason. The parallels adduced from rabbinical prayers are for the most part superficial, and prove no more than that our Lord availed Himself of current Jewish forms of expression.

The Lord's Prayer is generally divided into seven petitions, by some, however, into only six, the last two being reckoned as one. It falls into two distinct portions. The first portion, i.e. the first three petitions, is concerned chiefly with the glory of God; the second portion, i.e. the four latter petitions, with our own needs. Even those needs are mainly of a spiritual character. Bodily wants are mentioned in only one petition, and even that has been generally interpreted of spiritual as well as bodily needs.

9. Our Father which art in heaven] Christians are taught to say 'Our Father' not 'My Father' because they are brethren, and may not selfishly pray for themselves without praying for others. Every time they use this prayer they are reminded that they are a brotherhood, a society, a Holy Church, a family, of which the members are mutually responsible for one another's welfare, and cannot say, as Cain, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' This was also, though in a lower way, a principle of Judaism. The rabbis said, 'He that prays ought always, when he prays, to join with the Church' (i.e. to say 'we' instead of 'I'). God is never addressed as Father in the OT., and references to His Fatherhood are rare. Where they occur (Dt 32⁶ Isa 63¹⁶, etc.) He is spoken of as the Father of the nation, not of individual men. In the Apocrypha individuals begin to speak of God as their Father (Wisd 2¹⁶ 14³ Eccles 23^{1,4} 51¹⁰), and 'Our Father' becomes a fairly common form of address in later rabbinical prayers. Jesus first made the fatherhood of God the basis of religion, and gave it its full meaning. Since the Lord's Prayer is a distinctively Christian prayer, the prayer of the Church, not of humanity, 'Our Father' must be understood in its full Christian sense. In a certain sense God is the Father of all men. He is their Father because He created them, and because, in spite of sin, they are spiritually like Him, being made in His image. But He is the Father of Christians in an altogether new sense. They are His sons by adoption, reconciled to Him by the death of Christ; and, as a continual testimony that they are sons, He sends forth the Spirit of His Son into their hearts, crying, 'Abba,' i.e. 'Father.' Hence none but a Christian, i.e. one who by baptism 'has put on Christ,' and become 'a member of Christ, the child of God and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven,' can rightly use the Lord's Prayer.

Which art in heaven] lit. 'in the heavens.' We are reminded that He who is called Father on earth, is also called Father in the heavens, by the hosts of angels who worship before His throne, and by the spirits of just men made perfect. Heaven is generally plural in NT. (as always in OT.) to indicate that there are various states of glory and blessedness assigned to different persons or to different celestial natures. The expression 'Our Father which art in heaven' is found in Jewish prayers.

Hallowed be thy name] i.e. let Thy Name be regarded as holy by all creatures both in heaven and earth. God's name is His revealed nature, i.e. practically God Himself. Observe that the glory of God, not human needs, is here put first. 'Hallowed be Thy Name' is a prayer that God may be rightly worshipped, and its utterance is in itself an act of worship.

The prayer begins with worship, because worship is the highest spiritual activity of man. It is higher than petition. An unspiritual man can ask for benefits, but no one can worship who does not in his inmost soul apprehend what God is. To worship is to give God His due, to be penetrated with a sense of His perfections, His infinity, His majesty, His holiness, His love, and to prostrate body and soul before Him. In the worship of God is included also due reverence towards all that is God's, or comes from God. We 'hallow His Name,' when we reverence His holy Word, His day, His Sacraments, His Church, His ministers, His saints, and the revelation which He makes to us outwardly through nature, and inwardly in our own souls through the voice of reason and conscience.

10. Thy kingdom come] A glorious prayer of infinite scope, known also, yet not in its full sense, to the Jews, who held it for a maxim that 'That prayer, wherein is not mentioned the kingdom of God is no prayer at all.' 'Thy kingdom come' means, May justice triumph over injustice, truth over error, kindness over cruelty, purity over lust, peace over enmity. It is a prayer for the peace and unity of the Church, for the growth in grace of its members, and for the conversion of the world. But chiefly it is a prayer 'that it may please Thee, of Thy gracious goodness, shortly to accomplish the number of Thine elect, and to hasten Thy kingdom; that we, with all those who are departed in the true faith of Thy holy Name, may have our perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in Thy eternal and everlasting glory.'

Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven] RV 'as in heaven so on earth.' (Lk in RV omits the whole petition.) The nearest Jewish parallel is, 'Do Thy will in heaven, and give quietness of spirit to those who dwell beneath.' 'Thy will be done' is a prayer for grace to conform our wills to the will of God, and for diligence to carry out that will in action. It is also a prayer for the grace of patience. Sometimes God wills that we should suffer pain and sorrow, therefore we pray that we may suffer patiently. In the words 'as in heaven so on earth,' our Lord sets before us the example of the holy angels, who in heaven do God's will perfectly.

11. Give us this day our daily bread] We are not taught to pray for bread for many days, but for one day, God thereby reminding us of our continual dependence upon Him. Nor are we taught to pray for luxuries, but for bread, i.e. for necessary food, shelter, clothing, and health. We pray also for bread for our souls, i.e. the grace to confess our sins and to receive God's pardon, and to persevere, and to know God. But chiefly we pray that we may feed daily by faith on Jesus Christ, who is our true daily bread, and may be worthy partakers of the bread of blessing which makes us one with Him, and Him one with us, and which was to the first Christians literally their daily bread (Ac 2⁴⁰).

The Gk. word here translated 'daily' occurs nowhere else in Gk. literature, and its meaning is entirely unknown. The most likely meanings are, (1) daily bread, (2) to-morrow's bread, (3) heavenly bread. Probably the second is the true one, because the ancient Hebrew gospel of the Ebionites so understood it, perhaps preserving the original Heb. word used by Christ (Mahar).

12. And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors] RV 'as we also have forgiven our debtors.' No one who has not forgiven his enemies can pray the Lord's Prayer, which is another proof that it is meant for Christians alone. To forgive one's enemies is the act of a Christian, and the very opposite of the way of the world. Even for Christians it is so hard that our Lord thinks it needful to remind us of its urgent necessity every day when we say our prayers. Unless we forgive, we cannot be forgiven; unless we put away all malice and bitterness and hatred and revengeful feeling from our hearts, we are yet in our sins. Sin is here called a debt, i.e. it is regarded as 'an act by which we have robbed God of His rights, and incurred an obligation or debt which we cannot satisfy, and in regard to which we can only appeal to the divine pity.' For debts St. Luke substitutes 'sins.' St. Matthew's expression, being the more difficult, is the nearer to the original.

This petition, occurring as it does in a prayer intended for Christians only, is conclusive proof that our Lord did not expect His followers to attain sinless perfection in this life. The belief that a converted Christian lives a perfectly sinless life, is directly contrary to the NT.: see 1 Jn 1⁸.

13. And lead (RV 'bring') us not into temptation] God does not Himself tempt (Jas 1¹³), but He allows us to be tempted, and what God permits is often spoken of in Scripture as His act. The temptations here spoken of are not only the direct assaults of the evil one, but the trials and sorrows of life by which our souls are purified and refined, as gold and silver are purged from their dross in a furnace. We pray here that we may not be tempted 'above that we are able,' but that with the temptation God may also make 'a way to escape,' that we may be able to bear it (1 Cor 10¹³).

But deliver us from evil] RV 'from the evil one' (omitted by Lk in RV). This is a prayer that God may keep us 'from all sin and wickedness, and from our ghostly enemy, and from everlasting death.' The translation 'evil one' in this passage is adopted by nearly all modern commentators: cp. 13^{10, 33} Jn 17¹⁵ Eph 6¹⁶ 2 Th 3³ (RV), especially 1 Jn 2^{13, 14} 3¹² 5^{18, 19}.

For thine is the kingdom] RV rightly omits the Doxology, which is a liturgical addition, dating, however, from an early age, for it is found in 'The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles' (circ. 80-160 A.D., but probably before 100). It is Jewish in origin. In the Temple services the people did not respond 'Amen' to the prayers as they did in the synagogues, but 'Blessed be the name of the glory of His kingdom for ever.' 14, 15. Repeated in Mk 11²⁵: cp. Eph 4³² Col 3¹². One of the weightiest precepts and warnings of the Christian religion, and one of the most neglected.

16-18. Precepts for private fasts (not in St. Luke). Our Lord says nothing of public fasts, because when every one else is fasting there is little temptation to vainglory. In our Lord's time there were not more than five (or six) public fasts (see below), but the strict Jews, especially the Pharisees, were accustomed to fast also on Thursday (the day when Moses ascended Mount Sinai), and on Monday (the day when he came down): see Lk 18¹². Vainglorious persons fasted more frequently even than this, and were careful to advertise the fact. A faster did not wash, or bathe, or anoint the body, or shave the head, or wear sandals, but placed ashes on his head, thereby 'disfiguring his face.' It was said of a certain Rabbi Joshua, that 'all the days of his life his face was black by reason of his fastings.' Christians are directed by our Lord when fasting privately, to conceal the fact, lest they should be guilty of ostentation. This command does not apply to public fasts ordered by lawful authority. On such occasions Christians should fast publicly, both as an outward expression of obedience, and for the encouragement of others who are afraid of ridicule. All excessive fasting which would injure the body or interfere with the due discharge of social duties is contrary to Christianity. People who are strictly abstemious or temperate can fast very little with regard to the quantity of food, but it is open to them to fast with regard to its quality. To fast is also to abstain from usual and lawful indulgences and amusements, so far as can be done in charity and without attracting undue attention. The time saved can be given to prayer, meditation, visiting the sick, etc. Money saved by fasting should of course be spent in charity. The object of Christian fasting is, (1) to subdue the flesh to the spirit, and (2) to fit the mind for devotion. A fast which is not joined with prayer and devotion is no Christian fast. See further 9¹⁴⁻¹⁷ Ae 13² 14²³ 2 Cor 6⁵ 11²⁷.

What fasts were observed in our Lord's time is not quite certain. Only one fast (the Day of Atonement) was prescribed in the Law. During the exile arose the custom of observing four yearly fasts to commemorate the calamities of Jerusalem. That of the fourth month commemorated the capture of Jerusalem (Jer 52⁶⁴), that of the fifth the destruction of the city and Temple (Jer 52¹²), that of the seventh the murder of Gedaliah (Jer 41¹), that of the tenth the beginning of the siege (Jer 52⁴). Of much later origin was the fast on the 13th of Adar, supposed to commemorate the advice of Haman to massacre the Jews. To what extent, if at all, these fasts were observed in Palestine in our Lord's time, is a disputed question.

16. Disfigure their faces] viz. with ashes, or perhaps, 'conceal their faces with a veil': see 2 S 15³⁰ Esth 6¹². 17. Anoint] This may mean 'Anoint thy head as for a banquet,' but anointing was a common practice at all times.

18. Shall reward thee openly] RV 'shall recompense thee.'

19-24. These vv. are not very closely connected, but they form a kind of unity, and are printed as a single paragraph in RV. They deal with excessive care for earthly things: (a) wealth, vv. 19-24; (b) food and raiment, vv. 25-34. For purposes of exposition they may be conveniently divided into three sections.

19-21. The earthly treasure and the heavenly treasure. When do we lay up 'treasure in heaven'? Whenever we give alms (v. 2), or pray (v. 5), or fast (v. 16), to please God rather than man. But these three examples are only introduced to prepare the way for the wider principle that in every action of our lives, and not only in almsgiving, prayer, and fasting, it is possible to lay up treasure in heaven. Not only by the right use of wealth, but by the right use of any faculty, talent, or opportunity with which God has entrusted us, heavenly treasure is laid up. Even when we are doing nothing actively for God, but are only patiently suffering what He wills that we should bear, we are laying up treasure in heaven. Every act, however small, which is done purely for the glory of God, and for no lower motive, will receive its reward.

19. Moth and rust] Wealth in Eastern lands is largely stored and hoarded. Much of it consists of costly changes of raiment, which are liable to the attacks of moths. Break through] lit. 'dig through,' viz. the wall of the house, which was often only built of clay. 21. For where your treasure is, etc.] see Lk 12³¹. The heavenly treasure is the approval of our heavenly Father, which is represented as wealth stored up in heaven, ready to be enjoyed hereafter. The earthly treasure is not only wealth (though that is its most striking exemplification), but everything lower than God Himself on which men set their hearts,—honour, fame, pleasure, ease, power, excitement, luxury, animal enjoyment.

22-24. Singlemindedness in God's service, and how it is to be attained (Lk 11³¹⁻³⁶ 16¹³). The connexion of thought is—How can we be sure that we are laying up treasure in heaven, and acting simply and purely for the glory of God? Our Lord replies: By paying attention to our consciences, and keeping them in a healthy state. We are too much inclined to believe that our consciences are sure to lead us right, forgetting that the conscience itself may be darkened by sin. Conscience is like the eye. When the eye is in a healthy state the whole body is full of light (v. 22). Every object is seen in its true colours, true proportions, and accurate position. But if there is a cataract in the eye, or malformation of the lens, or colour-blindness, then the whole body is full of darkness, or distorted light (v. 23). So it may be with conscience, and therefore we are warned against blindly trusting our consciences, which may, through past sin or from lack of moral education, be seeing things in a false light, or may even be thoroughly corrupt, giving us moral darkness instead of light. We are to put our consciences to school with Jesus Christ and to be quite sure before we trust them, that they give the same moral judgments and are as sensitive as those of the best Christians. When our consciences are sound, and our souls are full of light, we shall be able to discern whether we are serving God or mammon. If our consciences are unsound, we may go on serving mammon all our lives without knowing it.

22. The light] RV 'the lamp.' The body] In the parable the 'body' stands for the soul of man. Thine eye] i.e. thy conscience.

Single] i.e. seeing things in their true light

24. Two masters] It is a common idea that virtue shades off into vice by imperceptible gradations, and that the majority of men are neither bad nor good. Our Lord pronounces absolutely that in the last resort there are only two classes of men, those who are serving God, and those who are serving the world. Mammon] RV 'mammon.' Not a proper name as readers of Milton would naturally suppose, but an Aramaic word for 'riches' (Lk 16^{9, 11}). Here it stands for 'worldliness,' which finds its chief expression in the love of money.

25-34. The Christian's freedom from care and anxiety (Lk 12²²⁻³¹). The worldly man is oppressed with care. He is always in fear that his deep-laid plans for the future will miscarry, that some object that he loves will be torn from his grasp, that his wealth will vanish, or that his health will fail so that he can enjoy life no longer. The actual failure of his earthly prospects makes him the most miserable of men, for those prospects were his all, and however little he may confess it to himself, he in truth loves nothing else. He seemed, perhaps, to be serving God much, and mammon a little, but he was in reality serving mammon with undivided devotion.

The Christian also pays attention to worldly things. He is diligent in his trade or profession. He makes all reasonable provision for the future. Often he prospers in business just because he is a Christian, and does honest work where a less scrupulous man would not. But his heart is not set on these things, nor is he anxious about them. He does his best, and leaves the issue to God: cp. Ps 37²⁵. Observe that the promise of sufficient maintenance is made not to the idle, the improvident, and the vicious, but to the righteous, who seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness (v. 33). Those who do this can never be idle or improvident: cp. 1 Tim 5⁸.

25. Take no thought] RV 'be not anxious': cp. 1 Pet 5⁷. 26. They sow not] God provides for the birds without labour on their part, because labour is not natural to birds. But labour is natural to men, therefore God provides for men by blessing their labour. There is a close rabbinical parallel to this saying: 'Have you ever seen beast or fowl that had a workshop? and yet they are fed without trouble of mind.'

27. By taking thought] RV 'by being anxious.' One cubit unto his stature] Since no one would literally desire to have a cubit (a foot and a half) added to his stature, and the word translated 'stature' generally means 'age' (sec RM), it is better to translate, 'Which of you . . . can add one span to his age?'

28. Take ye thought] RV 'are ye anxious.'

30. Into the oven] Dried grass is used in the East for heating the baking ovens, which are holes in the ground rather more than 3 ft. deep and 2½ ft. wide, shaped like a jar. The walls are cemented to resist the action of fire. Grass is burnt in the ovens, until they are thoroughly hot. Then dough rolled out into thin sheets is spread on the sides of the oven, where it is baked in a few minutes, and is taken out in the form of wafer-cakes.

34. Take no thought] RV 'Be not anxious.' Our Lord regarded cheerfulness and joy, and the absence of care and anxiety, as the mark of a true Christian who puts his trust in God.

Similarly the rabbis said, 'There is enough of trouble in the very moment.'

CHAPTER 7

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT (concluded)

The connexion of thought in this c. is less close than in the earlier part of the sermon, and the whole c. bears the appearance of an appendix of miscellaneous practical maxims, many of which, however, may have really formed part of the sermon. The words about rash judgment, and about a tree being known by its fruit, as well as the striking conclusion, are found also in St. Luke's sermon.

1-5. On the habit of criticising others (Lk 6³⁷⁻⁴²). St. Luke's account is here the fuller, and he places the section in a more satisfactory relation to what goes before. Our Lord condemns all forms of censoriousness. He calls censorious persons hypocrites, and says that they are worse than the people they criticise. They are worse because they lack love. As love is the highest, and indeed in the last resort the only Christian virtue, so the lack of it absolutely excludes from the kingdom where all is love. Such persons are also blind. They see their brother's faults, but have no eyes for his virtues, and they neither see nor wish to see their own far greater faults.

1. Judge not] cp. Ro 2¹. Unkind and frivolous criticism is what is meant. Judgment as a serious and solemn act is not forbidden by Christ. It is indeed often the Christian's duty to judge and severely to condemn things which the world never thinks of judging: cp. 18¹⁵ 1 Cor 5¹² 2 Tim 4².

2. With what measure ye mete (i.e. 'measure')] A Jewish proverb. The rabbis said, 'In the measure that a man measureth, others measure to him.'

3. Mote] lit. 'a small dry twig or stalk.' Here it stands for a relatively small fault.

The beam] i.e. the great roof-beam of a house, something a thousand times larger than the eye itself. Here it stands for 'want of love,' the most monstrous, under Christ's law, of all vices. Here Christ again adopts a Jewish proverb. It is said that when one Jewish judge criticised another and said, 'Cast out the mote out of thine eye,' the other replied, 'Cast you out the beam out of your own eye.'

6. That the most holy things ought not to be offered indiscriminately to all persons. The earliest comment on this v. is in the 'Teaching' (Didache): 'And let no one eat or drink of your Eucharist, except those who have been baptised in the name of the Lord. For it is concerning this that the Lord hath said, Give not that which is holy unto the dogs.' This correctly apprehends the principle, which is, of course, capable of wider application. Gore well says, 'We are not to shriek the highest truths of religion at a street corner. We are to wait till people show a desire for the deepest things before we offer them religion. Such was the method of the early Church. It went out into the world. It let all the world see the beauty of its life... But it did not teach them the secrets of its life—its Creed, its Eucharist, its Prayers—till they were ready for them, and showed their readiness at least by enquiry.'

6. That which is holy] in its literal sense the flesh of the sacrifices. Metaphorically it stands for all that is most holy in Christ's religion, like the pearls below. Dogs... swine] i.e. unclean and ferocious persons. They will trample on (i.e. revile and profane) what you offer them, and assail you with ridicule and blasphemy. While they are in this frame of mind, nothing can be done with them.

7-11. On urgency in prayer, and how God rewards it (Lk 11⁹⁻¹³). God always answers urgent prayer. Every asker receives, every seeker finds. Yet not every asker receives what he asks, nor every seeker finds what he seeks. As an earthly father gives good gifts to his children, so God gives good things to those that ask Him, not always what they ask, for they often ask amiss, but something far better, even, as St. Luke's version has it, 'the Holy Spirit.' Those who would obtain exactly what they ask, must conform their wills to God's, and ask for things which they know that He is willing to grant. St. Luke connects this section with the Lord's Prayer, and illustrates it further by the parable of the Friend at Midnight. The connexion in St. Luke is much more natural and suitable.

7. Ask... seek... knock] A climax of increasing urgency. We are to wrestle with God in prayer, as Jacob wrestled with the angel (perhaps with God Himself), and said, 'I will not let thee go, except thou bless me' (Gn 32²⁶). The lesson is, 'That men ought always to pray and not to faint' (Lk 18¹).

9, 10. Bread... stone... fish... serpent] A stone is like a loaf, and a serpent is like a fish, especially some fishes. The idea is that God will not mock an earnest suppliant, by appearing to answer his prayer, and giving him something which, though apparently good, is really noxious. 11. Being evil] Christ took no roscate view of the characters of men, even after their profession of faith in Him.

12. THE GOLDEN RULE (Lk 6³¹). This v. ought to form a distinct paragraph. Our Lord looks back to what He has been saying in c. 5 about the fulfilling of the Law, and sums up His teaching on the whole subject with this important practical maxim. As originally spoken, it probably formed part of our Lord's utterances upon the Law, as it still does in St.

Luke, who brings it into connexion with the command, 'Love your enemies': see 5⁴⁴. There are certain parallels to this saying. Once a would-be proselyte went to Rabbi Hillel and demanded to be taught the whole Law while he stood upon one leg. The good rabbi made him a proselyte, saying, 'What is hateful to thyself, that do not thou to another. This is the whole law, the rest is commentary. Go, thou art perfect.' The pious Tobias thus instructs his son Tobit (Tob 4¹⁵), 'What thou thyself hatest, do thou to no man.' The Chinese sage Confucius is reported to have said, 'Do not to others what you would not wish done to yourself.' All these are noble sayings, but they fall far short of Christ's golden rule, which means, 'Not only avoid injuring your neighbour, but do him all the good you can.' They simply forbid injuries: Christ commands active benevolence.

A saying ascribed to the Gk. philosopher Aristotle is closer in form to the Golden Rule than any other, but it applies only to friends. Aristotle was once asked how we should act towards our friends, and replied, 'As we would that they should act towards us.'

12. Therefore all things] The 'therefore' looks back to Christ's teaching about the Law. The sense is, 'Because ye are my disciples, and bound to understand the OT. in its higher and more spiritual sense, therefore do unto others all that you would they should do unto you, for this is the true meaning of the Law and the Prophets.'

13, 14. The broad way and the narrow way (Lk 13²⁴⁻²⁷). Although it is a blessed thing to be a Christian, it is not easy. The Christian journeys along the narrow way of self-denial, discipline and mortification, perhaps of contempt and persecution, but the end of it is life. Much easier is the broad way of self-indulgence, avarice, pride and ambition, but the end of it is death. How many choose death, rather than life! St. Luke speaks only of the narrow 'door,' not of the narrow way, and describes the terrible condition at the last day of those who have not entered it. There is a fine heathen parallel in the allegory called 'the Tablet,' by Cebes, a disciple of Socrates: 'Seest thou not a certain small door, and a pathway before the door, in no way crowded, for only a very few travel that way, since it seems to lead through a pathless, rugged, and stony tract? That is the way that leadeth to true discipline.' There is another in the philosopher Maximus of Tyre (150 B.C.): 'There are many deceitful bypaths, most of which lead to precipices and pits, and there is a single narrow straight and rugged path, and few indeed are they who can travel by it.'

13. The strait gate] RV 'the narrow gate.' St. Matthew's word means a city gate, St.

Luke's a small gate or door. Even city gates are exceedingly narrow in the East. For wide is the gate] Several modern editors omit the words 'is the gate.' 14. Strait] R.V. 'narrow.' Narrow] R.V. 'straitened.' Few there be that find it] lit. 'few be they who are finding it.' In St. Luke the disciples definitely ask, 'Lord, are they few that be saved?' but Jesus avoids a direct answer, bidding them look to themselves, and take care that they themselves enter by the narrow door. So here Jesus does not solve the mystery of the ultimate destiny of human souls. He refuses to say what proportion of mankind will be finally lost or saved, but he does say that the majority of men do not, in this world at least, choose the narrow way that leads to life. Whether after this life God will interpose to save them from their doom, and will apply to them some chastening discipline which may bring them to a better mind is not revealed. It may be so. Holy Scripture contains certain hints in this direction (1 Pet 3¹⁹⁻⁴⁰), but nowhere gives any clear hope, lest men should be encouraged to neglect their opportunities of repentance in this life: see on 12³².

15-20. How to detect false prophets and hypocrites in general (Lk 6⁴³⁻⁴⁵). The gift of prophecy was widely diffused in the Apostolic Church, so that the warning against false prophets was needed, but the word is intended to include hypocritical Christian teachers of all kinds. How can they be known? Not always by their doctrine, which, when it suits their purpose, is orthodox, but by their works, especially by their covetousness, which is the unfailing characteristic of false prophets.

The 'Didache' has some interesting remarks about the false prophets of the sub-apostolic age. 'Let every apostle (itinerant missionary) that comes to you, be received as the Lord. He will remain one day, and if necessary, two. If he remains three days, he is a false prophet. And when the apostle goes forth from you, let him receive nothing but bread for his day's journey. If he asks money, he is a false prophet. . . A prophet who in the Spirit orders a table to be laid, shall not eat of it himself. If he does, he is a false prophet.' The modern representative of the false prophet is the minister or teacher who works for hire or popularity.

15. False prophets] Not the Pharisees, but Christian false prophets and teachers, as is clear from v. 22: cp. also 24^{11,24} 1 Jn 4¹.

Sheep's clothing] Not the official rough garb of prophets, as in Heb 11³⁷, but the disguise of those who wish to pass for sheep, i.e. for Christians. The sheep's clothing is the hypocritical professions and the outward ordination of the false teacher. 16. Fruits] Not doctrines, but works, or moral character, as always in NT. 17-19. Our Lord echoes and reinforces the Baptist's teaching: see on 3¹⁻¹².

21-23. The punishment of false prophets, and of all hypocrites. Our Lord carries us forward in thought to the day of judgment. Even then the false prophets will pretend to be sheep. They will say, 'Lord, Lord,' and plead their successful ministerial labours. But our Lord will say. I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity.

21. Lord, Lord] During His earthly ministry Jesus was generally addressed as 'Rabbi,' Teacher. Here He claims the higher title of 'Lord,' but in what sense? Clearly as implying sovereignty over the universe, which was the sense in which it was applied to Jesus in the Apostolic Church: Act 10³⁶ 1 Cor 12³ Phil 2¹¹.

Kingdom of heaven] Here used of the final bliss of heaven. He that doeth] Everywhere in NT. it is said that men will be judged according to their works, not according to their faith or profession (16²⁷ 25³⁵ Ro 2⁶ 1 Cor 3⁸ 2 Cor 5¹⁰ 1 Pet 1¹⁷ Rev 2²³ 22¹², etc.). If faith is to justify, it must be a living faith which issues in good works. 22. Cast out devils . . wonderful works] There is no reason to suppose that this claim to successful ministerial work is unfounded. It is a fact that God does sometimes, for the sake of the flock, condescend to bless the work of evil shepherds, whose lives are not openly scandalous, and in general, we may say that 'the unworthiness of the ministers hinders not the effect of the sacraments.' Of course the best and truest work cannot be done by such men. 23. I never knew you] i.e. as true disciples: cp. Lk 13²⁷. The divinity of Christ appears not only from His office of judge, but from His power to read the heart. He claims that the most secret thoughts of the millions of the human race are naked and open before Him, and this is in effect, a claim to be divine.

24-27. The true foundation for all permanent spiritual building (Lk 6⁴⁶⁻⁴⁹). The great sermon concludes with a parable. Two men built houses near a watercourse. One dug deep and reached the rock, the other built upon the sand (i.e. the alluvial deposit of the watercourse). In the winter there was a flood, and the house built on the sand collapsed. The rock is Christ's own person and teaching, the only foundation for stable, spiritual and social building. Whatever is built upon that rock, lasts. Personal character built up on Christ, i.e. on faith in Him and loyal obedience to His commands, is stable. Men can count upon it, for they feel its strength as well as its gentleness. Societies or states, based on the supremacy of Christ's moral law, last. They have in them the elements of stability, prosperity, and progress. The Christian Church itself is the greatest example of this permanence and progress. Established originally by men who had dug down to the rock and based themselves on faith in Christ's divinity and absolute self-surrender to His service (see 16¹⁸), it became a spiritual fabric which has outlasted the fall of empires, has spread to the most distant lauds, and bids fair to fulfil the promise of its Founder that the gates of hell (i.e. of death or destruction) shall not prevail against it.

24. Doeth] Again the stress upon 'doing': see Jas 1²². 25. Floods] There are hardly any rivers in Palestine except the Jordan, but there are many watercourses or winter-torrents (Heb. nahal, AV 'brook,' Arab. wādī). These are mostly quite dry in the summer, but in the winter are full of muddy torrent-water, which descends with great violence, and often overflows its banks; cp. Job 6¹⁵. The foolish man in the parable had built his house either in or close by the channel of one of these wādys, without thought of the winter rains.

28, 29. Effect of the sermon.

29. Not as the scribes] RV 'not as their scribes': see prefatory remarks to c. 5. The scribe relied entirely on tradition. Hence he was compared to a cemented eistern which held every drop of water put into it. So enamoured were the Jews of tradition, that they would hear nothing else even from a man so great as Hillel. It is said that though Hillel discoursed of a matter all day long, yet his hearers received not his doctrine, till at last he said, 'So I heard from Shemaiah and Abtalion.'

CHAPTER 8

THE LEPER CLEANSED. THE CENTURION'S SERVANT HEALED. HEALING OF PETER'S WIFE'S MOTHER AND MANY OTHERS. STILLING OF THE TEMPEST. HEALING OF THE GADARENE DEMONIACS

1-4. Cleansing of the leper (Mk 1⁴⁰ Lk 5¹²). No natural explanation of this miracle is possible. Leprosy has always been, and is still, one of the most intractable diseases. Under the Mosaic Law lepers were regarded as unclean and excluded entirely from human society: see Lv 13 and 14, and notes. Considered as a parable this miracle represents the cleansing of the human race by the Redeemer from the leprosy of sin.

1. When he was come down] Only St. Matthew mentions the historical connexion of this miracle, though both St. Mark and St. Luke agree that it took place during one of the early preaching tours in Galilee. St. Luke says that it was done in a city. The miracle comes appropriately after the sermon. Having said, 'I came not to destroy (the Law),' He now says, 'Offer the gift that Moses commanded.' Having taught with authority,

He now heals with authority, 'I will, be thou clean.' 2. Worshipped him] Lk says, 'fell on his face.' The act of reverence that was paid to kings. Perhaps the leper already regarded Jesus as the Messiah, the rightful king of Israel. He certainly had full faith in His miraculous powers. He only doubted His willingness ('if thou wilt') to heal so miserable an outcast. Often men find it easier to believe in God's power than in His mercy and love.

Lord] Here a title of human respect, as in 8²⁵ 16²² Lk 9³⁴ 10^{17,40} 11¹, etc. Make me clean] 'Cleansed as well as heal me,' because leprosy was a Levitical defilement. 3. Touched him] No one was allowed to touch or even to salute a leper. If he even put his head into a place it became unclean. No less a distance than 4 cubits (6 ft.) had to be kept from the leper, or if the wind came from that direction, 100 cubits were scarcely sufficient. By thus touching the leper, Christ also showed His superiority to the Law of Moses. So far from being Himself defiled, His touch imparted cleansing.

4. See thou tell no man] According to St. Mark He dismissed the man abruptly, almost violently, with an urgent command to be silent. Only one explanation of this is at all probable. He feared, as in Jn 6¹⁵, that the people would proclaim Him Messiah, and force Him to be the leader of a revolution. Offer the gift] i.e. a sacrifice of two he-lambs without blemish, and one ewe-lamb of the first year without blemish. For the details see Lv 14. For a testimony unto them] i.e. a proof of the genuineness of his cure. The priests, after examining him, could not refuse his gift, and their acceptance of it would be valid testimony that he had really been cured of his leprosy. In face of the injunction to tell no man, we cannot imagine that Christ intended him to notify the priests of the manner of his healing, and so challenge them to examine His claims. The man seems, however, to have disobeyed the injunction (Mk 1⁴⁵), so that this miracle helped to arouse the opposition which Christ soon afterwards encountered (9^{3,11,31}).

5-13. Healing of the centurion's servant (Lk 7¹, not, however, Jn 4⁴⁷, q. v.). The accounts in St. Matthew and St. Luke are partly drawn from independent sources, which, though agreeing in essentials, differ considerably in details. In St. Matthew the centurion himself comes to Jesus. In St. Luke he first sends certain Jewish elders to plead for him, then some of his friends, and apparently does not see Jesus at all. St. Luke's narrative is the fuller and more original. The discrepancy with St. Matthew is not a serious one. It is quite common to represent a person as doing himself what he really does through others. St. Matthew alone records Christ's remarkable utterance as to the rejection of Israel and the call of the Gentiles, vv. 11, 12. St. Luke, however, has nearly the same words in another connexion (Lk 13²⁸).

5. A centurion] A Roman legionary officer commanding a century (i.e. from 50 to 100 men, the hundredth part of a legion), and occupying the social position of a modern sergeant or non-commissioned officer. Whether this centurion was directly under Roman authority, or was in the employ of Herod Antipas, in whose kingdom he served, is not certain. He was a heathen, and though favourably impressed by Judaism, it is probable from the language of v. 8 that he was not a proselyte. Several centurions appear in the NT., all in a very favourable light: 27³⁴ Ac 10, 27, and 28. 'Probably,' says Trench, 'in the general wreck of the moral institutions of the heathen world, the Roman army was one of the few in which some of the old virtues survived.' The troops of Palestine were recruited locally from the heathen of Samaria and Cæsarea, and were auxiliaries. The legionary soldiers proper were required to be Roman citizens. The centurion, being an officer, was probably a Roman. According to St. Luke, he did not venture to come himself, but sent certain Jewish elders, who said, 'He is worthy that thou shouldest do this for him, for he loveth our nation, and himself built us our synagogue.'

6. My servant] The expression might mean 'my little son,' but it is plain from St. Luke that it was a favourite slave who was ill.

8. Lord, I am not worthy] Both the centurion and the elders judged Jesus by Jewish standards. That Jesus should heal a Gentile at all, except for some very special reason, was thought impossible. Still more unlikely was it that He would enter a Gentile house, which was regarded as defiled, and defiling those who entered it (Jn 18²⁸). Speak the word only] lit. 'speak with a word.' In believing that Jesus could heal at a distance, the centurion showed remarkable faith. Perhaps his faith was assisted by the similar miracle worked shortly before in the same city upon the son of a certain 'nobleman' (Jn 4⁴⁶).

9. For I am a man under authority] The sense is: I am myself only a servant of others, and yet I have soldiers under me whom I can send where I please to carry out my will. How much more canst Thou, who art Lord of the powers of nature, speak the word and be obeyed. The centurion expresses his faith that angels and spirits and diseases are as obedient to Jesus as his soldiers are to him.

11. Shall sit down (lit. 'recline at table') with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob] The rabbis taught that the Messianic age would be ushered in by a great feast. All Israel, with its patriarchs, prophets, and heroes, would be there. The Gentiles would be excluded, and would have the mortification of seeing all the sumptuous preparations. Every (clean) animal that exists, and many that do not, would be eaten at that feast, e.g. the Leviathan, Behemoth, the gigantic bird Bar Jochani, and certain fabulous fabled geese. The wine of the feast would have been kept in the grapes from the creation of the world. King David would return thanks according to Ps 116¹⁸. Very startling, therefore, was the declaration of Jesus that Gentiles from all nations would be admitted to this Messianic feast, and many circumcised Jews ('sons of the kingdom') excluded. In the NT., the figure of a banquet or marriage feast is several times used (as here) to represent participation in Christ's Kingdom, both in this world and the next: see 22² 25¹⁰ Rev 19⁷. The present passage is a double prophecy (inserted most suitably in a Gospel meant for Jewish readers), (1) of the admission of the Gentiles on equal terms with the Jews into the Christian Church, and of the exclusion of many of the latter; (2) of the final salvation of many Gentiles, and of the reprobation of merely nominal Jews.

12. The children (RV 'sons') of the kingdom] i.e. the Jews. Outer darkness, etc.] a rhetorical description of the sorrow and disappointment of those who are excluded. The gnashing of teeth represents anger and disappointment, not torture: see Ps 112¹⁰ Ac 7⁵⁴.

14-17. Healing of Peter's mother-in-law, and of many sick and possessed persons (Mk 1²⁹ Lk 4³⁸). According to St. Mark and St. Luke these miracles took place on the sabbath, after the synagogue service at which Jesus preached and healed a demoniac.

14. Peter's house] Peter was a married man (1 Cor 9⁵). He had a house in Capernaum, which he shared with his brother Andrew, and apparently with his wife's mother.

15. Ministered] i.e. 'waited at table.' The fever had left no weakness. 16. Possessed] According to St. Luke the devils cried out, 'Thou art the Son of God,' and recognised Him as the Christ. 17. Isa 53⁴, quoted from the Hebrew. This application of the passage to the miracles of healing does not conflict with its deeper fulfilment in Christ's atoning work on the Cross (Jn 1²⁹ 1 Pet 2²⁴).

18-22. Sayings to a scribe and another disciple (Lk 9³⁷). St. Luke introduces these sayings much later in our Lord's ministry. Both evangelists apparently borrowed from a common source, which did not specify the occasion of the utterances.

19, 20. The offer of a recognised rabbi (scribe) to become a follower of Jesus was an attractive one, especially as no influential person had yet become a disciple. Jesus, however, did not hastily accept the offer. To test the sincerity of the new convert, he required him to count the cost. He must give up all to follow Christ—home-comforts, wealth, honour, and all prospects of advancement. Like his Master, he must have no place to lay his head. Probably the scribe, like the rich young ruler, found the conditions too hard.

19. Master] i.e. Rabbi, a title of respect properly belonging only to scribes. It was sometimes accorded by courtesy to our Lord, as here.

20. The Son of man] This title of Christ is found only in the Gospels and Ac 7⁵⁶, and (except in Ac 7⁵⁶) is found only in the mouth of our Lord Himself. It corresponds in Aramaic, which our Lord habitually spoke, either to bar nasha, which may mean either 'the man,' or (but this is not so certain) 'the son of man,' or else to b'reh d'nasha, which means definitely and emphatically 'the son of man' (lit. 'his son, that of man'). That our Lord, who was probably bilingual, occasionally used the Gk. title as found in the Gospels, is also very possible. The title was used by our Lord throughout His ministry, and not, as is sometimes erroneously supposed, only from the time of St. Peter's confession (16¹³). This fact must be taken account of in ascertaining its probable meaning. It follows from this that it cannot have been, as is sometimes maintained, a definite and well-understood designation of the Messiah. Our Lord concealed His Messiahship from the multitude until the close of His ministry, and did not expressly reveal it even to the Twelve until the confession of Peter. That it was not understood by the multitudes to be a Messianic title is evident from Jn 12³⁴.

The title probably designates our Lord as the ideal or representative man, 'the man in whom human nature was most fully and deeply realised, and who was the most complete exponent of its capacities, warm and broad in His sympathies, ready to minister and suffer for others, sharing to the full the needs and deprivations which are the common lot of humanity, but conscious at the same time of the dignity and greatness of human nature, and destined ultimately to exalt it to unexampled majesty and glory.' At the close of His life He invested it with a more definitely Messianic meaning by identifying Himself with the 'one like unto a son of man' of Dan 7¹³, who was generally understood to be the Messiah: see Mt 26^{63, 64}. The expression was used by our Lord of Himself on at least forty different occasions, and in very diverse contexts. Thus he uses it in connexion with His authority to forgive sins (9⁶), His lordship over the sabbath (12⁸), His Second Advent in glory (10²³ 13⁴¹ 16^{27, 28} 19²⁸ 24^{27, 30, 37, 41} 25³¹ 26⁶⁴), His familiar intercourse with men in daily life (11¹⁹), His poverty (8²⁰),

His preaching (13³⁷), His sufferings and resurrection (Mt 17^{9, 12, 22} 20¹⁸ 26²⁴ Mk 8³¹), His giving His life as a ransom (20²⁸), and His seeking and saving that which was lost (Lk 19¹⁰). St. Stephen uses it of our Lord as glorified in heaven. The title occurs twelve times in St. John's Gospel, for the most part in passages which clearly imply His divinity. The Son of man exists in heaven before His Incarnation, and descends to earth to become man (Jn 6⁶²); He gives His flesh and blood to believers to eat and drink, who are thus incorporated with Him and receive eternal life (Jn 6^{57, 61}); He holds unbroken communion with the Father during His earthly life (Jn 1¹⁴); He is the object of divine and saving faith (Jn 3¹⁵); His death on the cross is not a degradation but a glorification (Jn 12²³ 13³¹), and He ends His earthly course by a triumphant ascension (Jn 6⁶²).

The title 'Son of man' is used of the Messiah in a part of the book of Enoch (chs. 37-70), which is probably, but not certainly, pre-Christian. It is just possible that our Lord may have derived it from this source. But in any case the title was very little known, and was not popularly understood to mean the Messiah. Some have thought that the source of the title is Ps 8 (see especially v. 4).

22. Follow me; and let the dead, etc.] This difficult saying is variously interpreted: (1) My claim comes before all other claims. It is better that the dead should remain buried, than that thou shouldest delay to enter upon the solemn ministry to which I have called thee. (N.B. The funeral and subsequent mourning would cause a delay of several weeks.) (2) Let the dead (i.e. thy unbelieving relations who are spiritually dead through lack of faith in Me) bury thy father for thee, and come thou, follow Me at once.

The man's father was probably either dead or at the point of death, although some think that he was only aged, and that the disciple asked to remain at home till death occurred, thus indefinitely postponing his obedience to Christ's call.

23-27. The stilling of the tempest (Mk 1¹⁵ Lk 8²²). St. Mark and St. Luke both place the incident after the series of parables which St. Matthew records in c. 13. This is at once one of the best-attested miracles, and one of the most incomprehensible to those who desire to limit our Lord's miracles to those of healing. It is perhaps possible to regard the cessation of the storm as a fortunate coincidence, but it is certain that Jesus Himself did not take this view of it. He rebuked the wind and sea, showing that He regarded Himself as the Lord of physical nature as well as of the spiritual world. By stilling the storm Christ showed that, behind the inexorable and awful manifestations of nature, storm, pestilence, volcanic eruptions, and sudden death, which seem to treat man's sufferings with indifference, there is the loving hand of divine providence. In the last resort nature is subject to God's holy and righteous will.

The miracle is also a parable, setting forth Christ as a giver of peace and safety, both to individuals and to His Church. St. Augustine (400 A.D.) says, 'We are sailing in this life as through a sea, and the wind rises, and storms of temptation are not wanting. Whence is this, save because Jesus is sleeping in thee, i.e. thy faith in Jesus is slumbering in thy heart? Rouse Him and say, Master, we perish. He will awaken, that is, thy faith will return to thee, and the danger will be over.' Tertullian (200 A.D.) says, 'But that little ship presented a figure of the Church, in that she is disquieted in the sea, i.e. in the world, by the waves, i.e. by persecutions and temptations, the Lord patiently sleeping, as it were until roused at last by the prayers of the saints. He checks the world, and restores tranquillity to His own.'

24. Tempest] lit. 'shaking.' The word generally means 'earthquake.' 'To understand the causes of these sudden and violent tempests, we must remember that the lake lies low, six hundred feet lower than the Mediterranean Sea, that the vast and naked plateaus of Jaulan (the district E. of the lake) rise to a great height, spreading backward to the wilds of Hauran, and upwards to the snowy Hermon; that the watercourses have cut out profound ravines and wild gorges, converging to the head of the lake, and that these act like gigantic funnels to draw down the winds from the mountains' (Thompson).

27. What manner of man] The disciples already begin to think that Jesus is more than a mere man.

28-34. The healing of the Gadarene demoniacs (Mk 5¹ Lk 8²⁶). There are real difficulties in connexion with this narrative, but that upon which Professor Huxley laid so much stress in his controversy with Mr. Gladstone, 1889-91, is assuredly the least. Speaking of the destruction of the swine he said, 'Everything that I know of law and justice convinces me that the wanton destruction of other people's property is a misdemeanour of evil example,' as if He, who gives life and health and all things to all men, cannot take back His own gifts when He will. More serious is the difficulty presented by the transference of the devils from the men into the swine (vv. 31, 32). It may, perhaps, be sufficient to remark that it is not certain that this is the true interpretation of the incident. The transference itself could not from the nature of the case have been observed. It was an inference from the request of the devils
